/The Mongo file consists of nine sources, three of which are translations from the French, and four translations from the Flemish and one from the German. The main sources in this file are 1:Maes and 2:Hulstaert. 1:Maes is a general survey of the peoples in the southern part of the Mongo territory - particularly the Ekonda. 2:Hulstaert is a long, thorough study of the ramifications of the Nkundu Mongo marriage pattern. 3:Boelaert and 4:Gutersohn are short articles on Mongo society and economics. 5:Brepoels and 6:Kaptein are brief articles on family life and customs. 7:Brown examines the functions of a local official among the Ntomba Mongo. 8:Muller and 9:Boelart deal with kin and social organization.

An Outline of World Cultures change has been made so that FO37 Ntomba and FO48 Yaelima have been subsumed under the general heading FO32 Mongo, and the special OWC numbers for these groups have been dropped. There were no other special marking decisions made.

This file is strong on materials pertaining to marriage, the life cycle in general terms, and political organization. It is deficient on materials relating to human biology, psychology, the ethnosciences and demography. --Analyst/

Moreover, we find these same forms among the Babuba and Bashilele, up to the region of the Bankutshu of Bena Dibele-Kole. These various tribes have also reproduced in their sculpture the designs of the shaved parts of the head, which are so uniform and so characteristic. In this respect these various tribes are related, and their ethnic affinity seems very clear. Despite their present remoteness from each other and the absence of all tribal intercourse, their ethnic kinship is clearly shown in the mementos they have preserved of the ancestral culture.

1) The Bateke-Banfumu group, with its chignon hairdo over the nape of the neck and the rest of the head shaved or with the hair cut short.

2) The group including the Ipanga and the eastern peoples, with their hairdo of two braids passing behind the ears and under the chin and the upright roll on top of the head. [179]

3) The group including the tribes of Lake Leopold II and the lower Lukenie up to the Ipanga region, where having the hair arranged in tiny braids predominates.

The few groups of natives who inhabit this region have built their villages along the river on raised ground, safe from the periodic floods.

In the forest region the villages seem to be scattered purely at random.

The huts are built in the center of a large clearing, surrounded by manioc plots and banana groves which are encircled in the distance by uncleared forest.

Such is the region that we crossed from Stanley Pool to Kassai-Kwango, from the Fimi to Lake Leopold II, and over the entire basin of the Lukenie.

The first peoples we encountered there belong to the Bateke [Teke] group. Their territory lies around Stanley Pool and extends to the north as far as the Lufimi. Beyond that live the Banfumungu [Fumu], also called Banfugumu, Banfumuka, Baumbu, or simply Bamfumu.

North of the Kasai and along the banks of the Congo live the Bayanzi [Yanzi] or Babangi. Their neighbors to the east, the Baboma [Boma] or Babuma, occupy the whole of the confluence of the Fimi and the Kasai, up to the left bank of the lower Kwango.

The Wadia [Dia] live to the north of the Baboma between Nioki and Kutu and extend along the Boriempa and the western shore of Lake Leopold II up to the territory of the Mosengere [Sengele].

The region occupied by the Basakata [Sakata] stretches along the left bank of the Lukenie-Fimi between Bokoro and Moleke.

The Mosengere or Monsengere are settled along the Olonga-Uele in the region of Bongo. Northwest of this group we encountered the Bakutu [Kutu], whose territory extends beyond the boundaries of the Lake Leopold II district. [8]

The Ipanga and the Batitu or Atshitu, inhabit the Oshwe sector both north and south of the Lukenie. The region occupied by the Bokala lies farther east, between the Lodima and Bumbuli.

The Yaelima are found from east of Bumbuli to the Dekese sector and up to Dengese country.

A few Bashilele [Lele] groups are settled at the confluence of the Kasai and Sankuru. Their territory extends far to the south between the Kasai and the Loanga.

[14] During our stay in the village of Chief Pokei, Baboma tribe, one of the dignitaries died. This death gave rise to an important mourning ceremony, as required by custom. The whole gunpowder supply of the deceased had been used to announce his death to the neighboring villages. Sorrow was expressed in the noisiest and most unexpected ways. The sobs of the women, the cries of despair of the relatives, and the plaintive chanting of the official female mourners mingled with the roll of the drums and the guttural and incoherent cries of the men, who kept drinking in order to express their sorrow more convincingly. All this display is an act. The screams and cries of grief are duties and are all feigned. [15] The Banfumungu cry over the death of a neighbor in the same way as they go hunting; the women mourn and cry just as they prepare food. All this is done as another job, because it is customary, because it is obligatory.

Introduction

● 101 This study deals with the marriage laws and customs of a large group of the Nkundó [Nkundu] people. Therefore, it would be useful at the beginning to give some general information about this people, who are very interesting from the ethnological standpoint. Then we can define the specific purpose of our investigation.

101 131 The Nkundó or Mongo occupy almost the entire length of the central basin of the Belgian Congo, from the Lulonga-Lopori [rivers] in the north all the way to Lake Leopold II, and beyond the Lukenie [River] as far as the Kasai [River]. In the west they touch the Congo River only south of the "Ruki" (1); the western part of the old Lulonga District is occupied by the Ngombe, whose territory extends as far as the Maringa [River] (known to the natives as Lǔwo) upstream from Basankusu (Basǎnkoso according to the natives). (2) In the east they may be found as far as, and even beyond, the Lomami. In the southeast they have penetrated into the northwestern part of Sankuru District. At the present time it is still impossible to delineate precisely their eastern and southeastern boundaries; the Bambólé, the Bahamba, the Mïtuku, the Bangelengele, [4] the Balengola, the Basongola, and even the Batetela and the "Bakusu," are either Móngo or very closely related. (1)

1. Ruki is probably a corruption of Bolóki, a tribe of fishermen living downstream on the banks of this river, which the natives prefer to call Loilaka.

2. According to Bittremieux and Lestaeghe, a few Nkundó remain on Nsumba Island near Nouvelle-Anvers (Congo, 1922, Vol. 1, p. 194).

101 1. See Donckerwolcke, in Kongo-Overzee, Vol. 1, p. 235, and my article in Congo, Vol. 1, p. 13. The fact that Donckerwolcke

161 It is impossible to give an exact figure for the size of the population we have just defined. In any case one can estimate that it is more than a million.

184 Throughout the huge territory occupied by this people, only insignificant differences in institutions or language can be observed. Greater divergences appear in the material manifestations of culture.

101 563 In my opinion it is likely that certain groups which belong among the Nkundo-Móngo as far as culture and speech are concerned, may be distinguished from them in genealogy and history. Among these are the true Elína or riverain people (the Bolóki, the Eleku, the Elíngá of the upper Lomela and the upper Tshuapa), (2) the Ngombe tribes of the Lomela, the Mbólé, the Bakutu of the Lomela-Tshuapa (with whom one should probably include the Ntómbá and the Nkóle), (3) and perhaps also the Mpámá and the Losakanyi. (4). This likelihood

● 101 classifies the Bakela (or Boyéla), who are unquestionably pure Móngo, among the Wakutshu [Wakusu] or Batetela is highly significant.

2. We exclude a few Libinja and Basokó clans living near Coquilhatville, since they are clearly of alien origin. The native name for the Tshuapa [River] is Jwafa or Jafa and, higher up, Lwafa. Among the Bongandó and the Bahamba it is called the Laha.

3. See my article in Congo, 1931, Vol.1, pp. 21 ff.

4. The latter are erroneously called Losakanja by Father Schebesta in Vollblutneger und Halbzwerge, p. 199. They seem to have lived formerly on the lower Momboyo River (Luilaka); the land on which Flandria Mission has been established still bears their name.

Pygmies FO4
Batswa

M 101 563 does not exclude the possibility of a distant kinship, but the present state of our knowledge makes the solution to this question impossible; for very close resemblances may be explained by a common origin as well as by a period of living in close contact, and differences may be due to diverse origins [5] or to a temporary separation at a certain point in history.

P M 101 563 144 A considerable number of Pygmoids or Pygmiforms (1) (Batswá, Jǒfe, Balúmbe, Bilángi, Boné) are to be found scattered among the Nkundó. They share a community of social and economic interests with their "masters." The Botswá belongs to his master and depends on him, but he is not, strictly speaking, his slave. His master not only has rights over him; he also has obligations to fulfill. Most of the Pygmoids are to be found in the western part of Nkundó territory; in the east they are very rare.

M 101 173 The Nkundó-Móngo came from the north or northeast, while the Mbólé claim to have come from the northwest, and the Bakutu from the west. (2)

M 101 A word should be said about the name of these people. Ordinarily, we call them the Nkundó-Móngo. The first of these names is used in the west and in the south, the second especially in the north and in the east. The Elángá of the Losanganya region are called the Mongo êa Lolo, or the Upstream Móngo, by the peoples to the west of them. Foreigners call all these peoples, including the Nkundó, the Mbólé, the Bakutu, etc., by the name of Móngo. In literature one sometimes encounters the name of Lolo or Balolo. (3) But, as we have seen, lolo is not a proper noun but simply the word meaning "upstream"

1. This name was proposed by Father Schebesta, op. cit., p. 170.

2. See my study, previously cited, passim.

3. For example, the name of the Protestant mission of the Lulonga is "Congo Balolo Mission."

● 101 (in other dialects translated as nkoto).

The people are called Nkundó or Mó̲ngo̲, never Bankundó or 101 Bamó̲ngo̲. The prefix ba is often heard, as it may be used in front 193 of all proper nouns, similarly to the French usage in les Molière, les Rubens, etc. [or the English usage: the Browns, the French, the Nkundó]. The singular prefix bo is also used, but only rarely. [6] I have heard it only in the expression: ale ó bonkundó mongo, "He is a real Nkundo." This statement was made only in speaking of a foreigner who had successfully assimilated the Nkundó language and culture. It is possible, however, that it has a broader meaning.

Is it possible to discover an etymology for these names? 101 Mó̲ngo̲ is a common noun signifying something excellent, expecially a person. People say mó̲ng'ěy'ǒ̲na, "a fine child," mó̲ng'ěy'ǒmoto, a superb woman." (The name should be compared also with the term imó̲ngo̲, which denotes the state of being of a person who is well thought of, prosperous, rich, etc.) The form of the word does not change in the plural. The name Nkundó is more difficult to explain, if an explanation is at all possible. (1) If the name is to be related to some other word, the only possibility is the verb kundola, "to unearth what has been buried." But to unearth what? The corpses of one's enemies, in order to prove one's daring by eating them? Or copper rings, which would mean their wealth? The possibility is there, but we have no direct evidence. According to Fathers Bittremieux and Lestaeghe (on p. 195 of the article mentioned), some maintain that Nkundó means nkóló, "master." But what is the basis for this explanation? (2)

1. The word is Nkundó not Nkundu or Kundu. The assertion that the initial n is not part of the word, but is simply a nasal sound which must precede a consonant in the native sound system, shows a real lack of linguistic knowledge.

2. In contrast to the Batswá, the Nkundó and other groups are Baotó (sing. Bootó), meaning non-Batswá.

101 The explanation that I judge to be the most plausible is that Nkundɔ́ means "people of the interior." As a matter of fact, the name is almost always used in contrast to Elínga, "riverain people," and sometimes in contrast to other groups. But the original meaning of the term was probably broadened through contact with other Negro groups and with Europeans; it may thus have become the more or less specific name of the group. Still it should be noted that if you ask a Ngombe whether his tribe is Elínga, "riverain-fishermen," [7] he may answer you, "Among us there are Elíngá and there are Nkundɔ́." His reply would confirm our supposition. The word is thus a synonym of Nkondaka, which is found in several dialects at the equator. (1)

> 1. See my cited article, p. 19. I have also heard this term among the Lifumba. Nkondaka should be compared with the name Ekonda, and with bokonda, "forest on dry land," and with the verb konda, "to silt up, to be filled with alluvium, to become dry ground."

One often hears the Bombwanja contrasted with the Bokɔ́tɛ́. In many cases Bokotɛ́ is a synonym for Nkundɔ́, in the present-day meaning of the word. In his study of the Wǎngatá (Revue Congolaise, Vol. 1, 1910), Engels, who knew these peoples well since he was among other things administrator of the territory of Bokatola, already contrasted the Bombwanja and the Bokɔ́tɛ́. It seems to me that this name is the true name of the people in question, or at least for a great portion of them. It has no other meaning in the language of the present day. Etymologically, however, it may be related to the verb kɔ́ta, "to grow old," or to another kɔ́ta, as in kɔ́ta likambo (elsewhere bɔ́tola), "to end a dispute by pronouncing a final judgment," kɔ́ta lisolɔ́, "to have the last word in a discussion," kɔ́ta esɛ́, "to ensure peace and order in the village," and in the verb derived from it, kɔ́tela, "to be competent, skillful."

Leaving aside the Mbɔ́lɛ́, etc., as well as the tribes of the Lukenie [River], we can distinguish a number of different groups within the Nkundo-Mɔ́ngo: the Nsongɔ́ (Mbonje), Elangá, Bosaka, Bongandɔ́, Boyɛ́la, Ekonda, etc. Each of these contains a number of subdivisions or tribes.

101 We have excluded the majority of these groups from the scope of our study and have confined ourselves to a territory limited as follows: it is bound in the north by the Ruki-Tshuapa; in the east by the Salonga as far as the Mbólé boundary; in the south by a line running from the junction of the Luilaka and the Lwíle to the northern boundary of the Bombwanja of the Lokoló and then to the boundary of the Ekonda; in the west by the Bolóko, a tributary of the Ruki. In other words, we are considering only a very small part of the territory of the Nkundó tribes. But [8] it is the only part we have been able to investigate thoroughly. We are including the Bombwanja and the Elíngá who have settled in the area thus outlined.

101 563 The Elíngá live only along the big rivers. In our area they include in addition to the true Elíngá (of whom there are only about ten clans belonging to the Bolóki group, who have settled between Ikéngé and Bokéle and Mpakú, and the four or five Eleku villages on the Salonga), the Nkóle and Ekonda (1) villages who have adopted the way of life and customs of the Elíngá. (2)

As to the Bombwanja, their clans may be found scattered throughout the area. They are more or less dependent on clans of other peoples with whom they live and form hamlets of a sort in a great many villages. A solid bloc of them is to be found in the vicinity of Bokátola. It is constituted as an independent district [chefferie] even though, according to "custom," it "belongs" as a julé (pl. baulé), "subject," or "subjugated clan" (the verb is uja) to certain Bokóté villages or groups. (3) It is quite possible that these

2. See the data on the history and life of the Elíngá published by Father Boelaert, M.S.C., in Congo, 1935, Vol. 2, p. 705.

3. The same is true of the Bombwanja group of the Lokoló. Other clans are scattered Bombwanja were originally Mbólé, for certain words and idioms in their dialect are reminiscent of the Lombólé.

Let us briefly enumerate the other tribes -- "pure" Nkundó -- who form the subject of this study: 101 619

1. The Injóló, "sister's son" (bonankáná) of the Ntómbá and the Bolénge who live beyond the Boloko. They are divided into three groups [9] -- Engónjó, Wesé, and Ngombe, (1) each of which comprises a subdistrict [sous-chefferie] for administrative purposes. A small segment is to be found outside the area under discussion, between the Boloko and Coq. (2)

2. The Boángí (and their subgroup, the Besombó), related to the Bokála of the Losanganya region. (3)

101 563 among the Elángá beyond the Tshuapa. All of them are beyond the scope of this study. The Bombwanja are divided into Basuné and Bonkoso, and the Boendé are considered their bónankáná (sister's son).

1. West of their territory are to be found the remains of a group of former inhabitants of the area, whom the present inhabitants call Tompoko (or Baséká Bofáka l'Eléké) but who are completely unknown to me.

2. The southern Injóló are often called Imoma.

[114] 3. On the ethnographic map of the Belgian Congo prepared and published by Dr. J. Maes, the territory of the Boangi is marked with the name "Bokuala." There is no tribe or village by that name. Unless an insulting and humiliating nickname (bokwala, "slave") is involved, the name may result from an erroneous use of the name of the present chief of the Boangi, Bokwála.

3. The Ionda, related to the Bonyanga living north of the Tshuapa.

4. The Wǎngatá-Ntómbá, of whom one group is settled near Igende at the junction of the Tshuapa and the Momboyo, and another on the Jwalé. Other parts of this tribe may be found near Coquilhatville (district [chefferie] of the "Tumba"), near Bokote (Ikengo district), and at the middle section of the Luilaka, between Waka and Bonkoto (Nkundêngolo, or Wafanya and "Tumba"). (4)

4. At the present time it is impossible to determine the exact relationship between the Ntómbá and the Wǎngatá. In general the latter are treated as a subdivision of the Ntómbá, together with the Inganda and the Ikengo. Moreover, we do not know yet whether these Ntómbá are related to other tribes bearing the same name which are frequently encountered (on the Lopori, in the vicinity of Lake Tumba, and Lake Leopold II, among the Bakutu, etc.), or whether these are no more than groups bearing the same name. It should be noted that on the map previously mentioned, the Wǎngatá are placed much too far north; actually they are all to be found south of the Ruki.

5. The Bakáala, who seem to be more or less related to the Wǎngatá.

6. The Bonkoso.

7. The three sister tribes of the Bongíli, the Bombomba, and the Lifumba (the Beloko are a subtribe of the latter). [10]

8. The village of Bomángola, wedged in among the Lifumda. This village contains no more than thirty taxpayers but since it belongs to the Nsongó, the oldest of all Nkundó-Móngo groups, it is considered as a separate district. (1)

1. Their primacy has always been recognized and respected by the Lifumba.

619 9. The Bongale. Three large villages belonging to this group are to be found in the territory under discussion. In order of their size they are: Bongale wǎ Botóló (among the Lifumba, between the Bonsómbé, Lolíma and Saási rivers), Bongale wǎ Ilinga (among the Bakáalá, near Ikéngé), and Bongale wǎ Bo̱so̱ngú (among the Bonkoso, near Bempumba). [563] The difference between their rules of exogamy and those of the other tribes confirms the view that the Bongale are not true Nkundó. (2)

2. See Chapter V, Article III. There are several other small Bongale groups, but I do not know whether they are related to those mentioned above. Among them are those living near Bo̱nye̱ka (Busira) among the Boángi (Bokála, Boénjola). They may be descended from different ancestors who all bore the name Ngale. The same name may indicate an identical origin, but it may also be derived from different individuals whose names were the same. This statement is generally applicable.

The tribes living between the Jwalé and the Boloko, with whom the Bolénge and the Ntómbá between the Congo and the Boloko are sometimes classified, are grouped under the general name of Ilángá by the Boángí, Injó̱ló̱, and Elángá. (3)

[114] 3. The Bokele tribe listed on the above-mentioned map does not exist. Could this error be due to an incorrect extension of the name of a Boloki village near Bokúma which is called Bokélé?

The Nkundó-Mó̱ngo̱ came from the north or the northeast. (4)

[825] 4. The following note may be of interest: The stories and songs of the Nkundó indicate a > recollection of an animal of the leopard family which they call bokonga. Their description of it corresponds to the lion. Some soldiers and other expatriates, who were also young people, shown representations of a lion immediately identified it with their bokonga.

The groups under discussion here lived for a time on the banks of the Luwo (Maringa) and the [11] upper Ikelemba, (1) then under pressure from other Móngo tribes, they crossed the Tshuapa-Ruki. They evicted the Ekonda and settled in their present location. This exodus must have taken place a fairly long time ago; it is impossible to determine the date and difficult to make any estimates. In any case it must have occurred 150 to 200 years ago.

244 These peoples are primarily farmers; they grow chiefly bananas, manioc, yams, colocasia [taro], sweet potatoes, sugar cane, and various vegetables and condiments. The food crops they grow, together with what they gather and the Elaeis palm trees provide them with a continuous and abundant food supply, as long as elephants do [231] not interfere. Their domestic animals include chickens, goats, and 224 dogs. (2) Hunting is a pleasant change of activity rather than an

THE NKUMU OF THE TUMBA

RITUAL CHIEFTAINSHIP ON THE MIDDLE CONGO

H. D. BROWN

● 101 THE tribes living round Lake Tumba, a lake some thirty-five miles long by twelve wide lying north of Lake Leopold II (approximately 0° 30′ south latitude, [133] and 18° east longitude) and draining into the Congo River at the confluence of the Ubangi, lack cohesion and show a considerable variety of custom and language. But they are known collectively as Tumba, the Government adaptation of the Native term Ntomba. Most of them are found to the east of the lake, the whole group numbering perhaps little more than forty to fifty thousand at the present time, though
[797] there is evidence that the last twenty years have seen a great decrease in population. European occupation of this area goes back barely fifty years, Protestant missions having been established for about the same length of time. The first mission post [177] was established at Ikoko on the north-east shore of the lake, one of the villages of a group known as Bonginda. In pursuing this investigation particular attention has been given to the practices of this group, but mention is occasionally made where considerable differences have been found elsewhere.

105 The Tumba are agricultural, hunting, and fishing people. Their country is flat 13 and swampy with dense forests, and there are many watercourses flowing into Lake Tumba. There are occasional small, less swampy plains, and one such area, more open, with quite wide stretches of prairie, is a haunt of buffalo. The forests are fairly well supplied with game, and the swamps, streams, and lakes with fish. A heavy rainfall and no distinct dry season make agriculture reasonably easy and famine unknown. Every family has its plantation of manioc, the staple diet, which is supplemented by plantains and bananas. The people make their own tools, formerly smelting their own iron for this purpose, are fairly skilful at making dug-out canoes, engage in weaving raffia and making mats out of split cane, and are efficient at pottery production.

624 The role of the nkumu in the socio-religious activities of the community is one of the most interesting features of Tumba life. As a result of European contact the 101 ceremonies connected with the nkumu are rapidly disappearing, but it has been 178 possible to collect considerable information from the older men and women among whom the details are still vividly remembered.[1] The following report refers to the period previous to European occupation and control, a time within the memory of a large number of people, but already sufficiently remote to become a matter of hearsay before the lapse of many more years.

596 An understanding of the place of the nkumu among the Tumba requires a glance [173] at the tribal organization. According to the people themselves, they migrated westward, and coming into these parts chose land for themselves. Among the several

[1] In My Children of the Forest, New York, 1924, pp. 48–51, Andrew F. Hensey has briefly outlined some of the items of interest observed among the nkumu of the district adjacent to that of the present study. These more detailed notes are, however, timely if a record is to be preserved that approximates to accuracy.

[12] and Lévi-Strauss (7) were consulted (8).

7. Structures élémentaires.

8. I am particularly indebted to Prof. Mühlmann for his advice and references to source material.

By their very nature, all attempts to recognize ethnosociological ideal types must remain incomplete and are in constant need of revision on the basis of ethnographic reality (9).

9. Mühlmann, Methodik, p. 120.

Such revision can only be carried out if each field worker, while studying his material, compares the existing terminology with "his" realities and if he then submits the result of this comparison to the scrutiny of others. Unfortunately the use of ethnosociological terms is often dictated primarily by the convictions and preferences of the individual author who may neither refer to the existing terminology nor otherwise inform the reader of what he means exactly by the various terms. Many authors in this respect follow such unreliable standards as their "feeling for the language" or they act under the delusion that their private terminology corresponds to what is generally accepted. Too often, however, the actual usage differs considerably from what has been suggested in terminological studies. As a result terms like "clan," "kinship group [Sippe]," and "large family [Grossfamilie]" create different impressions among different readers.

In the present study the terminology of the authors mentioned above will be discussed in relation to the kinship and local groups of the Ekonda. [101] We are concerned here with the northwestern subdivision of the Ekonda who live in the Bikoro territory. The Ekonda belong to the large group, the Móngo.

602 another group. According to their relationship to others, groups may be designated as:

brother, younger or older; brother or half brother (descended from various wives of the polygynous ancestor); [848] Illegitimate child of the sister which, legally, as the child of the oldest brother or of the father of his mother, belongs to the group of the mother's relatives; child of a boy who together with his sister has moved to the unit of his brothers-in-law and has settled there permanently; son of a sister, who for some reason has separated from his paternal relatives and has moved in with the group of his mother or of one of his grandmothers.

601 Present-day social relationships are influenced by this variety of kinship relations. The kinship terms which refer to the relationships of the genuine or assumed ancestors to each other are occasionally transferred to the groups.

621 In this paper we shall describe the Isangi group (12) as an

12. Müller, Fürstentum [Kingdom], pp. 68 ff., 125, 128 ff.

●[101] example of hierarchical kinship structure. Isangi is a local group of the type described above (p. 1). Following the custom of the region, I shall refer to it as a "village." Until we have decided which terms are applicable to the various groups, I shall use the letters A to E for the individual ranks of the hierarchical structure. Within this system A shall stand for the smallest and E for the largest units (see Diagram 2).[1]

In addition to the three ranks of Group D in Isangi, there are others in the daughter villages (see Diagram 1). These may also include foreign groups, as, for example, the "Nkundó" group, Liimbu, in Wengá.

101 114 [218] The Nkundo [Nkundu], or Mongo, are an important ethnic group of the central basin of the Belgian Congo. They are patriarchal (1). I lived among their west-central tribes for 20 years.

614 We call a clan, in the ethnic sense, the group of paternal blood relatives who have an autonomous territory in common. This resembles closely what Anglo-Saxon researchers like to call a "lineage" (2).

I. Wise

601 614 A Nkundo calls his own clan his wise, from the word ise which means "father." My wise thus includes:

1. My paternal grandfather and his brothers and sisters who are called nkoko (pl., bankoko), "grandfather, grandmother."

2. The sons of my male bankoko, including my own father, all of whom are my "fathers" (ise; pl., baise).

The sisters of my "fathers" are my "female fathers" (isomoto, composed of isé and bomoto, "woman").

3. The sons of my "fathers" are my older brothers (botomolo; pl., batomolo) and younger brothers (bokune; pl., bakune). The daughters of my "fathers" are my sisters (nkâna; pl., bankâna).

1. The rules and many details of the classificatory system of the Nkundo have already been set forth in Le Mariage des Nkundo by Father G. Hulstaert (Belgian Royal Colonial Institute, 1938).

Identification

The Ekonda are a Bantu nation of the Southern branch of the Mongo "in a restricted sense." They number 160,000 to 200,000, in addition to 25,000 to 30,000 Ekondized Pygmies. In addition to the Mbo, Wati, and Isoko, acculturated to the Ipanga and Yembe, and probably also the Lusakani and Mpama-Bakutu, Van der Kerken includes the following tribes and sub-tribes:

a. Baseka Buliasa: Bohanga, Lonianianga, Biole, Besongo, Loondu.
b. Baseka Liombo: Baseka Ntomba Ileli, Djombo.
c. Baseka Ileli: Ntomba Ndongo, Bolia, Basengere (Basengele, Monsengere, Sengere).
d. Baseka Etuka: Waya, Weli, Ilanga, Bolongo, Bakonda, Tembe, Mbelo, Bokongo, Ipanga, Boleandamba.

Basic Economy

Primarily agricultural, with a very strong secondary reliance on fishing, especially around Lake Ntumba. The staple crop is manioc, followed by bananas. Lesser crops include peanuts, maize, sweet potatoes, yams, and legumes. There are no cattle, but goats, dogs, and a few chickens (eggs not eaten) are kept. Hunting is unimportant. Fishing is done with traps, spears, nets, hook and line, weirs, and the bow and arrow. Fish and salt (an important local manufacture) are traded to other tribes. Markets.

Sex Division of Labor

Men hunt, do most of the fishing, and clear land, but women do the balance of the agricultural work as well as market trading.

Property

Brass rods constitute an important form of wealth. Property in land is acquired by bringing it under cultivation. In general, land is owned by minimal patri-lineages and administered by the heads thereof, but any member of the minor lineage has the right to hunt and gather on the territories of the component minimal lineages.

Inheritance is patrilineal--by the eldest surviving brother, by a son only in default of a brother, by a DaSo in default of a patrilineal heir.

Social Stratification

Groups of Pygmies are attached as hereditary serfs to particular extended families or minimal patri-lineages. There are non-hereditary slaves, whose children become members of the owner's family.

Marriage

Infant betrothal is common, and sex relations are permitted after betrothal--during a period of trial marriage. The normal mode of marriage is by payment of a substantial bride-price in brass rods or copper bracelets. It is supplied by the head of the groom's extended family, and the WiMo receives a quarter to a third. Marriage also occurs through the capture or abduction of an alien woman in war. An earlier mode of marriage, now largely replaced by the bride-price, consisted in giving merely a token payment.

Polygyny prevails, but a man rarely has more than 2-4 wives. Each has her own dwelling, and the first wife is chief wife. The sororate and sororal polygyny are forbidden, but there is preferential junior levirate [marriage is forbidden with YoBrWi].

Family

The residential unit is a patrilocal extended family, occupying a compound. It consists of the families of a man and his married sons, together with clients and slaves. A larger extended family (ikundi), averaging about 40 members, consists of a localized minor lineage. It has a patriarchal head with nearly absolute authority over other members. He administers the real and movable property of the lineage, and is succeeded by its eldest surviving male member, commonly a YoBr. These larger extended families reveal a fissive tendence; branches can break off with the consent of the head to form new families.

Residence

Residence is normally patrilocal--in a new house in the compound of HuFa until his death, but avunculocal residence is a fairly common alternative. For example, in the case of an extended family with no male heir, the headship and property descend to a DaSo, who leaves his father and moves to his mother's family of orientation in avunculocal residence.

Kin Groups and Exogamy

Local agamy prevails. A man may marry into another village or into another quarter or hamlet of his own village.

Incest taboos and marriage prohibitions are extended bilaterally to fourth cousins.

Descent is patrilineal. Minimal lineages, localized as extended families, are aggregated into minor patri-lineages, each with a sib priest, who comes from a particular minor lineage, and also a head, who is the head of the senior component minimal lineage and who is merely primus inter pares. Minor lineages, which are exogamous with respect to both sex and marriage, are aggregated into sub-sibs, which are agamous for marriage, but not for sex relations. These are aggregated into sibs, which are also exogamous but with exceptions, and these into phratries of traditional common descent, which are really political groups and usually occupy more than one village. Philippe mentions "material clans" (elombe) with chiefs among the Ntomba Njale, states that this group was formerly matrilineal, and concludes that, lying as it does between the patrilineal Ekonda and the matrilineal Badia and Batou, they "present a mixture of these two systems of social organization."

Settlement Pattern

The local community consists of a cluster of hamlets (or "quarters"), separated from each other by bush. Each consists of a group of dwellings arranged on either side of a single street, and each has a men's clubhouse.

Community Organization

A hamlet is a patrilocal clan-barrio, normally occupied by the members of one sub-sib but sometimes by several or by part of one. The community is likewise a patri-clan, but not necessarily a localized sib or segment thereof, for Müller found three sibs of the same phratry represented in the village he studied. Circumcision is obligatory for boys, but clitoridectomy is not practiced.

Local Government

Each clan-barrio has a head, and each community has a council composed of the heads of its component extended families (minimal lineages).

State

The Baseka Muliasa tribe is politically organized under a tribal chief--rare among the Mongo peoples. Elsewhere there are only ritual chiefs (nkumu) over districts or localized phratries, but no higher political integration. The district has a common assembly place where courts are held. Ritual chiefs are chosen from among rich men; their persons are sacred; they are surrounded by numerous taboos; there are human sacrifices at their death; they are succeeded by the eldest male in their extended family. Van der Kerken reports such ritual chiefs as widespread among the Mongo tribes.

Warfare

Warfare is common, even between districts of the same tribe.

Identification

The Mongo (Balolo, Bamongo, Bomongo, Mbongo, Lolo) constitute the northern division of the Mongo nation proper [the Bosaka, Mbole, and Nkundu form the central division, the Ekonda and Kutshu the southern division]. With the Mongo, who number over 200,000, live numerous Pygmies or Twa, dependent and Mongoized, who provide game, and various riverine tribes [locally called Baringa, Baenga, Boluki, Nkole, etc.], who live almost exclusively by fishing and trade. Van der Kerken divides the Mongo in the limited sense into three groups: Mongo, Ntomba, and Yamongo.

Basic Economy

Primarily agricultural, with some hunting, fishing, and gathering and a little animal husbandry. The staple crops are bananas, manioc, and yams. Goats and chickens are kept, but no cattle.

Sex Division of Labor

Men hunt and clear land, but women do the tillage.

Property

Land is inferentially owned collectively by patri-clans.

Inheritance is apparently patrilineal except probably for a SiSo choosing to reside with his MoBr.

Social Stratification

Slavery prevails, but there is a relatively egalitarian or democratic status structure for freemen.

Marriage

A substantial bride-price is customary.

Van der Kerken reports limited polygyny, but all other sources specify common and preferential polygyny. Each co-wife inferentially has her own hut.

Family

The patrilocal extended family is the norm, with nuclear family households.

Residence

Patrilocality is the norm, but avunculocal residence is an important alternative; a SiSo has the right to reside with a succeed a MoBr who obtained a wife with the bride-price received for the nephew's mother.

Kin Groups and Exogamy

Local exogamy is the norm.

There are patri-sibs localized in communities and patri-lineages localized in hamlets. Matrilineal descent, however, is reported for the Ntomba tribe.

The nkita system, presumably similar to that among the Nkundu, strongly suggests former matrilineal descent and avunculocal residence.

Kinship Terminology

Fa--ise. Mo--nyango. Ch--bona. ElBr--botomolo. YoBr--bokune. Sibling of opposite sex--nkana. Hu--bome, bosaka. Wi--waji, wali.

Bifurcate merging terminology except for BrCh(w.s.), where generation terms prevail.

Cousin terms are of Crow type. The social system as a whole is thus Patri-Fox.

Settlement Pattern

Inferentially there are settled communities composed of hamlets separated by plantations.

Community Organizations

Patrilocal clan-communities and clan-barrios are probable.

Local Government

Inferentially there are local headmen (clan chiefs) with councils of elders.

State

Inferentially there are politically organized sub-tribes with hereditary paramount chiefs. Succession is everywhere patrilineal, brothers taking precedence over chiefs. Succession is everywhere patrilineal, brothers taking precedence over sons.

Identification

The nation under consideration includes the following tribes and sub-groups:

1. Ngombe (Bongombe, Bongongombe, Bangombe, Ngombeh), who are not to be confused with a Nkundu sub-group called Ngombe nor with the great "Ngombe ethnic stock" of the north (see under Budja, Ndoko). The Ngombe treated herewith are mainly of Mbole origin but are strongly acculturated to the Bakutu-Ntomba of the Lomela. Van der Kerken lists the following sub-groups: Ikongo, Lotoko, Mpoko, Ngombe (including the Booli, Boyea, Ebengee or Nkoto, and Itsika).

2. Kutu-Ntomba (Bakutu and Ntomba of the Lomela). Though they are Mongo in an extended sense, they differ appreciably from other Mongo in language and culture. The other groups are acculturated to the Kutu-Ntomba. These Kutu must not be confused with the Kutshu or with the Wankutshu division of the Tetela, and these Ntomba must not be confused with the Ntomba tribe of the Mongo proper, the Ntomba subtribe of the Nkundu, five Ekonda divisions known as Ntomba, or a Mbole group called Ntomba. Van der Kerken notes the following sub-groups: Bakutu (Bovame, Nsamba) including the Botsini and Ekea; Bosengea; Nkoe (Kwe, Nkole, Nkwe); Mpombi (Pombi); Watsi, comprising the Besongote and Ngommesa; Yenge.

3. Linga (Balinga, Baringa, Elinga, Waringa)--a generalized name for various riverine tribes who live by fishing and practice little agriculture. Mongoized.

4. Twa or pygmies. Mongoized pygmies are reported for most of the Mongo area though not specifically for the Ngombe territory.

Basic Economy

Primarily agricultural, except for the Linga and other riverine tribes, who subsist largely by fishing and trading (dried fish and pottery for manioc, bananas, meat, and weapons). The principal crops are inferentially manioc and bananas. Van der Kerken for the Mongo tribes in general reports: cultivation of manioc, bananas, yams, maize, and sweet potatoes; chickens, goats, and perhaps ducks; subsidiary hunting, fishing, and gathering.

Sex Division of Labor

Among the Linga both sexes fish, and the women make pottery.

Settlement Pattern

Settled communities except among the Linga, who live much of the time in boats and have only temporary villages. Kutu-Ntomba houses are rectangular and clustered close together; neighborhoods of hamlets and distinct extended-family "quarters."

Identification

The Nkundu (Bankundu, Baseka Mondji, Elanga, Gundo, Iukundo, Kundu, Nkundo) are a tribe of the Central division of the Mongo nation in the strict sense, and are consequently closely related to the Mongo proper (forming the Northern division), the Mbole and Bosaka (with Ekota) of the Central division, and Ekonda and Kutshu (with Boshongo) of the Southern division. With them live a very large number of dependent Nkunduized Twa or pygmies--about 45,000 locally called Balumbe, Batswa, Bilangi, Bone, and Jofe. There are also Elinga and other Nkunduized fishing people of alien origin, and the alien Bombwanja. Hulstaert lists the Nkundu component tribes as: Injulo (Ilanga Mongo of Hulstaert, with Engonjo, Wese, and Ngombe sub-tribes), Boangi (with Besombo), Ionda (Yonda of H), Wangata and Ntomba (with Bakaala), Bonkoso), Bongili-Bombomba-Lifumba sister tribes, Bomangola (a single village regarded as oldest Nkundu group), Bongale. Van der Kerken gives a very different list: Bolembelongi-Bokeniuma (with Bokala, Bunianga, Buya, Nsongo, Waola, Lingoi, Ntomba, and Bolenge sub-tribes), Botabongo (with Isaka, Ilongo, Elinga), Okweokai (with Lifino Lileko, Bekili, Esese, Bosombe), Bolemba (Bokote, Lifumba, Hulstaert's Elonga, with sub-tribes Bomangola, Bongali, Lifumba, Wangata), Yonda (Ionda), Lokwa Onene (Bombwandja), Ilanga Mongo (Indjolo of Hulstaert, with sub-tribes Boangi, Yonda, Indjolo, Bombomba), Mputela (with Ekota, Ekonda). Van der Kerken estimates the total Nkundu population at between 150,000 and 200,000 (including apparently, the pygmies).

Basic Economy

Primarily agricultural, with brand-tillage. The staple crops are bananas and manioc (both sweet and bitter); also grown are maize, sweet potatoes, yams, taro, and groundnuts. Animal husbandry is unimportant; there are a few goats (not milked), no cattle or sheep, numerous chickens and ducks (the latter relatively recent), and dogs. Fishing is next in importance to agriculture, and some subjected groups (Boluki, Elinga, Nkole) live primarily by fishing. Hunting is of less importance, and is done mainly for sport, most serious hunting being done by dependent Twa(pygmies). Collecting is mentioned.

Sex Division of Labor

The men clear the land and plant bananas, but women plant other crops, hoe, harvest, and do practically all other agricultural work. The men hunt and fish; the women do the gathering and a little fishing.

Property

Important objects of property are slaves, iron knives, copper rings, goats, and formerly pearls and shell ornaments. Property in land is held only by men, who acquire usufruct in plots brought under cultivation. Land is essentially the common property of clans (see Community Organization).

Inheritance is primarily by classificatory "brothers" (including ortho-cousins), passing by seniority through one generation in the extended family before passing to a member of the next generation. After "brothers" are exhausted, the rule of predominantly patrilineal (Engels, Schebesta, and Van der Kerken speak only of patrilineal inheritance), the ElSo taking priority. However, there is a matrilineal alternative of some consequence (described by Boelaert and Hulstaert and treated as the exclusive rule by Brepoels). By virtue of the nkita institution, a SiSo acquires certain rights against his MoBr in consequence of the fact tnat the latter normally obtained a wife with the bride-price secured by the marriage of his Si, the nephew's Mo. Brepoels says matrilineal inheritance is a compensation for money brought into the family by the sister's bride-price, but Boelaert and Hulstaert explain in greater detail what the nephew's rights are: he participates in the family council allocating the inheritance (perhaps receiving a portion himself), he has a right to the bride-price (or an equivalent) received for a daughter of the MoBrWi married through the bride-price received for his Mo, and he can become full heir and successor to his MoBr (taking priority over the latter's sons but not brothers) if he has elected to take up residence with his MoBr. Clearly, then, the inheritance rule, though primarily patrilineal, reveals strong survivals of matrilineal inheritance.

Social Stratification

Slaves are acquired only for debt, by capture in war, or by purchase. The status is not hereditary; females become free by marriage, and males become free when they marry a free woman or produce an heir for their master by a slave wife. Descent for slaves is strictly patrilineal, and the children of slaves suffer some stigma since they cannot trade matrilineal ancestry. Except for this stigma on the children of slaves, there are no significant class distinctions among freemen, though age status and political status are important. The dependent Twa (pygmies) form a sort of lower caste; marriage with them is forbidden.

Marriage

There are several modes of marriage, as follows:

a. Preferential levirate and sororate, extended from HuBr and WiSi to other relatives--for secondary unions only.

b. Exchange of sisters by two men, in lieu of a bride-price.

c. Free gift of a woman in marriage, without a bride-price. A probable example is Engel's report that a wealthy family without sons allow a daughter to live with one or more men, the first child belonging to the girl's Fa in lieu of a bride-price.

d. True purchase of a wife, as distinguished from marriage with a bride-price. Though not practiced by the Nkundu, this mode occurs among the Elinga.

e. By negotiation through a formal intermediary with betrothal period and payment of a substantial bride-price in installments (ndanga, walo, etc.). The bride-price is normally raised by the relatives of the groom--not only his paternal kinsmen but his maternal, including always his MoBr. It consists of skins, iron knives and/or copper rings, and a male slave. Prestige accrues to a groom who pays a larger bride-price than contracted for. The bride-price goes to the girl's father, and is always used to obtain a wife for some male member of her extended family, most commonly a brother. This gives rise to the nkita institution (see below).

Nkita institution. A wife obtained with the bride-price received for a sister (or other female relative) is called the nkita of that sister, who is the nkolo. Brepoels says the nkita is technically regarded as belonging to the nkolo, though it is not the latter but her children who profit, that the nkita's children are ideologically those of the nkolo (so that patrilineal descent is justified as technically matrilineal), and that matrilineal inheritance by the nkolo's children is interpreted as a compensation for the fact that her bride-price was used to marry the nkita. The accounts by Boelaert and Hulstaert are probably more accurate. They specify that the use of the nkolo's bride-price to obtain the nkita in marriage gives the nkolo's sons special rights against their MoBr and his children by the nkita. These include: (a) a right to the bride-price received for a daughter of the nkita; (2) a right against the MoBr, exercised if the nephew's father dies or his paternal relatives cannot or will not provide him with a bride-price, to go to live with the MoBr, cultivate land of the latter's clan, be provided with a wife by the MoBr (sometimes a secondary wife of the latter, occasionally even the nkita herself, and at least the wherewithal for a bride-price, even if only that received for a daughter of the nkita), and to be the heir and successor of the MoBr in preference to the sons of the latter (but not his brothers). The prevailing Crow kinship terminology, by which the nephew is called "father" by the children of his maternal uncle, justifies his priority in inheritance and succession. In this extremely interesting way, surviving matrilineal usages have been integrated with the prevailing patrilineal ones.

Polygyny is general and preferred (all other sources contradict Van der Kerken's assertion that limited polygyny prevails among the Mongo tribes). The first wife enjoys a special status. Each wife has her separate hut (Engels says a separate apartment in the case of the Ngata). The implication of most sources is that polygyny is normally non-sororal, though Engels says it is often sororal (he may be confusing preferential sororate).

Family

The patrilocal extended family is the norm (with an avunculocal admixture--see Residence). According to Van der Kerken, it typically occupies a special "quarter" within a hamlet of the village. It is called likudu, and is headed by its senior male member as patriarch. Succession is normally patrilineal by seniority. The patriarch is succeeded in order by his younger brothers (including classificatory "brothers" like FaBrSo), then by a SiSo (but only if he has exercised his right of avunculocal residence under the nkita institution--see Marriage above), then (and normally) by ElSo.

Residence

Residence is normally patrilocal--occasionally at first in house of groom's parents, but usually in a new dwelling. Engels reports occasional matri-patrilocal residence in special cases. Avunculocal residence is a regular alternative whenever a nephew exercises his nkita right against his MoBr. Sons usually remain with or return to paternal relatives, even after death of Fa or divorce of Mo, but may exercise avunculocal right.

Local exogamy is the rule. A woman leaves her own village to join her Hu, regardless of whether he resides in patrilocal or avunculocal residence.

Kindreds are unreported and almost certainly absent. Marriage is forbidden with any first cousin, and technically also with any known relative in any line, but this applies in practice only for members of the same community and for others with whom a direct patrilineal or matrilineal connection can be traced.

Descent is patrilineal, with matrilineal survivals. There are exogamous patri-lineages (ilongo), usually localized in a hamlet of a village, and exogamous patri-sibs, usually localized as clan-communities. Schebesta reports totemic food taboos associated with patri-sibs. Patrilineal exogamy is carried further for marriage than for premarital or extramarital sex relations, being extended to sibs traditionally descended from the same common ancestor of Ego's sib. Traces of matrilineal descent are unmistakable; the child of an unmarried woman belongs to its mother's patri-sib, which is called bonyango; a nephew exercising his nkita privilege is affiliated with his mother's (MoBr's) patri-sib. Moreover, the ability to trace descent in the female line is popularly regarded as more important than the ability to trace it in the male line; no two people who are matri-lineally descended from a known common ancestress may marry; this idea accounts for the stigma on the children of slaves, who have no matrilineal ancestry, being affiliated with the sib of the Fa or owner. Hulstaert says specifically: "Descent from a common mother is a more important factor than paternal descent." Though matrilineal exogamy is observed, no authorities report any corporate matrilineal kin-groups. For this reason, the rule of descent is classed as patrilineal with matrilineal survivals, rather than as double descent. The prevailing Crow kinship terminology is another clear indication of former matrilineal descent.

Kinship Terminology

Fa--ise. Mo--nyango. Ch--bona, Hu--bome. Wi--wali. ElBr(ms), ElSi(ws)--botomolo. YoBr(ms), rosi(ws)--bokune. Br(ws), Si(ms)--nkana.

Avuncular and nepotic terminology are of bifurcate merging type.

Cousin terminology is of Crow type. The social system as a whole is thus to be classed as Patri-Fox (or Duo-Crow if descent is regarded as double).

Settlement Pattern

Settled communities consisting of from 1 to 6 hamlets separated by plantations. Each hamlet is composed of a double row of dwellings arranged close together on either side of a single street. Near many communities there is a settlement of dependent Twa (pygmies). There are bachelors' houses in at least some communities.

Community Organization

Patri-lineages (ilongo), composed of patrilineally related extended families, normally occupy the hamlets of a village, forming clan-barrios. The lineages of a patri-sib normally occupy a settlement, which is thus a patrilocal clan-community, called ese (Van der Kerken), wise from ise, "father" (Boelaert). The agricultural land and hunting territories of a settlement are the communal property of its resident clan.

Local Government

Each settlement or clan has its hereditary headmen and a council of elders, who are presumably the heads of the component lineages or clan-barriors. The rule of succession is patrilineal, subject to the qualifications for inheritance.

State

Clans are aggregated into etuka (perhaps phratries or districts), these into sub-tribes (liotsi), and these into tribes (bonanga); the sub-tribe is normally the largest political aggregate, having a patriarchal head (Van der Kerken). Engels uses etuka for clan-barrio, reporting it as the strongest functioning unit and the largest political unit today, when larger units have gone.

Warfare

Both intertribal and intra-tribal warfare is common. The causes, according to Engels, are usually to avenge an uncompensated murder or settle an unresolved dispute. Probably the capture of slaves is another reason. Schebesta reports extensive cannibalism (not mentioned by other sources, which deal mainly with marriage and the family).

THE NKUMU OF THE TUMBA

RITUAL CHIEFTAINSHIP ON THE MIDDLE CONGO

H. D. BROWN

101 THE tribes living round Lake Tumba, a lake some thirty-five miles long by twelve wide lying north of Lake Leopold II (approximately 0° 30′ south latitude, [133] and 18° east longitude) and draining into the Congo River at the confluence of the Ubangi, lack cohesion and show a considerable variety of custom and language. But they are known collectively as Tumba, the Government adaptation of the Native term Ntomba. Most of them are found to the east of the lake, the whole group numbering perhaps little more than forty to fifty thousand at the present time, though [797] there is evidence that the last twenty years have seen a great decrease in population. European occupation of this area goes back barely fifty years, Protestant missions having been established for about the same length of time. The first mission post [177] was established at Ikoko on the north-east shore of the lake, one of the villages of a group known as Bonginda. In pursuing this investigation particular attention has been given to the practices of this group, but mention is occasionally made where considerable differences have been found elsewhere.

●105 The Tumba are agricultural, hunting, and fishing people. Their country is flat 13 and swampy with dense forests, and there are many watercourses flowing into Lake Tumba. There are occasional small, less swampy plains, and one such area, more open, with quite wide stretches of prairie, is a haunt of buffalo. The forests are fairly well supplied with game, and the swamps, streams, and lakes with fish. A heavy rainfall and no distinct dry season make agriculture reasonably easy and famine unknown. Every family has its plantation of manioc, the staple diet, which is supplemented by plantains and bananas. The people make their own tools, formerly smelting their own iron for this purpose, are fairly skilful at making dug-out canoes, engage in weaving raffia and making mats out of split cane, and are efficient at pottery production.

624 The role of the nkumu in the socio-religious activities of the community is one of the most interesting features of Tumba life. As a result of European contact the 101 ceremonies connected with the nkumu are rapidly disappearing, but it has been 178 possible to collect considerable information from the older men and women among whom the details are still vividly remembered.[1] The following report refers to the period previous to European occupation and control, a time within the memory of a large number of people, but already sufficiently remote to become a matter of hearsay before the lapse of many more years.

596 An understanding of the place of the nkumu among the Tumba requires a glance [173] at the tribal organization. According to the people themselves, they migrated westward, and coming into these parts chose land for themselves. Among the several Hensey has briefly outlined some of the items of interest observed among the nkumu of the district adjacent to that of the present study. These more detailed notes are, however, timely if a record is to be preserved that approximates to accuracy.

303 blocks is placed on the ground. The woman sits during the work. The second block is placed flat on the top surface of the first, which is moistened and sprinkled with sand. The woman holds the top block in both hands and rubs it back and forth with a rotary motion, taking care to keep the two grinding surfaces wet. The rubbing and the action of the grains of sand as fine graters produce a fine, red, almost impalpable powder mixed with water. The skill in this process consists of proceeding in such a way that the gritty sand is mixed as little as possible with the wood dust. The skill of some persons is so [168] great that one can find hardly any traces of sand in their ngula (1).

In the region of the Mosengere, the apparatus for making ngula is usually more elaborate. A thick piece of tree bark is used as a basin. Four or six rather strong sticks are fastened to this basin, and to these the native attaches one of the takula blocks. A special device permits this apparatus to be fastened in place. Some natives even have an improved apparatus set up under a crude shelter in front of their hut, which permits them to make ngula while standing up. Four heavy stakes driven perpendicularly into the ground support a large basin of tree bark 15 centimeters above the ground. [169] One meter from the ground, horizontal crossbars are attached to the forked ends of the stakes, and one of the blocks of takula is fastened to these crossbars. An earthenware receptacle, held in the three forks of a stake driven into the ground beside the apparatus, contains a mixture of water and a small portion of oil. A brush made of a piece of soft wood is immersed in the mixture and permits the craftsman to wet the takula block at will. A small piece of a calabash holds the sand which is rubbed on the wood to grate it to dust. Despite all the skill of the worker, this sand gets mixed into the dust and must be replaced from time to time. The person making 121 to present anything we have not thoroughly investigated. We have not stepped outside the geographic limits set forth except for a few incidental remarks. Although the cultural uniformity of the Nkundó-Móngo is remarkable it is not, of course, absolute. And if we have used the title Mariage des Nkundó (Marriage among the Nkundu), we have done so because it was difficult to find one which would be more appropriate for the geographic and ethnic limits of [14] this study. It is very likely that in most cases our data are valid beyond the limits we have laid out, but to generalize upon it before making a thorough study of each group would be contrary to all scientific method. The reader is therefore earnestly requested to take these remarks into account and to abstain from giving our conclusions too broad a scope.

Familial institutions in themselves and in their totality are outside the scope of this book. But since they are based on marriage, they have an important place within our framework. We must necessarily touch upon them, but we will limit our excursions into that realm to what is required to make the general description intelligible. On the other hand, the study of marriage throws a good deal of light on familial institutions.

The words "family," "clan," "group," etc. recur frequently.
128 The family is an entity smaller than the clan, and the latter is sub-596 ordinate to the group. Since it is very difficult to give a precise 614 definition, however, we have taken the trouble to make a clear distinction only when necessary. (1) [Editor's Note: Elsewhere we use them more as generic terms or even as synonyms. In order to make family relationships and the expressions used by the Nkundó to designate them more comprehensible, we are attaching an example of a genealogical table.]

H. Brepoels, "Het Familiehoofd bij de Nkundô-Negers," Congo, 1930, Vol. 2, p. 332.

124 We have tried to make our data as complete as possible. We have given here not only the major trends and basic principles, but also the particulars, even those that seem most insignificant. They are always interesting, and sometimes more so than one may have suspected at first. All the material has been discussed over and over again, in private and in public, with very varied people at different times and places, and the points that presented the greatest difficulty were gone over countless times.

121 In general we have preferred to use the descriptive and analytic method. We have drawn conclusions and principles from the data. Although case histories naturally lengthened the text of this work, we have not hesitated to insert them at various points. They are the best means of bringing out certain rules or customs and bringing to life the psychology of our people.

69 In this respect a remark should be made whose importance deserves our attention for a moment. The examination of judicial cases of which we have been direct or indirect witnesses does not provide a scientific certainty about the laws -- or "the customs," to use the term so frequently applied (1). For not all [16] that is done

1. It is unfortunate that this term has become so fashionable, for it lacks precision. Indeed, it may mean simply "practice, usage," or it may be used in the legal sense of "a practice having the force of a law." Often a confusion between the two meanings is created, and all customs are considered to be legally obligatory, when actually, some practices are outside common law, and others are in opposition to it. For the sake of precision in ethnographic and ethnological works, it would be well to use this ambiguous term as little as possible and to distinguish clearly among legal procedures, the laws and custom or usage.

837 their sense of the personal injustice involved. But they do not reason 577 out these feelings; they follow them spontaneously, blindly.

There is a greater awareness of the social evil in adultery. But it is based not on the philosophical considerations of this harm in itself, but on the consequences of individual cases for the proper functioning of society -- palavers, financial difficulties, enmities, quarrels, wars.

This it seems to me is the present state of their ideas. It does not preclude the possibility that the law and sanctions against adultery may rest on an ultimate basis of moral ideas. And more particularly it is quite possible that the moral idea [331] operates only in the form of a feeling of the great principles of fundamental natural law which is innate to all human reason.

837 5) No one will be astonished if we say that colonization, far 177 from reducing the frequency of adultery, actually contributed to its considerable increase. The abolition of native penalties and punishments together with a great freedom of movement could not help but lead, naturally, to this state of affairs. Every informed colonial who is in close contact with the natives is aware of the situation. "The prohibition of corporal punishments which, according to custom, were the sanctions imposed against a woman's adultery have brought about a license whose extent can be measured by the degree to which a group is subject to our occupation. The forgetfulness if not the contempt for the promises of marriage is nowhere carried so far as in places where the customary disciplines have been completely re- ● [113] moved." (Maj. Engels, Bulletin Soc. Belge. Et. Col., cited in Congo, 3rd year, Vol. 1, p. 77, April, 1922). That is why various persons have repeatedly called for sanctions against adultery to replace the ancestral means of repression that have been abolished.

But the decrees hoped for have never passed beyond the stage 692 of mere projects. Fortunately, another step, and a fundamental one, 177 has been taken in the meantime through the establishment of native 837 jurisdiction (1926). Under the guidance and control of European authorities, native courts will turn the helm halfway back to the ancient sanctions, adapting these all the while to the new conditions created by colonization and by the introduction of more humanitarian 563 among the Elángá beyond the Tshuapa. All of them are beyond the scope of this study. The Bombwanja are divided into Basunɛ́ and Bonkoso, and the Boeńdɛ́ are considered their bónankáná (sister's son).

Bombwanja were originally Mbólɛ́, for certain words and idioms in their dialect are reminiscent of the Lombólɛ́.

Let us briefly enumerate the other tribes -- "pure" Nkundó -- who form the subject of this study:

619 1. The Injóló, "sister's son" (bonankáná) of the Ntómbá and the Bolɛ́ngɛ́ who live beyond the Boloko. They are divided into three groups [9] -- Engónjó, Wesɛ́, and Ngombe, (1) each of which comprises a subdistrict [sous-chefferie] for administrative purposes. A small segment is to be found outside the area under discussion, between the Boloko and Coq. (2)

2. The southern Injóló are often called Imoma.

2. The Boángɪ́ (and their subgroup, the Besombó), related to the Bokála of the Losanganya region. (3)

●[114] 3. On the ethnographic map of the Belgian Congo prepared and published by Dr. J. Maes, the territory of the Boangi is marked with the name "Bokuala." There is no tribe or village by that name. Unless an insulting and humiliating nickname (bokwala, "slave") is involved, the name may result from an erroneous use of the name of the present chief of the Boangi, Bokwála.

619 9. The Bongale. Three large villages belonging to this group are to be found in the territory under discussion. In order of their size they are: Bongale wǎ Botóló (among the Lifumba, between the Bonsómbé, Lolíma and Saási rivers), Bongale wǎ Ilinga (among the Bakáala, near Ikéngé), and Bongale wá Bosongó (among the Bonkoso, [569] near Bempumba). The difference between their rules of exogamy and those of the other tribes confirms the view that the Bongale are not true Nkundó. (2)

2. See Chapter V, Article III. There are several other small Bongale groups, but I do not know whether they are related to those mentioned above. Among them are those living near Bonyeka (Busira) among the Boángi (Bokála, Boénjola). They may be descended from different ancestors who all bore the name Ngale. The same name may indicate an identical origin, but it may also be derived from different individuals whose names were the same. This statement is generally applicable.

The tribes living between the Jwalé and the Boloko, with whom the Boléngé and the Ntómbá between the Congo and the Boloko are sometimes classified, are grouped under the general name of Ilángá by the Boángí, Injóló, and Elángá. (3)

● [114] 3. The Bokele tribe listed on the above-mentioned map does not exist. Could this error be due to an incorrect extension of the name of a Boloki village near Bokúma which is called Bokélé?

The Nkundó-Móngo came from the north or the northeast. (4)

[825] 4. The following note may be of interest: The stories and songs of the Nkundó indicate a

771 In matters of religion the Nkundó recognize the existence of a Supreme Being: Njakomba or Mbombiɛ́ndɛ́, creator and ruler of all that exists. They do not worship him in any way, however; all their religious practices are addressed to guardian and ancestral spirits. (2)

> 2. On the subject of the religious conceptions of the Nkundó, see a detailed study by Father Boelaert, M.S.C., in Hooger Leven, 1934, pp. 1612 and 1636, and 1935, pp. 12 and 60.

197 The language of the Nkundó is beautiful, harmonious, flexible, and rich. It has all the qualities needed to become a literary language and is admirably suited to the requirements of teaching. Furthermore, its various dialects are spoken over a considerably large territory, in fact over one of the largest language areas [13] of the Congo. 797 214 In addition to the religious and devotional books of the Catholic missions, a fairly large collection of various academic textbooks is available in this language, thanks primarily to the zeal of the Protestant missionaries. The latter have also published a complete translation of the Bible. Several vocabularies and small grammars have been compiled, and in recent years a large dictionary and an expanded grammar have been added to these, both compiled by A. and L. Ruskin of the Bongandanga Mission. For several years the Protestant mission at Bolenge has been publishing a native magazine, and the Catholic mission is pushing ahead with preparations to publish one also.

114 Father Shebesta's book, Vollblutneger und Halbzwerge, includes a chapter on the Nkundó in which the author gives a good general description of this people. Nevertheless, some of the details given must be accepted with reservations.

121 The general information given above is enough to give the reader a superficial knowledge of the Nkundó.

The purpose of this work is to give a more extensive account of their institutions pertaining to marriage.

As we have previously stated, we are considering only a portion of this people. All our statements cover only the fraction we have delimited. The family institutions of other Nkundó groups are not accounted for, as they are less known to us and we do not want 121 69 is in accordance with justice. The observation that the natives behave in one fashion or another, and that this or that palaver is often settled in a particular way, is not a sufficient basis for concluding that such is the law.

Infractions of the rules of social justice are more frequent than one would suspect. The principles are good, but often passions prevent their application, and frequently there are neither sanctions to support a weakness of will nor rewards to stimulate loyal adherence.

121 114 69 Furthermore, one should not invoke the variability and continuous transformation of native law (as does Dr. T. Seitz, for example, in Africa, Vol. 3, No. 1, p. 89) without first establishing whether the judgments rendered have been in conformity with the law. The remark made by this eminent author further on in his article, "Welche Rolle dabei das Machtmoment," etc. . . . weakens his first statement and shows precisely that an accurate knowledge of legal prescriptions cannot be attained solely on the basis of the verdicts of tribunals, and that partiality often plays a considerable part. The observation made by the former governor of the Cameroons may be applied to the Belgian Congo and often to "civilized" countries as well -- partially and the abuse of power are nowhere unknown.

121 69 We must also take into account the possibility of the judges' ignorance, as well as our own difficulty in understanding their sentences, since important points of fact and law are sometimes left unmentioned, and yet are implied.

It is not surprising that there are complicated cases where it is very difficult for the natives, however intelligent and impartial, to settle the dispute and provide a fair and legitimate solution. The law cannot foresee for every case the infinite variety of personal, local, and modal circumstances that may occur.

Only the analysis and comparison of diverse cases, [17] their solutions, sanctions, and consequences, together with discussions with discreet and impartial natives who are knowing and skillful and who have learned to know us and to understand what we want to learn from them, and who are sincerely disposed to help us at the same time, can produce a rational and reasoned certainty which conforms to reality. These conditions are numerous, and it is difficult to find them

121 conformity or in opposition to this or that ethnological theory. We are presenting the facts in their entirety, the material portion of the culture as well as its intellectual, psychological, and moral basis. Theory should be based on these facts, not the facts adapted to suit the theories.

In the text of this work the reader will find repetitions, foot-121 notes, and references. We would have preferred to omit these,
114 since they are always tedious, but their presence was dictated by the nature of the material and by the strictly scientific nature of this work, which we wanted to retain at all costs. We hope in fact that those who wish to study it thoroughly will find these repetitions not an obstacle, but a valuable aid which will help them to obtain a total and precise picture of the material.

Although I have taken the greatest care and all possible precautions to present to the reader only facts and evidence which correspond to reality, and to document [20] everything as completely as possible, this work will inevitably contain gaps, imperfections, even one mistake or another. (1)

1. This is especially true with regard to the legal significance of certain practices, a most delicate point of inquiry, which has yet to be thoroughly investigated -- particularly, certain questions concerning the origin of marriage in its various forms.

This material is not exempt from such faults, and it would be pure presumption to pretend otherwise. But science could not advance, nor could the practical purpose of our knowledge ever be accomplished, should we try to achieve the perfection that can be the result only of successive studies by different people, before presenting the results of our research to the public. I would be gratified if others would check my data, criticize it, and supplement and correct it wherever necessary. I hope that this work will also stimulate them to make a similar study of the other segments of the Nkundó-Mongo so that at last we may have a total picture of the matrimonial institutions of this very important people.

114 I should like to express one more wish relevant to this subject. A number of studies by civil servants and government agents, containing a good deal of ethnographic data on various subjects, lie in bales in the bureaus of the Congo, waiting for the day when they will serve as fodder for ever-hungry termites. Would it not be possible to make these documents -- at least the better ones -- available to the public? Even if they contain gaps and errors, they will be gratefully received. They will lead other researchers to explore these questions thoroughly, and through emulation, criticism, and discussion, we will develop an increasing and more accurate knowledge of the natives, [21] their history, their way of life, their laws, their customs, and their mentality, which will be of great benefit for all colonial work.

Some of the terms used in one or another part of this study may appear too coarse. I would rather have avoided them, but I would have had to use veiled expressions and circumlocutions which would have adversely affected the clarity of this work and therefore its value, for it is intended for a purely scientific purpose. I trust the indulgent reader will therefore excuse their presence.

124 Here and there case histories are given in full. I believe that the details are not without interest, since they give a living picture of the mentality of our people. Most of the incidents were [114] collected in the vicinity of Flandria, the area with which I am most familiar. Here and there I have taken the liberty of passing judgment and of recommending solutions to certain problems. I should like to say that in these cases I am expressing opinions which are purely personal.

000 The map appended to this work makes it possible for the reader to find a tribe or village which is under discussion and shows its geographic position amidst the groups that comprise the Móngo-Nkundó people.

I wish to express my sincere gratitude to all those who have in some way contributed to this work: His Excellency Monsignor Ed. Van Goethem, our venerable vicar apostolic, who gave me permission to carry it out and always encouraged me in my research, understanding fully its practical value for a sensible adaptation which will enable us to establish the Church on a firm foundation; my colleagues, Father Trigalet and Father Wauters, as well as Brother Brants, who took upon 548 2) There is a considerable excess of bachelors over eligible women.

[694] 3) The freedom to commit adultery: no sanctions were provided.[1]

[586] 4) The difficulty of finding a suitable husband experienced by many girls born in the centers. Marriages between individuals belonging to different groups (especially certain ones) seldom last. And since inhabitants of the centers have no fixed or stable residence, they intend sooner or later to go back to their tribe of origin. Serious-minded parents therefore discourage and thwart these "mixed" marriages. (1)

1. On this subject, read Jadot's fine page in Blancs et Noirs au Congo Belge [Whites and Blacks in the Belgian Congo], p. 132, beginning: "La prostitution devait inevitablement . . . (Prostitution was inevitably . . .).

[361] In the region under discussion there are only a few lightly populated centers: plantations, government or business stations, and small commercial centers. From time to time the bachelors there satisfy their desires with the wives of their fellow workers, and especially with women who come from the interior to sell their products at market. But they do not avoid one of the consequences of prostitution, namely the spreading of venereal diseases.

It is possible to conclude that in the past prostitution existed only in a very broad sense [75] and there was very little of it. In [114] Engel's article, "Les Wangata" op. cit., he writes that among the Wangata "prostitution no longer exists." If the eminent author is using the term according to the meaning in the dictionary, we may ask on what basis he is implicitly stating that this institution existed in the past. If prostitution is broadly defined, then the facts contradict his remark, for actually it has not ceased to develop among the tribes he discussed,, who are located very close to the city of Coquilhatville and its various suburbs.

2. The nature of walo valuables

583x [301] [326] [435] The walo primarily consists of copper and brass rings. Wrought metal objects (bifeko), such as spears, knives, or axes are also added. Nowadays a part may be made up of simple brass or iron (steel) bars. Goats may be given in addition; a she-goat is worth 5 to 6 rings (nowadays 10), and a he-goat, 3 to 4 bakonga (nowadays 6 to 7). One or more elɔ́njɛ bells are greatly prized as gifts.

583x 435 Payment in iron or copper chains (bengɛ́-nyola), in various kinds of bead necklaces, and in leopard's teeth has almost entirely disappeared. Formerly, certain kinds of beads had great value; the big, round bluish-white ones (lonyɔ́ngu, pl. nnyɔ́ngu) were worth 1 konga each, the big, oblong blackish ones, cylindrical or rectangular in shape, 2 to 3 centimeters in diameter and 5 to 10 centimeters long (called nkángɛ́) were worth one slave or, nowadays, 20 to 25 bakonga each.

583x Copper (konga) and brass (kɔ́ngo) are the most important of all. Thus paying the bride price is often referred to as ɛ́nga la kɔ́ngo la konga.

● [14] The statement by R.P. Kaptein (in Congo, 1922, Vol. 1, pp. 452-543) that original valuables were the benkata, the bingetele, and the mitako is based on an error. [132] The first two types of valuables, also called bendɔ́ngu by some tribes, were used exclusively by the Ntɔ́mbɛ of Lake Tumba and the adjacent Ekonda (Bosanga, Balíngɔ́, Lonyanyanga, etc.). The mitako, known in Lonkundo as nngelo, [436] singular longelo, are not native; this monetary unit was introduced by the Independent State.

[177] The practice of making the payment at least partially in money or in objects of European origin (such as fabrics, blankets, sewing machines, trunks, household utensils, etc.) is gradually being introduced. Before the crisis it was already very popular among "white people."

3. The source of the valuables

A young man obtains the valuables for the bride price in various ways. The most usual way and the one which also conforms best to the Nkundɔ́'s familial and social regulations is the use of valuables

602 use of the bride prices received for the daughters.
607 3) If he cannot obtain a wife through his own clan, he is entitled to the bride price of one of his bekwá if it is not first needed by one of her own uncles or brothers. The rights of the latter have priority over that of the nkóló, unless he settles in his mother's clan. For in that case his rights have precedence over those of the brothers (though never those of an uncle), and he is next in line, after his uncles, to become head of the family. Since he is sister's son, the uncle's children call him "father" just as they call his mother, their paternal aunt, by the name of isómoto ("female father"). He himself calls his first cousins bǎna, "children," and thus has precedence over them. [168]

Thus the rights to authority over the daughters of the nkita on the part of the nkóló's son are limited by the rights of the uncles and, to a certain degree, of the brothers. (1) But in the inheritance of widows the rights of the nkóló's son operate fully, and he may claim the one acquired by means of his bokwá's bride price, who in a way is his nkita (when she is assigned to him they say balá ěkě nkita, "here is your nkita").

These rules can result in multiple transactions and in a repeated tr[illegible]ferring of rights from one of the two clans to the other as well as within the same clan.

The nkóló's grandsons call the nkita's grandsons nkwá y'áámbá, "the excrements of valuables" (an expression which is not at all disrespectful or shocking) because the rights derived from the relationship of nkóló and nkita are almost without force. In favorable circumstances they are limited to a little respect and assistance. And if the nkóló's grandsons have no other kinship tie with the paternal clan of their second cousins, they cannot even call them by that name.

The mutuality of the rights of nkóló and nkita is well expressed in the saying, ómbáté ñkoáté wě, "possess me so that I may possess you." It is like do ut des.

[611]
It is possible to judge from the preceding descriptions that the bride price has a considerable influence on family relations. Although the Nkundó system is clearly and manifestly patriarchal, the custom of the bride price and its logical consequences give it certain features which make one think of a matriarchy. This situation comes about quite naturally. Since the bride price is wealth it represents power in society. Through marriage this power is transferred from the husband's clan to the wife's, which is enriched in goods and persons by the bride price that has been received. In a sense, the husband is the provider of his wife's clan. And the child can truthfully maintain that his clan was enriched thanks to his father. As a matter of fact, for the Nkundó, this consideration above all others is the basis for their demands of whatever rights they possess in the mother's clan. [170] The relationship between a woman and her nkita and between their respective children is founded solely on the bride-price system of marriage and has nothing to do with matriarchy. (1)

1. But the above considerations may furnish one source of explanation for the origin of that family system.

Consequently, it is unnecessary to erect complicated theories or engage in tortuous speculations in order to explain the creation of this system or to justify it. It is quite simply the outcome of the payment of a bride price in valuables that are of no use except in connection with a similar purpose.

Nevertheless, although the system of the nkita is a natural and logical consequence of marriage by means of a bride price, it is not a necessary consequence. The bride price exists in all the tribes of the Congo, but it does not seem to have resulted everywhere in the institution of the nkita.

•114
607
What has given rise to this institution among the Nkundó? Father Brepoels (loc. cit., p. 339) gives the following explanation:

174 "The sale (sic) of the woman and her loss of liberty must naturally 583x have aroused her indignation. The man probably had a great deal ●114 of difficulty in persuading her to resign herself to it. It was neces-607 sary to arrange for some compensation and that is how the system of the nkita originated. That is how the woman acquired rights over her nkita and how nonexistent prerogatives were attributed to her children: they became the superiors, the "fathers" of the mothers' family . . . . The elders, the wealthy, profited from this system, which released them from any concern for their daughters: the girls could be sold while they were still very young and then if, later, they complained of the injustice that had been done them, the elders consoled them by reminding them of their rights and those of their sons over the nkita and her offspring . . . moreover, this system released the elders from their duty of obtaining wives for their sons and removed any reason for the latter to claim their father's wives.""

This explanation for the origin of the nkita system is unthinkable, for it is entirely contrary to everything [171] we know about the nature of Nkundó marriage. But it seems plausible that the fact that the old father benefited from this institution helped it to flower and spread. Native greed also may have played a role.

583x Nevertheless, we must seek beyond the operation of causes 174 which have contributed to the spread and retention of the system in 607 Nkundó society for those that led to its origin.

Need we invent complicated hypotheses for this purpose? It seems to me that we need not; we can be satisfied with the native explanation: the nkɔ́lɔ́'s rights over the nkita spring naturally from her dominance over the latter, for the nkita's marriage was made possible by the valuables paid for the nkɔ́lɔ́; whereas the rights of the nkɔ́lɔ́'s sons over the nkita's children are derived from the fact that in the Nkundó hierarchy the relationship of the latter to the former is that of "son" to "father."

The secondary causes mentioned above, together with the necessity of reconciling the interests of the various members of the family, subsequently amplified the system.

583x Exceptionally it may happen that a mother becomes her 607 daughter's nkita. Such was the historic case of Bekombe of Belondó (Bonjoku) and her daughter, Mbɛ́lɛ́. The daughter's bride price was 583^x^ 581 men although their first marriage has not been broken and no new marriage agreement has been concluded.

184 [114] The data given above provides no confirmation in the Nkundô tribes under study of the statement made by Engels "Les Wangata [The Wangata]," Revue congolaise, 1910, p. 35) that among the Wangata "her husband can exchange her . . . she can make no protest." (1)

1. The Ekonda apply the term lienjɛ only to an exchange of daughters or sisters. They have a specific term: mpɛ́ngô. Note, by the way, that certain Mbôlɛ tribes who practice a true wife exchange designate it by the same name: impɛ́ngô.

Article VII. Purchase

492 562 587 The purchase of women is not practiced by the Nkundô tribes under discussion here nor even by the Bombwanja. The practice is to be found only among the Elingɛ. What is involved is not a marriage by means of a bride price but a real purchase; that is, a man buys a woman from her husband for a certain sum. He does not go through the woman's parents, as in an ordinary marriage by bride-price payment, but addresses himself directly to the husband.

[721] In general it is the woman who makes the proposal that a man buy her in this manner. Sometimes a man wants to take a woman and first comes to an agreement with her. Before the Europeans arrived such a situation generally led to a war between clans or villages. After an armistice the palaver was settled, and the [219] purchaser paid the husband. [177] Nowadays, since the Nkundô no longer dare to fight because of the legal sanctions that inevitably follow, when a woman abandons her husband for another man who wants to buy her, the parties involved bring the palaver before the judges. As the woman wants only her new husband, and as, on the other hand, war and the punishment of women have been abolished, the first husband has no

[791] women receive other signs: an unexpected obstacle in the form of a stone, a stump, a root, the capture of a tree frog which comes and jumps onto the shoulder, etc

A spirit loves and protects only a child he himself has given. He abhors and hates to the death the living gifts of his fellow spirits. If there are several bilímá in the vicinity of a single village, however, the Nkundó explain the absence of the usual rivalries by considering them as related; one is the husband, another the wife, others the children; that is why they do not oppose each other.

843 Thus an elímá is hostile to any fetus not of his creation. Nevertheless, his spiteful action only begins at the end of several weeks, and even then the pregnancy must have gone far enough to be visible (ɛ́mi jɔ̂kela isómbá) Does it take time for him to obtain evidence that the fruit in question is undoubtedly his own gift?

In any case the consequence of this belief is that a woman who has been pregnant for several months cannot long [472] reside in foreign parts, and one who, after conception, has accompanied a husband who has gone to work elsewhere, returns to her village to complete the last period of pregnancy and to deliver.

However, there is an antidote (nsengó) against this murder-
[751] ous action of the spirits. It may be obtained from a person who knows the recipe (this person is not the nkanga or "doctor"). The protective compound is wrapped in a bit of cloth and, by means of a thread of fibers from the lokósá creeper, is tied in the middle of a rope braided with the fibers of the ikuluyaóndó bush, which the threatened woman ties around her hips. (1)

[115] 1. These data on the subject of the elímá is diametrically opposed to the ideas of Father Schebesta (Vollblutneger und Halbzwerge, p. 241, and W. Schmidt, Der Ursprung der Gottesidee, Vol. 4, p. 322), based on the word of his interpreter, Bern. Bongonga of Bodlama (Bombwanja) (now deceased), who was

2. The beginnings of pregnancy

The first months following the cessation of menstruation are called bɔfɔswa. The oral expression is -fɔswa jɛ́mi (jɛ́mi meaning "fetus")

A woman who has just conceived no longer has any success in looking for caterpillars or in fishing (by scooping, whether with balɛ́ngɛ́ hooks or drugs, called lisola). She is unable to catch anything while the efforts of her companions are fruitful. That is because the bɔfɔswa is wɛ̌ká, that is, a cause for a lack of success (bɔ̌moto ɔa wɛ̌ká ɛ́fɔ́áte) Note that this word may be derived from the verb ɛ́ka, "to place an obstacle."

The husband of a woman in this condition is no better off. His wife's wɛ̌ká is communicated to him as well as to all those of his relatives who [473] live in the same village or, as the natives say, ɔ́jɛ́ mpokɛ́ ɛmɔ̂nkɔlɔ́, "one who eats from the same pot," and okisɛ́ ilɔmbɛ ɛ́mɔnkɔlɔ́, "one who lives in the same house." Friends are not harmed, even if they live in the same settlement as the pregnant woman, nor are relatives living elsewhere.

The wɛ̌ká brings misfortune to anyone tainted with it. Thus if he goes hunting, he will return empty handed; if he participates in a war he will be wounded. Furthermore, if there is a leopard in the vicinity he will choose to kill that man. An elephant will detect his presence and try to kill him. A snake will bite him more readily than another. At market he will be charged more for everything.

This burdensome situation continues during the entire period of pregnancy, hence until the birth of the child.

For this purpose it was necessary to obtain a clear understanding of the meaning of the terms used to describe the types. 121 definitions to present a theory of development, the differentia-114 tion between the two terms appears to me to be very useful, and this seems particularly true if we accept the first definition of clan given by Thurnwald and regard the second as completely irrelevant for our present purposes.

It is true that our A-group lives in a certain district 614 which it claims for itself as its own "province," but it is never-621 theless difficult to describe this district as a politically sovereign community. A political nature could rather be attributed to those groups which, up to now, we have not described at all, i.e., the settlement communities. Proceeding further, the A-group is integrated into the B-group, the B-group into the C-group, thus forming an endless chain; among those tribes who have a greater degree of genealogical consciousness than the Ekonda -- for example, the neighboring Bongili (25) -- the hierarchy of groups ends with mankind, the hierarchy of ancestors with God.

25. Boelaert, "Les Bongili."

Thurnwald emphasizes this ranked structure, especially 121 in discussing the kinship group. Kirchhoff, however, fails to 614 deal with the problem of the kinship group in a manner which would be of value to us in differentiating between kinship group and clan. Dealing with the organizational structure of the peoples he discussed, he naturally was more interested in defining the border between large family and kinship group. Lowie (26)

only discusses the kinship group, "sib," calling it the "'clan' of British anthropologists", (p. 105) or "clans," if patrilineal, and "gentes," if matrilineal, "of most American anthropologists." The "ad infinitum" (p. 106) is also stressed by him in relation to the kinship group. Lowie also admits the possibility of subdivision with respect to his "sib," and consequently he even includes in the kinship group such forms as the "moieties," which according to Thurnwald's definition are still part of it, but which in his view

114 [218] The Nkundo [Nkundu], or Mongo, are an important ethnic group of the central basin of the Belgian Congo. They are patriarchal (1). I lived among their west-central tribes for 20 years.

614 We call a clan, in the ethnic sense, the group of paternal blood relatives who have an autonomous territory in common. This resembles closely what Anglo-Saxon researchers like to call a "lineage" (2).

2. The quotations in this article are from The Pattern of Hera Kinship, by J. F. Holleman (Capetown University Press, for Rhodes-Livingstone Institute, 1949).

614 A Nkundo calls his own clan his wise, from the word ise which means "father." My wise thus includes:

1. My paternal grandfather and his brothers and sisters who are called nkoko (pl., bankoko), "grandfather, grandmother."

2. The sons of my male bankoko, including my own father, all of whom are my "fathers" (ise; pl., baise).

The sisters of my "fathers" are my "female fathers" (isomoto, composed of isé and bomoto, "woman").

3. The sons of my "fathers" are my older brothers (botomolo; pl., batomolo) and younger brothers (bokune; pl., bakune). The daughters of my "fathers" are my sisters (nkâna; pl., bankâna).

776 842 [791] women receive other signs: an unexpected obstacle in the form of a stone, a stump, a root, the capture of a tree frog which comes and jumps onto the shoulder, etc

A spirit loves and protects only a child he himself has given. He abhors and hates to the death the living gifts of his fellow spirits. If there are several bilímɔ́ in the vicinity of a single village, however, the Nkúndó explain the absence of the usual rivalries by considering them as related; one is the husband, another the wife, others the children; that is why they do not oppose each other.

776 843 Thus an elímɔ́ is hostile to any fetus not of his creation. Nevertheless, his spiteful action only begins at the end of several weeks, and even then the pregnancy must have gone far enough to be visible (émi jótela isómbá) Does it take time for him to obtain evidence that the fruit in question is undoubtedly his own gift?

In any case the consequence of this belief is that a woman who has been pregnant for several months cannot long [472] reside in foreign parts, and one who, after conception, has accompanied a husband who has gone to work elsewhere, returns to her village to complete the last period of pregnancy and to deliver.

[751] However, there is an antidote (nsengó) against this murderous action of the spirits. It may be obtained from a person who knows the recipe (this person is not the nkanga or "doctor"). The protective compound is wrapped in a bit of cloth and, by means of a thread of fibers from the lokólá creeper, is tied in the middle of a rope braided with the fibers of the ikulayafodé bush, which the threatened woman ties around her hips. (1)

1. These data on the subject of the elímɔ́ is diametrically opposed to the ideas of Father Schebesta (Vollblutneger und Halbzwerge, p. 241, and W. Schmidt, Der Ursprung der Gottesidee, Vol. 4, p. 222), based on the word of his interpreter, Bern.. Bongonga of Bolilama (Bombwanja) (now deceased), who was obliged in my presence to retract his statements under the pressure of crushing objections on the part of a considerable number of other natives See also Father Boelaert, Hooger Leven, 1935, p. 60, and Congo, 1936, Vol. 1, p. 42, as well as Hulstaert, Congo, 1936, Vol. 2, p. 670.

2. The beginnings of pregnancy

A woman who has just conceived no longer has any success in looking for caterpillars or in fishing (by scooping, whether with balɛ́ngɛ́ hooks or drugs, called lisola). She is unable to catch anything while the efforts of her companions are fruitful. That is because the bɔfɔswa is wɛ̌ká, that is, a cause for a lack of success (bɔ́moto ɓa wɛ̌ká áfɔ́áte) Note that this word may be derived from the verb ɛ́ka, "to place an obstacle."

The husband of a woman in this condition is no better off. His wife's wɛ̌ká is communicated to him as well as to all those of his relatives who [473] live in the same village or, as the natives say, ɔ́jɛ́ mpokɛ́ ɛmɔ̂nkɔlɔ́, "one who eats from the same pot," and okisɛ́ ilɔmbɛ ɛ́mɔnkɔlɔ́, "one who lives in the same house." Friends are not harmed, even if they live in the same settlement as the pregnant woman, nor are relatives living elsewhere.

The wɛ̌ká brings misfortune to anyone tainted with it. Thus if he goes hunting, he will return empty handed; if he participates in a war he will be wounded. Furthermore, if there is a leopard in the vicinity he will choose to kill that man. An elephant will detect his presence and try to kill him. A snake will bite him more readily than another. At market he will be charged more for everything.

This burdensome situation continues during the entire period of pregnancy, hence until the birth of the child.

The Land and Its Inhabitants

The appearance of the land. -- Location of the tribes. -- General characteristics of the natives. -- Maternal feelings. -- The fetisher. -- Religious beliefs. -- Cult of the dead. -- The Mfumu. -- Medicine.

[137] The area between the Congo, the Kasai, and the Kwango is covered with tall grass interspersed with stunted trees and a few small forests whose verdant canopy rises majestically over a boundless plain. A curtain of trees stretches along the rivers and gradually thins out as one penetrates into the interior. The path [491] beaten by the regular passage of endless columns of natives, walking Indian file, winds sadly and monotonously across these lightly rolling plains. During the rainy season the grass, whose stems grow as high as two or two and a half meters, obstructs the view. During the dry season, destroyed by brush fires, it has given way to a blackish-yellow plain from which all life seems to have been [361] banished. From time to [6] time, at distances of 30 and sometimes 40 kilometers apart, we find groupings of huts, surrounded by a few manioc fields, [Fig. 1 appears here] banana groves, and sometimes small plots of maize and peanuts. Upon our arrival, [60] the men look at us without concern, the mistrustful women hide [Fig. 2 appears here] in their huts or take refuge in the forest and fields, and the less timid children stare at us with the insouciance characteristic of their age. [7]

Beyond the Kasai, in the region of the Fimi, around Lake Leopold II, and along the Lukenie, the bush gives way to the forest, damp, swampy, dark, and mysterious.

[137] [136] At the confluence of the Fimi and the Kasai, a vast swampy area stretches as far as the eye can see, bare of all arborescent vegetation, crossed by innumerable channels which are narrow and shallow during the dry season and wide to the point of covering practically the whole region during the rainy season.

The few groups of natives who inhabit this region have built their villages along the river on raised ground, safe from the periodic floods.

In the forest region the villages seem to be scattered purely at random.

The huts are built in the center of a large clearing, surrounded by manioc plots and banana groves which are encircled in the distance by uncleared forest.

Such is the region that we crossed from Stanley Pool to Kasai-Kwango, from the Fimi to Lake Leopold II, and over the entire basin of the Lukenie.

The first peoples we encountered there belong to the Bateke [Teke] group. Their territory lies around Stanley Pool and extends to the north as far as the Lufimi. Beyond that live the Banfumungu [Fumu], also called Banfugumu, Banfumuka, Baumbu, or simply Bamfumu.

North of the Kasai and along the banks of the Congo live the Bayanzi [Yanzi] or Babangi. Their neighbors to the east, the Baboma [Boma] or Babuma, occupy the whole of the confluence of the Fimi and the Kasai, up to the left bank of the lower Kwango.

The Wadia [Dia] live to the north of the Baboma between Nioki and Kutu and extend along the Boriemps and the western shore of Lake Leopold II up to the territory of the Mosengere [Sengele].[8]

The region occupied by the Basakata [Sakata] stretches along the left bank of the Lukenie-Fimi between Bokoro and [illegible].

The Mosengere or Mousengere are settled along the Olonga-Uele in the region of Bongo. Northwest of this group we encountered the Bakutu [Kutu], whose territory extends beyond the boundaries of the Lake Leopold II district. [8]

The Bolia occupy the country northeast of Bongo as far as the Bolia-Kiri region.

The Tumba [Ntomba] are settled all along the eastern shore of Lake Leopold II.

The Bobaie [Baye] are the northern neighbors of the Basakata in the Isoko-Tolo region.

The Balesa [Lesa] -- Batete -- occupy the left bank of the Lukenie between Bokoro and Pobombo.

The Ipanga and the Batitu or Atshitu, inhabit the Oshwe sector both north and south of the Lukenie. The region occupied by the Bokala lies farther east, between the Lodima and Bumbuli.

The Yaelima are found from east of Bumbuli to the Dekese sector and up to Dengese country.

A few Bashilele [Lele] groups are settled at the confluence of the Kasai and Sankuru. Their territory extends far to the south between the Kasai and the Loanga.

The Bankutshu [Wankutshu], also called Basongo-Meno [Songomeno], live on the left bank of the Sankuru up to the sector of Bena-Dibele and Kole. [Ed. the text from here to mid-page 14 is not translated.]

[14] During our stay in the village of Chief Pokei, Baboma tribe, one of the dignitaries died. This death gave rise to an important mourning ceremony, as required by custom. The whole gunpowder supply of the deceased had been used to announce his death to the neighboring villages. Sorrow was expressed in the noisiest and most unexpected ways. The sobs of the women, the cries of despair of the relatives, and the plaintive chanting of the official female mourners mingled with the roll of the drums and the guttural and incoherent cries of the men, who kept drinking in order to express their sorrow more convincingly. All this display is an act. The screams and cries of grief are duties and are all feigned. [15] The Banfumungu cry over the death of a neighbor in the same way as they go hunting; the women mourn and cry just as they prepare food. All this is done as another job, because it is customary, because it is obligatory.

764 273 After the initial manifestations of grief came the burial. The deceased was interred quite far from the village. On the grave, the natives laid out a considerable part of his property, cooking pots, trunks, boxes, pottery, an umbrella, etc., all of which had previously been made useless. The whole ceremony was preceded by copious libations of palm wine and sugar-cane beer. All the guests made it a duty to pay the highest honors to them, and the funeral soon evolved into a scene of general drunkenness.

[362] The women of the village were excluded from the drinking. They would go once in a while to the hut of the deceased, enter it, stay there for 15 or 20 minutes, loudly weeping and wailing, and then calmly go back to their work. There was no trace of [152] true sorrow, of real grief! Only appearances are important to the Banfumongo in these circumstances. [16]

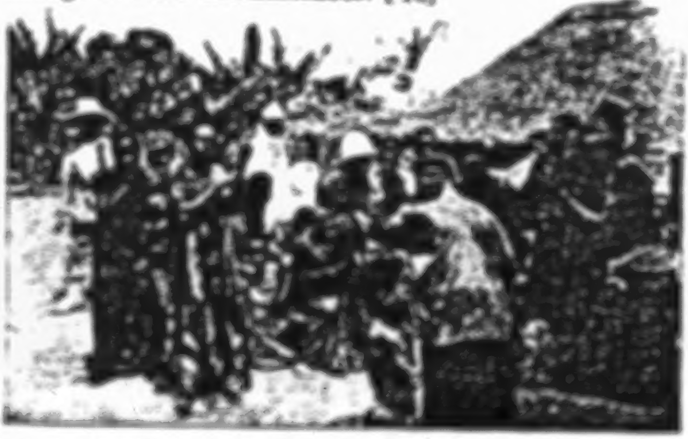

Fig. 10. Mourning Dance in the Village of Chief Pokdi, Belemo.

764 152 A native, nevertheless, is truly affected by the death of a member of his family. The mother in particular suffers at the death of her child, especially if she has raised it through the first stage of infancy. The father is more affected by the loss of a daughter, because she constitutes part of his fortune. Upon the death of her child, husband, or a brother born of the same mother, the woman covers her body with a whitish clay. It is not the white earth called mpembe, but a viscous mud which lends the woman a rather unpleasant, not to say repulsive, appearance. Usually, the 764 traditional loincloth is replaced by crude rags, dipped in the same 152 mud, and leafy branches attached to the waist.

In general a child mourns the loss of his parents very little If they 152 die when he is young, the brothers and sisters of his mother or father 768 take care of him, and he will have the same rights among them as he 764 would have had under the maternal roof. If his parents are old when they die, he is little affected by his loss, and, except for the heavy white lines which the women draw on his forehead, arms, and chest after the great mourning period, he will have little recollection of them.

When we arrived at the village of Penge, a young girl had just died. 764
Throughout the night and the following day, there were incessant 152 cries and laments. The village women would go in turns into the mortuary hut [17], gather around the body, and take up their mourning chant, melancholy, gloomy, and monotonous. At the end of 10 or 20 minutes, they would come out with an unconcerned, casual, and indifferent air while other mourners took their place. The mother alone wept for her child, and her sorrow, less noisy and showy, was sincere, real, and profound.

764 At the village of Tik-ke-Tik in Yaelima territory, we witnessed a similar scene following the death of a young man.

At nightfall his body was wrapped in mats or rattan splints, solidly plaited, tied up, and completely sealed. At dawn the [342] mortuary bundle, attached to a strong branch, was lifted by two men. Instead of taking the village lane, they carried the corpse behind the hut and then through the bush. A few men walking Indian file made up the procession, at the end of which was the mother of the deceased in mourning costume. The path they followed was quite irregular. Largely avoiding the trodden paths, the bearers often retraced their steps and took almost two hours to reach the cemetery, four kilometers from the village.

761 On the way back, the natives explained to me that the numerous turns and the walk through untrodden bush were meant to lead astray the evil spirit who had entered the village and killed the

[19] Since the chief goal of our expedition was to study the practices and customs connected with the material and everyday life of the native, as well as to gather objects for our collection, our stay among the various tribes was too M 121 short to permit a thorough study of their religious life and its attendant customs.

We ascertained that the native, as a rule, acknowledges the existence of a higher spirit. During my stay in the village of Kapanda, Basfumungo tribe, I had the opportunity to question a chief on the subject. M I 716

"Who causes the sun and the moon to rise? Who gave you the fish of the river and the animals of the plain, Matali?"

The chief looked at me for an instant, dumbfounded, and then replied, "Nzambi ve Mundele?" "Was it not Nzambi, White man?"

"Why, then, do you not call upon Nzambi to protect your crops, favor your fishing, and grant you success in hunting, Matali?" [20]

Text F133

M 776 "Would he want to help us, Mundele?"

"Why not?"

"If he is so good, should he not listen to you, Matali?"

"Are not misfortunes caused by the ndoki (spirits), Mundele?"

"But is not Nzambi sufficiently powerful to ward off these ndoki, Matali?"

"Are not the ndoki sent against those who have done evil to others? Would Nzambi still be good if he were to ward off the ndoki, who punish the evil-doers? Ve Mundele, ve! Nzambi is good, he does only good; why call upon him?"

This bit of conversation sums up the native's conception of the supreme being. One calls upon him to explain what one cannot understand, but there is no cult devoted to him. Everything that is good for the society and whose source or origin is not known comes from him.

M 776 778 Aside from this spirit, the various tribes believe that there is a multitude of other spirits, some stronger than others, who are all very much concerned with the natives. They are all good in the sense that what is obtained from them is always beneficial to someone, although sometimes it is quite harmful to someone else. For this reason the native has created nkisi [Ed., fetish] and ndoki.

M 776 791 The fetisher is supposed to be able to communicate with these spirits. He keeps from them, according to native belief, the secrets of which plants help in healing and who has killed someone. He can obtain from them the punishment of a thief, because such punishment is beneficial to the one robbed. Through their intervention he can assure good fishing, guarantee rich hunting, facilitate childbirth, heal the sick, etc., or, on the other hand, make any enterprise fail.

M 776 791 778 The native believes that success of any kind is granted by these spirits. He attempts, therefore, to secure their good graces as much as possible. Before hunting, fishing, childbirth, etc., he goes to the fetisher. For a fairly high fee, the latter calls upon the spirits and hands over the appropriate nkisi. If the results do not conform to his expectations, the native blames [21] neither the fetisher nor the nkisi, but a ndoki more powerful than the nkisi involved. [Ed., a passage is omitted here.]

The intervention of the nkisi or ndoki is only a temporary one. Once an undertaking has been successfully carried out, the native has no further use for the object given to him by the fetisher to insure success. On the next occasion he will go back to the fetisher and ask for a new nkisi, which he would always like to be more powerful than the ndoki. Unfortunately the fetisher cannot find such an all-powerful nkisi. A spirit that he has invoked with success for years, whose power seems inexhaustible, will one day fail him. Five, ten, fifteen times success has followed the invocation, and then, there it is, an enterprise under the same auspices fails miserably. A new nkisi, more powerful, has become ndoki, and the native returns to the fetisher and demands that he do better, always better! With the exception of certain figurines carved in wood and used as hunting fetishes, the physical representation of nkisi consists of an assortment of the

M 778 of the most disparate and incongruous objects, [22] white, black, or red clay, ngula /Ed., redwood powder/, chicken feet, heads, beaks, claws, and feathers, shells, palm nuts, etc., all mixed together in a large pot or in an old worn basket. It is from this magic treasure that the fetisher takes a pinch or two which he wraps carefully in a little bag and hands over to those who resort to him. [T 778] As for the human figurines so often found in the huts of the Bateke and Banfumu, we do not believe that they are fetishes. In our opinion, they are guardian figurines for children, carved before their birth and preserved until they reach marriageable age.

M 791 824 Some fetishers manage to gain quite a reputation, and their services are purchased for a very high fee. They are familiar with the properties of certain plants, and they keep this knowledge secret and exploit it as much as possible. It would be wrong to believe that the fetisher's practices are all based on mystification.

M 278 696 Ebendia, the high chief of the Mosengere, knew the secret of certain poisons. He knew effective remedies for certain kinds of festering wounds; he proportioned the quantity of poison at ordeals so as to make its action violent or slow, and he was familiar with an antidote which cancelled out the effects of the poison.

M 278 695 684 A few hours before our arrival at Penge, Ebendia had subjected [23] one of his wives to trial by poison, on the mere suspicion that she might have gone too far with a native during a slightly prolonged stay in the forest. Ebendia accused her of adultery, prepared the beverage, and compelled the poor woman to prove her innocence by taking the poison. The unfortunate creature rebelled. A quarrel arose, and the village natives, when informed of the matter, protested against it, to no avail, however. The old tyrant carried out the ordeal. He had been notified of our impending arrival, and after allowing the unfortunate woman to suffer horribly for nearly two hours, he gave her the antidote. Five hours later, all the effects of the poison were gone. [Ed., the text is not translated from the last paragraph, page 23, to the second paragraph, page 26.]

T 764 [26] In general the natives have a kind of cult of the dead. In the Bateke-Banfumu region, the corpse is wrapped in fabrics. The more important the deceased person is, the larger the bundle. His whole wealth in fabrics goes with him to the grave. Prior to burial, the deceased is laid out in the mortuary hut. Relatives, friends, and acquaintances sit up with the body in turn. Night and day, plaintive and monotonous chants commemorate the high deeds of the deceased, his glory, his qualities, his wealth, his power, his whole life. The burial is carried out with great pomp and ends with a general consumption of the whole supply of palm wine, malafu, and masanga [Ed., sugar-cane beer]. T 764 T [773]

The cemeteries are located outside the village. The relatives lay out a few broken utensils on the grave. If the deceased was a hunter of repute, they plant a long staff upon the grave, and the skull of some animal killed by the dead man is attached at the top of it. [27]

During my stay in the territory of the Baboma-Banfumu of Bokala, I was struck by the presence of a tiny hut in the center of Chief Pokei's village. It was about 60 centimeters high, 30 centimeters wide, and 50 centimeters long. I thought at first S 766 845 761

766 that it was a small chicken coop, but when I drew near I 945 saw that it was filled with trinkets. Puzzled, I questioned 761 a woman who had been loitering about for a while.

"Is this not my child's house?" she said.

"Where, then, is your child?"

"Is he not there?" and she pointed out a small basket hanging a few paces from the hut.

I came closer, incredulous, and to my great surprise found the mummified body of a child about two years old in the basket. The corpse was completely desiccated. The mother had fed a low fire under the basket for months and months in order to smoke, dry, and preserve her child.

I wanted to have the basket removed and to buy the little hut with the set of small things adorning it. The woman protested strongly. The natives ran up from all sides, and the old chief gave me an explanation for this unexpected gathering. [28]

"If you remove the child, what will happen to his brother? Won't his breath leave him? Can he live here if his spirit is gone? No,

[illegible]

Mundele, no! Look, Mundele, look at this child," he said, pointing to a little boy three or four years old, "he and the other one (pointing to the mummy's basket) were born of the same mother on the same day. The life spirit was shared between the two! One of them died! The spirit remained among us in the brother and will remain here as long as the body of the deceased is with us! This is why we keep the body! When the child grows into an adult, when he can live on his own strength, the mummy will be carried into the forest and disappear, for its spirit will live wholly in the child grown to manhood!" T [764]

Fig. 19. Sitting up with the Dead among the Basake. The body of the deceased, wrapped in fabrics and forming a large bundle, is laid out in the mortuary hut.

Among the Basake-Baboma, each group or village is under the authority of a local chief. There is no general council of the dignitaries of different villages, no common chief.

Beyond them, each village is under the authority of a local chief, Mfumu na Buala, who bears the medal of Bula Matari [Ed. European administration]. His authority is minimal, his powers (42 are not very extensive. He rules on matters of general interest, organizes the hunting and fishing parties, the vintage of palm wine, the preparation of sugar-cane beer, the exploitation of salt grass, the iron work, the construction of the village, and the clearing of agricultural fields. The Whites go to him for corvée labor, bearers, the collection of taxes, the supply of foodstuffs, etc. His authority hinges largely on the prestige of the superintendent. East of the Batitu, these petty medal-holding chiefs are usually mere Mfumu na Bula Matari, for the Mfumu na Buala who govern the villages along with the councils of longamo [Ed., elders, dignitaries] have avoided direct contact with the occupying powers. Thanks to the influence of our agents, these Mfumu na Bula Matari have gained a certain authority. Corvée [61] labor is gradually disappearing, the problems of communication with the agents decrease with the progress of civilization, and the Mfumu na Buala of the region east of Oshwe are beginning to wish they had the medal of Bula Matari and are trying to emerge from obscurity.

(43 Above the Mfumu na Buala stand the Mfumu na Tse, the "chiefs of the earth." Within a single tribe, there may be one, two, or sometimes three Mfumu na Tse. The boundaries of the territories over which they rule are as clearly defined as those of our provinces. Except for unusual cases of supremacy, the Mfumu na Tse of a single tribe regard themselves as totally independent of one [30] another. Only an armed conflict with a neighboring tribe may cause them to rally against a common danger. [Ed., a passage is omitted here.]

The influence of the Mfumu na Tse is especially strong among the riparian tribes of Lake Leopold II and among the Ipanga-Batitu. It probably exists among the Bobala-Tselima and possibly among the Bobala-Basakata-Balesa. [31]

All matters of some importance must be submitted to the Mfumu na Tse, and his judgments are accepted without question. Setting up a new village, clearing new fields, matters of inheritance, important hunting disputes, all must be submitted to the judgment of the Mfumu na Tse. His dwelling is set slightly apart [44] from the village. It includes the hut of the chief, those of his wives, and a large annex reserved for audiences. The furnishings

644 of this audience hall are quite rudimentary: a throne made of a few juxtaposed tree branches placed on a rise, and all around it a large open space with a well-beaten floor. On audience days, the Mfumu na Tse has his chair placed upon the throne, his few counselors settle themselves beside him, and the subjects may sit 653 on the ground. The Mfumu na Tse has the right to collect taxes 651 in kind. A well-defined share of each large animal, such as elephant, buffalo, or antelope, killed on the hunt, whether communal or individual, must be set aside for him. Moreover,

Fig. 20. The Great Chief Bembe, an unsociable character, Mfumu na Tse of the Wadia.

each community pays a specified sum annually as tribute to the Mfumu, and finally, for each matter referred to his judgment he must receive suitable remuneration. At regular intervals, the 643 Mfumu na Tse organizes great celebrations in which all the 533 Mfumu na Bwala in his territory may participate. He covers the expenses of these festivities, just as he must pay the musicians

643 766 [32] The reign of each Mfumu na Tse is usually short. We have not been able to determine the reasons for this, but the fact is unquestionable. Upon the death of a "chief of the earth" among the Mosengere or Bolia, a few dignitaries carry the corpse to the cemetery of the great chiefs. The body is supposed to remain there for seven months. Meanwhile, the new chief prepares to take up [765] his duties. One night the bokoko, sacred bird of the tribe, makes its cry heard, announcing to the whole population that the spirit has appointed a successor. The petty chiefs and dignitaries gather in the village of the new Mfumu na Tse. At night, the latter comes 5 643 766 out of his hut, speaks to the people, and the boloko replies, "Ngulu, ngulu, ngulu." A few days later, the burial of the dead chief takes place. The dignitaries are supposed to go and recover the body, place it in a coffin, [33] and have it buried with great pomp in the morning. It appears that the body remains in the chiefs' cemetery and that the coffin actually holds nothing but a tree trunk, but here again a more detailed investigation would seem indispensable. The burial is carried out with great pomp, and then the new chief is definitely installed. How does the chief acquire the secrets of his occult powers? From whom does he learn how to measure the poison, how to prepare the medicines? So many questions which are yet to be elucidated.

6 157 Aside from these secrets, the art of healing is not highly developed among the natives. A string around the forehead, cupping, and scarification are supposed to cure neuralgia. The cups consist of small gourds with a narrow hole. The native puts a few twigs of very dry grass inside it, sets them on fire, and immediately places the opening of the gourd against the skin. The combustion creates a vacuum, and suction is produced automatically. Scarification is done with a small razor-like knife. [34]

Dwellings

Conditions for setting up a village. -- General arrangement of the huts. -- The typical Bateke-Bamfumu hut. -- The conical Baboma hut. -- Shape of the hut in the region of Lake Leopold II. -- Hut with arched roof on the Lukenie. -- Villages of the Sankuru-Kasai. -- Bakuba hut. -- General conclusions.

M 361 Although all the peoples in the region we visited have reached the sedentary stage, local migrations and changes of abode are rather frequent. In short, the dwelling and the village are stable only as long as the resources of the site and its environment can provide the basic needs of the community.

361/ The first essential condition is a nearby source of drinking water, 312 a stream, a marsh, or one or more natural springs. These springs are quite numerous in the region we visited. Their water is clear, limpid, and refreshing; the supply is abundant and regular in the dry season as well as in the rainy season. The natives value their [515] benefits so highly that the women willingly go 200 or 300 meters to a spring in the forest rather than to draw water from the stream.

361/ [35] In addition to a bountiful spring, the native seeks a healthful location and takes this into account when choosing the future site for his household. The ground that suits him best is slightly raised, dry, open, and located near the forest or in the midst of a fertile plain.

Aside from their hygienic benefits, such locations afford a measure of security to the settler. At the slightest alarm, the whole community leaves both village and home to run into the forest, where they are sheltered and completely safe.

Finally, the native looks for the fertile soil essential to the welfare of his crops. The well-being and even the existence of his whole family depend in large measure on the yields from these crops.

The new site then, must fulfill all these indispensable conditions. If the place that meets these requirements is to be found in a region full of game and not far distant from a stream, marsh, or watercourse rich in fish, the native will not fail to choose such a privileged spot. These conditions will determine the duration of the native's settlement. [Ed., a passage is omitted here.]

361 When the community has decided to move and a location suitable 313 for a new settlement has been found, all the adult males leave to prepare the ground. This work is particularly arduous in forested areas. In the grasslands it is sufficient to cut the grass, or simply to burn it, and then to hoe thoroughly the area for the new village and its fields and to carry off all the rubbish, while the establishment of a village in the heart of the forest requires far greater effort and work. The first few days are devoted to marking out the boundaries and clearing the small trees, creepers, bushes, grass, etc. Everything that can be cut with a knife or ax is hacked down. Large tree trunks are chinked at the base; then the native heaps all the rubbish [36] from the first stage of clearing around them and

Yaelima

361 sets it on fire. Two or three days later the giants of the 313 forest topple one after another amidst an indescribable din and the joyous cries of the natives. The brushwood is quickly cut up and branches and crowns are lopped off. The large logs are left where they fall.

Nothing is more interesting to see than these barely outlined villages in the midst of the great equatorial forest. The clearing, still poorly defined, is framed by a dome of wild greenery over this small open spot where man has decided to settle. The whole clearing is strewn with thick trunks, pieces of wood, charred wood, and rubbish of all sorts. Stumps, cut about one meter from the ground, rise on every side, like so many relics of a life and vegetation recently passed away. Amidst this tortured heap of debris

342 completely at random. They are really nothing but shelters, places of refuge, where the native spends the night for the time being, protected from dampness and inclement weather. Their miserable appearance, their ramshackle exterior, and the roughness of their construction show [37] that the native has built them in great haste, without attaching any importance to them. He nevertheless lives there until a more permanent hut is built, and this provisional state of affairs sometimes lasts quite a long time.

These initial shelters are built without order or method. An odd assortment of materials are used. The shape of the huts varies, and, curiously enough, it usually bears no resemblance whatever to the ultimate dwelling or to the shape typical of the region.

Among the Bateke and Babuende [Bwende], the hut is rectangular and on the average is twice as long as it is wide. The very low side walls are rarely higher than 1.50 meters. The door is cut into the gable end, placed a little to the side, opening on the large village square. The roof slopes away on both sides in a curve from a horizontal ridge. Its edges project considerably beyond the side walls and form a small protective roof all around the outside of the hut. The native uses this protected area to store part of his firewood supply, pottery, and other objects of lesser value.

All the huts are built separately and spaced from 10 to 15 meters apart. They stand parallel to each other, facing the main thoroughfare. [38]

T K 392 As building materials, the native uses raffia stems, bamboo, rattan, and large squared branches for the framework, and grass to cover the roof. The door is sometimes made of planks. Old mats are sometimes used to reinforce the exterior covering of the walls.

The interior of the hut is divided into two rooms by a middle partition. The first room serves as a kitchen, dining room, etc., and the second one as a bedroom.

Fig. 24. Baboma Hut of the Old Type under Construction.

T K 415 357 392 The furnishings of the kitchen are highly varied. Pots, baskets, mortars, pestles, sieves, and other utensils are hung on the walls or arranged on one side. An openwork basket hangs over a hearth made of three stones, and here the native stores his reserves of maize, dried or smoked meat and fish, etc., to protect them from rodents and dampness. A pile of wood stands in a corner, precious fuel taken from the outside stack and brought inside to dry better. Finally, there is the hens' nest, hidden and quite isolated in another corner.

The native stays inside the hut during the day only when it is too cold or too wet outside.

T K 352 The bedroom walls of Babuende and Betcke huts are lined with large mats. Only one or two small baskets and boxes are to be found there, in which the native keeps a few precious 352 objects and nkisi [Ed., fetishes]. There are also two or three pillows carved out of wood, a bed, and sometimes a few human figurines.

The bed is made of four small forked stakes planted in the ground. [39] The strong beams of the bed frame lie upon the forks. The "springs" are made of slats of raffia stems, and one or two large mats substitute for a mattress.

342 The Banfumu hut is also rectangular and divided into two compartments. The door, however, is usually cut in the side wall. The hut is placed lengthwise. The roof has a double slope with an oblique tilt and projects beyond the front of the hut to form a veranda. The ridge of the roof is horizontal.

[351] The chief's house is surrounded by an enclosure, and to reach it one must pass through a sort of simple labyrinth.

351 Each family has a group of dwellings occupying a given space which is often separated from the neighboring enclosure by a low fence and several banana trees. This familial grouping of the huts gives the Banfumu village a distinctive character and appearance which are not seen anywhere else. The village is made up of a series of small, elongated courtyards, separated by small banana groves and plots of peanuts, maize, etc. Certain villages are one or two kilometers in length, although they include only 25 or 30 families. [40]

177 In the Bokala region, among the Banfumu and Bakoma, we came across the conical hut with a square base. It resembles the hut of the Basonge [Songe] in its exterior appearance as well as its structural details and internal layout, except that the projecting roof over the door of the Basonge hut is missing, and the sliding door is replaced by a hinged door opening toward the outside.

This special type of native dwelling, foreign to the area, was introduced by Arabs from the east. Pokaf himself, the acknowledged and undisputed chief of the Banfumu of this region, is actually the former houseboy of the deceased Arab chief who ruled the area for nearly ten years. How did the natives come to adopt this new form of hut so rapidly? We do not know! It is possible, however, that the Arab chief was accompanied by several Baluba [Luba] or Basonge families when he arrived in the region and that the conical hut was first built in the area by these families. The Banfumu natives who fell under the influence of the chief or who accepted his authority may have copied the shape of the hut when [41] they formed a group around the new chief, thus gradually introducing this novel form, entirely different from that of the ancestral hut. It is not without interest to note that the Banfumu of this region have not lost all memory of their original crude huts. The shelter that serves in one of these villages as the hut for the nkisi of the huts has the shape of the old dwellings and curiously enough, tiny as it is, it reminds one very much of the Bateke hut.

£ 361 The conical huts are not arranged in family groupings, but are built along an irregular double line. The free space between the two rows of huts forms the principal artery of the village, and the whole assemblage is surrounded by luxuriant plantings of banana trees and manioc.

M 342 The dwellings of the Baboma, Wadia, Mosengere, and all the peoples along the right shore of Lake Leopold II and the Fimi have the same appearance: rectangular base; roof with an oblique double slope, horizontal ridge; triangular gable; veranda formed by the projection of the roof from one to one and a half meters beyong the façade which faces the chief artery of the village; and an entrance through this same wall with a raised, sliding door.

kitchen utensils and a storage place in the first room and to the bed in the sleeping chamber. The bed is built on stakes from 20 to 30 centimeters high. Mats serve as a mattress, and the pillow consists of a crude wooden block which has hardly been squared, except among the Baboma who still use the small stool-pillow that we found among the Banfumu-Bateke.

M 342 All the peoples of this region build their huts with great care. After carefully marking the area of the new site, the native drives in three large stakes to support the main crosspieces. Then he builds the vertical framework of his hut by planting strong, straight stalks all around the perimeter, 70 centimeters apart. To these vertical stalks, the native attaches horizontal crosspieces made of strong raffia stems and spaced from five to seven centimeters apart. The same method is followed for the interior partition, although weaker and thinner raffia stems are used. The space reserved for the door is left open. At this stage, the dwelling resembles a large cage, (32) fully open to the sky, with its bars arranged horizontally. It remains in that state all through the period of time required to prepare the materials that will line the interior walls. To this end, the native cuts leaves of the nse-nse, a very common type of palm throughout this swampy region. The leaves are assembled in groups of four, the fronds having first been folded in along the rib and roughly braided. The free ends are tied with a fine thong, and the ribs are bound together at intervals of five centimeters. Once the leaves have been prepared, the native goes inside the hut under construction and begins to cover the walls. Proceeding systematically, he works from bottom to top, attaching the nse-nse leaves to the horizontal slats and placing them so that they overlap. When the wall has been covered, it is strengthened with a few slats placed vertically and tied to the outer framework

Sakata FO43
Ntomba

M 342 with rattan thongs. These walls are very strong and durable. The roof is usually covered with thatch, but it frequently happens that the native also uses panels of nse-nse to cover his hut. [43]

M 361 Among the peoples who live west of the lake, the huts are grouped in clusters of two or three and placed in two parallel lines. The free space between the clusters is very limited, so much so that at first sight all the huts seem to be continuous. The doors always open on the large street.

M 342 177 656 We also visited a number of villages where earthen dwellings, built by administrative order, stretched out the whole length of the village. As a rule, however, these huts, which we regard as an improvement from the standpoint of hygiene and comfort, were not favored by the natives. The Negro had carried out the task imposed upon him, but he refused to enjoy it. His primitive hut, which was better adapted to the necessities of his life, retained its appeal and its occupants.

M 361 342 Among the Tumba of the east shore of the lake, we observed that the hut tends to present certain characteristics relating it to the type of hut with an arched roof found among the Buli [Oli] and farther north. The ridge, instead of being straight, extends beyond the ends of the hut and dips down, giving the whole structure the appearance of a bow bent [44] chiefly at the two ends. In certain dwellings the doors are placed in the side wall facing the main thoroughfare, and the huts are built in groups standing more or less close together. In other huts, on the other hand, the door is located in the gable wall and opens on a small veranda formed by the projecting roof front. The huts built this way are placed in a line, but are separated, and although the space between the two lines forms the chief thoroughfare of the village, each hut nevertheless boasts a small individual courtyard in front of the veranda. As to the method of construction, it is identical to those we noted in the region west of the lake.

M S 361 342 Among the peoples of the lower Lukenie, the huts are also built by the same method and with identical materials. The door, however, is nearly always in the gable wall, at the end where the roof projects, slightly curved, to form the veranda. When the huts are separated, one notices again a tendency toward an arc in the

ridge, although it is true that this is not very pronounced. It happens very frequently, however, that the natives help each other in building the village and proceed so as to form long lines of uninterrupted huts. [45] As a result, the ridgepiece is continuous and straight. The opening that serves as a door is in the gable wall and opens on a small empty space. This courtyard is common to two adjacent huts, but their doors are not placed face to face.

This type of continuous dwelling is found most frequently among the Basakata of the interior. It is characterized by the careful attention the natives give to its construction and completion.

342

As regards dwelling type and general village layout, all the peoples along the shores of Lake Leopold II and the banks of the lower Lukenie seem to belong to a single ethnic group characterized by the rectangular hut having a roof with an oblique double slope and a horizontal ridgepiece parallel to the village thoroughfare. The single huts, however, with slightly arched roofs and placed perpendicular to the main axis of the village, which we noted to the east of Lake Leopold II, reveal certain traces of an ethnic affinity with the peoples farther east. Before we proceed

Fig. 28. Tumba Hut with Rectangular Base and Slightly Arched Roof.

Before we proceed

M 361 342 643 to the study of dwellings in that region, it is well to note that among all the western populations, the hut of the great chief, that is to say, the "chief of the [46] earth," Mfumu na Tse, is built separately, a little apart from the general alignment or facing the principal street. This hut is surrounded by a fence, and the enclosure contains the royal hut, the reception palace, and the huts of the chief's wives.

M 644 Entry into the chief's courtyard is forbidden to his subjects. Only the dignitaries are admitted there when royal audiences are held, and to receive them the chief holds court in the hut that serves as a reception building. All around the enclosure, the "chief of the earth" has special trees of the cactus family planted. This, we were assured by the future successor of the Mosengere chief of Penge, is a royal prerogative very strictly observed. The existence of this enclosure around the royal dwelling recalls the custom in Banfumu villages of arranging the huts in family groups, and it seems to indicate a certain affinity between these different tribes.

Fig. 29. Basakata Huts Connected by a Common Court.

M 342 In the region of the Ipanga-Batitu, besides the small hut whose roof has the oblique double slope and horizontal ridge and is covered with vegetal tiles, which serves as a secondary, temporary establishment, we find another type of hut reminiscent of the type found north of Lake Leopold II. The base is rectangular, but the front half forms an open veranda or one closed [47] at the sides. The interior of the hut is square. The roof is arched, with a more or less pronounced curve. After first having cleaned, beaten, and prepared the interior area, the native traces the outline of his hut and erects on the perimeter and the median line the supports for the main rafters. The central stake is 50 to 75 centimeters higher than those placed at the two ends. The latter are, on the average, one meter higher than the stakes of the lateral walls. The three stakes of the median line are connected by a strong horizontal crosspiece, and a second crosspiece is laid over this. The latter must form an arc. The curve is obtained by attaching very strong lianas to the ends, from which the native suspends very large wooden blocks. The roof is covered with raffia stems bent at dihedral angles and attached to the ridgepole and to the two horizontal crosspieces of the side walls. The spaces between the large wall staves are filled in with smaller rods that are tied to the horizontal crosspiece. Upon this framework, the native ties raffia stalks, placed horizontally 15 or 20 centimeters apart. The gable walls are built in the 342 same way, but the tips of the vertical beams are attached to the crosspieces of the roof. The huts are covered with overlapping nse-nse by the same method as that used among the peoples of Lake Leopold II, or they are covered with the large ndele leaves that form vegetal tiles. The native proceeds to cover the roof before finishing the walls of his hut. The rows of nse-nse are fastened directly to the framework of the roof. The ndele tiles, on the other hand, are plaited into an openwork mat with the horizontally aligned holes very close together. The mat is spread over the framework of the roof and fastened to it. It often happens that the native covers the part of the hut that forms the bedroom with ndele and the roof of the veranda with nse-nse. When asked the reason for using such different materials on the same structure, Imunu, chief of the Batitu of the Oshwe territory, explained to us that the ndele make good vegetal tiles which are tough and in which rodents cannot nest because of the thorns, sharp as needles, with which the leaf is covered. In the nse-nse, on the other hand, rats and mice settle quite willingly. They cut the leaves to make their nests and quickly reproduce there, unless they are driven away by smoke from the hearth. "That is why," said Imunu, "we prefer to cover with ndele that part of the hut where our wives set up their hearth." [48]

35 of tree bark. Walls of nse-nse are exceedingly rare.

The door of the hut opens on the interior of the veranda. The latter is always open on the side facing the main artery of the village. Sometimes it is open both in front and to one side; it is very rarely open on all sides.

In the Bokala region and in a very few Yaelima villages, we found this same characteristic type of hut. Such cases, however, were quite rare. Most often the huts in this area had an appearance that reminded us of the Batito type only by the presence of a veranda with a roof that was more or less curved in the extension of the main axis.

The Bokala-Yaelima hut has a rectangular base and a roof with an oblique double slope and a horizontal ridge.

The interior of the hut has two parts, one serving as living room, kitchen, and dining room, the other as the bedchamber. The door opens into the first part and is cut in the wall facing the main artery of the [48] village. All the huts are built separately [36] and laid out lengthwise in such a fashion that two parallel rows make up the village. The huts are built with stakes and raffia stems for the framework and nse-nse to cover the walls as well as the roof. The natives of the Bumbuli region usually build their 342 huts quite carelessly. Although their villages are remarkably clean, the general appearance suffers a great deal from the shabby state of most of the dwellings. Even quite new huts are poorly finished, compared to those of other regions.

The furnishings of Batitu and Yaelima huts do not differ from 352 those of other regions, except in the shape of the utensils and the presence of chairs. The bed is always very low, raised barely 10 or 15 centimeters from the ground. The interior of the hut is only very rarely lined with mats. Among the furnishings one should [345] note the large drying basket which serves as a storage place and which is hung above the hearth. It is hexagonal in shape, and its radius varies from one to one and a half meters. Its edges are straight, the thongs by which it hangs are attached to the six corners of the hexagon, and it is made entirely in an openwork weave like that [50] of the caned chairs of Europe, a special technique of which we found no other instances in the region. No less interesting are the chairs, relatively rare among the Batitu, common among the Bokala, and in daily use among the Yaelima. Their special form is characteristic. The natives 352 sometimes take the utmost care to ornament them with carved 531 designs, and the remarkably artistic appearance of certain ones

Yaelima
[illegible]

352
331 give them in general a very interesting local ethnic character.
415 One might say as much of the carved wooden cups, the engraved 531 horns, and the vessels of artistically worked wood which up to now have been regarded as local to the region occupied by the Bakuba [Kuba] and which are found throughout the territory south of Wumbali.

342 As a rule, the hut of the Bena Dibele-Kole region is much trimmer, it is constructed much more carefully, and the work is accomplished with order and method. The shape is rectangular, the roof has a double slope, and the ridgepole is slightly arched. This curve, however slight, is nevertheless quite characteristic and quite constant. It is undeniably reminiscent of the typical form of the ancestral hut.

Fig. 34. (1) Basketu-Bakuba Hut under Construction.
(2) Completed Basketu-Baskuba Hut.

The door is located either on the side or in the gable wall, according to whether the hut is oriented parallel or perpendicular to the main axis [51] of the village. This door is always placed 342 rather high and closes on an inner slide. Since _one_-_one_ and _ndele_ are lacking in this region, the framework of the huts is made of stakes and pieces of raffia, and the walls and roof are covered with raffia leaves plaited flat in the form of a mat.

The huts are built singly, a method which again reminds one of the customs of the Odiwe-Bumbuli region. The native does sometimes cover his hut with grass, but this is very rare.

In this region we also observed that in certain villages the huts 361 were arranged in family groupings and that each group had a spe- 592 cial area clearly set apart from the rest of the village. The various huts of a single group are inside a fairly solid stake fence 572 from one and three-quarters to two meters high and sometimes 351 covered with mats of raffia leaves. The doors of all the huts within an enclosure open toward the interior of the courtyard.

Fig. 35. Interior of a Lupango and Drying Peanuts, Bena Dibele-Kole Region.

The whole forms the _lupango_. By counting the number of huts in 592 a _lupango_ one may determine how many wives the chief or head of the place has, since each one has her own home. [52] The lupango are of recent introduction and are derived from Arab in- [177] fluence. One cannot take them into account in establishing relationships of kinship or ethnic affinity between the different peoples. There is no connection whatever between the _lupango_ of the Bena Dibele-Kole region and the familial grouping of huts

572 among the Basfunus. [Ed., the remainder of the chapter, through page 54, is not translated.]

The Native's Means of Subsistence

Animal husbandry: chickens, goats, dogs. -- Agriculture: manioc, maize, rice, bananas, peanuts. -- Hunting: weapons, snares, nkisi, individual method, communal hunting. -- Fishing: general method, dams, basket weirs, traps, harpoons, bows and arrows, cord nets, screens.

231 The peoples of the Congo-Kasai-Lake Leopold II region and of the Lolenie do very little animal husbandry. They possess no large animals. At most one may find a few chickens, rare goats, and some hunting dogs in their villages. The dogs get a share of the game and live as best they can the rest of the time.

No care whatever is given to the goats. They wander freely during the day and graze in the forest or plain. Sometimes they venture into the planted fields, from which the hunting dogs chase them at first sight. At night they return to the village and take shelter where they will. During our stay in the village of Toipolo, they even came and disturbed us at night while we were lodged in the hut reserved for strangers. [915]

235 The chickens wander around the village and planted areas during the day and sleep [56] at night in the native's hut, where they have their nest for laying eggs and a place to hatch them.

262 439 435 The native does not eat the eggs. He sells them to agents of the state or of commercial concerns, who collect them for hatching. The chicken itself is rarely eaten by the native. Most often it goes to the kitchens of the Europeans. In 1913-14 the average price of a chicken was half a franc, that of an egg, five centimes, and the price of a goat was from five to 15 francs.

4/2 241 [83] When new fields are prepared, the first work of clearing them falls to the men. This work is done with a knife and an ax. The shape of this latter tool is the same among all the tribes: a wooden handle with a bulge at one end like a club; and a long, narrow, triangular piece of iron embedded laterally in the handle.

After clearing the brush, the men pile the rubbish at the foot of the large trunks and set it on fire. The tree, undermined at its base, finally topples over and remains where it falls.

[85] The women take charge of the other work of cultivation. This varies [57] very little from tribe to tribe, and even the various crops of manioc, maize, peanuts, rice, bananas, and sugar cane require only quite rudimentary special labor.

246 4/3 Manioc is the staple food of the tribes over most of the region we visited. The natives cultivate both sweet and bitter manioc. The latter variety is the more widespread. To prepare the ground, the native woman uses an iron hoe, triangular in shape, with a flaring base and a spike at the top. This piece of iron is embedded laterally in a rough-hewn wooden handle which bulges at the end like a club. The purpose of the club-like end is two-fold: it provides a better hold for the piece of iron, and it intensifies

the worker's efforts without, however, making the use of the tool too tiring. 412

After the first hoeing, the woman makes little mounds, 30 centimeters high on the average and spaced about 80 centimeters apart, and inserts four or five manioc cuttings into them. 244

The upkeep of the manioc fields is limited to one or two [58] hoeings to remove the weeds. Manioc requires extremely fertile soil. Its cultivation exhausts the soil to such a point that after three or four years the native must move his fields and abandon the cleared land.

Sweet manioc attains its maximum development at the end of a year, bitter manioc after 15 or 20 months.

Fig. 38. Initial Establishment of the Village of Longiapila in a Clearing, Batitu Tribe.

The manioc tubers or roots are gathered as the family needs them. The root is good to eat at any stage of growth and at any time of year. The maximum yield coincides with the maximum growth of the plant and not with its full maturity. The average yield varies between 12,000 and 14,000 kilograms per hectare. The native woman does not wait until the plants are fully developed to start exploiting the crop. She limits her harvest to a strict minimum throughout the rainy season. At this time the manioc, swollen with water, yields only a little flour and is easilyy spoiled by soaking.

M
245 Next to manioc, bananas occupy the first rank among the native crops, at least among the peoples of Lake Leopold II, the [56] lower Lukenie, and the region between the Congo and the Kasai. Among the tribes of the upper Lukenie, cultivation of banana trees is less developed, and in the Bena Dibele-Kole region it is almost completely absent.

The natives prefer to cultivate the large banana. It is less juicy and more floury than the small one and yields larger crops. The banana groves are always set up near the village and most often directly behind the dwellings. It follows that these groves have the general shape of the village and, in a way, frame it.

Banana trees, in order to thrive, must be planted in very fertile soil which has been well cleared and deeply turned. To promote their growth and increase their yield, the natives dump into the banana groves all the waste from the kitchen, ordure, ashes, and sweepings from the regular cleaning of the village and huts. They also go into the groves to answer the calls of nature.

[579]

M
243 Maize is not cultivated on an important scale. Beyond the post at Tolo, maize seems to be completely unknown. Among the peoples of the Fimi, Lake Leopold II, and the lower Lukenie, the cultivation of maize is quite rudimentary. On the other hand, we encountered large fields of maize among the Bateke and especially among the Basfumu of the Kapanda territories. It is well to note, however, that the intense cultivation of maize in that region was not due to any direct use of it by the native, but to the hope of selling it profitably to the traders and workers of Leopoldville-Kinshasa.

Tek. FI33

T [243 W31]

Maize is sown in seed holes, 20 to 60 centimeters apart. The holes are dug in cleared ground as the rainy season draws near. The maize shoots appear after four days. At this time the plants are quite vulnerable to the depredations of birds. The children keep watch over the fields from morning to night for four or five days and drive the birds away with their cries.

Care of the crop includes weeding and thinning out the plants. Maize is neither hoed nor propped. It is sometimes sown as an extra crop in manioc fields. The maturity of maize is marked by the yellow, dry spathes. The harvest takes place some time after its maturity. The maize stalks are pulled out by the women and children, and the ears are cut off on the spot and carried to the village. [60]

The cultivation of rice is unknown in the region we visited, except among the peoples of the Bena Dibele-Kole region. The ground is hoed before sowing. The rice is sown in seed holes during the first quarter of the rainy season. The care of the fields is limited to two or three weedings during the initial stage of the plant's growth. The crop must be guarded regularly and uninterruptedly from morning to night from flowering to harvest. The rice is cut with knives, ear by ear. The ears are gathered by the handful. These are put in loose sheaves and, after several days, piled in stacks. The threshing is done in the village by family groups. The native chooses a large, well-beaten area and uses long rods. Husking is done with a pestle in a wooden mortar. The husked rice is winnowed in baskets of rattan splints, which are circular and shallow with a reinforced rim. The average yield varies between 2,000 and 3,500 kilograms per hectare.

Teke FO33

M 243 The cultivation of rice serves less to nourish the native than for trade. He usually sells his harvest immediately after the husking.

T 244 Peanuts thrive in the region of the Basfumu and among the Basiamba. They grow best in light soil and are not suitable for land cleared from the great forest. The crop demands a great deal of care and regular upkeep. Fields invaded by weeds yield

T M [462] nothing. The harvest takes place when the crop is mature and is the task of the women with the help of the children. The peanuts are placed in baskets carried on the back and taken to the village. The native spreads them out in the sun to dry. He turns them again and again, two or three times a day, and brings them into the hut at night.

M 244 Sugar-cane plantations are set up in marshy lowlands.

[462] [273] All the work on this crop falls to the men. These plantations are found only in regions where the natives make masanga, sugar-cane beer. Sugar-cane fields are especially numerous in the villages on the lower Lukenie and the Fimi.

M 244 As a rule the natives also cultivate a few legumes, sweet potatoes, and yams, but on a small scale and without giving them any particular care. (41)

Hunting

M 224 462 Hunting is practiced only by men. They engage in it, not for sport, diversion, or relaxation, but for the sole purpose of procuring meat and fat.

M 224 857 From their earliest childhood, the boys get together to beat the grass and catch mice, rats, and other rodents which swarm in the bush. Nothing is more interesting than to see them at work. Ten, fifteen, or sometimes twenty of them form a large circle. Armed with sticks, they beat the grass and make an unbelievable din. Little by little the circle narrows, moving in on a small well-cleared space. The oldest, most daring and most agile of the boys keep watch over this space, their eyes alert and riveted on the edge of the grass, ready to pounce. The beaters redouble their zeal, strike, shout, gesture, and gradually drive all the rodents 224 857 toward the small clearing. Badgered and frightened, the rats, mice, etc., run madly. Not daring to break through the line of beaters, they are pushed toward the clearing, hesitate an instant before entering it, then bound in. Without moving from their places, the little hunters wait for them and catch them in passing.

A sharp, quick blow and their ribs are smashed in, their skulls broken. Not one escapes; neither their size (some rodents are as big as hares) nor bites nor scratches frighten these tots of three, four, or five years of age.

224 223 857 The children also occupy themselves by capturing birds and small rodents with nets and snares. The latter are made with a flexible stalk for a spring and a cord with a noose. A system of small sticks which automatically trigger the release compels the bird to stick its head into the noose to reach the bait. At this moment, the mechanism is released, and the victim is pulled up by the cord attached to the stalk spring.

224 The natives also set snares of the same sort in front of holes of rodents and other animals or at a place where they habitually pass.

At the village of Madjuku, I had occasion to see the mechanism of a rat snare in action. In front of a hole, two arched sticks [62] intersect. A strong rattan stalk (E) has been stuck into the ground, and two piassava cords (A and B) are tied to its tip. One of the cords ends in a noose, which is placed in front of the entrance to the hole. A small stick (C) is attached to the end of the second cord. One of the ends of this stick passes behind the intersection 224 of the two arches, and the other one is held in place by a mobile stick (D) placed transversally between the tips of the arches in such a fashion as to bar the mouth of the hole. In leaving or returning, the rodent sticks its head through the noose, and being impeded by the transverse stick (D), it pushes the stick aside with its paws, releasing the trigger stick (C) and the bent branch (B) which snaps up. The rodent is automatically caught in the noose, pulled up, and strangled. This snare is remarkably sensitive, and the rodent who tackles it is invariably caught.

The natives also set up snares for antelope. Being very observant, they quickly discover the place where an antelope passes regularly, as well as the size of the animal. They place a rattan noose at this spot and carefully hide it in the grass and leaves. The animal sticks its head through the noose in passing and is trapped. The more the animal struggles, the tighter the noose is drawn.

The native sets traps for the large flesh-eaters, hyenas, leopards, and large wild cats. [Ed., the text is not translated from the third paragraph, page 62, to the second paragraph, page 64.]

The pitfalls consist of large holes dug along the paths frequented by the pachyderms. These holes are three to four meters long, two meters wide, and four to five meters deep. At the bottom, the native plants wooden stakes whose ends, carved to a point, are hardened by fire. The opening is hidden by a mat of tree branches and roughly plaited creepers, covered with leaves and grass. These traps are a real danger to travelers in the country, and therefore the native is required to indicate their presence by a conventional sign prominently displayed. I first noticed these signposts between the Mosengere villages of Lokila and Gomo Erenge: a strong stake perpendicular to the ground, on top of which the native fastens a hoop and a stick. The latter is fixed obliquely to the ground in the direction of a straight line from the post to the trap. If a native neglects to place the signpost, he [65] loses his right to the game caught in the trap, and he is held responsible for any accidents that might result from his negligence.

224 Another trap, very often used for the hippopotamus, is made of a heavy iron point suspended above the path frequented by the pachyderms. During the day, they prefer to stay in the water or to sleep on a sand bank. At night, they leave their refuge to graze on the grass of the plain. More often than not the animal leaves quite visible traces of his passage on the bank as he leaves or enters the water. The native places his trap near those places, but avoids putting it at the exact spot where the animal comes out. Experience has shown him that the hippopotamus, being extremely cautious, is alerted by the least [65] alteration of this place and changes to another one immediately.

The iron point is embedded in a large block of wood. The whole apparatus is suspended four or five meters above the ground. A crossbar, one meter above the ground across the track, is held in place by the trigger device which controls the suspension of the weapon. As he passes, the pachyderm strikes and dislodges the crossbar, springs the trigger, disrupts the suspension, and the spear falls heavily upon him. The trap is arranged in such a way as to hit the animal on the nape of the neck. M 224

The native hunts with bow and arrow as well as with spear. The bow and arrow, however, is more a weapon than a hunting instrument. M 224 411

The peoples in the territory between the Congo and the Kasai, as well as the Baboma of the Fimi have now given up these weapons. A few privileged persons own percussion guns which are usually more dangerous to the hunter than to the hunted. When the native fires a shot, he extends his arms, directs the barrel towards the prey, and turns his head aside. If, through cunning and patience, he gets to within a few meters of the game without arousing its attention, the shot has a chance [66] of success. Ordinarily the animal is more or less gravely wounded, unless the overloaded gun explodes in the hands of the imprudent hunter.

The Bateke, Banfumu, and Baboma store powder in small receptacles made of a simple calabash or cut out of a block of hard wood. The calabashes are sometimes covered with a sheath of serpent or lizard skin to protect the powder more effectively from dampness. The wooden powder flasks are usually pear-shaped, probably to imitate the shape of the calabash. They have a wooden cover that fits very tightly into the body of the object, and the leather strap for hanging it up is attached to two holes cut in the body of the receptacle and drawn through two side openings in the cover. Very often these carved powder flasks are decorated with designs engraved in bas relief, linear motifs arranged in bands. The lines are sometimes curved, sometimes straight, and sometimes also oblique. The bottom of the powder flask is flat so that it may be placed upright [67] on a horizontal surface. The body of the powder flask extends into the straight cylindrical neck onto which the cover is fitted. S T 411 322 S T [53]

The bow with rattan thong is relatively rare. We found it only among the Tumba, Balesa, Bobale, Batete [Tete], Ipanga, Batitu, and the Pygmies. This bow is made with a rattan stem, its convex section facing out and its flat section facing in. The rattan thong is attached to the two ends after having been drawn through M 411 [171] small holes made in the body of the bow four centimeters from the tips. A shallow vertical groove is made at the end of each tip. Tension on the bow is obtained by drawing the bowstring through these notches.

The arrows are made of false bamboo, the two vanes of leaves drawn through a slot. The heads, hardened by fire, have small notches and are smeared with poison. This poison is dangerous only when quite fresh. A small dose of it will not kill, but benumbs the wounded animal.

The natives use these bows and arrows especially for hunting birds and more rarely for hunting monkeys. In the latter case, they like to use a bow made of a strong, very flexible, and very tough stalk. The average length varies between 80 centimeters and 1.10 meters. The stalk tapers gradually toward the ends which are pointed and have a stop notch. The convex side of the vertical section faces inward, the flat side outward. The cord is made of [203] banana tree fibers. The tension is constant, that is to say, the native does not slacken the bow at rest. Under tension the height of the curve of the bow is 12 centimeters; the bow's actual range is 150 meters and its useful range 100 meters, or 15 to 20 meters when shooting upward.

[362] The manufacture of bows and arrows is practiced only by men.

322 The native chooses the wood for his arrows very carefully. It must be light and very tough. After scraping it carefully with a small knife, he carves one end into a point and cuts a notch at the other end for the bowstring. Both ends are slightly hardened by fire. The part where the vanes are to be attached is scraped with the greatest care. The lines marking the place for the vanes are drawn with the point of the knife, and the vanes are made out of half

S

M
[314] This fine ligature is strengthened with bulungu resin which is applied in a liquid state and thus forms a very light sheath when dry.

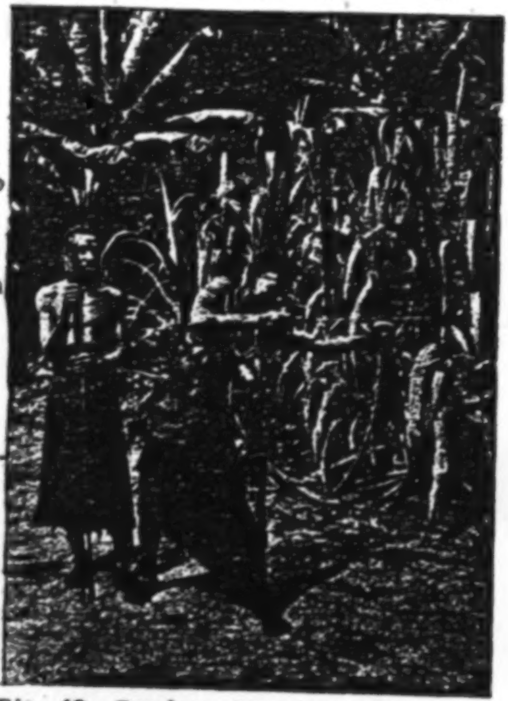

Fig. 43. Basakata Armed with Spears, Bow and Arrows.

M
411 The arrowhead ends in an elongated, conical socket into which the upper end of the wooden shaft is fitted. The general shape of the head is that of a narrow, oblong leaf, sometimes provided with one or two barbs. This shape is found throughout the Lake Leopold II and Lukenie regions. The notch for the bowstring is quite even and shallow, although among the

Yaelima

411 Yaelima it is sometimes as deep as five centimeters. The bow and arrow of the type we have just described serves both as an offensive and a defensive weapon. Its importance as a weapon must have formerly been greater. In our time wars between [721 tribes have become almost impossible. Attacks and reprisals by 578] individuals, on the other hand, are still rather frequent. This is especially true of the region east of Opombo. Every free Ipanga, Batitu, Bokala, and Yaelima owns a bow and arrows and does not hesitate to use them either to defend himself or to attack.

224 Hunting with bow and arrow is done on an individual basis. The game taken in this way belongs wholly to the hunter. [69]

[411] Among the Yaelima we found an arrow with a removable head that is notably larger, wider, and stronger, and that is attached to the shaft by thin cords. The natives use these arrows for hunting antelope and buffalo. When the animal is hit, the arrowhead penetrates its body, and the surprised victim flees into the bush or forest. The shaft of the arrow, buffeted by the tall grass or lianas, gradually works itself loose. The head, attached to the shaft by a cord, remains in the wound. With each motion, the animal enlarges its wound. The shaft, sooner or later, is caught in the lianas or grass, with the result that the head is violently jerked from the wound, making it a mortal one. This very dangerous weapon is not widespread, and for good cause. The native can use it effectively only for a point-blank shot. The range of the bow is limited; the arrow with the removable point is heavy; the iron point is very wide and has small barbs. To succeed in planting this arrow in the body of the animal, it is necessary to creep to within several meters of the game, to string the bow without attracting the animal's attention, and to hit it in the belly. The wounded beast may seek its salvation in wild and fatal running, but it sometimes turns against its attacker. In any case, the hunter who uses these arrows cannot do so without risking great [70] danger. Although the native likes to hunt, he also fears the dangers associated with this occupation. The only ones who use these arrows are the intrepid true hunters who have inherited some of the instinct and audacity of the Batua [Twa]. Inunu, chief of the Batitu of the Oshwe region, who was audacious to the highest possible degree and feared no animal, obstacle, or danger, asserted to me that he and a few other hunters did not hesitate to attack elephants with this weapon.

Yaelima

The native most often uses his spear for hunting big game, 224 or he contents himself with setting traps.

The peoples west of the Ipanga have given up elephant hunting. During our sojourn in the region of the Bobaie, Basakata, and Balesa, the natives came to complain several times about the invasion of their manioc fields by elephants and the damage done by these inopportune visitors each time they came. They never thought of attacking the animals. To chase them away, they built fires and made an infernal din, while keeping their distance.

Fig. 44. Great Yaelima Hunter Showing his Harpoon Arrow.

In the region of the Ipanga-Batitu and among the Bokala-Yaelima, elephant hunting is rather frequent. The most daring hunters attack them with spears. This hunting is done on an individual basis. The hunter covers or smears himself with elephant dung. As he draws near, he takes a thousand precautions not to attract the attention of the animal, who is always on the alert. Once within range, he plants his spear into the under belly of the animal and gets away as fast as he can. The wounded beast 224 lunges forward at random until, exhausted by the wild ru and loss of blood, it falls for good. The hunter follows the track for two or three days without ever tiring or losing heart. He infers the probabilities of success from the loss of blood, the footprints, the length of the paces, and many other signs, and as long as any hope remains he keeps up the chase. The animal sometimes manages to get rid of the spear. In this case, the hunter returns to the village and recounts his exploit to all who will listen. He does this not to establish a reputation, but to build up a claim against anyone who might find the animal if, by some wild chance, it should succumb to the wounds.

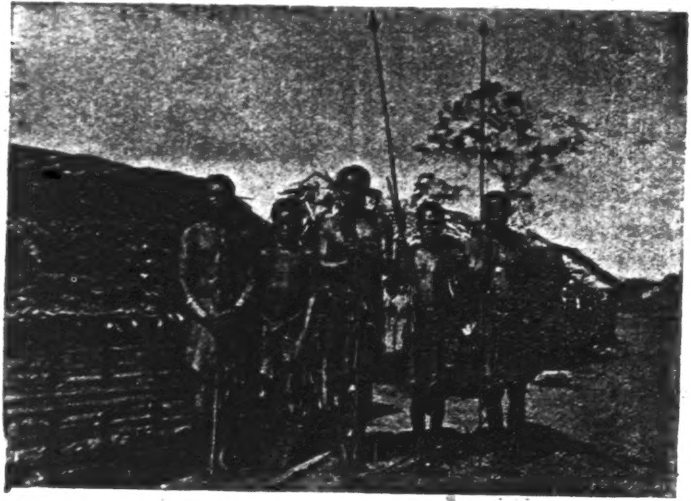

Fig. 45. Leaving for the Hunt in Yaelima Territory with Spears, Bows, Arrows, and Nets.

Communal hunting is more common. The natives use large [71] nets, spears, knives, and dogs. The group is divided into beaters, directed by a leader, and those who own nets and act as lookouts.

The first native hunt I had the pleasure to attend took place at Tua among the Banfumu.

224 The first native hunt I had the pleasure to attend took place at Tua among the Banfumu.

Upon arriving at the edge of the forest chosen for the hunt, the [231] chief hunter stopped, put his dog down on the ground, and ordered it to lie down and stay still. Well trained, the dog obeyed at the first sign. The leader assembled the hunters and told them he was 224 782 going to invoke the nkisi in order to ensure the success of the hut. He began:

"Why is there no fire?"

"Where, then, is the wood?"

Thereupon the men carrying the nets put their burden down and went off to the left and right to gather dry wood with which they made a pyre. A hunter squatted down and lighted the fire with his strike-a-light. When the wood caught fire, the chief beater continued:

"Where, then, are the nets? Why don't I see the little bells? What [72] has happened to the dogs?" Immediately, the nets and bells were placed in a circle around the fire, while the dogs and the hunters grouped themselves around the chief beater. He tore off a tree branch and held it over each net in turn, saying, "You will be stretched out in the forest, and you will stop the game!" Then, passing the branch over the bells and the dogs, he continued, "You will awaken the game in the forest, and you will drive them into the nets!" Next, taking a large leaf, he placed it flat over the hollow of his left fist and struck it with the palm of his right hand to make it pop with a sharp noise, saying, "May the nkisi favor us."

[534] Next, seating himself before each net, he blew twice into a small wooden whistle which Folikini, the Mfumu na Tse, had given to him along with the nkisi of the hunt, struck the nets and bells twice, and whispered several mysterious words. At each invocation, the man carrying the net and the owner of the dog made a leaf pop on their fists by striking it with their right palms.

A child brought a white chicken. The chief beater tore off its head with a sharp jerk and sprinkled the nets and bells with blood while invoking the nkisi. He then threw the chicken on the fire after sprinkling it with the red, brown, and black dust of the nkisi given to him by Folikini at the moment of departure. While the unplucked [436] chicken roasted on the fire, one of the hunters placed a bundle of small shells (native currency) on the ground. Each hunter took an equal share of these and gave them to the chief beater.

Take FI33

224 782 The latter then opened the roasted chicken and amid the shouts of the hunters threw the entrails into the fire in honor of the nkisi. Then each hunter brought a banana leaf to receive his share of the chicken. Immediately thereafter, they tore off tree branches, threw them on the fire, trampled all this, and smeared the nets, bells, dogs, bows, arrows, spears, and their own bodies with the ashes. The ceremony was over. The hunt was about to begin.

Fig. 46. Putting the Hunting Nets in Place.

224 The net bearers took up their loads and went to set up the nets in the forest.

Each net was from 20 to 25 meters long. The native stretched them slightly oblique, on a slant toward the beaters. The latter attached [73] the bells under the dogs' bellies and went to form a large arc whose ends pointed towards the ends of the nets. We followed the owners of the nets. They stationed themselves 10 or 12 paces in front of their nets, hiding in the foliage, while we stood near the nets, but at a good distance from one another. Soon the cries of the beaters, the jingle of the bells, and the barking of the dogs awakened the silent forest.

We loaded our rifles.

The chief beater's voice was heard, "Aliende go... O..O!" The dogs had just flushed some game. They chased it, and the beaters shouted, sang, made a racket, and incited their dogs.

Take F133

224 Care had to be taken so that the panic-stricken beast would not slip between them. Soon we heard a great shout, followed by a plaintive animal cry. A buluku (small, mauve antelope, Cephalophus maxwelli) had just been caught in a net. The owner rushed out from his hiding place. The small beast, frightened out of its wits, made desperate efforts to get loose, but entangled itself more and more. In a flash, the native seized it and securely tied its legs. [74]

Ordinarily he would have finished it off, but we had given orders not to kill the game for fear of harm to the skins.

A second, third, and fourth beating followed the first. We stood on the lookout all the while. Alas! Not one large catch! About three o'clock we returned to the post, followed by the hunters carrying the six captured buluku. The hunt had not been a very good one. Mr. Borremans told us that the natives often return with 10 or 15 of these small antelopes.

Sometimes an elephant is roused by the beaters, a disastrous occurrence for the nets and a dangerous one for the hunters. If the frightened beast plunges into the nets, it tears them loose, to the great danger of the owner who stands on watch. If the animal in its fury turns upon the dogs, the beaters have no choice but to flee as fast as they can!

224 778 Every communal hunt is accompanied by some magico-religious ceremonies. This custom is common among all the peoples we visited west of Dekese. Throughout this region, we found a small place in each village dedicated to the guardian spirits of the hunt. In the Leopoldville region and among the Bateke in general, the fetish place is enclosed by high stalks reinforced with intertwined transverse stalks. In rare instances antelope and buffalo skulls are found inside these enclosures of the nkisi of the hunt.

224 778 346 We found the same kind of enclosure among the Banfumungu, but instead of standing against the native's hut, it was placed in front of the entrance of a small hut with a very peculiar and characteristic shape. The roof had a double slope and a horizontal ridgepole; the side walls were rectangular and the others gabled. A small rectangular opening with a woven screen to close it on the inside was cut in the wall that faced the enclosure, and this served as a door. Inside the hut we noted a small hearth made of 224 three tiny termite mounds, a bed covered with a mat, and one or 778 two worn pots containing the oddest assortment of objects, as well 346 as ngula powder, mpembe, and black earth. It is in this hut that the fetisher keeps the hunting fetish. [75] It was quite accidentally that I was able to observe this fact during my visit to the village of Mbomu in the Banfumu region.

Among the Banfumu of the Bokala region and the Baboma of Mushie-Bokala-Wombali, we found these same typical huts dedicated to the guardian spirits of the hunt.

Fig. 47. Baboma Hut for Nkisi of the Hunt. In the background, hut of Basonge type with conical roof and square base.

In the village of Bomu-fioti, the hut of the hunt was considerably larger and was not surrounded by an enclosure, but in front of its entrance stood a tiny hut that strongly resembled a very large hive with a pointed top and a markedly curved base. This hut was the sanctuary of the guardian fetish of the hunt. All sorts of skulls were piled around the hut, attesting to the power of the fetish.

In the Baboma village of Wombali, the hut of the nkisi of the hunt was two meters long and one meter wide. The roof and the side walls were made of lengths of rattan bent into a half ellipse.

224 The door had been cut in the front wall. The hut was thatched 778 and surrounded by a rattan fence. Inside there were a bed and 346 three nkisi pots. As for the fetish, if there [76] were one, the natives had taken it out before our visit. Animal skulls lay all around the hut.

[784] According to our information, entrance to the hut of the nkisi of the hunt is forbidden to women and to every native whose reputation as a hunter has not been established by exploits during communal hunts. On the eve of an organized hunt, that is, a communal hunt with nets, the chief fetisher or whoever is designated to lead the hunt must retire to the hut. He spends the night there without going out under any pretext and without taking any food whatever. If, for any reason, he violates these rules, the hunt must be put off until the following day.

224 When all the hunters are assembled, about five o'clock in the 778 morning, he leaves the hut with a small bag made of banana leaves in which he carries part of the magic substances taken from the nkisi pots. These substances will be used in the special ceremonies which take place at the edge of the forest just before the hunt. Upon returning from the hunt, the skull of the largest animal killed is placed in front of the hut as a token of gratitude.

When he hunts alone, the hunter whose reputation is such as to entitle him to enter the fetish hut must stay in it four days before starting out. He takes his weapons, spears, knives, bows, and arrows and keeps them inside all the while. He may leave the enclosure only to satisfy the most urgent needs, and before going out, as well as upon re-entering, he must pluck a leaf from a nearby bush, lay it over the hollow of his loosely clenched left hand, and pop it by hitting it with the flat of his right hand, in the manner we described when relating the ceremonies of the buluku hunt. Food must be brought to him by a man, and it must be taken from the portion set aside for another hunter of repute.
[834] Going out at night and all sexual relations are strictly forbidden. Upon returning from the hunt, he must lay the skulls in front of the hut and fasten the largest one to one of the stakes of the en-
224 closure. We were able to acquire two fetish objects found inside 778 these huts. The first came from the Banfumu village of Mbomu 532 and was acquired under the circumstances described earlier. This fetish is [77] carved in the shape of a human figurine and represents a man standing. The head alone has been worked with some care. The body is crudely outlined, the sexual organs are roughly indicated, the legs poorly defined, and there are no arms. A twisted cord of banana fiber is tied above the hips to represent a belt. The whole figurine was smeared with ngula paste.

S 224 778 532

The second one was purchased in the village of Bakomu and differs notably from the first. It consists of a basket of rattan splints, 18.5 centimeters tall and 27 centimeters in diameter, with a square base and filled with a compact mixture of mpembe, black earth, ngula, and finely ground iron ore. The whole mixture was sprinkled with water and chicken blood and mixed and kneaded so as to form a thick paste. This paste was poured into the basket, and the fetisher had stuck into it two figurines and a spearhead carved in wood. The figurines are very crude and worked very little. Their appearance, the worn state, and age, which are characteristic of them, gives them a very ancient stamp. It was not at all easy to acquire these fetishes. Aside from the opposition of the natives in general, we had [78] to overcome the resistance of the qualified hunters and to secure the cooperation of the fetisher.

778 Beyond the Baboma the hut dedicated to the guardian spirits of the hunt gradually disappears. We no longer found the slightest trace of fetish figurines.

Among the Basakata and Wadia of the Fimi, as well as among the Bobaie and Balesa, we came across small and quite rudimentary structures, faintly reminiscent of the Baboma-Banfumu-Bateke customs, in several villages. The hut had given way to a small, very low shelter, open on all sides and resting against the trunk of a fine banana tree. Under this shelter we noted: four earthenware pots stuffed with a mixture of the most varied substances, a few antelope skulls, and, in front, an antelope horn planted in the ground and containing a thick, liquid substance of dubious nature. A bow and arrow were hung inside. Finally, a calabash, a termite nest, and a buffalo skull were on the ground. We vainly [79] attempted to determine the significance, use, and purpose of all these objects. The natives would only answer, "Nkisi, Mundele."

Fig. 49. Hut of Nkisi of the Hunt and a Banana Tree with Flower and Fruit, Village of Madjuku, Bobaie Tribe.

A fine bunch of bananas hung from the tree trunk, and the first fruits were quite ripe. While questioning the natives, I plucked one of these bananas. Immediately, I was beset with protests.

S
"Did not the bananas belong to the nkisi? This bunch was taboo! 224
No one had the right to take a banana from it!" Several natives 346 rushed into the banana groves and brought back quantities of 778 bananas. They had their hands full of them. They offered all of them to me in exchange for the one banana taken from the tree of the nkisi, and when I finally gave it to them, they fastened it under the roof inside the nkisi shelter.

In the Bobaie village of Madjulu, the nkisi hut is replaced by 224
a large basket, surrounded by large blocks of wood and covered 778 with grass. A large, broken pot for cooking chikwangue [Ed., manioc cakes] was placed on top of it. Several sticks were placed around it, and at the top of two of them the natives had hung large calabashes. Here again I found it impossible to get precise information about the use or [80] significance of each of these objects. The few skulls of small antelopes inside the basket were again vaguely reminiscent of the Bateke-Bamfumu custom of huts for the nkisi of the hunt.

Among the Tumba, the Wadia on the right shore of Lake M [171]

Leopold II, and the Mosengere, all traces of such huts disappear. In the Wadia village of Ibali, a large pot was placed on top of a branch which ended in a trident with diverging spikes. This pot was three-fourths full of a reddish, very thick mud. A few splints

S 224 778 of false bamboo, two or three arrowheads, and a small bow had been stuck in this paste. At the foot of the stake the natives had piled a whole series of antelope and buffalo skulls. These remains alone were vaguely reminiscent of the hunting fetish of the Kasai region.

M S 224 778 It is possible that this very simple form of the nkisi of the hunt is also the earliest and that it is closest to ancestral custom, since the primitive shelters of the neighboring peoples and the huts characteristic of the Bateke-Banfumu tribes are actually a mere elaboration of the custom followed by the parental branch of these peoples, a custom which called for the skull of the largest animal killed during the hunt to be dedicated to the guardian spirits of the hunt and to be placed at the foot of the physical representation of these spirits.

M 224 778 In the region of Oshwe and Bumbuli we found no trace of this custom. Each village, however, possessed its hunting fetish. The one in the Yaelima village of Yanga is among the most interesting. A tall shrub stands near a group of four huts located slightly apart from the principal area of the settlement. Two forked stakes, 1.20 meters apart, stand close by, and a straight stick lies on the ground, which may be placed on the forks. A small piece of a calabash hangs by two lianas, one of which is tied to the tree, the other to one of the forked stakes. The calabash contains substances with magic power: a mixture of mpembe and black earth, forming a muddy paste. Before leaving on a communal hunt, each hunter who owns a net must walk by this fetish. The head of one of his arrows or of his spear is dipped in the small calabash, and part of the mud that sticks to it [81] is spread on the nets. Upon returning from the hunt, a piece of flesh from one of the animals killed is hung on the crossbar lying on the two forked stakes. The custom of depositing skulls does not seem to be known in the region.

The hunting fetish of the Bokala in the village of Yoshomo Monene stands in the center of the native settlement. It consists of two forked stakes which may be joined by a crossbar, exactly like the framework of the Yaelima hunting fetish. The tall shrub is replaced by an herbaceous plant with thick leaves. The calabash containing the magic substances lies on the ground between the 778 plant and one of the stakes. The customs and ceremonies observed before leaving for the communal hunt are identical to those we have just described.

224 As to the relations between the fetisher, the hunting fetish, and the individual hunter, we will ignore them, having been unable to obtain any information on this subject in these regions.

Throughout the region we visited, large-scale hunting is done communally. As a rule, all the men participate, including young men from the age of 15. [Ed., the text is not translated from the last paragraph, page 81, to the second paragraph, page 83.]

[83] The catch of the communal hunt is shared among all the families in the village, with the chief and the dignitaries having special rights.

622 Individual hunting does not entail any distribution, except when a buffalo, leopard, or elephant is involved. [293] The tail of the buffalo goes to the native chief who uses it as a fly-chaser and a badge of rank. [281] The skin of the leopard is reserved for the chief, who makes it into a skirt which he displays ostentatiously at important festivities and public dances. The trunk and tusks of the elephant go to the chief while the bristles go in [778] part to the hunters and [84] in part to the local dignitaries, who [301] use them to make necklaces.

Fishing

M 226 Near rivers, swamps, and lakes, fishing is one of the principal occupations of the native.

M [462] Unlike hunting which is practiced only by men, fishing is done by both men and women. The latter, however, practice it only occasionally and fish only by damming up part of a river bed or marsh. The dam is usually built during the rainy season, but as long as the water is rising, the women leave all the sluices wide open. Toward the end of the rainy season, they narrow the drain channels and set large traps before the openings. These traps are attached to strong wooden stakes on the shore near the dam. M 226 285 The traps are made of splints from the ribs of raffia leaves and are plaited in openwork with the open spaces varying in size. The exterior form is always the same. Cylindrical at one end [85] and the other end closed along the diameter, the trap resembles a large cone ending in a line at the top. These traps are built over a framework made of two, three, or four hoops. Their diameters vary according to their positions. They are set inside the trap, the largest one at the base, the smallest one toward the upper end. The transverse elements, doubled and woven alternately in and out, are spaced 10 to 15 centimeters apart and are usually made of strips of rattan. The inner trap, or entry trap, is plaited in the shape of a broad fan, conical in form, with an ellipsoidal base. The open top is the entrance 226 hole. The ends of the splints overlap somewhat on the inside in 285 order to prevent the trapped fish from retracing their paths and escaping.

These traps are made only by men. When the plaiting is done, [462] the work is flat, and then the finished latticework is fastened to the frame.

The trap is opened by detaching the binding that closes the top.

As the waters recede, a woman lowers the trap. Morning and 226 evening she comes to inspect it and to gather the captured fish.

When the waters have fully subsided, the women assemble and go up the river or into the swamp. Standing across the full width of the watercourse, they walk down, chasing before them the fish that remained in the dammed-off area. They make an ear-shattering din, slapping the water with broad sticks or churning it with arms and legs. The hunted and terrified fish flee wildly only to be caught eventually in the trap. If they try to break through the line of women, the latter do not hesitate to grab and fling them on the bank. [Ed., the text is not translated from the second paragraph, page 86, to the second paragraph, page 87.]

285]

Fig. 53. Fish Traps used by the Peoples of Lake Leopold II.

Yaelima

226 [87] After the drive through the dammed-off area, there are usually several fish remaining that succeeded in slipping through the chain. The women then take baskets and bail the pool dry, throwing the water over the dam.

Very often the women dam up part of a marsh or stream and bail out the water with baskets without setting traps or waiting for the water level to go down.

In all three cases we find: 1) setting the trap in front of the drain channel; 2) the drive in the dammed-up area; and 3) bailing out this section. The catch is divided equally among the women who participated in the work. [88]

These three methods of fishing prevail among all the riparian peoples of the Congo, Kasai, Fimi, Lake Leopold II, and the lower Lukenie.

On the upper Lukenie, starting with the Oshwe sector, no traps are made. At most the women occasionally dam up a section of the rivers and streams of the interior and bail them out with baskets to catch the fish.

226 184 The Ipanga, Batitu, Bokala, and Yaelima do not fish at all. They are people of the forest and not of the water. Hunting is their chief occupation, and fishing is unknown to them.

In this connection, these tribes are wholly distinct from their neighbors to the west. It must be noted, however, that even among the latter all the clans do not engage in fishing. The groups of the interior do not fish any more than their brothers of the sector of Oshwe and Bumbuli. The traps and other contrivances which we shall discuss below are unknown to both groups. In this respect, all these peoples have a common characteristic, recalling their common origin. In the lower Lukenie and farther west, however, part of the population, the Bandzali, "people of the water," have adapted themselves to the new conditions of their environment. The river became for them a source of wealth and well-being, and a part of their social activity was oriented toward the exploitation of this precious resource.

226 258 At the present time fishing and the preparation of salt are practically the only means of subsistence and unquestionably the principal occupations of all the riparian groups in the region of Leopoldville, Kwamouth, Lake Leopold II, and the lower Lukenie.

226 258 Among all the tribes of this region, we were able to distinguish clearly between the groups of the interior, whose chief occupation is hunting, and the riparian groups who prefer to fish and make salt.

Two clans arose in this fashion within a single ethnic group. They both belong to the large family known by the name of the tribe, and yet they are completely different in the habits, practices, and customs relating to that aspect of their lives.

226 During the dry season, one sees the natives from villages located two or three hours' march into the interior come to establish camps on the [89] river bank and to set up veritable fisheries. The information that follows applies to these groups and to all the peoples from Leopoldville to the sector of Tolo inclusively. The rivers, lakes, and marshes in this region are extremely well stocked with fish. As a matter of interest, we give here the list of some native names for fish noted by Mr. Bayens and used by the Bandzali of the Tolo region: kinkure mbieme, lepari, ignognienge, mpushu, lokanga, itike, mokonga, n'sombo, loana, sabere, lboie, moelo, n'ikulu, m'binga, pesule, m'butu, mondja, mshime, moekiki, lupungu, ompara, m'vunu, longelenzali, monkie, komoe, ikeke, koshoie, nokama, singa, n'guikemen, m'pio, mwiki, ekambela, lekumu, elangu, evuya, mekamo, m'beli, motume, idzore, kebaie, kupu, mokeja, kevuni, mopa lekeje, mipari.

Aside from fishing with dams, these different groups fish both individually and communally.

Individual fishing is done by the following methods.

1) Fishing with hook and line, angling. The hook is made of a very fine splint of false bamboo, folded back and held in the shape of a hook by a fine raffia fiber. This raffia fiber extends on to form the fishing line. It is attached to a splint of bamboo which serves as a float. The native does not keep watch over his line. He fastens the lines with the hooks on them to a rope of twisted fibers. The lines are spaced 30 to 50 centimeters apart. The rope is 10 to 15 meters long and is attached to a stick at either end. The native plants two stakes in the river bed. He attaches the two ends of the rope to them, taking care that it is stretched perpendicularly to the current. The lines with float and hook are uncoiled, the bait consisting of a pellet of 226 chikwangue [Ed., manioc cake] or an earthworm is fastened to the hook, and everything is thrown into the water. Under the pressure of the current, the lines are drawn out and lie parallel to each other, held at one end by the large rope stretched over the water. A fish, attracted by the bait, seizes it and swallows it along with the hook, which remains in the stomach. All its efforts to free itself merely hooks the fish more securely. The native inspects the rope four or five times during the day and pulls in the lines one by one. The hooked fish is cut loose by severing the string from the hook; it is gutted and thrown into the canoe. [90] The hook is replaced with one held in reserve until the first one is recovered while cleaning the catch.

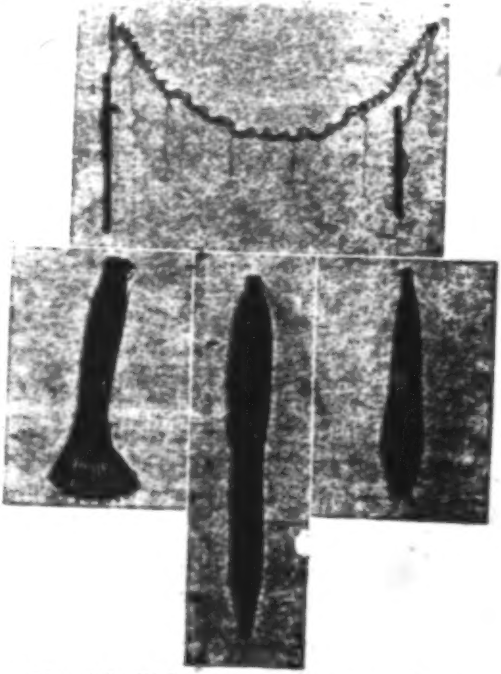

Fig. 54. Fish Traps and Lines, Lake Leopold II.

The native also fishes with a line on the bottom and an inert line without a float. The hook is larger and usually made of iron. The strong rope is coated with oil to make 226 it more durable. The bait, consisting of a piece of chikwangue, entirely covers the hook. The line is thrown into the water, weighted with stones, and attached to a stake on the bank. The native pulls in these lines only in the morning and at night. They are used only for large fish.

2) Fishing with bow and arrow. This is a method of fishing at which the natives excel. During the hot hours of the day, they settle themselves comfortably in their canoe among the grasses and wait patiently for a large fish to wander up to the surface of the water. Immediately, they bend the bow and shoot the arrow. They are fine shots and rarely miss their target. The fish is usually run through and impaled on the arrow. Hampered in its movements, it vainly tries to dive. The native puts down his bow, judges his spring, dives, grabs the fish, and climbs back into his canoe. [91]

3) Harpoon fishing is practiced especially for capturing fish that live in the mud. The native takes to this with real passion. Standing in his canoe, he lets himself be carried along by the current, advancing slowly so that no disturbance of the water will scare the fish. With a slow, regular, methodical motion, he plunges in his harpoon, guided by chance and his instinct. The jerks made by the harpooned fish trying to escape alert the experienced fisherman to his catch. He immediately increases the pressure, and then with a slow, regular, methodical motion he pulls up the harpoon, avoiding any abrupt motion that might detach the prize.

[411] The fishing harpoon is made of a bamboo shaft about 2.50 meters long onto which four wooden prongs are attached with bonds of rattan splints. At the tip of each of these four prongs is fastened an iron point which has four barbs and terminates in a conical socket.

4) Fishing with a trap placed at random in the grass of marshy banks. [92] The traps, made of rattan splints and with an opening that has spikes pointed toward the interior, vary in size, but they are all made by the same technique. The native puts bait inside and submerges the whole trap in the water. The fish, attracted by the bait, try to get it and enter the trap through the opening set on its side. This entrance, easy to negotiate from the outside, bristles with spikes pointed toward the interior, which prevent the fish from leaving the trap. The shape of the traps for small fish is long, tubular, and narrow. They open at one end, and the entrance with spikes is set toward the middle of the trap. The traps for big fish have the shape of a truncated cone, with the top forming a straight line. The entrance, constructed on the same principle as that of the small traps, is set in the forward part, opening toward the interior. These traps are placed in front of the drain channels of dammed-up marshes and rivers.

285

5) Fishing with a trap, usually set in waters with a strong current. The trap is in the shape of a cone, its movable base serving as a lid and its tip extended by a strong, flexible strip of rattan which acts as a spring. A liana is attached to the end of the rattan. A free-swinging, trapeze-like apparatus is tied to the body of the trap. The bait is attached to a rattan splint inside the trap. This splint is tied to a small, mobile crossbar on the trapeze. The liana tied to the end of the rattan spring is drawn inside the trap through one of the openings near the supporting hoop of the entrance and is attached to the movable lid. The trap is constructed in such a way that when it is not set, the lid is closed by the pull of the rattan spring. To set the trap, the native ties toward the middle of the liana a rattan splint to which a small stick is attached. The end (A) of the latter passes behind

Fig. 55. Making a Fish Trap among the Bobaie.

285]

M 226 285 the bar of the trapeze, and the point (B) is caught behind the mobile crossbar (C). To the latter the native ties a rattan splint, at the end of which he fastens the bait. This consists of a palm nut still covered with pulp. To reach the bait, the fish enters the trap; it takes the bait, pulls on it, and dislodges the triggering crossbar (C). The catches (A) and (B) are freed, the rattan spring is released, and the lid closes, trapping the fish. [93]

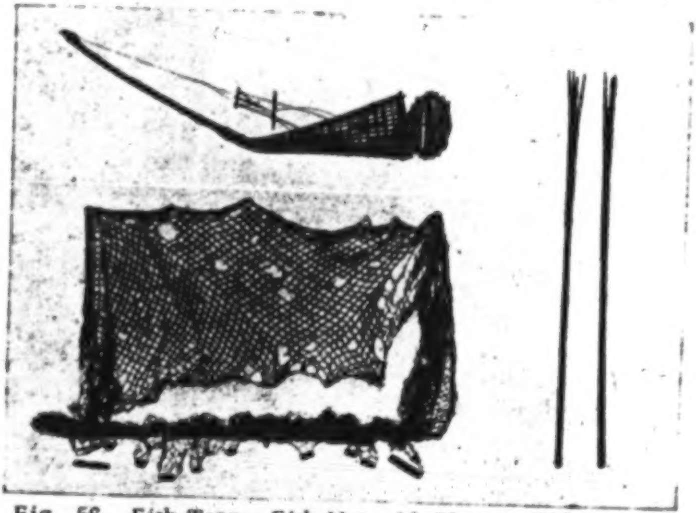

Fig. 56. Fish Trap. Fish Net with Floats. Fishing Harpoons from Lake Leopold II.

M 226 685 In individual fishing, the fish belong to the owner of the trap or to the person who set it. The native respects this right, and, moreover, custom punishes offenses very severely. Native law is rigorous to the point that a man caught red-handed in theft is liable to be driven from the community.

M 226 The yield from individual fishing is of hardly any importance. This kind of fishing is practiced only to vary the diet a little, and it is successful only because of the tremendous abundance of fish in these rivers.

M S 226 Communal fishing is much more productive. Certain tribes, or to be more exact, certain families among the peoples of the Fimi, Lake Leopold II, and the lower Lukenie make a veritable

S M 226 industry of it. This sort of thing flourishes especially among the riparian people in the country of the Basakata, Balesa, and Mosengere.

S M 226 361 In the region of the lower Fimi, as well as along the marshy banks of the lower Lulonga, native fishing camps are quite numerous. They are all of the same type and [94] never have the character of a permanent settlement. At the end of the rainy season one sees families of riparian peoples leave their villages temporarily and settle along the marshy rivers. Men and women make this move, while children, old people, and a few able-bodied adults stay in the village to guard the homes.

The fishing camps are set up in very rudimentary fashion. The huts are merely shelters, refuges.

S M [462] Gathering salt grass for making salt is the chief task of the women. The men do the fishing.

S M 226 All the methods for fishing individually are used, but the bulk of the work is done communally.

The procedures are quite varied. We will mention the following.

1) Damming the mouths of small rivers and minor tributaries, along with setting traps in front of the escape channel and the method of driving the fish described above.

S M [286 386] 2) Fishing with a net. Unlike the nets used for hunting, the fishing nets are made of raffia fibers. The type of knot is the same, but the technique is more like the one used for plaiting the hair. The native carefully dyes the fibers black in order to make the mesh invisible under water. He attaches small cylindrical sections of a very light wood to the upper part of the net to serve as floats. At the opposite edge, he attaches the sinkers, made of cylindrical pieces of baked clay. The floats and sinkers are made so that they counterbalance each other and maintain the net in a vertical position in the water. These nets are 20 to 25 meters long. If necessary, the natives use a series of nets and dam the whole river in this way. Five to ten men are stationed with large baskets along the nets. The women go up the river 100 to 200 meters, enter the water, and form a chain to drive the fish before them. These are caught in the meshes of the nets and attract the attention of the fishermen by the efforts they

M
226 make to free themselves. The fishermen grab them and throw them in their baskets. [95]

Sometimes the natives enclose an area on the grassy banks, move into it, and search the grass for fish. If the fish try to break away for the main channel, they are caught in the meshes of the net.

3) Fishing with screens. This method is the most common. It is easier and more productive than the others. The screens are made of long splints of rattan or raffia, placed parallel to each other one or two centimeters apart. The cross elements of rattan are spaced from 20 to 30 centimeters apart. The height of the screens varies from 66 centimeters to 2. 50 meters, and their length from 10 to 20 meters. These screens are used as dams in the river, marshes, coves, and at the mouths of small tributaries. They are fastened to stakes and sunk perpendicularly into the river bed. The natives set them up when the waters first begin to recede. A little upstream of the screens, they throw into the river a number of branches, still bearing their leaves, in such a fashion as to provide a shelter for the fish stopped by the screen. When the water is very low, the natives go a very great distance upstream. They enter the water, form a tight chain, and work methodically downstream toward the screen. All the fish are driven toward it. At 25 or 30 meters from the screen, the natives put another screen in the water. Some of the fishermen are assigned to hold it vertical. The others enter the enclosure formed by the two screens, take out the sheltering branches and grass, and begin to hunt the fish. They have openwork baskets shaped like a truncated cone. The fisherman, with the basket in front of him, sets it down on the river bed, the large opening toward the bottom. If a fish is trapped in the basket, the fisherman can tell by the light bumps against the sides caused by the fish trying to escape. The fisherman plunges his hand into the basket through the top opening, gropes about inside, seizes the fish, breaks its backbone, and throws it into the canoe or on the bank.

S
M
251 The catch is carried to the temporary village, and the fish are gutted, cleaned, and thrown on the apparatus for smoking them. This is a [96] grid made with rattan of average thickness, which rests on crossbars placed on forked stakes planted in the ground.

S M 251 The average height is 1.25 meters, the width 2.50 meters, and the length five to ten meters. The women maintain a fire under this smoking-drying apparatus night and day. It is fed with grass and other rubbish, which are not very dry so that a great deal of smoke will be produced. All the fish are turned over twice a day. After eight to ten days the operation is finished. The dried, smoked fish are carefully wrapped after being sorted and graded according to size. Part of the fish will make up the family reserve, and the rest will be used as trade goods. When the grid is almost empty, the men go up the river and start fishing again.

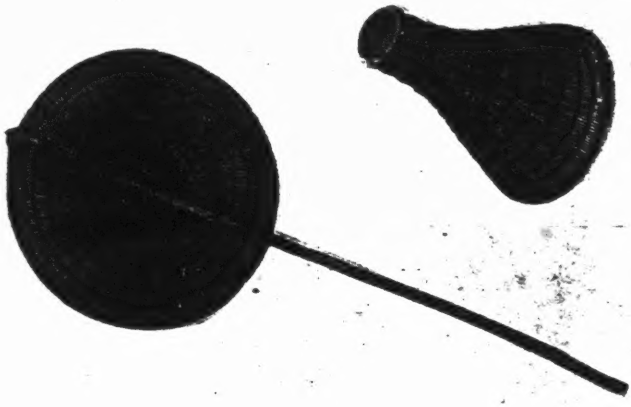

Fig. 57. Baskets for Fishing, Lake Leopold II.

S M 226 It is difficult to realize the magnitude of this industry and the unbelievable quantities of fish caught by the natives during their sojourn in the region of the salt grass. We watched one of these miraculous hauls one day, organized through the kind cooperation of Mr. Molin. The river had been dammed for only one night, the natives went up it only 150 [97] meters, this in the middle of the dry season, and yet they brought back four large baskets full of fish.

S M [622] The catch from communal fishing is shared at the end of the season. A part is reserved for the chief, the owners of the screens receive a special share, and the rest is divided among all the 000 members of the group participating in the enterprise. [Ed., a

1) Uniformity in the cultivation of manioc, the staple food of all of these peoples.

2) Undertaking the cultivation of maize under the influence of the ephemeral encouragement of Bula Matari [Ed., the European administration] among the peoples of the Congo-Kasai, and rice cultivation under Arab influence in the region of Bena Dibele-Kole. Contrary to what we noted concerning maize, the innovation introduced by the Arabs has become firmly implanted in the life of these natives, and the cultivation of rice will probably eliminate manioc eventually. 241 177

3) Formation of a zone of sugar-cane cultivation, the development of which is in inverse proportion to the extent of the palm groves.

4) Complete absence of animal husbandry of any importance. 231

5) Uniformity in the methods of communal hunting and the gradual development of attendant religious customs and practices from east to west, corresponding to a decline in hunting by individuals with traditional weapons. This fact leads us to suppose 224 174

174 that hunting was practiced as a rule in the ancestral society without special recourse to any protective force or spirit and that primitive man relied wholly on his strength, skill, courage, and necessity. The small yield and the accidents involved in this dangerous sport probably impelled the primitives to go in groups, the first step to communal hunting. In the course of these forays, accidents must have occurred, some men being hurt and others spared. For no apparent cause, one hunt was successful and another failed. Not being able to understand the reason for these occurrence, the natives naturally ascribed their origin to spirits, from which arose the desire to gain the favor of these spirits. One can thus explain the magico-religious beliefs and practices, whose intensity, [99] elaboration, and spread are in direct proportion to the disappearance of individual hunting.

174 6) The existence among all the peoples of a few common fishing customs, so little developed unquestionably fish could have played only a minor role in the diet of the ancestral community. This community, therefore, must have lived in an environment ill-suited to the development of a fishing industry or too poor in resources of this kind to invite man's efforts in this direction in his struggle for existence.

7) In their migrations and displacement, certain groups settled in more favorable regions, and the families among them who settled in the immediate vicinity of well-stocked rivers and marshes adopted new fishing customs while partially giving up the hunting customs. Making Fire

M 372 The natives of the Kasai-Fimi-Lukenie region make fire in three different ways.

The Bateke and Banfumungu of the river use flint and steel; the Banfumungu of the interior, the Boboma, Mosengere, Tumba, Wadia, Basakata, Bobaie, Balesa, Ipanga, Batitu, Bokala, and some of the Yaelima use the friction method [102] or longitudinal rubbing; and the Yaelima of the east, the Basongo-Meno, and the Bankutshu of the Bena-Dibele-Kole region obtain fire by gyration or rotary rubbing.

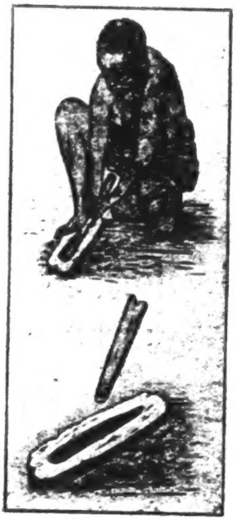

Fig. 59.
Making Fire by Friction.

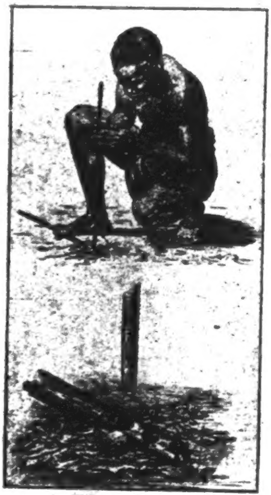

Fig. 60.
Making Fire by Rotation.

M [177] The native method tends to disappear rapidly everywhere with the introduction of matches, although most of the natives have kept their primitive strike-a-light and always carry it with them on journeys. If there are no matches or if through some circumstance -- the humidity, the crossing of a river or marsh -- the matches will not work, the native takes out his strike-a-light and makes fire by the native method.

T 372 The strike-a-light of the Bateke and Banfumungu of the river consists of an iron or steel blade from three to eight centimeters long and two to three centimeters wide, a flint (a mere

Teke F133

372 chip of gneiss or silex, a gunflint or quartz fragment), and tinder. Any dry and highly inflammable matter, such as dry leaves, etc., may serve as tinder, but tufts of the vegetable fiber that the natives gather from the trunks of palm or banana trees are commonly used. [103]

To make fire, the Bateke and Banfumungu of the river prepare a small bundle of dry twigs in the midst of which they set a pinch of tinder. A few strokes of the strike-a-light produce a spark, and the fire is started. A small, incandescent dot, barely visible, a trifle suffices. The native immediately blows very lightly on the tinder, fans the fire, slightly stirs the twigs, and soon the flame leaps up.

M
372 To make fire by friction or the longitudinal rubbing method, the native uses two pieces of wood, one broad, flat, and soft, the other long, more or less evenly cylindrical, and very hard.

During my journey to the interior of the Kasai-Fimi-Lukenie region, I had an opportunity to observe firsthand this method of making fire, notably at Bomu among the Banfumungu, at Mpa among the Mosengere, at Kempa among the Basakata, at Lubamiti among the Wadia, at Wambia among the Batitu, at Wumbuli among the Bokala, and, finally, at Lopori among the Yaelima.

The native proceeds in the same fashion everywhere.

When he is alone, he sets the piece of soft wood, which has a groove parallel to its axis, flat on the ground. He kneels and pins the wood under one of his knees. Holding the rod of hard wood in both hands, he vigorously rubs the point along the groove with a continual back-and-forth movement. In no time at all fine, charred wood dust accumulates at one end of the groove. In less than a minute one sees a spot ignited. The native took care to prepare the tinder in advance. He puts the little incandescent nucleus on it, blows, and the flame soon leaps up.

When there are several natives, as is usually the case, one man puts his foot on the grooved piece, while a second man kneels and rubs the end of the small rod in the groove, as though to carve it deeper.

In the gyration or rotary rubbing method used by the peoples of the Bena Dibele-Kole region and among part of the eastern 372 Yaelima, the apparatus consists of two small cylindrical rods. [104] One of the rods, cut from relatively soft wood, has one or more notches. The other, rounded at one end, is of hard wood. The notched rod is placed over the tinder; the other one is held perpendicularly, with the round end inserted in the notch. The native gives the latter rod a rapid rotary motion by spinning it between his hands. At the same time he slides his hands from top to bottom in order to increase the pressure as much as possible.

Rod and Small Board with Notches.

Two rods, One with Notches.

The special skill consists in producing this motion with as few pauses as possible. This is why several natives usually participate. One holds the notched rod in place, a second one spins the other rod, while a third stands by ready to maintain the gyrating motion as soon as his companion reaches the bottom of the rod. The first spinner will relieve the other in turn. After several rotations, a small incandescent spot appears in the charred wood dust in the notch, and a spark falls on the tinder, which catches fire.

The areas in which these three methods of making fire are found form three distinct ethnic zones in the region visited.

The first one includes only the Bateke and part of the Banfumungu and is characterized by use of the iron blade and flint.

The second one with the system of friction or longitudinal rubbing extends from the interior of Banfumungu territory to the center of the region occupied by the Yaelima. [105]

372 The third, with the system of gyration or rotary rubbing, 177 includes the easternmost part of Yaelima territory and the whole Bena Dibele-Kole region.

Yaelima

372 177 This last method has also been noted among the Balesa, and we were able to verify that some of the natives in the region were familiar with it and used it. It is not indigenous to this tribe, however, and must have been introduced into the region by soldiers or laborers from the old Tolo post, who came from regions where this method was known.

It is also possible that the eastern Yaelima borrowed this method from the peoples of the south, although we were unable to obtain any precise information on this point. This hypothesis, however, is justified by the fact that we found the friction and gyration methods in certain Yaelima villages, and the natives preferred to use the latter method in every such instance. It must be noted that the gyration method is not only less tiring but also faster and permits the natives to take turns. It provides a maximum of yield for a minimum of work. There is, therefore, nothing astonishing in the fact that wherever the natives have had an opportunity to observe the advantages of this method, they have made a point of adopting it.

372 In our opinion, the friction or longitudinal rubbing method should be regarded as having been used exclusively in former times by all the tribes, from the Banfumungu to the Yaelima. This method may still be found among the tribes of the Dekese region, but, unfortunately, we were unable to substantiate this.

All these peoples in this respect would belong to the same ethnic group, which is clearly differentiated from the group of tribes in the Bena Dibele-Kole region.

Salt

258 The preparation of salt occupies an important place in the life of certain tribes of the Kasai-Lukenie region. Lacking both salt mines and salt water in their territory, the natives proceeded to obtain this precious condiment, indispensable to the diet, by extracting it from plants. [106]

Wherever the introduction of imported products has not eliminated the native method, the extraction of salt is a veritable national industry. The whole community participates in it.

[177] Among the Bateke, Banfumungu, Baboma, and part of the Wadia, the introduction of salt has completely eliminated the use and preparation of native salt.

Sakata FO43

M S 258 Among the Mosengere, Bobaie, Basakata, Ipanga, Batitu, Bokala, and Yaelima, on the other hand, the natives still use the primitive process.

This varies according to the region, insofar as the materials used in the preparation are concerned.

Among the Mosengere, Wadia, Tumba, Basakata, and Bobaie, the natives use only the salt grass that grows abundantly in the marshes and along the marshy banks of certain rivers in the region.

In the territory of the Ipanga, Batitu, Bokala, and Yaelima, where this precious resource is lacking, the natives use the trunks of banana trees and especially the flowers of palm trees, whose ashes are quite rich in alkaline matter.

M S [361] Salt grass is harvested toward the end of the dry season.

At this time groups of Mosengere, Wadia, Tumba, Bobaie, and Basakata of the interior leave their villages to camp along the rivers with marshy banks.

M S [342] They choose a site suitable for setting up the few huts that will serve them as shelters during their temporary sojourn in the region. These huts are usually very poorly constructed. Built hastily and carelessly, they are provisional shelters, refuges for the night, rather than dwellings.

M S 258 423 In former times the whole expanse of the marshy plain covered with salt grass was divided into sections.

Each native group had its own well-defined area and exploited it exclusively. [107]

The site for the huts occupied by each such group was determined by the location of the familial reservation or domain and was chosen so as to lie in the center of it.

The time of year when the salt grass was gathered and the length of the period of exploitation were regulated. In short, the preparation of salt was a national industry, governed by special laws to which the whole tribe had to conform.

At the present time, the groups gather salt grass wherever they think best, without regard for the customs and rights of the past. This work of harvesting the grass falls to the women.

M S 258 462 While the men are fishing, the women, provided with large knives, cut down the tall grass that grows in the mars[illegible] along the flooded banks of all the rivers in the Mosengere-Basakata region. When the nature of the ground and the level of the river permit, the grass is spread out on the spot to dry in the sun, while in flooded areas the woman loads the harvest in the canoe and takes it to the temporary village set up [108] on the bank. The dry grass is packed in stacks which are like the haystacks on our European farms.

M S 258

When a family deems that its harvest of grass is sufficient, the chief of the group prepares the incinerating grounds or furnace. Pulverized earth from small termites' nests is mixed with mud from the river. The mixture is well worked and kneaded so as to make a firm and pliant paste and is then spread over the surface of a small hole from 15 to 20 centimeters deep and one or two meters square.

When this coating is entirely dry, the women begin their work. One of them loads the furnace and lights it, while the others bring in grass from the stacks.

As the first pile burns down, the woman in charge of the furnace throws in new sheaves, and the work, accompanied by a low, monotonous chant, continues without pause until the full harvest of salt grass is burned.

Fig. 63. Stacks of Salt Grass, among the Bobaie.

M S 258 834 462

The burning usually lasts a whole day. During this time and during the period when the furnace is being prepared, all sexual relations are strictly forbidden between the head of the family and the woman in charge of the burning.

M S 258 [285] 462

When the last sprig is burned, the fire extinguished, and the ashes cold, the women heap them in large baskets.

Meanwhile the head of the family has made a sort of large funnel out of broad and tough rattan splints, bound with fine thongs of raffia stems and lianas. These funnels vary between two and three meters in height. The diameter of the large opening is one and a half to two meters. The bottom is formed by the cluster of rattan splints, roughly tied with a broad rattan thong. This funnel is placed upright between three or four sticks planted in the ground. An earthenware jar is placed under the funnel. The women line the inside of the funnel with banana leaves, placed on top of each other in such a way as to make the sides completely [109] waterproof. They next pour the ashes from the incineration into the funnel, pressing and squeezing them as much as possible.

When the funnel is three-fourths full, the woman draws about ten pots of water, or about 50 liters, and pours them over the ashes. This water takes two or sometimes three days to spread through the ashes. When the ashes are saturated, the woman pours two or three more pots of water into the funnel. From then on there is a slow drain of water, strongly salted from the dissolution of the soluble alkaline matter contained in the ashes. The water is caught in the earthenware jar under the funnel. The woman thus obtains four or five pots of a strong salt solution and two pots of water less saturated with salt. After putting aside her six or seven pots of salt water, the woman lights a fire and puts one or several earthenware bowls over it. Into these, little by little, she pours the strong salt solution, which she allows to boil.

When the water evaporates, the first salt deposit forms on the bottom and sides of the bowl.

M S [415]

The heat from these evaporation hearths is so intense that it is impossible to come near them. The woman therefore carefully provides herself with two long ladles to refill the bowls at a distance as the evaporation progresses. The whole lot is left on the fire until all the salt water is evaporated. Even after the evaporation is completed, the woman leaves the jar over the fire, which she stokes, so as to completely dry and solidify the salt deposit. This

258
[462] deposit naturally acquires the shape of the pot, which is finally overheated and bursts, while the salt block remains intact.

When the salt is finally prepared, the family group returns to the village. The temporary installations are abandoned and may be used by other families who may do with them as they please.

258

The salt is divided into two parts.

One part makes up the family reserves, reckoned according to the needs of each family in the group, clan, or village which undertook the exploitation. The rest is divided equally among all the members who took part in [110] the harvest, except that the chief and the woman who was in charge of the burning receive double shares.

The salt reserved for family needs is used in the preparation of food and remains the inalienable property of the family. The share distributed to the participants in the undertaking becomes their private property .

S
258
435

Each one of them, man or woman, disposes of his share as he sees fit. Most often the natives use this as trade goods. Among certain tribes, notably the Mosengere, Wadia, Basakata, and Bobaie, the salt blocks are used as currency or as a common trade item whose value is determined by the weight.

435

Before our [Ed., European] penetration into the region and more especially before the introduction of legal tender and its imposition by the administration, salt played a much more important part in the economic life of these primitives.

At the present time, it is used only in local transactions.

326

The blacksmith and his family, for example, never participate in the preparation of salt. He exchanges the products of his trade, knives, arrowheads, or spearheads, for the stock of the salt makers. [111]

M
437

It even quite frequently happens that the salt makers sell their surplus as a mere commodity to the highest bidder. They bring it to market, display it for sale, haggle about the price in the same fashion as they do for manioc tubers, smoked fish, smoked meat, or baskets of peanuts.

562

It is singular and interesting to note that the proceeds from this sale do not entirely go to the woman who owns the salt.

Sakata FO43

M 422 562 [Ed., an example given by the author, from the third paragraph, page 111, through the fifth paragraph, page 114, is not translated.]

[114] This clearly shows that the proceeds from the sale of salt, the property of the woman, belong in equal shares to the husband and wife: to the woman because of her work, to the man because of his trouble and travel to put the product on sale.

Among the Wadia, Tumba, Bobaie, Basakata, and Balesa, I had the opportunity to observe the same fact. As long as the woman herself goes to sell her part of the communally made salt, she keeps all the proceeds of the exchange, but according to native custom, when the husband is entrusted with the sale, he is entitled to part of the proceeds.

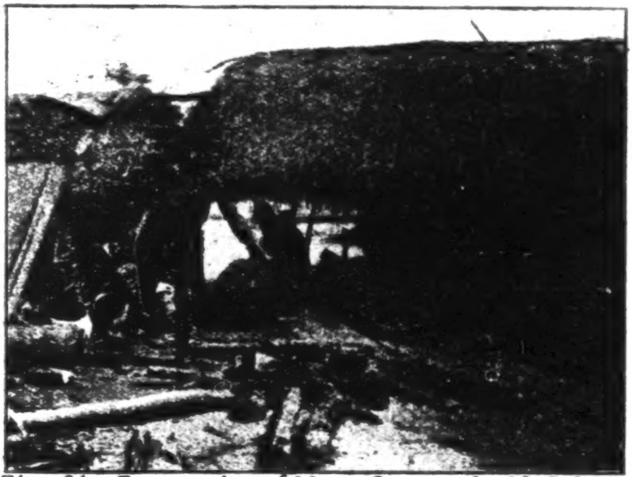

Fig. 64. Evaporation of Water Saturated with Salt, among the Basakata.

M 454 562 422 The proceeds, however, are not divided immediately after the sale. The total sum is put in a safe place, a hiding place known to both husband and wife. The couple accumulates the mitakos [Ed., a kind of metal currency]; they hoard them until the day when they both agree to divide them. Custom gives one quarter to the man and three quarters to the woman. [115]

M 258 476 This custom does not exist among the tribes east of the Balesa. Salt grass cannot be gathered there, because it is very sparse in the region. The trunks of banana and palm trees and the flowers of palm trees are not sufficiently abundant to permit exploitation on a large scale. The women scarcely manage to gather enough material to make the salt needed for everyday life. The whole village takes part in the harvest. The incineration and extraction of the salt is done in the village by the process we have just described, but the product is divided among all the families in proportion to the number of their respective members. The quantity available is usually so small that it is barely sufficient for daily needs; hence the value of salt here is notably higher than among the peoples of the regions where salt grass is abundant. [Ed., the text is not translated from the second paragraph, page 115, to the end of the section, page 118.]

[145]

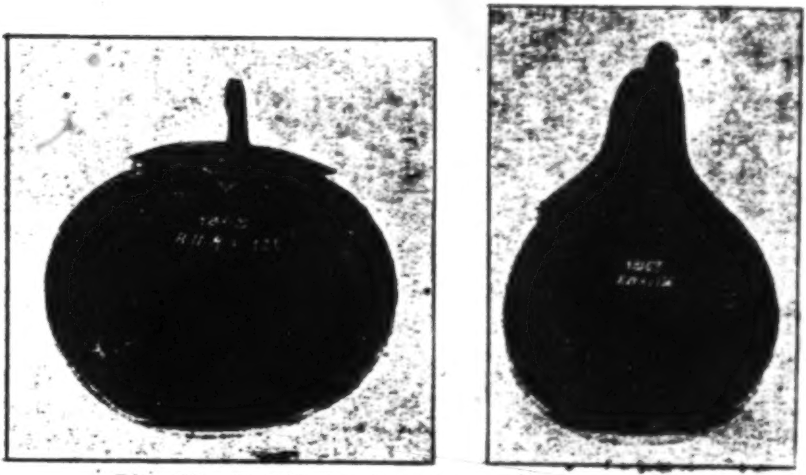

Fig. 66. Calabashes for Salt, Lake Leopold II.

[118] Preparation of Food

262 Manioc may be regarded as the principal food, the dietary staple of all the peoples in the region visited.

From the Bateke of Leopoldville to the Bankutshu of Bena Dibele-Kole, [119] all the tribes cultivate manioc, gather the tubers, soak them, and extract the flour with which they make chikwangue.

262 The natives are familiar with two kinds of manioc, sweet and bitter.

Sweet manioc is not highly valued, owing to its insipid taste and the poor consistency of the chikwangue made from it.

252 Aside from the soaking, which is done only for bitter manioc, chikwangue is prepared in the same way whether the flour comes from sweet or bitter manioc.

The first harvest of manioc tubers takes place eight to ten months after planting. The natives, however, do not begin harvesting them in earnest until the second year. Only the woman [462] does this work.

[482] The manioc tubers are piled in large baskets carried on the back and taken to the soaking well, a pond of putrid, dirty, muddy water giving off a highly unpleasant odor of putrefaction and fermentation, which is reserved for this task.

252 462 The manioc roots remain submerged from five to eight days to make them ferment and thus eliminate their bitter taste. At the end of this period the woman returns to the pond, tucks up her primitive loincloth as high as possible and enters the swamp. She sinks in up to her knees, and plunging her hands and arms into the mire, she pulls out the roots one by one and throws them on the bank. When her supply seems sufficient, she piles the roots in her basket and goes to wash them in the river. Returning to the village, she cuts the tubers, lets them dry a little in the sun, and then peels them. The Bakete, Banfumungu, and all the tribes of the Fimi-Lake Leopold II-Lukenie region, up to the boundaries of Bobaie and Balesa territory, chop the pieces of manioc root before reducing them to flour, while the Ipanga, Batitu, Yaelima and Bokala crush them between the fingers before throwing them between the fingers before throwing them in the mortar.

412 The chikwangue knife has a double-edged blade, a median rib, and a long, relatively broad oval form. It is pointed at both ends. One of these ends is [120] embedded in a wooden handle with a doubly concave vertical section.

The museum [Ed., Museum of the Belgian Congo] now has only two of these knives, but they are found in every native hut in the Kasai-Fimi-Lukenie region up to the Oshwe sector. It is, however, almost impossible to buy them from the natives. A woman, unable to do without her chikwangue knife a single day

M 442 and never having a spare one, will not let one go at any price.

M 252 462 A woman chops the manioc on a large wooden tray, a crude, slightly hollowed board roughly rectangular in shape among the Bateke, Banfumungu, and Baboma, but circular among the Tumba, Wadia, Mosengere, Bolia, Bobaie, Basakata, and Balesa.

After having chopped up the manioc tubers as finely as she can with the primitive tool at her disposal, the woman removes the woody fibers, remains of rind, and other hard bodies. She then takes the etuti with both hands and rocks it back and forth. While doing this, she is careful to shake the flour from time to time and to remove the impurities she finds in it.

S [252 516] When the flour is quite fine, the housewife sprinkles it with a little water, [121] kneads it, works it into a firm dough of a pale grayish-white color, and carefully removes every little trace of impurities. She then divides the dough into pieces the size of a cubic decimeter which she rolls into more or less symmetrical balls or into sausages 20 to 25 centimeters long.

Fig. 67. Preparation of Manioc Flour among the Bobaie. Special Form of Knife to Chop Manioc.

M [283] These balls or sausages are carefully wrapped in banana or masisa leaves, and the whole bundle is tied with very pliant rattan or raffia splints which serve as string.

Among the Ipanga, Batitu, Bokala, and Yaelima, we never found the crushing pestle [Ed., a broad, short pestle]. Instead, the woman uses a long, cylindrical pestle on a wooden mortar, a rough plank, very thick and heavy, sometimes square, sometimes round, but always quite irregular in shape. Very often, the mortar is a basket of rattan or raffia splints, rectangular and very shallow. Instead of crushing the manioc into flour, she kneads it and works the dough the same way and in the same mortar.

When the dough is sufficiently kneaded and all the impurities [122] have been removed, she rolls it into sausages and wraps them in banana leaves as we described above.

The Basongo-Meno and the Bankutshu crush the manioc in large wooden mortars, roughly cylindrical in shape, and use very large pestles. The height of the mortars and the length of the pestles compel the women of that region to stand when preparing manioc flour, while in the Kasai-Fimi-Lukenie region, including the Oshwe and Bambuli sectors, the women are seated for this work.

The sifted flour is gathered in small baskets, then made into dough, rolled into small cakes, and wrapped in banana or masisa leaves in the way we have just described.

M

The chikwangue are cooked in the same way by all the peoples visited.

The woman lays a wooden grid in the bottom of an earthenware cooking pot. She pours in water up to the level of the grid, lines the whole inner surface of the pot with banana leaves, and places the cakes or sausages one on top the other. She not only fills the pot, [123] but she piles them well above the rim and covers them with more banana leaves, which are tied together so carefully that the whole thing is hermetically sealed. The pot is placed on the fire for several hours. The chikwangue, then are cooked by the steam.

Fig. 69. Mortar with Clay Pestle (Etuti) for Manioc, Banfumu Tribe.

After being cooked, the manioc dough looks like very heavy bread, amber-colored, very slightly translucent on the edges, and of a rather soft consistency. This is chikwangue, the famous kwanga of the natives which plays the same role in their diet as bread does in ours.

M

Although the cooking method is the same everywhere we went, the pottery used for the cooking differs notably from one region to the next.

Yaelima

From Stanley Pool to the Bumbuli region, the natives use a 415 large earthenware vessel, generally with very little decoration on 531 the rough, irregular outside surface which is marked with vertical lines. [124]

The few specimens we collected are the only ones that the Museum of the Belgian Congo possesses.

The vessel is oval and elongated in shape, and the bottom is rounded off so little that the pottery cannot stand upright on a horizontal surface. The opening at the top is wide. Among the Balesa and Bateke, the rim is slightly raised and tilts sharply, while among the Ipanga and Batitu, the rim is wider, and its slope is less accentuated. The latter pottery, moreover, is very often decorated with two or three circular, impressed lines. As one advances eastward, the oval shape tends to disappear. The pot becomes spherical, the rim wider, and the impressed decoration more symmetrical and more painstakingly done.

Fig. 70. Yaelima Women Preparing Manioc.

Among the Bokala and Yaelima, the vessels used to cook the chikwangue have a bottom shaped like a spherical calotte, a rather wide, reversed rim, and a neck and body with sharp edges and distinct angles. The impressed decoration consists of two or three circular lines placed immediately above the bend

Ntomba

415 531 of the body. These parallel lines are intersected in three or four places by small groups of eight to ten little notches. In addition, the part of the body angling inward is quite often decorated with intersecting oblique lines. [125]

415 These types of pottery for chikwangue seem to be modern forms.

The very ancient kind, of which we happily were able to find a specimen still intact, has a less characteristic shape. The bottom is round and irregular; the body is more or less angled but without sharp edges; and the neck is slightly bent back but has no distinct plane surface.

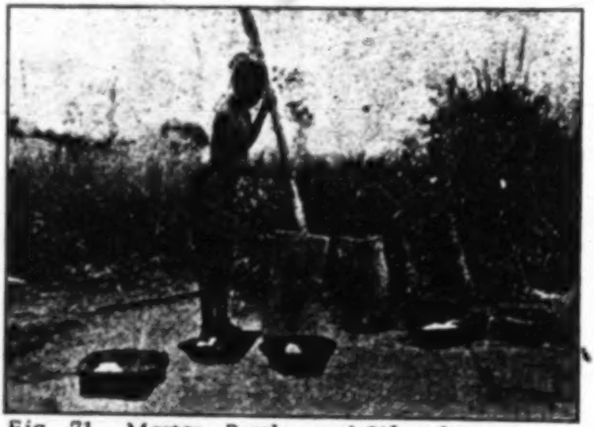

Fig. 71. Mortar, Pestle, and Sifter for Manioc Flour among the Bankutu.

252 415 The Bokala, Yaelima, etc., place a wooden grid at the bottom of the chikwangue vessel, line the inside with leaves, and pile the cakes of manioc flour in small mounds higher than the rim of the vessel. To keep these characteristic pyramids stable, they often tie a network of cords, a sort of net with large, wide meshes, to the molding of the neck. The top of this net can be opened or closed at will, and the chikwangue cakes are crammed in it as in a net. Sometimes the wooden grid is replaced by an earthenware shelf which extends beyond the rim of the vessel. This shelf is pierced with large round holes. This type of pottery, however, is quite rare. We were able to find only a few specimens.

M
The natives do not care for them very much; they regard them as impractical for preparing chikwangue, but readily use them to dry and smoke their provisions. 252 415

M
Beyond the Yaelima, notably among the peoples of the Bena Dibele-Kole region, the pottery used to cook manioc cakes [126] is more reminiscent of the old earthenware cooking pots of Europe. It is spheroid in shape, very symmetrical, with the neck curved out a little, rounded, and slightly arched. The upper part of the body is decorated with broad circular lines, small arcs, and little dots. These pots are a mottled brownish-black in color and are lightly glazed. 415 531

M
Here, too, the chikwangue are cooked by steam. It must be noted, however, that chikwangue does not play the same important role in the diet of the peoples of the Bena Dibele-Kole region, although it is still one of the chief elements even now. 252 262

D
The Basongo-Meno and Bankutshu also eat kifunge, a manioc bread which is prepared in the following way. The 252 415 housewife heats water in a large earthenware receptacle with a rounded bottom. It is shaped like a wide, spherical calotte, with the body almost straight, but in any case having sharp edges, and the neck slightly flared but not arched. When the water begins to boil, she throws in the manioc flour a little at a time, stirring constantly with a [127] long spatula of polished wood. When the flour has absorbed practically all the water, the vessel is taken off the fire, and more manioc flour is added while the mixture is stirred vigorously. This produces a sort of soft bread called kifunge by the natives. The Bankutshu and Basongo-Meno also use maize or millet flour to make kifunge. Both are ground in the large mortars used to make manioc flour and are sifted through the basketwork sieves. M D 252

Kifunge is always eaten hot. The housewife serves it on a wooden plate previously rubbed with palm oil. M D [264]

We thus see that the peoples of the Bena Dibele region are differentiated from the other tribes not only by their way of making manioc flour and the shape of the utensils used, mortar, pestle, sieve, and pottery, but also by the special use made of manioc flour and the use of maize and millet flour in making kifunge. There are then, in this respect, two ethnic groups which seem to be quite different from each other. Unfortunately, it is very difficult to determine whether kifunge is truly indigenous to the civilization of [128] these natives or was introduced by the Basonge-Baluba peoples of the Sankuru-Lubefu. When questioned on this subject, the natives sometimes told us that they had always made kifunge, while some old men claimed that kifunge was still unknown during their childhood.

T [252 415 301 516]

As we have noted, the peoples west of the Bena Dibele-Kole region cultivate maize. This crop is of secondary importance, except in the region of the Banfumungu of Kapanda and Engrei. M T 243

243
252

Maize gathered before maturity is eaten raw or roasted over a low fire. The ears which are allowed to ripen on the stalk are carefully shelled, the kernels ground in a wooden mortar with a cylindrical pestle, and the flour is winnowed or passed through a sieve.

412

The mortar used to make maize flour is made from a section of a tree trunk, with a rectangular opening hollowed in the outer surface and perpendicular to the axis of the trunk. These mortars are very crude, poorly worked, and quite rudimentary. Besides these, one sometimes find others which are better made, small cubes provided with a lug or a liana. Let us note, however, that among the Banfumu southeast of Tua we found a mortar of similar shape which the natives used to prepare vegetables.

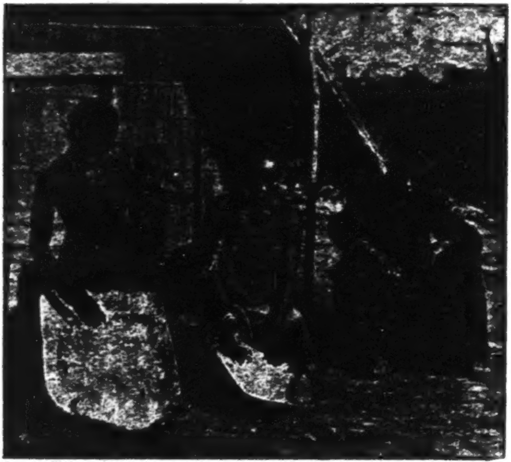

Fig. 74. Batitu Women Shelling Maize and Preparing Vegetables.

The sieves used for maize flour in this region are also a special type. The sides are made in an open weave. The general form resembles that of a large bottle with a square bottom, cylindrical body, constricted neck, and slightly flared rim.

The housewife mixes the maize flour with palm oil to form a somewhat thick dough. She wraps it carefully in leaves and boils it for 10 to 15 minutes. This dish, the mokwoï of the Basakata-Mosengere, is served very hot, usually seasoned a little

T M 252 with palm oil and pili-pili pepper. Whenever the opportunity arises, the native adds fish or meat to it. The dish is very highly regarded among all the peoples of the Bateke-Yaelima region, but it should be regarded as a luxury which the family can afford only on special occasions. [129]

M 252 262 The sweet manioc tuber, cooked in ashes, is a more common dish. It is served very hot with slips of manioc greens prepared as vegetables.

Sweet potatoes, which are widespread throughout the region, are peeled, boiled in water, mashed, mixed with palm oil, and served with meat or fish.

Peanuts are eaten boiled or roasted, or sometimes the women crush them raw and mix them with manioc flour or use them instead of palm oil in preparing the meals.

Although the natives eat few vegetables, except yams and sweet potatoes, their diet from time to time includes spinach, native sorrel, small tomatoes, a type of purslane, and leaves of all sorts which the women gather in the forest. The housewife pulverizes them in her small mortar with a cylindrical pestle and stews them over a low fire in small earthenware pots.

M [415] Among certain tribes, notably the Bokala and Yaelima, these small pots have an earthenware lid with a small vertical lug, while in other regions the woman covers her pot while it is on the fire with part of a calabash, a piece of bark, or the bottom of an ordinary pot.

Bananas play a major part in the native diet. From Leopoldville to Kole, we found banana trees in all the villages, both near the state posts and far into the interior of the country. Bananas are eaten raw, roasted, stewed, dried in the sun or smoked on grids. Dried bananas are reduced to flour and served as mush with other dishes.

M 262 Meat is greedily devoured by all these peoples, regardless of its origin or condition. The native must content himself with what chance brings him, the game from his hunting, and what the Mundele [Ed., White men] leave for him. The natives do not have enough practical means at their disposal to secure an abundant diet of meat. In the villages of the interior, meat is [130] seldom eaten. The prospect of a good share of meat is enough to get the native to do the hardest kind of work. In the M 262 course of our journey, our bearers never complained about long marches, heavy loads, or fatigue, as long as they got their ration of one or two kilograms of meat every evening.

M 262 252 The native is passionately fond of meat, and nothing absolutely nothing, is wasted of the animals killed in hunting. The intestines are especially prized. The natives empty them very hastily and do not hesitate to eat them raw. Most often, however, they cut them into small pieces and boil them in big earthenware pots. The fat is very carefully collected and stored for subsequent use in the preparation of vegetables and sauces. The rest is served with vegetables, chikwangue, kifune, etc.

M T 252 The meat is cut into small pieces, seasoned with a little palm oil, pepper, and salt, and placed on the fire to boil. It is cooked in small pots which also serve as plates.

T 415 Among the western Bateke and Banfumungu(in the region of Tua, Kunzulu, and Kwamouth), these utensils are very similar to bowls in shape. The bottom is round, and the rim is straight, slightly flared or arched, and not very high.

Among the eastern Banfumungu (in the region of Tua and Bokala), on the other hand, these utensils have an altogether different shape, little known up to now: a wide, spherical calotte, whose rim, two or three centimeters wide, is bent inward and shows a distinctly horizontal surface.

S 415 Among the Baboma in the region of Bokala, Wombali, and Mushie, as well as among the western Wadia and Basakata, the rim of these bowls has the same characteristic inward curve, but the sides are much more symmetrical and better finished. Moreover, the shape is slightly different. The bottom is round and very flat; the body is shallow and curved slightly inward; and the rim is turned back in horizontally. [131]

M 415 The inward curve of the sides of some pottery, terminating in an inward, horizontal rim, is a characteristic that we find again, although much less pronounced, in the bowls used for the same purpose by the Mosengere, Tumba, Bobaie, Basakata, and Balesa. All of these peoples thus seem to have a certain ethnic relationship characterized by this special form of pottery rim. The general shape of the various vessels we gathered in this region,

M
415 however, shows us that aside from this generally uniform character these different tribes each have their own distinctive pottery. In our opinion the latter should be regarded as a derivative from the original form, known and used by the principal ethnic branch of these various peoples. Each of them has modified the original form according to its tastes, its conceptions, and local circumstances and needs, to the point where each people developed a special and characteristic form that retained only two essential elements of the original: the more or less marked curve of the sides, and the inward, horizontal rim.

531 Among the Ipanga, Batitu, Bokala, and Yaelima, the shape of the small pieces of pottery used for preparing meat is altogether different. Here we find neither a regular curvature of the sides nor an inward, horizontal rim. On the contrary, the bottom is a spherical calotte, the body distinctly angled with a sharp edge, the upper surface decorated with incised drawings, and the rim slightly sloping and curved outward. The decoration is the same as that we noted on the pottery for chikwangue in this region.

415
531 Farther east, among the Basongo-Meno and Bankutshu, the shape is again quite different. The sides, which slant obliquely inward and have no rim, meet the round bottom at a sharp angle. They usually have considerable decoration with incised drawings and even some molding in relief.

M
251 To preserve meat, the natives proceed in two different ways.

For small quantities, the meat is cut into pieces weighing from one to three kilograms, impaled on a stick, and roasted over [132] a low fire. This procedure does not give very good results. Meat smoked in this way spoils after five or six days, but this does not keep the native from eating it. "It's the meat and not the smell that I eat," he says, "for after the meal the meat is gone and the smell is still with us!"

To store large quantities, the meat is cut into pieces weighing from half a kilogram to one kilogram and then boiled over a brisk fire for a little less than an hour in rather salty, well-spiced water. The pieces are then smoked on a large grid, usually set up in the center of the village. This grid, made of large rattan stems and green branches, rests on four forked stakes 90 centimeters to 1.20 meters high. A woman keeps a slow fire burning under the 251 grid, which gives off a great deal of smoke. The boiled meat is lightly packed and covered with large banana leaves. It remains on this grid for two or three days. At the end of this time, it is thoroughly smoked, black as coal, dry, and tough, but it keeps almost indefinitely.

The housewife takes her supply and puts it in the storage place inside her hut, where it is safe from the rats, mice, and other marauders which infest the native huts.

Fig. 75. Communal Smoking Apparatus.

M
415 The meat is usually cooked in large earthenware vessels. [133]

Among the Bateke and Banfunumgu, these vessels are shaped like irregular spheres with the top cut off.

Among the Baboma and Basakata, on the other hand, this pottery is cylindrical in form, broad, of moderate height, and has a flat bottom. Among the Bobaie, Balesa, and Batete, the bottom is rounded, broad, and shallow, and it extends into a rather high neck in the shape of a truncated cone, decorated with very even and not very artistic impressed designs. The body has sharp edges, and the small rim has a wide flare. This form is found among the Basakata, although less frequently. It seems to be quite common in the region of the Kundu [Nkundu], northern neighbors of the Bobaie, Balesa, and Batete.

415
531 The Ipanga and Yaelima use pottery vessels similar to those they use for making chikwangue, while the Basongo-Meno and

Dengese FO16

D

Bankutshu use a bell-shaped form; the bottom is a spherical 415 calotte, the body slightly curved, and the decoration consists of [531] heavy moldings, both sunken and in relief.

These same pots are also used by all these tribes for preparing and cooking fish. M 415

The riparian peoples of the Congo-Kasai-Fimi and of the lower Lukenie, as well as the Wadia and Mosengere of the Boriempe-Lulonga, fish a great deal.

M

Fish is never eaten raw. The natives boil it or eat it dried 252 or smoked. 251

To preserve fish, the natives smoke it on large grids similar to those they use for smoking meat.

Certain peoples, notably the tribes of the Fimi and lake region and of the lower Lukenie, also use a special form of pottery, rare and heretofore unknown. We were able to bring back only two specimens, which are fortunately very characteristic. [134] M 415

Fig. 76. Rattan Belt.

This form is open at the base and closed at the top by a large disk pierced with holes. The sides are curved. The diameter of the bottom opening is a little smaller than that of the upper disk. It varies from 45 to 90 centimeters.

This drying pot, called kenge by the natives, is placed on three pieces of wood forming a tripod. Under the tripod, a woman maintains a slow fire of leaves, grass and green wood, which sends thick smoke inside the pot. The gutted fish are placed over the disk. They are left there for four or five days, exposed continually to the action of the fire and smoke. At the end of this time they are sufficiently smoked and dried to keep for several months. Naturally, these pots can be used [135] for preparing and preserving only small quantities of food. They form a part of the native house wife's equipment among these various tribes. She also uses them to smoke chikwangue, to dry bananas, manioc tubers, and ears of maize, and sometimes to smoke meat. The manioc tubers, bananas, ears of maize, and other vegetable 415 251 products to be dried are not exposed to heavy smoke, but to a small fire of very dry wood producing a low, hot flame, or, if possible, to the heat given off by a glowing bed of charcoal.

When completely prepared, protected, and wrapped in leaves, the chikwangue are laid above the kenge for six to eight hours, while the housewife maintains a charcoal fire underneath. When dried and smoked in this way, the chikwangue keep a very long time.

Lacking a kenge, a woman sometimes uses a pottery vessel with a flat bottom, pierced with small holes, and vertical sides.

Fig. 77. Two Ways of Climbing Trees.

This fits on top of an old chikwangue pot, mpoko-kepinga, whose bottom has been broken.

The mpoko-kepinga is placed over the fire. The woman seals the juncture between the mpoko-kepinga and the kenge with the pierced bottom, using a paste of clay and potter's earth.

We did not find this particular kind of pottery beyond the 415
Batete area. The Ipanga-Yaelima, as well as the Basongo-Meno and Bankutshu, do not seem to be aware of its existence and, in any case, do not use it. [136]

I come now to the important subject of palm oil. We have 262 already noted how frequently the native housewife uses it in preparing meals. This oil takes the place of the butter and fats used in European cooking. Gathering the clusters of palm nuts and 249 making the oil are very important among all the tribes.

The remarks of Mr. Engels on this subject in his work on the Wangata [Ngata] are applicable to all the peoples we visited.

In each village one or several natives chosen from the 249 nimblest and most daring (the local daredevils) specialize in 464 gathering the clusters from the palm trees. They do this not only for themselves, but also for others for a slight fee.

Gathering these clusters is always somewhat dangerous. The 249 native must climb to the top of palm trees which are sometimes 481 20 to 25 meters high and, once there, must work hard to disentangle and sever the cluster.

[412]

Fig. 78. Mortar and Pestle for Preparing Vegetables and Palm Oil.

The method of climbing varies according to the height of the palm trees. We noted two different procedures among all the tribes visited (see Fig. 77). [137]

If the palm tree is not high, the native climbs to the cluster by using the stubs of cut stems as steps. If the tree is very high, the native uses a rattan belt which encircles both man and tree trunk.

Nothing is more interesting than to watch a native climb up to the crown of a palm tree. He does it with truly extraordinary 249 481 skill and speed. Supported by his belt, with his feet propped against the tree trunk, he proceeds quickly by small bounds, moving the belt constantly upward. Upon reaching the root of the cluster, he stands erect or sits on one of the leaves, and with a hatchet or knife he frees the cluster, cuts it, and lets it fall to the foot of the tree. The women collect the nuts, pull off those still attached to the cluster, clean them very carefully, and carry them to the village.

252 According to whether the housewife wants to make a small or large amount of palm oil, she proceeds in one of two ways.

In the first case, she throws a few palm nuts into an earthenware vessel half full of water and puts them on the fire to boil for a good hour. When the outer part is soft, she pours off the water and puts the nuts in a small wooden mortar in order to separate the pulp from the kernels. For this purpose, she avails herself of the mortar and wooden pestle used in preparing vegetables. When the outer part is completely separated from the nut, the woman takes it and extracts the juice by squeezing it tightly in her hands. The kernels are discarded.

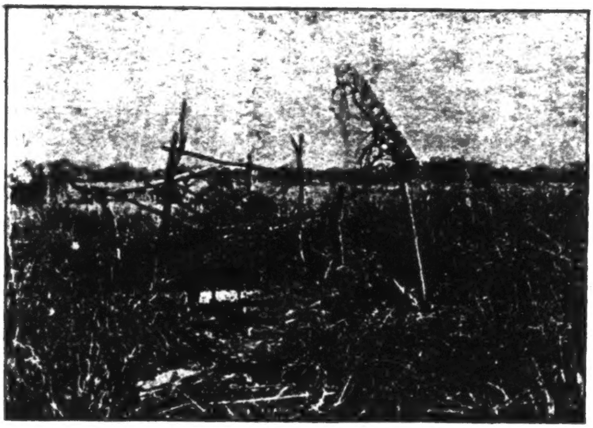

Fig. 79. Installation for Making Palm Oil.

In the second case, each village has a special installation for making palm oil. This very primitive factory usually stands slightly apart from the dwellings. Everyone has access to it, and it belongs to the entire community, but each family uses it individually.

252 It consists of a large hole in the form of a truncated cone. The diameter of the upper part varies from 60 to 70 centimeters, that of the lower part from 20 to 30 centimeters, and the depth varies from 60 to 80 centimeters. The bottom and sides are lined with pieces of raffia stems, placed [138] [Fig. 80 appears here] [139] side by side with their rounded surfaces facing the interior of the pit. The nuts, which have been slightly boiled, are poured into this funnel, which serves as a mortar. The outer part is separated from the nut with a large wooden pestle. The kernels are discarded. The pulp is taken from the hole and tightly pressed between the hands to squeeze out the oil.

Near the funnel-shaped mortar dug in the ground, there is a bench made of two or four forked stakes, graduated in height, over which the natives place large sections of tree bark. The woman throws the pulp from which she has extracted the oil on this bench, spreads it out, and lights a small fire under the wide sections of bark, which serve as drains. Under the influence of the heat, part of the oil remaining in the pulp flows out slowly and is caught in the earthenware vessel placed at the lower end of the drain. [401] Finally, whatever palm oil remains in the pulp is squeezed out by the torsion method. For this purpose, the native has set up a large stationary bar, very strong, to which he attaches one end of a pressing apparatus made of young lianas and fine rattan plaited together. The pulp, still hot, is placed in this press and wrung very tightly to extract every last drop of oil.

252 415 The natives collect and keep the palm oil in large pots covered with banana leaves, in calabashes, or, if possible, in imported bottles. Big demijohns stripped of their protective covering are in special demand for this purpose.

000 We have mentioned above the chief uses the native makes of palm oil in preparing food and the important role it plays in the diet of these primitives. Later we shall have occasion to mention palm oil again when we discuss the role it plays in native body care.

263 A word now about stimulants. Food in general, particularly meat, is always very strongly seasoned with condiments.

The most widespread stimulant is pili-pili, red pepper. This pepper, the fruit of Capsicum minimum, which is rarely more than one to one and a half centimeters long, is extremely hot. It grows

[text continues on p. 103]

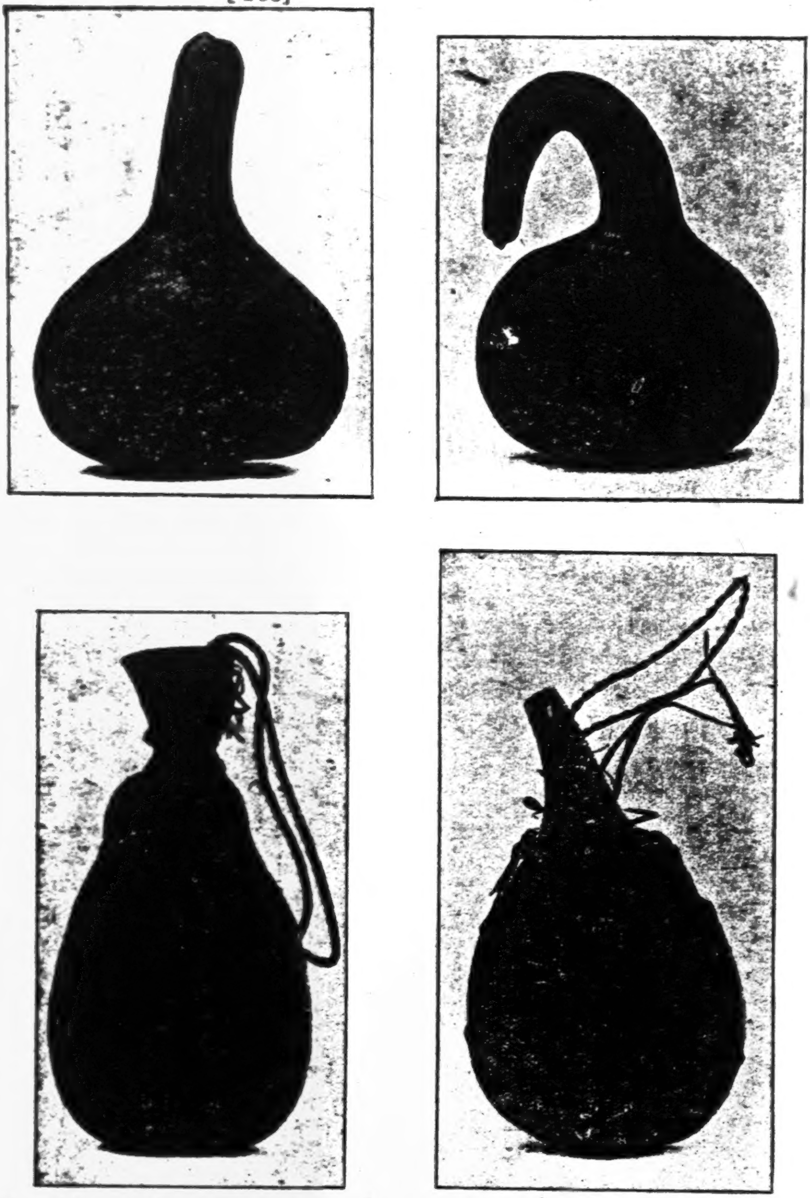

Fig. 80. Calabashes used as Receptacles for Water, Wine, Beer, and Oil.

263 wild [140] throughout the region we visited. All the tribes are acquainted with it and use it regularly.

222 Collecting and preparing pili-pili are tasks especially re-462 served to women. Upon returning from the fields, a woman 252 spreads the fruits on a mat before her hut and lets them dry for 263 five or six days. Sometimes she uses them fresh, mixing them with palm oil enhanced with salt. The native uses this sauce to season his dishes according to taste.

252 When the pili-pili is quite dry, the woman pulverizes it in 263 a small wooden mortar with a cylindrical pestle or with a small 412 piece of elephant's tusk. The shape of the mortars used for this purpose by the different peoples of the Lukenie varies a great deal. From the Bateke to the Batete, we found only very crude mortars hollowed out from the trunk of a tree. Among the Yaelima and Ipanga this utensil is more carefully worked and finished. The shape is rather like that of a small rectangular box without a lid, but provided with a lug. Among the Basongo-Meno and Bankutshu of the Bena Dibele-Kole region, we collected very crudely shaped and primitive mortars, while others were well made and carefully carved. All of them, however, have the common characteristic of an elongated vertical form, and most of them have a leg. The pestles are always quite long.

We thus again find three ethnic zones characterized by the special shape of these utensils. Of course, this fact alone could not serve as the basis of any ethnic classification, but it might have a relative value and importance in drawing general conclusions based on the whole assemblage of the ethnic characteristics of these various peoples.

263 Once reduced to a fine powder, pili-pili pepper is mixed with salt to season food after cooking. All sauces are spiced with a generous pinch of this pepper. Meat is sprinkled with it, or even stuffed with whole peppers.

When the natives are traveling, they merely pick a few pili-pili and squeeze the juice into the food while it is cooking. [141]

276 The kola nut also is very well known as a stimulant and is widely used. The kola tree is found nearly everywhere. The natives gather the fruit and chew it. Women do not indulge.

276 842 According to native belief, the kola nut ensures the fertility of a woman if sexual relations take place the night after the man has used this stimulant.

276 The regular use of kola induces very intense nervous excitement. We noticed that the adolescents and men in their prime scarcely use it. Only the old people use it regularly. Kakua, the old native chief, chewed it from morning to night. One day I pointed this out to him, asking if he were not afraid of the dangerous effects of this overindulgence. He proudly pointed out to me the huts of his seven wives, saying, "Ask them if they don't have children!"

276 263 278 Among the stimulants we may also mention the peanut, widely used by all the tribes, a type of small ground pea, and certain tree roots known to the natives but the exact nature of which we unfortunately could not determine. It is well to note, moreover, that most of the natives use the stimulants as medicaments as well as condiments. They are used for intestinal pains, colic, and as purgatives.

462 252 In all the tribes the preparation of food and meals is exclusively the task of women. They always do it with great care. [142]

252 The kitchen, if it can be called one, is always very simple. If the weather is good, cooking is done in the open in the middle of the village, in front of the hut or behind it,

[482] [313] and very often in the shade of the banana trees. If the weather is rainy or cold, the women prepares the meals inside the hut. [Ed., a passage is omitted here.]

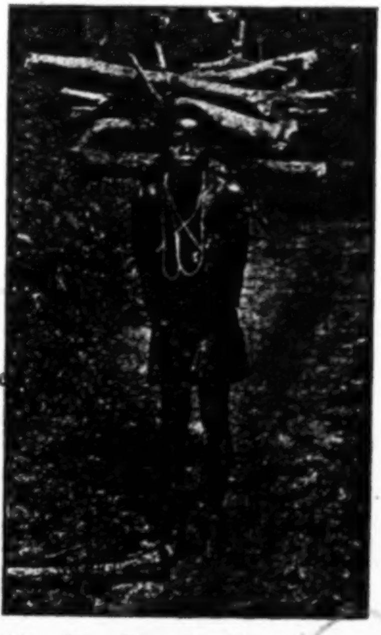

Fig. 81. Carrying Firewood.

Yaelima

264 The natives eat three meals a day, in the morning, toward noon, and at night after sunset.

The wife is never allowed to eat with her husband or to eat in the same group as he does.

[622] A chief always eats alone, far from the eyes of the common herd. [143]

Leftovers from the meals are ordinarily given to the women and children.

264 415 We did not find tables, spoons, or forks among any of the tribes we visited.

The food is put in small baskets of rattan or raffia splints, plaited in openwork and lined with leaves on the bottom. Sometimes the plate is made of wood or baked clay.

Fig. 82. Native Outdoor Kitchen, Ipanga-Batitu Tribe.

Among the Bateke-Banfumungu, we collected some earthenware plates which look a great deal like European soup plates, but are less symmetrical in shape and deeper. Among the Baboma-Wadia-Batete, on the other hand, the plates look more like our flat plates. Among the Ipanga-Yaelima, basketwork plates are chiefly used, while in the Bena Dibele-Kole region one finds the pottery plate again, a sort of broadly flared, 264 spherical calotte, and also wooden plates. Sometimes also simple leaves are used as plates, unless the food is served in the cooking pots.

The whole meal is spread on the ground. [144]

The man squats on his mat and dips leisurely in the dishes with his hand, moving from one to another according to his taste.

[532] The meal is always eaten in silence. Even when several friends eat together, they never talk during the meal.

After the meal the natives carefully wash their hands and teeth and rinse out their mouths several times.

Beverages

415 Water is the only beverage they drink at mealtime, and they use it quite rarely. If they do not have a wooden or earthenware cup, they use part of a calabash or simply a leaf rolled into a little cone.

482 Water usually comes from a spring near the village. The natives use river water only when it is quite clear. The women and children have the task of fetching water, a chore which is often quite hard. I visited many villages located along or near the river, whose source of drinking water was 20 to 30 minutes away.

At certain hours of the day and more especially in the morning as the sun first comes up, the women and children set out, a calabash or water jug balanced on their heads, to fetch the supply for the day.

415 Water is kept in large calabashes or earthenware jugs, sheltered from the sun in a corner of the hut.

271 The shape of these water jugs varies considerably according 415 to the region, and some of them even seem to us to be characteristic of certain ethnic groups. [145]

Among the western Bateke and Banfumungu, the spherical shape with straight neck predominates.

Among the Maboma of Bokala-Wombali and the eastern Banfumungu, the shape is distinctly spherical, with a very small, funnel-like neck that is usually no more than one or two centimeters high. This form is entirely new. Fortunately, we were able to collect several specimens. The Bateke of the Stanley Pool region use a water jug that resembles the carafes imported from Europe. This shape is particularly common in the Leopoldville-Kinshasa region.

From Mushie to the region of the Basakata-Balesa, including the Wadia and Tumba, the body of the water jug consists of two parts joined at a sharp or slightly rounded edge. The bottom part is shaped like a spherical calotte; the upper part has the shape of a truncated cone. The decoration is very symmetrical. Lightly [53] marked parallel circles cover the conical part of the body and sometimes the neck. The latter is very long, usually wider at its base than at the top and slightly swollen in the middle. This interesting shape is also found, though more rarely, among the Mosengere. Among this tribe we encountered another form, no less interesting and very little known up to the present time. The chief characteristics of this form are the flat bottom, a cylindrical, more or less symmetrical body, rounded edges, and a neck in the shape of a wide funnel.

Among the Bobaie of the northeast, the Balesa-Batete, the Ipanga-Batitu, and the Bokala-Yaelima, the water jug has a spherical body and a straight neck. This same shape is also found among the Bankutu [Wankutshu] and Basongo-Meno of the Bena Dibele-Kole region.

Let us note, however, that in the region of the Ipanga-Yaelima, water jugs are relatively rare; the natives commonly use large calabashes, very often provided with a handle and a leg of rattan or bamboo.

271 Other than with meals, the natives drink water only to slake
515 their thirst. Each time the porters come to a river, they make it a point to bathe in it and to refresh themselves. [146]

006 point to bathe in it and to refresh themselves. [146]

273 In addition to water which is the customary drink of all the tribes, we found the following beverages according to region: palm wine, malafu; sugarcane beer, masanga; and pombe, maize beer.

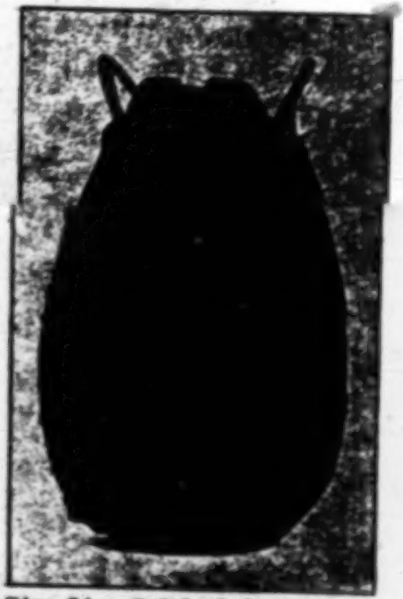

Fig. 84. Calabash for Palm Oil, also for Water.

Palm wine, the native malafu, although liked, is usually not very much in demand, especially when the native can replace it with masanga, sugar-cane beer. We found it among all the peoples, however, although actually only the Ipanga-Yaelima and the Basongo Meno-Bankutu drink it regularly.

[439] In the other regions palm wine is made particularly in the villages near government posts or commercial establishments for the benefit of the Whites. These villages usually have a professional vintager.

The vintage comes from tapping the trees. The mese palm, raffia, and the oil palm are chiefly used.

481 The native has three methods of climbing the trees for the vintage. The first is the one we described for gathering clusters of the palm nuts; the second one consists of leaning a pole-ladder 273 against the palm or fastening rungs to the trunk itself; the third 481 is to dig holes in the trunk to serve as steps. The native climbs to the crown and cuts a palm leaf just below the terminal bud. He digs a rather deep opening in the wound and plants a palm leaflet in it to serve as a channeling trough. At the other end of this trough, the native fastens a calabash. The palm sap fills the hole and flows slowly [147] down the trough into the calabash. The native comes to collect it early in the morning.

When fresh, this wine seemed delicious to me; fermented, 273
I found it undrinkable!

The natives, on the other hand, went only after it has fermented for three or four days.

Another method, simpler but less profitable, is to cut down the palm tree, lop off the crown, and gather the sap that flows out. Used in this way, a palm tree may yield, at most, 10 to 15 liters of wine and is permanently destroyed. The wine, moreover, is of a decidedly inferior quality. A native would never dare offer it to the head of a post.

Fig. 85. Masanga Brewery, Basakata.

Sugar-cane beer, the native masanga, is the drink most in demand.

In certain regions, notably among the Basakata-Balesa, we found one or two large establishments for making beer in each village. These breweries are located a little outside the village. The equipment is very rudimentary. It consists of a large, cleared space with the ground well beaten, a straw roof sheltering 273 a sort of large basin resembling a canoe, two or four beating paddles, a strong stationary bar, a pressing apparatus made of lianas, a storage vat, and calabashes.

Sugar cane is grown communally on a rather large scale. 244 [148] The natives cut it shortly before it is fully ripe. Men, women, and children participate in this work. The whole harvest is carried to the brewery shed. The sugar cane, cut in pieces, is thrown into the mash tub, and two or sometimes four men crush it as much as possible with large beetles, reducing it to a sort of whitish pulp. When this pulp is sufficiently thin, the natives put it in the press made of lianas, which is attached so as to hang under the bar and over the vat. To keep the press from coiling up as a result of the twisting, they insert a stick in it perpendicular to the bar. Two men vigorously twist the press, squeezing out every last drop of the sweet juice. The liquid is caught in the vat and then poured into large calabashes and carried to the village. Masanga is truly pleasant, refreshing, and delicious when it is fresh. It has no intoxicating effect. The natives, however, do not drink it until it has fermented. They add to it the bark of a small plains shrub, put the waste from the sugar cane around the calabashes, and expose them to the sun for one or two days to induce very active fermentation.

Sugar-cane beer is always imbibed communally.

All the important ceremonies are accompanied by heavy drinking. Marriage, birth, death, burial, the return from important hunts, the appearance of the new moon, a visit from a neighboring chief, and even our arrival in certain villages are all reasons for organizing big native celebrations where the emptying of great numbers of calabashes of masanga is the order of the day. The natives gather in the shade of the big trees in the village or under the public shelter. The calabashes of masanga are set in the center or poured into big pots. Everyone drinks as much as he wants, as long as there is any left and as long as he can. Meanwhile, the music is in full swing, and there is singing and dancing. Hemp is very often smoked, and the drinking always continues up to the point of brutish drunkenness. It is hard to realize what enormous quantities of this heady beverage some natives can imbibe. Pokei, the Banfumungu chief at Engrei, ordinarily does not stop until his tenth liter, and he is not the biggest drinker. Very often [149] the celebrations degenerate into bloody brawls. The drunken native flies into a rage over trifles, quarrels, and does not hesitate to use his weapons.

Among certain tribes, notably the Banfumungu, women under no circumstances may be present at important festivities or participate in large-scale drinking. Pokei assures us that they are excluded because of their vindictive temperament. "We men," he said, "sometimes fight during these celebrations, but the next day haven't we forgotten our quarrels? The women would also fight. Do they know how to hold their tongues even when they haven't drunk masanga? The next day they would go on quarrelling. The husbands would step in. A village quarrel would follow every celebration! No, the women may not drink masanga."

It would be a mistake, however, to believe that the women strictly observe this prohibition. Oh no! More than one has her little drop of masanga inside her hut, and on occasion intentionally pours herself a little too much. Masanga is not taboo for them!

[415]

Sugar-cane beer is served in small earthenware cups, pieces of a calabash, or wooden cups.

East of Balesa-Batete territory, masanga seems to be unknown, or at least we did not find any, either among the Ipanga-Batitu or among the Bokala-Yaelima.

273
415

Among the Basongo-Meno and Bankutu of the Bena Dibele-Kole region, the natives chiefly consume palm wine.

They also make very inferior beer from maize or millet.

To make this beer, the native crushes the maize or millet, steeps it in spring water, and lets it ferment in earthenware jars.

531

These jars are shaped more or less like the water jug with the spherical body, but have a very broad and higher neck. They are usually quite large. The cups used for palm wine and beer by the Basongo-Meno and Bankutu are always carved out of wood. They are found in all shapes, from a simple, undecorated small keg to a splendidly fashioned human figurine. In certain villages, notably at Tipolo and Bakoba, we found cups made of buffalo horn, decorated [150] with carved designs. Cups shaped like horns are sometimes carved out of wood. These are usually larger and more carefully decorated.

Sakata FO43

M D 415 The fact that these wooden cups are found in the Bena Dibele-Kole region is not without interest. Until the present time they had been reported only among the peoples in the region between the Kasai and the Sankuru, and certain authors even regarded them as characteristic of the Bakuba people. We shall say more on this subject later.

M 266 If cannibalism ever existed, it has disappeared. When questioned about this, the natives as a rule vigorously deny any connection with this barbarous custom, but they do not hesitate to accuse their neighbors of the worst misdeeds. In our opinion, the peoples of the Bena Dibele-Kole region were once anthropophagous and practiced cannibalism until quite recently. It seems probable to us that on a favorable occasion they would not resist temptation even today.

M S 261 Geophagy is better known. Children eat earth among all these peoples. Among the Basakata, Lesa, Mosengere, and Wadia, all the natives and especially the women are earth-eaters. Potter's earth and the clay from the nests of certain termites are very highly prized.

The natives seem to eat earth as a delicacy and perhaps also as a medicament. To call it food would be an exaggeration, for the amount eaten is very small. [Ed., a passage is omitted from the last paragraph, page 150, to the end of the section, page 151.]

Fig. 86. Bobaie Children. One of them shows signs of geophagy.

M 276 The consequences of using hemp are more disastrous.

This sad practice, which seems to have been quite widespread among certain peoples, is fortunately on the wane, thanks to the vigorous intervention of the government.

M 276 In spite of a most careful search, we found only a few rare proofs of the existence of this baneful custom. [152] [Fig. 87 appears here.] [153]

T 276 Among the Banfumungu of Mpozali, however, we found samples of hemp and calabash pipes, well hidden under the bed.

Asked about the use of these pipes, Lekana, the chief of the Banfumungu of the region, first gave us an evasive answer. I asked him abruptly if he did not know what use was made of the bundle of hemp I found in the same hut. He said simply, "The White man knows everything! Why ask me what use is made of these pipes?"

T 276 778 The few pipes for smoking hemp that we collected in the village of Mpozali are decorated with feathers, beads, and small bags made of raffia fibers or rags of imported cloth, containing the most diverse substances, white clay, cowry shells, ngula, etc. All of these various things taken together make up the essential part of most of the Banfumungu nkisi or ndoki objects. Their presence alone led me to attach a significance to these pipes that I had not previously suspected.

When questioned about this, the natives of Mpozali and particularly their chief, Lekana, were very definite: "Mbula Matari [Ed., European administration] has forbidden the use of hemp, but is it not nkisi?"

"Why can't we use it?"

T [757] When I explained to them the evil consequences of its use, Lekana asked me, "When we smoke hemp, do we still feel pain? Are not our sick people able to sleep after smoking hemp? Is it evil to make people forget pain and suffering, to give sleep to the sick? Is not hemp nkisi for the sick?"

I insisted, explained, argued, all in vain. Hemp and the pipes for smoking it were and would remain nkisi.

It is not only for the pure love of it, then, that the Banfumungu smoke hemp and that they do it clandestinely, since they cannot do it openly. It is not only the need to indulge a deep-rooted habit that impels them to disobey the severe laws which prohibit the practice.

T 276 Belief in the magic force, the occult but beneficial power, of this narcotic keeps them from putting aside the hemp pipe. As long [154] as this belief endures, the Banfumungu will keep this pipe and will not give up the custom. If we could get them to understand that far from being nkisi, hemp is a ndoki and the chief cause of many sufferings, pains, and diseases, the fight against the use of hemp would be over throughout the Banfumungu region.

I would not dare to make the same statement about the tribes of other regions.

M 276 Among the Wadia of Lubamiti, the Bobaie of Lebi, and elsewhere, I collected several calabash pipes, without being able to determine, however, whether or not the natives used them for smoking hemp. None of them was decorated in any way to suggest that the natives attached any magical or religious significance to it. Incidentally, the natives regularly used these pipes to smoke tobacco.

The use of hemp, however, is general from Leopoldville to the Bena Dibele-Kole region, but the custom did not seem to us to be as widespread in the region of Lake Leopold II-Lukenie as it is south of the Kasai-Sankuru.

The shape of the calabash pipe depends mainly on the shape of the calabash itself. This varies a great deal. We believe, however, that we can divide these pipes into two categories: one including the pipes with a simple spheroidal body and a long tube; the other category includes the pipes with a double spheroidal body, a constriction in the middle, and no tube.

This latter shape is more often found in the region between the Congo, the Kasai, and the Kwango.

We cannot, however, regard it as a special ethnic characteristic of this region, because this form of calabash pipe is also found among other tribes, from whom we obtained, as we did from the Banfumungu, pipes with the simple, spheroidal body and long tube which were used to smoke hemp.

The bowl of the calabash pipe is made from a tube of wood or bamboo, or a piece of stem from a banana leaf. The native cuts a small circular opening in the lower body of the calabash and sticks the tubular bowl into it.

The bottom end of the tube is always carved in the shape of a bevel or fork. [155] [Fig. 88 appears here.] [156]

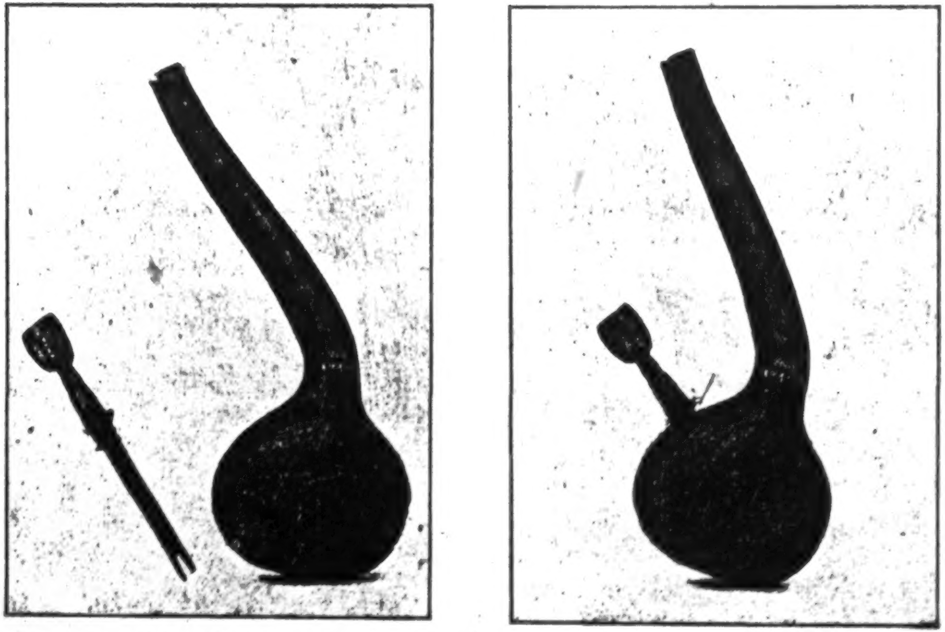

Fig. 88. Pipe for Smoking Hemp. Left: bowl and tube detached. Right: bowl and tube in place.

The hole for the mouth is cut at the top of the upper part of the calabash.

Usually very small, the hole is frequently overlaid with a thin wooden or ivory disk with a small hole in it, which is glued on with resin. We found a specimen with this special characteristic among the Tumba in the native village near Inongo.

Before using his calabash pipe, the native takes out the bowl, fills the calabash with water up to a third of the upper part and puts the bowl back in the opening. The bottom end of the tube is thus immersed in water, and the pipe is a sort of hookah.

The hemp smoke is drawn in by creating a vacuum inside the calabash. The smoke passes through the water, leaving all impurities suspended in it.

A calabash pipe found in the hut of Matari, chief of the Banfumu in the village of Kapanda near Kwamouth, has the special characteristic of a double bowl.

To smoke hemp, the native uses a simple bamboo tube stuck in the body of the calabash. To smoke tobacco, he fastens a special earthenware bowl with a considerably larger capacity on top of the tube.

The reason for using these different types of bowls follows from the way hemp and tobacco are smoked.

Hemp is smoked in small quantities at a time, and the pipe used by the Banfumungu for this purpose is his private property.

The native smokes hemp only when he feels safe from prying eyes, hidden in the bush or inside his hut with the door closed.

Tobacco, on the other hand, is smoked in the open during large gatherings, and the well-stuffed pipe passes from mouth to mouth.

As soon as the chief has drawn one or two hearty puffs, he passes the pipe to his neighbor. On such an occasion the tubular bowl, which is large enough for the small quantity of hemp smoked secretly by the native, cannot hold enough tobacco to give each member of the circle a good puff. Matari, therefore, takes care [157] to attach a bigger bowl so that the custom may be observed.

As we noted above, the calabash pipe with single spheroidal body and long tube is found chiefly in the Lake Leopold II and Lukenie region.

276 Of the seven specimens of this type that we collected, only one came from the Banfumungu, while the others belonged to various tribes of the region cited above.

The bowl is usually made of a section of bamboo or the tip from the stem of a banana leaf. All these pipes are of the hookah type.

The one we obtained from the Yaelima has a bowl cut from the kernel of a palm nut. This bowl is glued with a paste of [314] bulungu resin to a bamboo tube whose lower end is cut in the shape of a fork and submerged in the water.

The natives prefer to use this type of pipe for smoking hemp, although we noted more than once that they also use it to smoke tobacco.

The custom of smoking tobacco with a communal pipe does not seem to be practiced much by the peoples of the Fimi-Lukenie. As a rule, each native has a pipe of his own.

Among the tribes of Lake Leopold II, as well as among the Basakata, Bobaie, and Batitu, the tobacco pipe is usually made simply from the rib of a banana leaf. The native often attaches a small earthenware bowl to the lower end of it. This bowl is always very crude, and it is interesting because of its irregular shape which is long, thin, and slightly crooked. The native unquestionably got the idea for this from the shape of the pipe bowls made from the rib of a banana leaf. The latter did not stand up well under use; the bowl was burned as the tobacco was smoked. At first, the native replaced it by another, cut from a harder and tougher piece of wood, but he soon started making the bowls out of baked clay, while retaining the original shape. [158]

Pipes from this region with wooden bowls are very rare. We possess only one, which comes from the Batitu village of Longinpila.

Beyond the Batitu in the Bumbuli region, among the Bokala and Yaelima, the pipe consists of a long wooden tube, usually slightly curved and provided with a small earthenware bowl at one end and a monkey's femur at the other as a mouthpiece.

Teke F133

M 276 Aside from this characteristic form, we found another which is no less interesting. The bowl and tube are always made from the hollowed branch of a special species of tree. The shape is slightly curved, and the top end slightly flared to form the bowl. At the other end of the tube, the native attaches a small spheroidal calabash with two holes, one of which serves as the mouthpiece. This calabash is lightly stuffed with raffia fibers and dry grass to filter the tobacco smoke.

M 276 531 Other than this primitive form, we collected a few pipes belonging to the same category, but with the calabash mouthpiece replaced by a wooden one, sometimes decorated with carved linear designs and with small copper strips inlaid in the wood.

-M 276 171 We found, then, two very characteristic pipe shapes in the Yaelima-Bankutsu region which seem to indicate a certain ethnic relationship among these different peoples. We do not know if these same shapes are found among the peoples of the Dekese region, but it seems quite probable to us. We found this same type along the north bank of the Sankuru between Lodi and Isaka, so the ethnic zone characterized by these two special forms of the native pipe, at least in the region south of Dekese, includes the whole area from Bumbuli to Bena Dibele-Kole. These types are also found outside this territory, notably to the north among the Bakuba and Bashilele. It must be noted, however, [159] that the pipe with a femur for the mouthpiece is extremely rare in the north, while that with a calabash mouthpiece is very seldom seen in the south. This seems to indicate that we have here a zone of contact where we once more find evidence of ethnic relationships between the peoples of this region and the tribes to the north and south. It may be inferred from this that the Bakuba and Bashilele tribes of the Kasai-Sankuru region are connected with the peoples between the Sankuru and the Lukenie and that they even have ethnic affinities with the peoples whose territory extends much farther north.

T 276 171 In the region of the Banfumu and Bateke, we find two types of tobacco pipes, one with a large bowl for communal smoking, the other smaller, with an earthenware bowl and a wooden tube and mouthpiece, used individually by both the women and the men. Along with these pipes, we also found several specimens with the bowl and tube made of iron. These pipes are usually very long and cruder than the small clay pipes with wooden tubes. Moreover, it is probable that the latter were copied from imported models. We found them chiefly in villages near the large centers and the government posts. Their shape is strikingly similar to that of imported pipes.

171

171
We found this same type among the Bayanzi of the right bank of the Kasai and north of Kwamouth. These natives are thus connected with the Bateke-Banfumungu group. Thus a new ethnic zone appears, and the territory we visited may be subdivided in this respect into three ethnic regions.

The first one includes all the territory occupied by the Bateke-Banfumungu, the Bayanzi, and part of the Baboma, and it is characterized:

1) by the use of a calabash pipe, a nkisi fetish, for smoking hemp;

2) by the use of pipes with large clay bowls, for smoking tobacco communally, and the small tobacco pipe, the property of the individual, used by both men and women. [160]

The second one extends from the mouth of the Fimi to the confines of Batitu territory.

The hemp pipe is not nkisi. The tobacco pipe, very primitive, is made from the rib of a banana leaf and very often has a wooden or clay bowl. The woman smokes neither tobacco nor hemp, and the custom of smoking the pipe communally is not much in favor.

The third zone is the one where we found the wooden tobacco pipe with a calabash mouthpiece or a neck of monkey bone. It includes the whole Yaelima-Bankutshu region, taking in the Bashilele and Bakuba and, very probably, the Dengese region.

276
As a rule, the natives like to smoke tobacco very much. They prefer doing it when the weather is cold, maintaining that it heightens the body heat.

Tobacco is not cultivated on a large scale. The crop is always strictly limited to the needs of the person who plants it. When the native wants to smoke tobacco, he plucks a leaf from the plant, dries it at the hearth, crushes it, and reduces it to powder. A pinch of this crudely ground tobacco is placed in the

276 receptacle forming the pipe's bowl, and it is covered with a glowing piece of charcoal. The native strongly draws in the smoke until he has his mouth full, holds it for a few moments, and then blows it out by opening his mouth wide and turning his head slightly to one side. He frequently inhales part of the smoke, which always provokes a violent cough, brings tears to the eyes, and sometimes entails pronounced discomfort. [161]

If the natives are together in a group, they pass the pipe from one to another after taking a good puff. Those waiting for the pipe often show signs of impatience, and anyone who ventures to smoke more than his share risks a real quarrel.

Women are never admitted to the circle of smokers, nor do they gather to smoke among themselves, but always do it in private. [Ed., the remainder of the chapter, through page 162, is not translated.]

Care of the Body

Hygiene. -- Soap making. -- Ngula and mpembe. -- Artificial deformations. -- Depilation. -- Filing the teeth. -- Hairdos. -- Ornaments and objects suspended from the body. -- Tattooing by incision. -- Circumcision [Ed., the author does not discuss circumcision in this volume].

515 356 A person who has only limited contact with the natives tends to depict them as very careless in their grooming, ignorant of the principles of hygiene and cleanliness, and, we may say, even as foul and filthy. If, however, one has an opportunity for closer contact with these primitives, he quickly realizes the inaccuracy of these judgments which are based on hasty and superficial observation. In closely studying the native's customs, in watching him in his daily, ordinary life, one notices many small things which show us [164] that the native, apparently heedless of all hygienic measures and inattentive to cleanliness, does take into account rudimentary principles of hygiene and tries to apply them in many small ways.

356 At first glance the native hut looks like a miserable hovel. Its often dilapidated appearance, narrow and low entrance, lack of windows or ventilating shaft, the general disorder reigning in the area which is used as shelter, kitchen, etc., all are reasons for the unpleasant impression acquired from a rapid investigation. The native, however, puts a great deal of care into the construction of his dwelling. The woman works hard at cleaning the inside of her hut regularly. If, pushing our investigation further, we proceed to the area reserved for the husband and wife and closely study the organization and arrangement of what serves as the bedroom, we see that a cleanliness reigns here that stands in conspicuous contrast to the unpleasant first impression. The 356 walls are lined with mats, and the crude bed is raised off the ground to avoid unpleasant and unhealthy contact with the ground. A mat is spread over the native's bed, [165] and the pillow which is customarily used permits him to lie in a restful position.

515 The natives take a bath almost every day. They usually go to the river during the hottest hours of the day, but sometimes they do so early in the morning or in the evening. The child participates in this from an early age. Aside from these regular baths, the native often washes his whole body with warm water. [302] He then smears himself with a light film of palm oil to ensure the suppleness of the skin and to protect it from the sun's rays.

264 575 Before and after each meal the native makes a point of washing out his mouth. After the meal he brushes his teeth with a small brush made of rattan or soft wood, the fibers acting as bristles.

Fig. 91. A Scene from Native Life among the Riparian People of the Lower Lukenie.

252 264 Meals are prepared with a genuine concern for cleanliness. All the food is washed, cleaned, and boiled before being eaten. Kitchen utensils are cleaned and carefully put away. Despite the primitive conditions for preparing manioc flour, the product is as pure as if it had been prepared by an improved method 252 264 with modern machinery. Not content with the state of the utensils in which she serves the meals, the woman is careful to line them at mealtime with fresh and very clean leaves.

515 The natives keep the nails of their hands and feet cut short.

The care of the feet is explained as a hygienic measure and by the necessity of taking precautions to avoid the vermin which like to get into these places (ticks). The care of the hands can be explained only by the concern for cleanliness shown in native eating habits.

Imported soap is not yet commonly used, although we found it in a number of native huts.

388 Many native women know how to make soap. The process is very simple. Dried banana skins, trunks of papaw trees, bark, the fruits of various vegetables, and waste from palm nuts are gathered together and burned. The ashes are carefully collected and mixed with some water for boiling them. At the first ebullition, the woman removes the ashes and impurities that [166] rise to the surface. Boiling is then continued until the evaporation is almost complete. When only a thick and strupy grayish-black deposit is left, the woman takes it off the fire, washes it, and kneads it in cold water until it takes on a clearer color. She then adds palm oil, mixes it in with great care, and puts the lot back on the fire. The paste is stirred all through the boiling, which is continued until the woman obtains a mixture whose consistency is slightly firmer than that of our soft soaps. [Ed., a passage is omitted from mid-page 166 to mid-page 167.]

Native soap is used only in the care of the body.

[302 303 [167] The native does not merely smear his body with palm oil. The men and especially the women often powder themselves with takula dust. The women prepare a cosmetic with this and love to cover their whole body with it in a spirit of coquetry. This practice is so widespread among the peoples of Lake Leopold II that the manufacture of ngula has become a veritable local industry in certain areas. This is especially true of the Mosengere. In a village near the Bongo post, we counted 35 installations for making ngula powder. The simplest set of materials includes two blocks of takula or redwood, a small receptacle containing water, a handful of sand, and a small hand or painting brush. One of the 303 blocks is placed on the ground. The woman sits during the work. The second block is placed flat on the top surface of the first, which is moistened and sprinkled with sand. The woman holds the top block in both hands and rubs it back and forth with a rotary motion, taking care to keep the two grinding surfaces wet. The rubbing and the action of the grains of sand as fine graters produce a fine, red, almost impalpable powder mixed with water. The skill in this process consists of proceeding in such a way that the gritty sand is mixed as little as possible with the wood dust. The skill of some persons is so [168] great that one can find hardly any traces of sand in their ngula (1).

113 1. On this subject see the monograph on ngula and its manufacture in the Belgian Congo by Dr. J. Maes in the periodical, Congo, 1920 volume.

In the region of the Mosengere, the apparatus for making ngula is usually more elaborate. A thick piece of tree bark is used as a basin. Four or six rather strong sticks are fastened to this basin, and to these the native attaches one of the takula blocks. A special device permits this apparatus to be fastened in place. Some natives even have an improved apparatus set up under a crude shelter in front of their hut, which permits them to make ngula while standing up. Four heavy stakes driven perpendicularly into the ground support a large basin of tree bark 15 centimeters above the ground. [169] One meter from the ground, horizontal crossbars are attached to the forked ends of the stakes, and one of the blocks of takula is fastened to these crossbars. An earthenware receptacle, held in the three forks of a stake driven into the ground beside the apparatus, contains a mixture of water and a small portion of oil. A brush made of a piece of soft wood is immersed in the mixture and permits the craftsman to wet the takula block at will. A small piece of a calabash holds the sand which is rubbed on the wood to grate it to dust. Despite all the skill of the worker, this sand gets mixed into the dust and must be replaced from time to time. The person making

303 the ngula stands before the apparatus. The mixture of water, ngula dust, and a few grains of sand falls into the storage basin as the work progresses. When the stock is large enough, the native plaits small baskets having the shape of a truncated cone and an average capacity of one cubic decimeter. The ngula paste is packed into these baskets, and the lot is then hung under the shelter out of the sun. At the end of a few days the paste is dry. The molded cone of ngula is taken from the mold, wrapped in banana leaves, and

The sides are then plaited by the simplest method, that is, with the horizontal band weaving in and out of the vertical thongs. As all of these molds always have approximately the same height and diameter, the ngula cones are both similar in M 303 shape and quite constant in weight. The natives use them a great deal as trade goods. In some regions the ngula cone has become 436 a veritable currency, with a standard value from one tribe to another. [170] A market is organized regularly when steamers M 437 call at Mushie, and there the people of the interior exchange the products of their industries for the imported objects brought by the Blacks who work for the Whites. Ngula cones are among the principal items of trade and bring a very high price. In the Oshwe region, the old chief Kua Kua was a great ngula trader. He came by regularly with four or five of his wives, bringing various products from the region between the Kasai and the Lukenie to exchange for the ngula made in the Lokoro region.

D 303 Throughout the central Congo regions, the ngula used for trade has the shape of an elongated truncated cone. Among the Basongo-Meno and farther east, on the other hand, ngula most often is shaped in a ball. The native of these regions often uses it to decorate his pottery and wooden objects and to dye the fibers of cloth used for decoration. He keeps it in cosmetic boxes carved from takula wood and usually decorated with very artistic designs. He also uses it to color his hair. [Ed., a passage from the middle of page 170 to the last paragraph, page 171, is omitted.]

M 302 789 [171] Aside from ngula, the native sometimes smears his body with a type of white clay quite frequently found in the river beds. [172] The native calls it mpembe. Its use is far from being as widespread as that of ngula, and we believe that the native associates it with magic power rather than ornamentation. Mpembe is used chiefly by the peoples of the Congo-Kasai, Lake Leopold II, and Lukenie regions, up to the region of the Batitu.

M 766 We never saw a native smear his whole body with it. The few women in mourning that we saw were covered with a grayish-yellow mud and not with mpembe. We believe, moreover, that the use of mpembe is reserved to the chief, his wives, and perhaps

M 302 789 dignitaries and their families, but it was impossible for us to prove the accuracy of our hypothesis. When questioned about this, the natives always confined themselves to uncertain and evasive replies. The native chief rarely appears at a large gathering without having his face and sometimes his arms and chest covered with lines drawn with mpembe. At all official receptions, the chief, a few dignitaries, and sometimes some of the chiefs' wives had a more or less symmetrical rectangle drawn with mpembe around the eyes.

M 304 342 We observed the following artificial deformations in the course of our journey:

1) depilation;
2) filing of the teeth;
3) tattooing by incision;
4) circumcision.

M 302 Depilation is practiced by all the peoples of the regions visited. The native plucks out every last hair on his body. Where the hair cannot be plucked, it is shaved with great care. For the parts of the body that are hard to reach, men and women help one another. Eyebrows and eyelashes are both plucked, while beards and mustaches, on the other hand, are cared for with great pride. It is very unusual to see a full beard. We ran across only one such case. The happy possessor of this beautiful [173] beard was as proud of it as he could be, and Natali, chief of the Banfumu of Kwamouth, was heartbroken to have only a few hairs on his chin while one of his dignitaries was endowed with such a fine beard.

T 302 Among the Bateke-Banfumu peoples, up to the Ipanga, the natives frequently shave the base of their scalp all around the head. Their headdress looks like a very symmetrical calotte.

M 302 Among the Yaelima we encountered men whose heads were completely shaved except for one strip just above the nape of the neck. A similar custom must have prevailed among the Bateke and Banfumu, but the unshaved part was broader.

Among the Yaelima and up to the region of the Bankutshu north of Bena Dibele, the natives shave their hair in such a way

M 302 as to broaden the forehead. The brow is sharply delineated at right angles and framed by two corners projecting over the temples.

M 302 557 Let us note that the custom of shaving part of the scalp is hardly a general one. The types of headdress we have just described are seen regularly, but by no means are worn by all the natives. It even seemed to us that they tend to be the prerogative of the chiefs, dignitaries, and their families, but we dare not assert that they constitute a right, a strict prerogative. [174]

S [302 301 142]

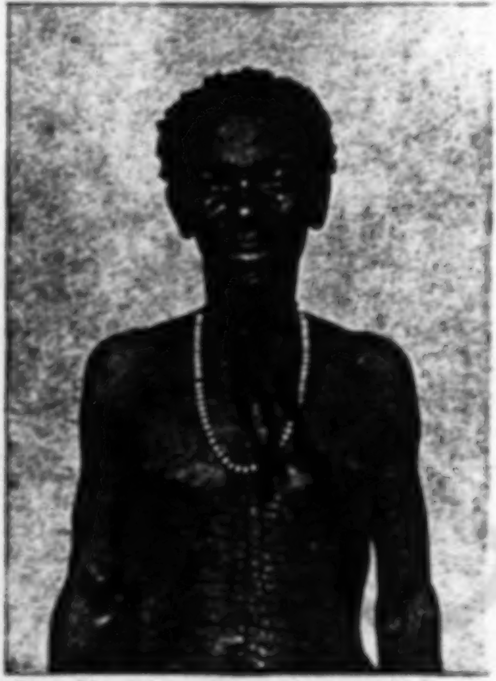

Fig. 93. Batete Type with Long Beard, Plucked Eyelashes and Eyebrows.

M S T 304 The Bateke and Banfumu file the middle upper incisors in the shape of an isosceles triangle, break them, or pull them out. We observed this custom among some of the Baboma. The majority of the Baboma, however, have their teeth filed to a point, a custom that prevails up to the Bokala region and along the north bank of the Kasai up to 23° longitude east of Greenwich. "Basongo-Meno" seems to mean "people with filed teeth" and may have

314 been the name used by the southern peoples to designate their neighbors to the north whose real name they did not know. The custom of deforming the teeth tends to disappear rapidly. The younger generation already refuses to submit to it, and we often heard the natives with filed teeth referred to as basengi, that is "savages." The deformation of the teeth is accomplished with a [326] small iron chisel and a wooden mallet. The village blacksmith does this for a small fee. The teeth are broken with short, sharp blows while the patient is seated with his head against the knees of the blacksmith, who stands behind the patient. The operation is very painful and takes several sittings. The last ones are for the filing, which is done with a small native file.

302 The native takes special pains with his hairdo, which sometimes is a true little marve the fruit of long and patient work. Both men and women attach great importance to this. They strive [175] to surpass themselves and to achieve the most coquettish coiffure possible. Since every native is a born hair stylist and they aid each other with complete unselfishness, the hairdo that only varies from one tribe to another, but the most disparate types are found within the same tribe, according to our observation.

Fig. 94. A Balesa with a Small Goatee and with Eyelashes and Eyebrows Carefully Plucked.

A very popular method is to smear the hair with a rather thick paste of palm oil and ngula and then to separate the locks and roll them up so that they form small, very irregular balls. To enhance this hairdo, the native does not hesitate to insert peanuts into the hair, first smearing them carefully with ngula paste in order to conceal the deception.

A very common hairdo around Lake Leopold II and in the region of the lower Lukenie consists of a multitude of small, perfect braids covering the whole head, falling over the forehead, the ears, and the nape of the neck. These braids are sometimes arranged in star-shaped formations originating at the top of the head or sometimes in crossed strips; sometimes they are partially parallel and then branch away at the sides, and sometimes they are placed in concentric circles or spirals. The more civilized element tends [176] to adopt a hairdo resembling a cock's comb, single, double, or triple.

Among the Mosengere and Bolia, we greatly admired a hairdo arranged in an adjustable aureole. A narrow strip of hair was finely plaited all around the head. The braids were mounted on very thin raffia splints in a circular arrangement. The native could raise or lower this hairdo at will, so that he sometimes seemed to wear a very smooth calotte and at other times a fanned-out crown. This hairdo was highly prized by the Mosengere. Among the Tumba and Wadia, having the hair in an arrangement of conical bags was fashionable for the men. Banfumu women, on the occasion of great celebrations, selected a hairdo in the

None of these types of native headdress, however, seemed to be a stable characteristic. We found them all more or less regularly in the various regions, without being able to characterize them as distinctly local products.

Tk 304 554 751 Some less widespread forms, on the other hand, do have a strong ethnic character. Such is the case for the chignon hairdo which prolongs the heads of the Bateke-Banfumu. This coiffure, together [177] with the general appearance of the head -- with its plucked eyebrows and eyelashes, the skull covered for the most part with little tufts of wooly hair, beard, mustache, and tattooing made with a comb on the temples and cheeks -- is indeed the typical and characteristic form, representing the artistic ideal of of the Bateke-Banfumu. All the natives would like to adopt it, but only the great chiefs and dignitaries may thus glorify themselves. It is this model that the Bateke-Banfumu use to fashion the figurines which are often called fetishes, but which are really nkisi, protectors of the children. The form of these nkisi is the same for adults or for children, for the poor or for the wealthy. This form is found throughout the region, from Stanley Pool to the Kwango, and belongs specifically to the Bateke-Banfumu peoples, whose ethnic unity it demonstrates anew.

M

A no less characteristic coiffure is that worn by the dignitaries of the Ipanga-Yaelima region. The hair is parted in the middle, with the part running from the forehead to the nape of the neck, and the hair is gathered into one braid on each side. The braids originate just over the ears and then pass behind them to meet under the chin, where they are sometimes knotted. The hair at the top of the head used to be plaited in an upright roll over a small circumference. Only the favorite wife of the young Batitu chief still wore this ancestral coiffure when we passed through the region. This hairdo seems to have been very widespread in the region of the Yaelima and perhaps [178] much farther east. It corresponded to the local ethnic type which the sculptors followed in 302 532 fashioning most of the statuettes, figurines and bowls that we possess from this region, which are so remarkably decorated. Moreover, we find these same forms among the Babuba and Bashilele, up to the region of the Bankutshu of Bena Dibele-Kole. These various tribes have also reproduced in their sculpture the designs of the shaved parts of the head, which are so uniform and so characteristic. In this respect these various tribes are related, and their ethnic affinity seems very clear. Despite their present remoteness from each other and the absence of all tribal intercourse, their ethnic kinship is clearly shown in the mementos they have preserved of the ancestral culture.

Fig. 100. Hairdos and Tattoos of Lake Leopold II.

302 161 These various observations permit us to divide the peoples into three very distinct groups.

1) The Bateke-Banfumu group, with its chignon hairdo over the nape of the neck and the rest of the head shaved or with the hair cut short.

2) The group including the Ipanga and the eastern peoples, with their hairdo of two braids passing behind the ears and under the chin and the upright roll on top of the head. [179]

are worn in the hair, around the neck, on the wrists and ankles, and at the waist. M 301

From Stanley Pool to Mushie, the women slip a crown of cowries into the hair, sometimes wear bracelets of brass or glass beads on the wrist and forearm, and hang brass necklaces or imported beads strung on fibers around the neck. Very often the necklace goes from the shoulders under the arm. Throughout this region, imported ornaments predominate. Only the chiefs have retained a few special ornaments from the old days, notably the necklace and bracelet of worked brass and the necklace adorned with the teeth of leopards or lions. These latter objects are associated with a privilege, a prerogative, a right of use. M T 301 554

They are, in a way, badges of rank. In the full regalia worn by [180] Natali, a typical native petty chief, each detail seemed to have a special meaning. He had donned his finest costume in our honor and to impress us: an old tunic from the Belgian Regiment of the Guides, and a government medal around his neck on a chain, the badge of a native chief recognized by the government. He had attached a small whistle to the same chain, along with the five or six medals for his wives' taxes. Over this chain he wore the necklace of the native chiefs, made of brass and T 301 554 302

T 301 554 302 decorated with worked designs. His black skin glistened with grease and oil. His face had a wide red line of oil and ngula powder from the tip of his nose to the top of his forehead. A large circle, white above and yellow below, was painted around his right eye. His eyelashes were very long and powdered white, while his eyebrows had been carefully plucked. His head was covered with thick hair, short and woolly. It was gathered at the back into a large chignon roll, to which was fitted a secondary coiffure in small braids, dyed with ngula and shining with grease. A long blue bead dangled below this original headdress, and a long cock feather topped off the whole thing. The T [304] temples and cheeks were marked with a set of light parallel lines, a tattoo which seems to be drawn with an iron comb and which is [181] characteristic of all the Banfumungu. T [481 293] In his left hand Natali held the big walking staff, adorned at the top with a small iron bell, and he M [301 854] carried a fly-chaser made from the tail of a buffalo under his right arm, the badge of a chief. This was Natali: a native chief whose T [651] ornaments indicated his authority, recognized by the state whose medal he possessed, a polygamist who had paid the tax on his wives as attested by the little receipt plates which hung from his neck, a sorcerer and fetisher who knew the art of making nkisi and the magic powders that striped his face.

No less interesting is the full ceremonial regalia of the chiefs of the Lake Leopold II tribes. This varies according to the importance of the chief, but it always includes a number of cowries and one or several brass disks attached to the hairdo and the loincloth. The right to wear disks in the hairdo dates from olden times and is reserved to the chiefs and great dignitaries by ancestral custom.

The practice is found all along the Lukenie. From Lake Leopold II to Dekese, these disks have the same shape and ornamental designs. Their manufacture is reserved to the important blacksmiths upon authorization by the local Mfumu na Tse of the region. [182]

Leopard skins, iron or brass bells hung from the waist, and the right to wear certain knives of a special shape at the waist are also prerogatives of the chiefs and dignitaries throughout the Lake Leopold II and Lukenie region.

We are thus confronted with various manifestations in the material life which are so many indications of the common origin or kinship of these different tribes.

301 Among the peoples of Lake Leopold II, hair ornaments are rare. Hairpins seem to be unknown; combs are made of raffia splints. A woman prefers ornaments of metal, iron, brass, or copper, while the chiefs and great dignitaries like to wear belts, necklaces, bracelets, and trimmed with cowries. The necklace of solid brass is very popular. The heavier it is, the more it is liked. We saw women wearing necklaces weighing as much as 25 pounds. These necklaces are riveted around the necks of the favorite wives of great chiefs or wealthy dignitaries. In case of divorce or separation, the owner of the necklaces removes them without regard for the suffering or cries of the victim. The women seem to be in no way inconvenienced by these cumbersome ornaments. On rare instances they wrap cloth around them to keep them from rubbing against the collarbone. [183]

Bracelets and anklets are relatively rare as ornaments among the Mosengere and other riparian tribes of the lake. We found them from time to time among the Bobaie and Balesa.

The elegantly dressed women of the Ipanga-Batitu and Bokala wear heavy brass rings over the ankles, brass rings on the fingers and toes, and leather belts adorned with brass beads, while the necklaces of solid brass gradually disappear as one goes eastward. Among the Yaelima and Bokala they are practically nonexistent, but the men and women like bracelets of brass wire. They wear them like a sheath from the wrist to the elbow. Except for rare exceptions, these people do not wear rings around the ankles. Some dignitaries deck themselves out with imported bead necklaces. The belt decorated with brass beads is rather commonly used. In the Bena-Dibele-Kole region, ornaments of copper and brass seem to be disappearing little by little as imported beads come in. Necklaces of glass beads, incidentally have been introduced throughout the region. [184] we visited. They are particularly in vogue among the Ipanga and Batitu women. The men prefer necklaces made of hair from elephants' tails, or a simple brass ring.

[778] from which they hang nkisi bags and horns. These amulet necklaces are associated with a religious idea, with magic power, rather than with ornamentation.

M

857 Children are usually overloaded with gaudy ornaments: white feathers stuck in the hair, necklaces and belts of glass beads, and small bells attached to the belt. In our opinion, however, these objects are not primarily intended to adorn the child, but to protect it. There is no doubt that the mother sticks the feathers in her child's hair and attaches small bells to his belt in order to find him more easily if he gets lost in the fields or in the bush. As soon as the child is old enough to find his own way and return to the village alone, bells and feathers are given up permanently. [185]

171 According to their ornaments, the peoples of the Stanley Pool-Kole region are divided into five groups.

The first one includes the Bateke-Banfumu-Baboma, among whom ornaments are relatively rare for the women as well as for the men. 301 171

The second one encompasses all the peoples in the region of Lake Leopold II and the lower Lukenie and is characterized by the solid brass necklace worn by the women and the ornaments trimmed with cowries and the brass plaques worn by the dignitaries and chiefs.

The third one includes the Ipanga and the Batitu, with the belt ornamented with brass beads, rings on the fingers and toes, and solid brass rings worn above the ankles, all of which are peculiar to the women.

The fourth group is characterized by the sheath of brass rings covering the arm from wrist to elbow and worn as much by the men as by the women of the Bokala-Yaelima.

In addition to all these adornments used regularly in common, everyday life, the native also has ornaments reserved for show and ceremony. 301

S 643 301 293 302 For important ceremonies Chief Etoti, an old and unsociable Wadia, wore a hairdo of small braids adorned with three brass disks. He also wore a necklace made of hair from an elephant's tail, from which hung a triangular apron embellished with eight brass disks, signs of his great power and of his title as the oldest and greatest Mfumu na Tse in the whole Lake Leopold II region. His face was smeared with ngula, his eyes encircled with mpembe, and there was a long white line on each arm. In one hand he held the royal fly-chaser, and in the other, two chief's staffs.

During dances and ceremonies the women attach the most unusual objects around their waists, often large bushy branches. Among the Ipanga and Batitu, as well as in the region of Wumbuli and Dekese, betrothal and wedding dances are executed in special attire, heavily bedecked with beads and cowries. 292 301 535

These ornaments are not at all consistent. They vary according to taste and the whims and means of the natives, but certain parts of the dress costume worn by the betrothed couple at the dances celebrating the engagement seem to have a special meaning, to which we shall return later.

From Leopoldville to Kole the peoples know and practice tattooing. This varies, however, from one region to another in motif and design, the symmetry of application, its extensiveness, and the manner of execution.

Among the Bateke and Banfumungu, we noted two distinct tattooings: that of the men and that of the women. [188]

[304]

For the men, the face is covered with striated, parallel lines, irregular, slightly concave, shallow, and covering the cheeks from the temples to near the chin. For the women, there is no facial tattooing, but the abdominal region is symmetrically covered with small lines or elongated dots in relief, placed side by side and covering the whole region extending from the pit of the stomach to the lower abdomen.

[771
291] personal vanity, and to excite the male. At the present time only the latter reason accounts for the practice in the region where our influence has been effective. The introduction of European fabrics, the expansion of the economy and the progress of civilization have led the women to clothe themselves and to hide and screen a large part of the body from indiscreet glances. [189] The small primitive loincloth has given way to a toga of variable length, which hides from the public eye that part [Fig. 112 appears here] of the body which is covered with tattoos. In such cases, the woman can no longer display her tattoos for the sake of vanity. [Figs. 113 and 114 appear here] If, despite this, 304 133 some of them continue to have themselves tattooed just like the old matrons, it is because they hope to attract a man, to please him, and to be able to participate sooner in the pleasures of intimate life. When questioned on this subject, the natives are very definite. The men maintain that the raised tattoos [190] on

304
833 certain parts of the female body is very exciting to them, essentially as a result of the very pronounced movements of the woman during sexual contact. This explanation, which according to the natives seems to be the only reason for tattooing the women of certain tribes (this applies, in our opinion, to the Bateke, Banfumungu, Baboma, and, up to a certain point, to all the riparian peoples of Lake Leopold II), also enables us to explain the special character of the tattooing of Yaelima women. It extends all around the mons Veneris, follows the fold of the groin, and continues in concentric circles on the inside of the upper thighs. The tattoo scars on these parts of the woman's body are usually more symmetrical and in more pronounced relief, and these characteristics increase in direct proportion to the nearness of the pubic region. Coquetry cannot be the reason for making these raised scars. Their presence is largely hidden, even by the flimsiest and most primitive loincloth. Among certain tribes, the loincloth completely covers this part of the body, and since native women exercise a great deal of care and modesty in hiding these tattoos from the public eye, it was only with great difficulty that we were able to verify their existence. Let us note in passing [834] that despite earnest endeavors, we never were able to persuade a native woman of the interior to be photographed without her loincloth. The civilized women, whether local demimondaines or housewives, were, it is true, less [191] timid. The natives themselves make a distinction between these tattoos and those which appear on other parts of the body, notably on the arms, back, and face.

832 Tattoos on the back, arms, and throat are always essentially decorative. We found them especially on the women, who are coquettish by nature even among the most primitive peoples. These tattoos generally lack the characteristic uniformity which is such a clear mark of the racial tattoos. The latter are found in their most characteristic form on the men, particularly on the forehead, temples, cheeks, and sometimes the chest. Among certain tribes, the women have also taken over this artificial deformation peculiar to the men. Elsewhere, the women have special tattoos which are clearly distinct from those of the men, and, finally, among some peoples the women have no racial tattoos.

We have seen earlier that among the Bateke, Banfumungu, and Baboma, the man's characteristic tattoo consists of lines scratched on the face, while that of the woman consists of small dots in relief, juxtaposed in parallel lines, more or less horizontal, covering the body from the pit of the stomach to the lower abdomen. This same design [192] is found among the women of all the riparian peoples of Lake Leopold II and among the tribes of the Lukenie up to the Bambuli sector. It must be noted, however, that in this last region the relief is less clear and less pronounced.

171

Fig. 116. Tattooing among the Women of Lake Leopold II and the Lower Lukenie.

Moreover, as a general rule, the relief gradually decreases as one goes farther from the lake. In this respect, then, all these peoples seem to belong to the same ethnic group, and it is probable that this characteristic tattooing is one of the traits of the ancestral civilization, retained until the present time by all

M 304 171 the branches of the original group despite migrations and displacements. In the same region, the tattoo of the man is a small rosette, consisting of a large central dot and two or three concentric circles in relief, decorating the temples. In the region north of Lake Leopold II, the native usually adds to this a line of small dots all across the forehead.

M S 304 Among the Tumba, Mosengere, Wadia, and Basakata-Bobaie-Balesa, on the other hand, this line is replaced by a series of small incisions in relief which form a little cock's crest in the hollow at the root of the nose.

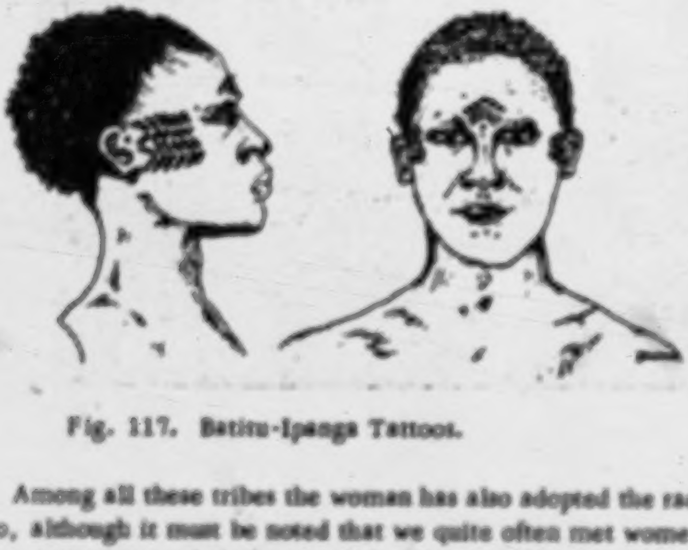

Fig. 117. Batitu-Ipanga Tattoos.

Among all these tribes the woman has also adopted the facial tattoo, although it must be noted that we quite often met women with no tattooing on their faces, while others had the rosette alone, the rosette [193] and the cock's crest, or the line crossing the forehead, and sometimes the three tattoos were combined.

This irregularity in the application of facial tattoos leads us to suppose that this tattooing is more a matter of vanity for the women of these various tribes than a practice imposed by the usages and customs, while for the men this artificial deformation is a true distinguishing mark imposed by local tradition.

M 304 Among the Ipanga and Batitu, tattoos include designs on the face and on the breastbone. The chest tattoo consists of a vertical line of small linear scars, obliquely parallel and slightly bent running from the top of the breastbone to the navel. To the left and right of this main line, we see a double row of small oblique lines separated from each other by a space from one to three centimeters wide. The facial tatto consists of a double or triple row of oblique lines, arranged in such a way that they look like palm leaves, and a small cross formed by short, curved incisions at the root of the nose. According to a photograph sent by Mr. Timmermans, this same type of tattoo is also found among 304

the Yaelima. We ought to note in this connection that in the course of our journey [196] through this region we did not observe this anywhere, despite numerous investigations. We therefore believe that an error was made in transmitting the information. The persons involved were probably Ipanga-Batitu who happened to be in the Yaelima region.

304 154 The tattoos of Ipanga and Batitu women differ considerably from those of the men, except for the facial designs. The lines of small dots that we observed and described for the women among the western peoples are quite widespread throughout the region. On certain women these scars are not only found on the abdomen and upper thighs, but they decorate the whole body and sometimes even the arms.

In the region of the Oshwe sector, especially near the eastern limits of the territory occupied by the Batitu, we encountered, moreover, several women whose tattoos were notably different from those of their sisters to the west. The palm-leaf designs on the temples are replaced by a series of concentric circles around a small dot in strong relief. This dot is placed half-way between the eye and the ear. These women were probably not natives of the region. In our opinion, they had come in through trade or even through abduction. They probably belonged to the Bokala or Yaelima tribe, although we were unable to get confirmation of this from the natives. Among these [195] latter tribes, tattooing is very much in fashion. The women in particular seem to be very fond of this type of ornamentation.

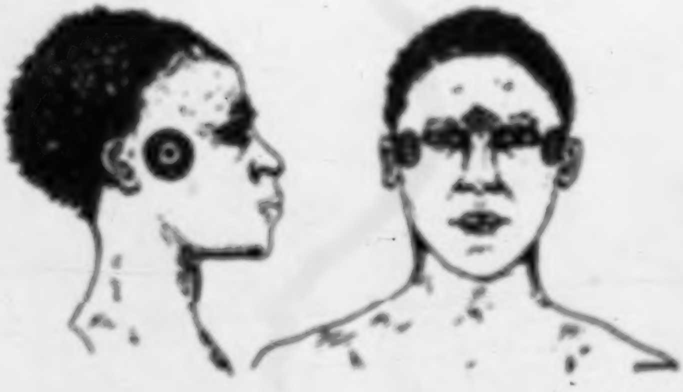

Fig. 119. Tattoos of the Lake Leopold II Tribes.

304 The designs are so many and varied that we could not attempt to provide a detailed description of them. We believe that we may divide them, on the whole, into three main classes or categories.

1) The racial or tribal tattoo.

Yaelima

This consists of a set of small curves drawn above the root of the nose, similar to those we previously noted among the Ipanga-Batitu, but usually sharper and more pronounced. This identical and characteristic motif seems to establish an affinity between these two groups, but it must be noted that the motif on the temples varies considerably from one region to another. Here we find again the rosette of the peoples of Lake Leopold II, although much larger. The concentric circles cover the temples, and very often they extend over a wider area as arcs, always concentric, are added above the cheeks. 304

Both men and women have adopted this tattoo.

2) Sexual tattoos, reserved for women. 304

These consist of scars in relief which are found on all parts of the body from just above and between the breasts to the middle of the thighs. 833

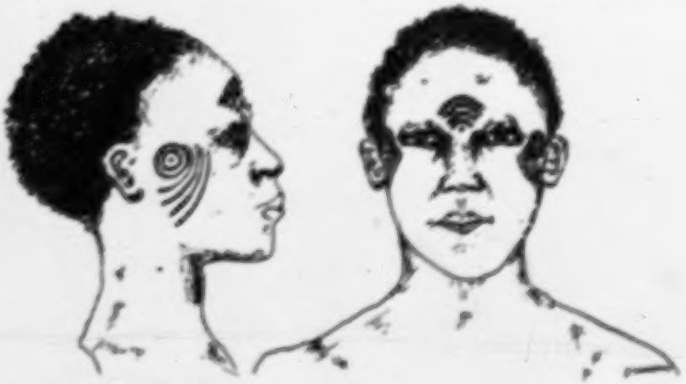

Fig. 120. Bokala-Yaelima Tattoos.

3) Ornamental or coquettish tattoos. [196] 304

These extend irregularly over all the other parts of the body, including the arms and back.

The tattoos in the second category form a series of concentric, rounded triangles whose tip is actually the mons Veneris. 304 833

The designs between the breasts and the navel vary considerably from one person to another. The rosettes and palm-leaf motif clearly predominate. The man does not use this type of tattoo, but the woman, on the other hand, takes a great deal of 833 pains with it, from which we may conclude that her chief aim is a heightening of sensation in sexual relations.

304

M
304 The motifs or designs in the third category are extremely varied [197] and most irregular, as we noted earlier. Aside from the concentric rosette, we saw the most varied designs: small dots, stippled lines, crescents, diamond shapes, palm-leaf motifs, and other figures cross, cut into each other, are superimposed on each other, and are mixed in such a way that the scars seem to have been scattered at random all over the body.

Men and women both have adopted these designs, but the woman seems to be especially fond of them. In this respect the Bokala and Yaelima differ sharply from their neighbors to the west, but seem to resemble closely the tribes to the east, especially the peoples of the Dekese region. Photographs sent by Mr. Van den Broeck and designated as Dengese show us the undeniable likeness of their tattoo designs and those of the Yaelima. Among the Dengese, however, the designs are generally more symmetrical, and the rosette on the temple is smaller and usually framed by two or three lines of small dots, one of which sometimes extends into the forehead. Another figure, no less characteristic, consists of [198] a band of three parallel lines drawn in such a way as to form the native imbolo, which looks like two eights joined horizontally.

This motif is usually drawn above the navel and on the arm, and it is found almost exclusively on women.

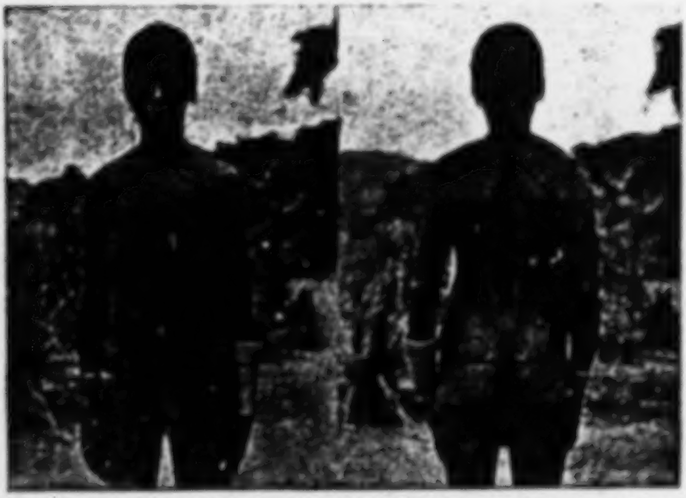

Fig. 123. Tattoos of the Bokala-Yaelima Woman, Front and Back.

Finally, the small scarified dots which adorn the neck of certain Dengese women show us that they are related as much to the eastern peoples as to their neighbors to the west.

The characteristic tattoo of the women of the Bena Dibele-Kole region, Basongo-Meno as well as Bankutshu, consists precisely of these sets of small scarified dots adorning the neck, temples, and forehead. To this must be added the design very often drawn on the upper arm. This motif, consisting of three broken parallel lines arranged in the form of a diamond with the sides shifted out of place, may be justly regarded as a special characteristic of this region.

D M 304 Tattoos on the chest and the upper and lower abdomen are less uniformly worn by the women of this region, but where they do exist the design is always outstandingly symmetrical. It is formed by small juxtaposed dots in strong relief.

M 304 171 To sum up, we believe that we may divide the racial tattoos of the various populations we visited into four groups.

The first consists of the tattoo of the Bateke-Banfumungu-Baboma, made with a comb.

The second is characterized by the rosette on the temples and the semi-concentric crest at the root of the nose, and this includes all the riparian peoples of Lake Leopold II and the Lukenie, with the exception of the Ipanga-Batitu.

The third group is distinguished by the semi-concentric crest at the root of the nose and the palm-leaf designs at the temples, which we observed among the Ipanga-Batitu and up to the Bokala region.

Lastly, the fourth group is marked by the small, raised dots with which the woman of the Bena Dibele-Kole region adorns her neck and forehead, as well as by the characteristic figure on the upper arm.

We have noted earlier that, thanks to photographs by Mr. Van den Broech, we were able to verify the fact that the peoples of the Dekese sector are related particularly to their western neighbors as far as tattooing is concerned, although they [199] show strong resemblances to the eastern tribes. Their territory, therefore, should be regarded as a mixed zone or an area of transition between the two ethnic groups.

The study of the different figures of ornamental tattooing permits us to subdivide the region we visited into two large provinces.

The first one includes all the peoples who have few ornamental tattoos, and these few are not very elaborate. In this case, there are no true figures involved, for the tattoos invariably consist of small dots aligned horizontally.

This region extends from Leopoldville to Oshwe.

The second one includes the tribes with highly elaborate ornamental tattoos. This province covers the rest of the region we visited, and its major center is the Yaelima region. The study

Yaelima

304 171 we made of the many figures we saw in this region showed us that the variations are so numerous, so diverse, and so closely intertwined that it is totally impossible to use this as a basis for determining ethnic sectors with clearly-defined characteristics.

304 171 833 Finally, if we consider only those tattoo figures to which we attributed, if not a familial origin, at least a familial nature [200] (incitement to sexual relations), we see that throughout the region this type of tattoo is peculiar to women.

Fig. 124. Yaelima Headdress and Tattooing. Typical Longomo or Dignitary.

From Leopoldville to the confines of Batitu territory and even among some Bokala women, this tattoo consists (where it still exists) of a number of small, aligned dots, just like the ornamental tattoos.

Among the Ipanga-Batitu, these figures sometimes embellish the arms and part of the back, while among the other tribes they are less elaborate.

304 171 833 In the region of the Yaelima, Dengese, and some of the Bokala, this tattoo consists of a series of broken, concentric lines with the pubic region as the main center.

We do not know if this tattoo is also worn by the Basongo-Meno and Bankutshu women, but this seems probable to us. We can, however, assert that among those peoples this tattoo does not extend to the upper thighs, except for one or two lines of small incised dots running parallel to the fold of the groin.

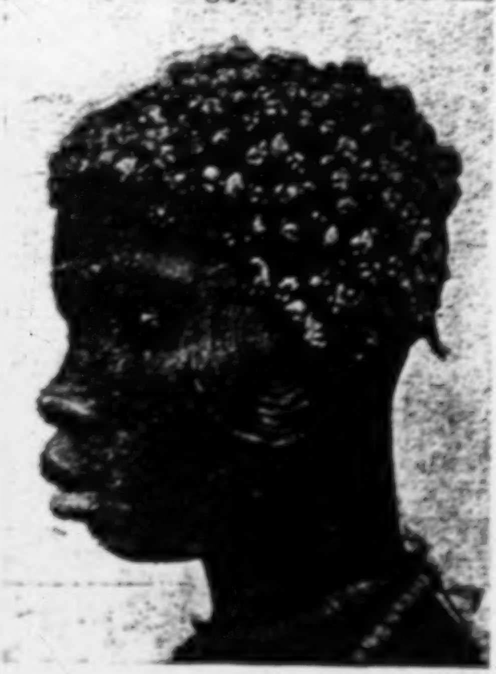

Fig. 125. Yaelima Tattoing and Headdress Adorned with Peanuts Smeared with Ngula.

The incisions for ornamental and sexual tattoos are usually made by women, although a man sometimes takes over this task.

304 The operation is carried out at very irregular intervals and at practically any [201] time of life. Moreover, it requires several sittings, usually spaced from 10 to 15 days apart.

The tattooing knife, which is also used for depilation, consists of a small, broad iron blade with a curved, very sharp cutting edge.

M 304 The patient is seated. The operator draws the designs or motifs on the body with mpembe. He pinches the skin between his left thumb and forefinger and makes the line with a sharp blow of the lancet. The wound is sprinkled with powdered charcoal, mpembe, and a powder made of dried and crushed tree bark. This mixture slows the healing process. The operation is repeated three or four times until the relief of the raised scars is deemed sufficiently pronounced.

T 5 304 Among the Bateke, Banfumungu, and Baboma, facial tattoos are obtained by scratching or scraping the skin with a sort of iron comb with relatively broad, dull teeth. The operation requires only one sitting among these peoples, and the wounds are not powdered. These two procedures are explained by the difference in these tribes between racial tattoos and the scarified ornamental figures worn by the women. The former are ordinary cicatrized wounds; the latter are raised scars.

M 304 The racial tattoos are always made prior to the other figures. In 1913-14 boys and girls were compelled to have them inscribed before they reached marriageable age.

The familial tattoos are usually begun some time before the girl's marriage, and they are quickly elaborated during the last few weeks preceding the union.

As for the coquettish tattoos or ornamental figures, there seems to be no rule regarding the age at which they are applied. Sometimes even an old woman will not hesitate to acquire new incisions.

M 304 178 It is probable that the custom of tattooing will soon disappear among these peoples. The spread of the principles of European civilization will invariably suppress this primitive custom. [202]

We were able, moreover, to observe this trend during our visit to the villages of the houseboys, laborers, and soldiers of Leopoldville, Kinshasa, and other large centers. In these villages, the children and even the young men are no longer tattooed. The young girls are tattooed only slightly, and in general they have incisions only on the lower abdomen. Racial tattoos are totally lacking. On the other hand, in the villages of the interior, less influenced by the principles of civilization, 304 178 tattoos are very much in vogue at the present time. We concede that the custom of tattooing is now at its height in the region we visited.

It is probable that this custom will not long survive our penetration.

304 174 It would be very difficult to determine the approximate time of its introduction into the life of these natives. We believe, however, that we may regard racial tattoos as one of the ethnic characteristics peculiar to the contemporary culture and not as a specific custom of the ancestral civilization, transmitted from generation to generation and preserved or even elaborated by each one. The clearest proof of this fact comes from our observations of the present generation of old men. As a rule they have no racial tattoos. The old women who have no [203] trace of ornamental or ethnic tattooing are rarer. Ornamental incisions are more often lacking than tribal scars, and we encountered only rare cases where the sexual tattoos were lacking.

174 These facts prove that when the elders of the present generation were young, tattooing, if it was customary, was practiced with some regularity only by the women and originally had an essentially familial character in this region.

304
152 A woman bears the pain of the incisions without showing the least sign of suffering, without a complaint or a sigh. She even submits to this custom with some joy, mixed with a bit of pride, knowing that she will be held in higher esteem by the man.

This point, in our opinion, is much more important to the women among primitive peoples than one would generally suppose. It appears to us to be the leitmotiv of the major part of the variations that we observed in the grooming of the native woman.

The anxiety to please, the wishes of the man, these lead the woman to seek constantly the means that would enable her to be tattooed as soon and as often as possible. This natural desire and inner necessity are the reasons why the woman stoically bears all the torture, all the suffering. In primitive life the sexual side naturally is dominant. In this way we can explain, and in a way understand, why tattooing in the beginning was the exclusive appanage of the woman in this region and how she came to decorate the sexual organ and its immediate vicinity in order subsequently to display it; covering nearly all the body with decorations came about, perhaps, simply through coquetry.

VOLUME I.

Préface.

Les notes publiées aujourd'hui comme travail de début dans la nouvelle série de vulgarisation des Annales du Musée du Congo Belge, résultent des observations que nous avons faites au cours de la mission ethnographique dont nous avons été chargés en 1913. Elles paraissent un peu tardivement à cause de l'impossibilité de mettre nos observations au point pendant la grande guerre.

Nous avons parcouru toute la région qui s'étend entre le le Kasai, le Congo et le Kwango, visité les populations de la région du Lac Léopold II, de la Lukenie et Bas Sankuru-Kasai, passé par plus de deux cents villages situés à l'intérieur de la forêt Equatoriale, et pris contact avec certaines populations restées en grande partie en dehors de toute influence étrangère et jusqu'à un certain point hostiles à la civilisation Européenne ou même en révolte contre elle.

[p. II is blank]

Le but principal de notre voyage était la récolte de collections ethnographiques pour le Musée du Congo Belge. En conséquence nous n'avons guère séjourné longtemps dans une même agglomération et nos documents se rapportent essentiellement à la vie matérielle, aux industries, aux arts et métiers et plus rarement aux coutumes familiales et religieuses des indigènes.

Nous avons ramené quantité d'objets ethnographiques, près de 1500 photographies et récolté autant que possible des collections de sciences naturelles. Déjà la valeur de ces dernières a été partiellement mise en relief par une série de notices publiées dans la Revue Zoologique Africaine. Citons au passage l'étude intitulée « Odonates récoltés dans la région du Lac Léopold II » par le Dr. H. Schouteden, comprenant en dehors de divers spécimens très intéressants, deux espèces nouvelles ; l'étude du professeur Lonnberg sur les singes du Musée du Congo Belge., etc.

Une partie des documents photographiques a été utilisée pour l'illustration du Guide Ethnographique du Musée du Congo Belge, d'autres photographies ont servi de base à la publication de l'Album « Kykjes uit Congo », édité par la ville d'Anvers et distribué à tous les élèves des écoles supérieures de l'enseignement primaire d'Anvers en 1922. Toute l'illustration du présent volume, de même que celle du second qui paraîtra ultérieurement, y a été puisée et la réserve paraît encore suffisante pour servir de base à la formation d'un album de notre expédition que nous espérons pouvoir éditer quand les conditions de publication seront devenues un peu moins onéreuses.

Le principal artisan de cette riche documentation photographique et de la récolte des collections d'histoire naturelle fut Monsieur Philippe Tits, taxidermiste-photographe, adjoint à la mission ethnographique du Congo Central.

Si après avoir parcouru les notes où nous avons condensé la première partie des documents rassemblés au cours de notre expédition, le lecteur juge que nos efforts ont été couronnés de quelque succès, nous tenons à associer à cet hommage notre adjoint, dont l'activité infatigable et le grand dévouement ne nous ont jamais fait défaut.

Nous tenons à remercier également les agents, employés, fonctionnaires de l'accueil sympathique que nous avons reçu au cours de nos voyages, ainsi que de l'aide précieuse, qu'ils nous ont prêtée dans toutes nos recherches. Nous exprimons notre reconnaissance toute spéciale aux Pères de la mission de Wombali et de Bokoro. Nous devons à leur précieux concours, la majeure partie des résultats que nous avons pu acquérir dans la région des Baboma et des Basakata. Pour ces derniers le travail s'annonçait comme particulièrement laborieux et dangereux. Peu avant notre arrivée, le chef territorial en tournée d'inspection dans cette région avait été attaqué par des indigènes. Si malgré ces circonstances désavantageuses nous avons pu pénétrer jusqu'au cœur du territoire des Basakata en pleine révolte sans autre escorte que nos deux soldats chasseurs et trouver nos deux cents porteurs pour assurer le transport de nos bagages et de nos collections ; si nous avons pu y faire ample récolte d'objets et de documents, c'est grâce au concours d'un missionnaire de la mission de Bokoro, aimé et respecté dans toute la région et au prestige du Rév. P. Denis, fondateur de la mission.

Nous exprimons également notre gratitude à M. Borremans, de Tuas, à M. Lallemand, de Bumbuli et tout particulièrement à M. Molin, de Bongo, pour l'aimable assistance et le précieux concours dont ils nous ont comblés au cours de nos pérégrinations dans leurs territoires. Le mérite des documents précieux que nous avons pu rassembler dans la région si peu connue des Mosengere revient en majeure partie à l'heureuse initiative de M. Molin. Sans sa collaboration il nous eut été impossible de pénétrer jusqu'aux extrêmes limites du territoire des Mosengere et de rassembler toutes les belles collections que nous avons pu expédier au Musée d'une région à peu près inconnue jusqu'à ce jour.

A tous ceux qui nous ont aidé et assisté nous exprimons tous nos remerciments et toute notre reconnaissance.

Dr. J. MAES.

CHAPITRE I.

Le Pays et ses Habitants.

Aspect du pays. — Situation des tribus. — Caractères généraux des indigènes. — Sentiment maternel. — Le féticheur. — Croyances religieuses. — Culte des morts. — Les Mfumu. — La médecine.

La région située entre le Congo, le Kasaï et le Kwango, est couverte de hautes herbes, parsemées d'arbres rabougris ou de quelques petites forêts, dont le dôme de verdure se lève majestueux au dessus d'une plaine sans limites. Le long des rivières s'étend un rideau d'arbres dont la profondeur diminue au fur et à mesure que l'on remonte vers l'intérieur. La route tracée par le passage régulier d'interminables colonnes d'indigènes, marchant à la file indienne, serpente triste et monotone à travers ces plaines légèrement ondulées. À la saison des pluies les graminées, dont les tiges atteignent deux et parfois 2 m. 50 de hauteur, coupent la vue ; à la saison sèche, les herbes, détruites par les feux de brousse ont fait place à une plaine jaune noirâtre d'où toute vie semble bannie. De temps en temps, éloignés les uns des autres de 30 et parfois de 40 kilomètres, nous rencontrons un groupement de huttes entourées de quelques champs de manioc, de bananeraies et parfois de petites cultures de maïs et d'arachides. A notre arrivée les hommes nous regardent avec nonchalance, les femmes méfiantes se cachent dans leurs huttes ou se réfugient dans la forêt et les plantations, les enfants moins timides nous dévisagent avec l'insouciance caractéristique de leur âge.

FIG. 1. — En route dans la brousse et la savane de la Lukenie.

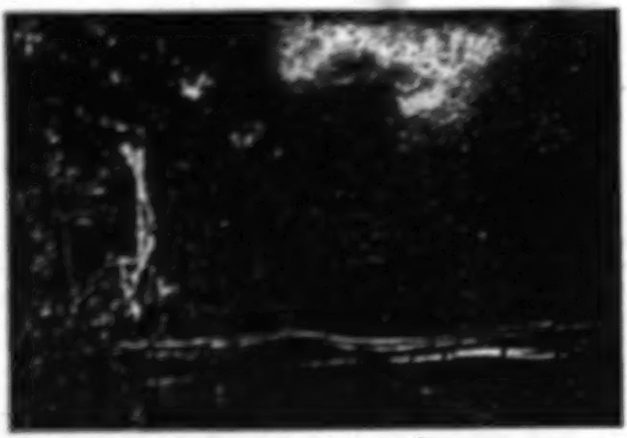

FIG. 2. — Dans la forêt Équatoriale.

Au delà du Kasai, dans la région de la Mfimi, au Lac Léopold II et le long de la Lukenie, la brousse fait place à la forêt, humide, marécageuse, sombre et mystérieuse.

Au confluent de la Mfimi et du Kasai s'étend à perte de vue une immense région marécageuse, dénudée de toute végétation arborescente, entrecoupée d'innombrables canaux, étroits et peu profonds à la saison sèche, larges au point de couvrir à peu près toute la région à la saison des pluies. Les quelques groupements d'indigènes qui habitent cette région ont construit leurs villages le long de la rivière sur un espace de terrain surélevé, à l'abri des inondations périodiques.

Dans la région forestière, les villages semblent semés au grand hasard.

Les huttes sont construites au milieu d'une large clairière, encadrées de cultures de manioc et de bananes que borde au loin la forêt non débroussée.

Telle est la région que nous avons parcourue du Stanley Pool au Kasai-Kwango, de la Mfimi au Lac Léopold II et dans tout le bassin de la Lukenie.

Les premières populations que nous y avons rencontrées appartiennent au groupe des Bateke. Leur territoire s'étend autour du Stanley Pool et remonte au Nord jusqu'à la Lufimi. Au delà habitent les Banfumungu, également appelés Banfunguna, Banfumeke, Bawumbu, ou simplement Banfumu.

Fig. 3. — Femme et enfant Bateke

Au nord du Kasai et le long des rives du Congo, habitent les Bayanzi ou Babangi. Leurs voisins de l'Est, les Baboma ou Babuma, occupent toute la région du confluent de la Mfimi et du Kasai, jusqu'à la rive gauche du Bas Kwango.

Les Wadia habitent au Nord des Baboma entre Nioki, Kutu et remontent le long de la Bosiempa et la rive occidentale du Lac Léopold II jusqu'au territoire des Mosengere.

Sur la rive gauche de la Lukenie-Mfimi entre Bokoro et Moleke, s'étend la région occupée par les Basakata.

Les Mosengere ou Musengere sont établis le long de l'Ubanga-Lele dans la région de Bongo. Au nord-ouest de ceux-ci, nous avons rencontré les Bolaia, dont le territoire dépasse les limites du district du Lac Léopold II.

Les Bolia occupent le pays au Nord-Est de Bongo, jusque dans la région de Bolia-Kiri.

Les Tumba vivent le long de toute la rive orientale du Lac Léopold II.

Les Bokala sont les voisins Nord des Bombaia dans la région de Isaka-Tolo.

Les Bolima — Bokote, occupent la rive gauche de la Lukenie entre Bokoro et Pokombo.

Les Ipanga et les Batitu ou Atshitu habitent le secteur d'Oshwe tant au Nord qu'au Sud de la Lukenie. Plus à l'Est entre la Lodima et Bumbuli, s'étend le territoire occupé par les Bokala.

Les Yaelima se rencontrent de l'Est de Bumbuli au secteur de Dekese et jusqu'au pays de Dengese.

Fig. 9. — Bankutshu.

Au confluent du Kasai-Sankuru, sont établis quelques groupes de Bashilele, dont le territoire s'étend bien loin au Sud entre le Kasai et le Loange.

Les Bankutshu également appelés Basongo-Meno, habitent la rive gauche du Sankuru jusque dans le secteur de Bena-Dibele et de Kole.

En général les indigènes ont bonne apparence, les diverses parties du corps sont bien proportionnées, à l'exception des jambes qui, particulièrement chez la femme, sont d'ordinaire peu musclées, trop longues et rarement bien formées. La taille moyenne varie de 1 m. 65 à 1 m. 70. Chose curieuse, au Kasai, au Lac Léopold II, dans la Lukenie et jusqu'au secteur d'Oshwe, la taille moyenne de la femme dépasse légèrement celle de l'homme. Ailleurs la femme est généralement plus petite et il est rare d'en rencontrer dont la taille dépasse 1 m. 68.

Au point de vue physiologique, les populations Batetela-Bankutshu, sont incontestablement supérieures à leurs voisins de l'Est. La sensibilité physique est notablement inférieure à la nôtre. Leur résistance à la faim, à la soif, aux privations et à la fatigue des longues marches est remarquable. L'acuité de l'ouïe et de la vue contraste singulièrement avec le peu de développement du goût, de l'odorat et du toucher. Là où nous ne percevons qu'une masse aux contours peu précis, les indigènes distinguent des formes nettes. Rien ne leur échappe, le moindre bruit, un son très simple sont perçus. En pleine marche ils m'indiquaient les cris des singes qui se disputaient dans les cimes des arbres. Une petite égratignure à un arbre, une branche cassée, l'herbe à peine foulée, quelques traces suffisent pour leur révéler le passage du gibier. Par contre les émanations des marais boueux qui nous écœuraient, l'odeur de la chair en décomposition qui nous répugne, ou l'atmosphère surchargée de fumée épaisse qui remplit les huttes, ne les incommode nullement.

Résistant aux plus grandes fatigues, exécutant des marches forcées avec des charges de vingt à trente kilos, ces indigènes supportent les privations les plus dures sans se plaindre. Quand l'heure du repas est arrivée et que les vivres sont en abondance, ils s'en donnent de plein cœur et mangent d'un appétit qui semble insatiable. Il m'est arrivé plus d'une fois de voir un indigène absorber en un seul repas plus d'un kilogramme de chikwangue et un même poids de viande. Que ces excès occasionnent parfois un certain malaise, nul ne s'en étonnera, mais le plus souvent le noir n'en est pas incommodé.

S'il résiste aux fatigues et aux privations les plus dures, l'indigène supporte moins les variations atmosphériques. Le matin, quand il fait beau, le noir est gai, joyeux et vif. Lorsque la température s'élève et en particulier entre onze et deux heures, il est irrésistiblement porté au « dolce farniente ». À ces moments il recherche l'ombre et la tranquillité. Aux heures de midi, l'animation matinale qui égayait le village a fait place à une quiétude générale. Les champs sont déserts, les enfants se sont réfugiés dans les huttes ou rodent autour de leurs mères, à l'ombre des bananiers ou sous les branches de quelque manguier gigantesque. Les hommes sont dans la forêt ou rassemblés sous le hangar public. Vers trois heures la vie renaît au village, l'animation devient plus grande, la circulation plus intense. Le soir toute la population est sur pied. Les enfants s'adonnent de tout cœur aux jeux et amusements de leur âge. Ils badinent, courent, gesticulent, sautent, crient et s'amusent à qui mieux, mieux. Les femmes agiles et actives, circulent de tous côtés, bavardant à l'infini tout en surveillant la popotte familiale. Les hommes circulent d'un groupe à l'autre, discutant longuement les événements de la journée, ou les préparatifs du lendemain. Puis après le repas, quand la lune brillante monte majestueusement dans la nuit, les indigènes se rassemblent autour des grands foyers, et tous les villageois dansent. Au son des tambours et des chants, le rythme de la danse s'accentue et, toujours plus pressés, ils dansent et ils chantent sans jamais se fatiguer. Quand bien avant dans la nuit, je me retirais sous ma tente las de les voir danser, ils continuaient infatigables jusqu'aux premières brumes du matin!

Fig. 5. — La vie au village des Mongos

Par contre quand il fait froid ou que la pluie tombe à torrents, l'indigène souffre, se courbe, grelotte, s'affaisse. Que de fois je les ai vus, assis près du feu, les jambes repliées contre le corps, les mains jointes, nouées autour des chevilles, le menton appuyé sur les genoux, le regard vide, tristes et silencieux, abrités sous le pauvre toit de ces huttes sombres, tandis qu'au dehors le tonnerre roulait et grondait, que le vent soufflait en ouragan, courbant les cimes des arbres, brisant les géants de la forêt, que d'innombrables éclairs déchiraient la nuit et que l'eau tombait à torrents. À ces moments inoubliables pour nous, l'indigène ne ressent rien de tout ce qui nous étreint. La grandeur, la majesté, la puissance et la beauté de cette nature se révélant au milieu de l'immense forêt séculaire, ne l'impressionnent pas. Il vit sa vie matérielle, il a froid et recroquevillé, il se rapproche de l'âtre pour se réchauffer au pauvre feu de son misérable foyer. Demain, tantôt peut-être, quand l'orage sera passé et que le beau soleil ardent aura séché la terre trempée et ravinée, il se lèvera, sortira péniblement de sa cachette, étendra longuement ses membres engourdis, se redressera, sourira et comme si rien ne s'était passé il dira « m'bolo bosso ». Oui l'orage a passé, le vent dort, la nature est calme, mais dans mon âme il reste quelque chose du spectacle grandiose et inoubliable de la grande tornade sous les tropiques. Chez lui rien, absolument rien, même pas un souvenir !

FIG. 6. -- Vieillards et notables dits Longomo des Yaelima.

Pauvre primitif ! Telle est sa vie, terre à terre, vivant au jour le jour, sans souvenirs du passé, sans espoirs pour l'avenir.

En général l'indigène a un caractère doux, craintif, voire même peureux, mais il n'est pas un lâche. Il est peu susceptible, aime à badiner, à jouer et se querelle avec animation. Eloquent en certaines circonstances, il a la manie des longs discours et des plaidoyers interminables. Appelé à défendre une cause ou à soutenir ses intérêts, il est d'une ténacité rare, n'hésitant pas à remonter au plus lointain de ses souvenirs pour vous convaincre du bien fondé de sa cause.

Combien de fois ne me suis-je pas amusé à écouter leurs explications interminables. Assis dans ma chaise longue, les plaideurs devant moi encadrés par une multitude de curieux qui s'amusaient passionnément aux discours de ces avocats improvisés, j'aimais à écouter leurs palabres. Ils y discutaient non seulement les faits, mais ils faisaient appel aux lois, us et coutumes de la tribu, pour mieux défendre leur cause. Puis quand la sentence était rendue et qu'elle répondait à la logique de leurs lois primitives, l'auditoire tout entier acclamait le juge improvisé.

Fig. 9. — Un orage sous les tropiques.

L'indigène a le sentiment de la justice. Il sait à certain moment reconnaître ses fautes, ses torts et se soumet stoïquement aux punitions qui lui sont appliquées. Quoique par sa nature il soit porté au vol, je dois reconnaître qu'au cours de mon voyage, les délits furent rares. Entre eux ils respectent le bien d'autrui. Les lois indigènes punissent très sévèrement le vol. Vis à vis du blanc la mentalité est tout autre. Voler les biens des « Mondele » c'est faire preuve d'une grande habileté et d'audace, à condition de ne pas se faire surprendre. Quel est le blanc qui n'a pas été victime de ces larcins, où tabac, sel, col, chemises, etc. s'égarent comme par enchantement. S'il n'y prend garde à temps, petit à petit tout son équipement y passera ! Personnellement nous avons appris à nos dépens combien peu l'on doit se fier à l'honnêteté de ces serviteurs improvisés que l'on appelle Boys. Un jour un indigène fut surpris en flagrant délit de vol. Vertement admonesté, il nous explique naïvement. Je n'ai pas volé « Mondele ». Voler c'est prendre le bien de Mondele sans qu'il le sache ! Vous avez vu que je prenais votre bien donc je ne l'ai pas volé !

L'indigène a le caractère peu franc et peu loyal. Dire la vérité, à moins qu'il n'y ait tout intérêt, lui semble peu recommandable. Le faire quand il peut y perdre, lui paraît illogique, je dirai même absurde.

En général l'indigène est indifférent au malheur d'autrui. Extérieurement il manifestera une commisération trop bruyante, imposé par la coutume. En réalité il ne s'occupe de son voisin que pour autant qu'il croit y trouver un avantage. Au cours de mon voyage j'ai eu l'occasion d'assister, à plusieurs reprises, à ces scènes extraordinaires qui suivent le décès d'un indigène. Lors de notre séjour au village du chef Pokoi, tribu Ekonda, un des notables vint à mourir. Le décès donna lieu à une grande cérémonie de deuil, tel que le veut la coutume. Toute la réserve de poudre du décédé avait servi à annoncer sa mort aux villages voisins. La douleur se fit jour par des manifestations les plus bruyantes et les plus inattendues. Les sanglots des femmes, les cris de désespoir des parents, les chants plaintifs des pleureuses, se mêlaient au roulement du tambour et aux cris gutturaux et incohérents des hommes, qui s'enivraient consciencieusement pour mieux manifester leur douleur. Toutes ces manifestations sont de la comédie. La douleur criée, hurlée est officielle et toute

Fig. [illegible]. — Danse de deuil au village du chef Pokoi Ekonda de commande. Les Baafomongo, pleurent au décès d'un voisin comme ils vont à la chasse, les femmes se lamentent et crient comme elles préparent les repas. Tout se fait comme un autre travail, parce que c'est la coutume, parce que c'est chose obligatoire.

Après les premières manifestations de deuil, vint l'inhumation. Le défunt fut enterré assez loin du village. Sur la tombe, les indigènes déposèrent une grande partie de sa fortune, des casseroles, des théières, des coffres, des poteries, un parapluie, etc., le tout préalablement mis hors d'usage. Toute la cérémonie était précédée de très copieuses libations de vin de palme et de bière de canne à sucre. Tous les invités, se firent un devoir d'y faire le plus d'honneur possible et les funérailles se transformèrent rapidement en une scène d'ivresse générale.

Les femmes du village restaient exclues des libations. Elles venaient de temps à autre, jusqu'à la hutte du défunt, y entraient pendant 15 à 20 minutes, y pleuraient et se lamentaient au plus fort, puis s'en retournaient bien tranquillement à leur besogne. De vraie douleur, de chagrin réel, il n'y avait aucune trace! Les Baafomongo n'attachent en ces circonstances de l'importance qu'aux apparences.

Il arrive cependant que l'indigène se sente réellement affecté par le décès d'un membre de sa famille. La mère en particulier, souffre de la mort de ses enfants, surtout s'ils viennent à lui être enlevés dans la première enfance. Le père sera plus affecté de la perte d'une fille, car elle constitue une partie de sa fortune. Au décès d'un enfant, de l'époux ou de ses frères maternels, la femme se couvre le corps de terre glaise plus ou moins blanche. Ce n'est point la terre blanche dite « mpembe » mais une boue gluante, qui donne à la femme un aspect plutôt désagréable pour ne pas dire répugnant. Le plus souvent le pagne traditionnel est remplacé par de grossières loques, trempées dans la même boue et de branches de feuillages attachées à la ceinture.

L'enfant en général, ne déplore que très peu la perte de ses parents. S'ils viennent à mourir, quand il est jeune, les frères et sœurs de sa mère ou de son père, prennent soin de lui et il jouira chez eux des mêmes droits, que sous le toit maternel. Si ses parents meurent vieux, il n'est que très peu affecté par leur perte et sauf les grandes lignes blanches, que les femmes se tracent sur le front, les bras et la bouche après le grand deuil, leur souvenir ne survivra que très peu.

À notre arrivée au village de Pongo, une jeune fille venait de mourir. Toute la nuit et le lendemain ce ne furent que cris et lamentations interminables. Les femmes du village arrivaient les unes après les autres dans la hutte mortuaire, se groupaient autour du cadavre et entonnaient leur chant de deuil, mélancolique, sombre et monotone. Au bout de 10 à 20 minutes, elles sortaient l'air dégagé, insouciantes et indifférentes tandis que d'autres pleureuses les remplaçaient. Seule, la mère pleurait son enfant et sa douleur moins bruyante et moins tapageuse était sincère, réelle et profonde.

Au village de Tik-ke-Tik, dans la région des Yaelima, nous fûmes témoins d'une scène analogue, à la suite du décès d'un jeune homme.

À la tombée de la nuit le corps fut enroulé dans des nattes en éclats de rotang, solidement tressées, ficelées et complètement fermées. À l'aurore le ballot mortuaire, attaché à une forte branche fut levé par deux hommes. Au lieu de prendre la rue du village le cadavre fut porté derrière la hutte puis au travers de la brousse. Quelques hommes marchant à la file indienne formèrent le cortège, terminé par la mère en toilette de deuil. La route suivie fut très irrégulière. Évitant surtout les chemins tracés, les porteurs revenaient souvent en arrière, et mirent près de deux heures pour arriver au cimetière situé à 4 km. du village.

Au retour les indigènes m'expliquèrent que ces nombreux crochets et le passage au travers de la brousse sauvage avait pour but d'égarer le mauvais esprit qui avait pénétré au village et frappé le jeune homme !

Le sentiment de l'amour maternel, existe chez la femme indigène. Grand fut le bonheur, de la mère de notre dévoué Nkasa, lorsqu'elle apprit son retour au pays. Elle avait pleuré le départ de son enfant enlevé pour la milice, et pendant sept ans, elle en avait conservé le souvenir. Aujourd'hui elle le retrouvait, grand, beau, fort, et au service d'un « Mundele na Bula matari ». Oh combien elle était heureuse de son retour !

Les indigènes aiment et respectent la vieillesse. Dans tous les villages, nous avons observé le fait. Les vieillards étaient l'objet de l'attention de la jeunesse. Leurs conseils étaient écoutés, leurs leçons suivies, leur autorité incontestablement établie et respectée. Les vieillards étaient les notables du village, les « Lomposo » de l'endroit, les amis des enfants. Les infirmes aussi étaient respectés et bien traités.

Chez les Bambamunga de la région de Bokala, nous avons rencontré une malheureuse, devenue aveugle à la suite d'une grave maladie. Elle était à charge de la communauté. Elle se rendait utile, autant que son état le lui permettait, mais elle n'était astreinte à aucun travail. Loin d'être exposée aux railleries et tracasseries des enfants, elle était leur amie et l'objet des soins et de la bienveillante attention de toutes les femmes du village.

Le respect des infirmes et des estropiés est d'ailleurs d'usage, même chez les Batua : pygmées dont nous avons visité quelques villages situés le long de la Lokoro et aux environs d'Inongo. Nous y avons rencontré un Batua estropié, qui ne pouvait marcher qu'en soulevant le pied au moyen de la main. Incapable de subvenir à ses besoins, pouvant à peine se rendre utile, il ne manquait cependant de rien, participait à toutes les fêtes, était admis à toutes les palabres et vivait au milieu de ses frères primitifs, aimé et respecté par tous.

Fig. 13. — Un albinos au marché indigène de [illegible]

Cependant il est bien rare de rencontrer, chez les indigènes, des infirmes ou des estropiés. Les enfants nés difformes, débiles et moins bien préparés à la lutte, succombent en général très rapidement, malgré les soins dont les entoure leur mère. On comprend que dans cette lutte âpre, abandonné à ses propres ressources, sans moyens de défense contre les nombreux dangers qui l'entourent, le guettent et le poursuivent, le petit noir ne peut survivre que lorsque la nature l'a doté d'une constitution solide. De là, cette grande mortalité infantile que l'on observe chez les primitifs et la beauté des types que nous rencontrons si fréquemment dans ces régions.

Les déformations naturelles sont rares.

Nous avons observé quelques cas de déformation des seins, d'éléphantiasis, de goitre, de lèpre et d'hermaphroditisme.

Le but principal de notre mission, étant l'étude des us et coutumes de la vie matérielle et journalière de l'indigène et la récolte de collections, notre séjour au milieu des différentes tribus, a été de trop courte durée, pour pouvoir étudier à fond leur vie religieuse et les coutumes qui s'y rapportant.

Fig. 19. — Déformations naturelles chez l'indigène.
1° Femme [illegible]. 2° Femme [illegible]. 3° Enfant [illegible].

Nous avons constaté, qu'en général l'indigène admet l'existence d'un esprit supérieur. Lors de mon séjour au village de Kapenda, tribu des [illegible] j'eus l'occasion d'interroger le chef à ce sujet.

Qui donc fait lever le soleil et la lune ? Qui vous donne les poissons de la rivière et les animaux de la plaine, Matali ?

Le chef me regarde un instant interloqué, puis répondit, « Nzambi va Mondele » ? N'est-ce pas « Nzambi », blanc !

Pourquoi ne vous adressez vous pas à « Nzambi », pour protéger vos cultures, favoriser la pêche et vous donner une bonne chasse, Matali ?

Voudrait-il nous aider, Mondele ?

Pourquoi pas ?

N'est-il pas exclusivement bon, esprit Batali ?

S'il est si bon, ne doit-il pas vous écouter, Batali ?

Les malheurs ne vous viennent-ils pas des Ndoki (esprits), Mondele ?

Mais, Nzambi n'est-il donc pas assez puissant pour écarter ces Ndoki, Batali ?

Les Ndoki ne sont-ils pas envoyés contre celui qui a fait du mal à un autre ? Nzambi serait-il encore bon, s'il écartait le Ndoki, qui punit le malfaiteur ? Va Mondele, Va ! Nzambi est bon, il ne fait que du bien, pourquoi l'invoquer ?

Cette petite conversation résume la conception, que se fait l'indigène de l'Être suprême. C'est par lui qu'il explique ce qu'il ne peut comprendre, mais il ne lui consacre aucun culte. Tout ce qui est profitable à la communauté et dont il ne comprend point l'origine ni la provenance, vient de lui.

A côté de cet esprit, il existe dans l'idée de ces diverses tribus une infinité d'autres esprits, les uns plus forts que les autres, qui tous, s'occupent beaucoup des indigènes. Tous sont bons en ce sens, que ce que l'on obtient d'eux est toujours avantageux à quelqu'un, tout en étant parfois très néfaste à un autre. De là l'indigène a créé les Nkisi et les Ndoki.

Le féticheur est censé pouvoir entrer en relation avec ces esprits. Il détient d'eux d'après les croyances des indigènes, le secret des plantes qui guérissent, ou qui tuent. Il peut obtenir d'eux le châtiment d'un voleur, car punir un voleur, c'est faire du bien à celui qui a été volé. Il peut assurer par leur intermédiaire une bonne pêche, garantir une chasse fructueuse, favoriser l'accouchement, guérir les maladies, etc., ou au contraire faire échouer toutes les entreprises.

Aux yeux de l'indigène tout succès dépend de ces esprits. Dès lors il tâche autant que possible de gagner leurs bonnes grâces. Avant la chasse, la pêche, l'accouchement, etc., il ira trouver le féticheur. Moyennant une rétribution sérieuse, celui-ci invoque les esprits et donne le Nkisi. Si le succès ne répond pas à son attente, l'indigène s'accuse-ra ni le féticheur, ni le Nkisi, mais un Ndoki, plus puissant que le Nkisi invoqué.

Partant de ce principe l'indigène veut expliquer tout, le succès comme l'échec, une maladie, son aggravation, la guérison, les accidents, le malheur, la défaite ou la victoire.

Êtes-vous certains de réussir dans toutes vos entreprises me demanda un jour Elanda, vieux chef des Mosongo?

Oui, lui dis-je, l'énergie et le travail suffisent, pour triompher de tous les obstacles! — Oui Mondele, le blanc est fort, nos Nkisi ne sont pas aussi grands que les Mondele et nous ne pouvons implorer vos Nkisi et vos Ndoki.

Mais Elanda, nous ne connaissons ni Ndoki ni Nkisi

Si, Mondele, le blanc d'Isango nous l'enseigne! Le blanc de Bongo, n'a-t-il pas manqué l'antilope à la suite d'un Ndoki! (Allusion à un incident de chasse du matin).

Elanda ne sait-il pas que ce fut le chien, qui chassa l'antilope au moment où le blanc allait l'abattre!

Qui donc a envoyé le chien! Ndoki ou Mondele? J'eus beau essayer, de lui faire comprendre, qu'il était dans l'erreur. Ndoki, Mondele, me répondit-il, Ndoki, et il s'en tint à son explication.

L'intervention des Nkisi et Ndoki, n'est que temporaire. Après une heureuse entreprise, l'indigène ne s'inquiète plus de l'objet que le féticheur lui remit, pour en assurer le succès. A une occasion prochaine il s'en retourne chez le féticheur, demander un nouveau Nkisi, qu'il voudrait toujours plus puissant que n'importe quel Ndoki. Malheureusement ce Nkisi tout puissant, le féticheur ne peut le trouver. Tel esprit qu'il a invoqué avec succès depuis des années, dont la puissance semblait ne ne pouvoir plus diminuer, se trouve un beau jour en défaut. Cinq, dix, quinze fois le succès a répondu à l'invocation et voilà, que tout à coup, l'entreprise faite, sous les mêmes auspices, échoue lamentablement. Un Nkisi nouveau, plus puissant, est devenu Ndoki et l'indigène s'en retourne chez le féticheur et lui demande de faire mieux, toujours mieux! Abstraction faite de certaines figurines en bois sculpté, utilisées comme fétiche de chasse, la représentation matérielle du « Nkisi » est formée d'un amalgame de choses les plus disparates et les plus hétéroclites, terre blanche, ocre, rouge, ngula, pattes, têtes, becs, ongles et plumes de poules, coquillages, noix de palme, etc., le tout mélangé dans une grande poterie ou un vieux panier usagé. C'est sur ce trésor magique que le féticheur prélève une ou deux pincées qu'il enveloppe soigneusement dans un petit cachet pour le remettre à celui qui a eu recours à son ministère. Quant aux figurines humaines que l'on retrouve si fréquemment dans la forêt du [illegible] et du [illegible] nous ne croyons point que ce soient des fétiches, ce sont à notre avis des figurines protectrices des enfants, sculptées avant la naissance et conservées jusqu'à ce que l'enfant soit devenu adulte.

Certains féticheurs parviennent à se créer une grande réputation et leurs services s'achètent à des hauts prix. Ils connaissent les vertus de certaines plantes ; ils en gardent jalousement le secret et l'exploitent au possible. On aurait tort d'ailleurs de croire que dans la pratique du féticheur tout est mystification.

Fig. 25. — Matériel de [illegible] féticheur des [illegible] de la région de [illegible].

Quelques heures avant notre arrivée à [illegible], [illegible] avait imposé l'épreuve du poison, à une de ses femmes, sur la simple supposition, qu'elle avait pu s'oublier avec un indigène pendant une absence un peu trop prolongée dans la forêt. Elandja l'accusa d'adultère prépara la boisson, et mit la pauvre femme en demeure de prouver son innocence par l'absorption du poison. La malheureuse se refusa. Une dispute s'engagea et les indigènes du village, mis au courant protestèrent. Rien n'y fit. Le vieux tyran imposa l'épreuve. Prévenu de notre arrivée prochaine, il laissa la malheureuse dans d'horribles souffrances pendant près de deux heures, lui administra ensuite un contre poison et cinq heures plus tard, tous les effets du poison avaient disparu.

Fig. [illegible]. — Elandja chef des [illegible], ses deux favorites et ses principaux notables

Grâce à notre influence, les indigènes osaient de résister et de se soustraire au pouvoir tyrannique des grands féticheurs. L'appel fait par un nommé Elandja à l'autorité du chef de secteur, en fut une preuve évidente. Malheureusement les administrateurs, ne jouissaient en 1913-1914 ni d'autorité ni de pouvoirs assez étendus (bien entendu administrativement), pour seconder utilement les indigènes dans leur œuvre d'émancipation. La palabre de [illegible], en fut une triste confirmation. Après avoir entendu les deux partis, il ne nous restait aucun doute sur la culpabilité du vieux chef. Elandja et une grande partie des indigènes du village, demandaient justice au représentant de Bula-Matari. Le chef de secteur dans l'impossibilité d'agir ; dût se contenter de leur promettre de faire rapport à l'administration compétente et Elondja, se retira en lançant, aux récalcitrants protestataires cette apostrophe « moi et moi seul ne suis-je pas le chef » ! Elondja fût à tel point révolté de l'impuissance du représentant de Bula-Matari, qu'il déposa sa médaille de Mfumu na Bula-Matari, en disant : « si le Mundele na Bula-Matari ne peut nous défendre, s'il ne peut nous protéger, à quoi nous sert-il donc d'être chef reconnu, de servir fidèlement Bula-Matari » ?

FIG. 27. — Kakua, chef des [illegible], déporté pour meurtre rituel, et [illegible] dans la région après son retour de l'exil.

Abandonné à ses propres forces l'indigène n'ose se révolter contre l'autocratie tyrannique des chefs-féticheurs.

La puissance morale de ces féticheurs l'accable. Il tremble à l'idée qu'il pourrait devenir l'objet de leur haine et la victime de leur vengeance.

Kakua, Fumu na tsi: c'est-à-dire, chef de la terre de la région d'[illegible], avait été condamné pour meurtre rituel, déporté à [illegible] et dégradé. Au bout de quelques années d'exil, il fut autorisé à rentrer dans son pays. Peu de jours après son retour, sans appui administratif, sans médaille de Bula-Matari, malgré sa dégradation et sa déportation, nonobstant la présence d'un nouveau chef indigène, son successeur légitime reconnu par l'Etat, Kakua, avait regagné toute son autorité et tout son pouvoir !

Il parcourait sans escorte, toute la région des Iyanga-Batéla, du Nord au Sud. Il allait de village en village, accompagné de trois ou quatre hommes et partout les indigènes tremblaient devant lui. Nous l'avons vu, à Longinpolo, annonçant aux indigènes le but de notre voyage, leur indiquant nos intentions et dictant leur attitude à notre égard. Bakon, avait parlé ! Toute la population s'inclinait et obéissait. Un soir il vint me dire : Mondele peut être tranquille, Mondele aura tout ce qu'il voudra, Bakon le veut ! Effectivement, dès le lendemain les indigènes nous apportaient des vivres et des collections. Les femmes étaient rentrées au foyer, les enfants rodaient autour de nous, les hommes se prêtaient à toutes nos demandes.

Tant que ces potentats sont bien disposés à notre égard, nous avons intérêt à nous servir de leur influence pour nous introduire dans la vie indigène, gagner la confiance et la sympathie des populations et asseoir notre autorité sur les bases de l'ancienne civilisation. Nous trouvons alors en eux de précieux collaborateurs et des auxiliaires utiles. Si au contraire, craignant de perdre leur rang et leur influence, ils cherchent à s'opposer à la pénétration et au développement des lois nouvelles, notre oeuvre s'en ressentira. Il est donc de toute nécessité de combattre énergiquement ces ennemis occultes et redoutables.

Nous avons dit plus haut, que l'affection de la mère pour ses enfants et réciproquement, était assez développée chez ces différentes tribus. Par contre l'indigène ne se fait qu'une idée très vague du lien familial qui unit l'époux à l'épouse. Le mari est jaloux de sa femme, mais il ne l'aime pas. Il demandera le châtiment de l'adultère tout comme il cherche à se faire rendre justice d'un vol. La femme c'est un objet, une marchandise, qu'on achète et qu'on utilise, mais qu'on n'affectionne guère. L'unique cas d'amour conjugal que nous ayons observé, est celui du chef Isomo et sa favorite. Ils s'aimaient d'un amour réel, profond, sincère. Malheur à celui qui aurait osé porter la main sur cette femme, chercher à la séduire, tenter de la ravir.

Un jour (ainsi racontent les indigènes) un indigène travailleur du poste d'Oshwe voulut en abuser de force. La malheureuse trop faible pour échapper à l'étreinte de l'audacieux séducteur, se débattit, tout en lançant des cris désespérés. Son appel fut entendu. Armé de son couteau, [illegible] d'[illegible] à son secours. A son arrivée le ravisseur, lâcha sa proie. Une lutte s'engagea entre les deux sauvages. [illegible], cloua l'adversaire au sol. Écumant de rage, couvert de sang, il ramena sa femme au village ; heureux de l'avoir délivrée, fier du châtiment, qu'il venait d'infliger au ravisseur audacieux et coupable.

Fig. [illegible] — Femme [illegible], la grande favorite de [illegible], grand chef des [illegible].

En général les indigènes ont un certain culte des morts. Dans la région des [illegible], le cadavre est enroulé dans des étoffes. Plus grand est le ballot et plus important fut le défunt. Toute sa fortune en étoffe passe, avec lui au tombeau. Avant l'enterrement, le mort reste exposé, dans la hutte mortuaire. Les parents, amis et connaissances, le veillent et se relaient à ce devoir. Nuit et jour les chants plaintifs et monotones, commémorent les hauts faits du défunt, sa gloire, ses qualités, ses richesses, sa puissance, toute sa vie. L'enterrement se fait en grande cérémonie et se clôture par une consommation générale de toute la réserve de vin de palme, manioc et malafu.

Les cimetières sont situés en dehors du village. Sur la tombe, les parents déposent, quelques ustensiles brisés ; si le défunt fut chasseur réputé, ils y planteront un long bâton au sommet duquel ils fixent le crâne de l'un ou l'autre animal tué par le défunt.

Lors de mon séjour dans la région des Baloma-Bonfumu de Bokala, je fus frappé par la présence au milieu du village du chef Pokei, d'une hutte miniature. Elle pouvait avoir 60 centimètres de haut, 30 centimètres de large 50 centimètres de long. Je crus d'abord à un petit poulailler, mais en m'en approchant, je constatais, que cette hutte, était remplie de petits bibelots. Intrigué, j'interroge une femme, qui depuis un moment rodait autour de moi.

Fig. 19. — La veillée des morts chez les [illegible]. Le corps du défunt est exposé [illegible] de la hutte mortuaire entouré de tissus et [illegible] un grand [illegible].

N'est ce pas la maison de mon enfant ? me dit-elle !

Où donc est-il ton enfant ?

N'est-il pas là ? et en même temps elle me montra un petit panier suspendu à quelques pas de la hutte.

Je m'en rapproche, incrédule, et quel ne fut ma surprise ; dans ce panier se trouvait la momie d'un enfant de deux ans environ. Le corps était complètement desséché. En dessous du panier la mère, avait entretenu pendant des mois et des mois un petit feu pour enfumer, dessécher et conserver son enfant.

Je voulus faire enlever le panier et acheter la petite hutte avec l'ensemble des menus objets dont elle était ornée. La femme protesta vivement ; les indigènes accoururent de toute part et le vieux chef, me donna l'explication de [ce] rassemblement inattendu.

Si vous enlevez l'enfant, qu'adviendra-t-il de son frère ? Son souffle ne s'en ira-t-il pas ? Pourra-t-il vivre ici lorsque l'esprit sera loin ? Non Mundele, non ! Voyez Mundele, voyez cette enfant me dit-il en désignant un garçonnet de 3 à 4 ans, lui et elle, (montrant le panier à la momie), sont nés de la même mère, au même jour. L'esprit de la vie fut partagé entre eux deux ! L'un est mort ! L'esprit est resté auprès de nous dans son frère, il y restera tant que le corps du défunt est parmi nous ! Voilà pourquoi nous conservons ce corps ! Quand l'enfant sera adulte, quand il pourra vivre de ses propres forces, la momie sera portée dans la forêt où elle se perdra, car son esprit vivra tout entier dans l'enfant devenu homme !

Dans la région des Mosengere, l'enfant défunt des jumeaux est enterré à proximité du village, le long de la route principale. Son corps reste en quelque sorte dans la vie de la communauté. L'endroit est marqué par un petit arbrisseau, une butte minuscule et quelques menus objets déposés sur la tombe. Le corps y reste tant que le second enfant n'est pas adulte. L'esprit doit rester dans le village disent les indigènes. Si le second des jumeaux vient à mourir, les parents déterrent le premier où ils détachent le panier à la momie et les deux corps sont déposés dans une même tombe.

La croyance à la survivance de l'esprit de la vie, de l'un des jumeaux dans le second est telle, que malgré tous mes efforts, malgré mes offres les plus attrayantes, je n'ai pu obtenir, ni les bibelots, ni le panier. La mère se serait fait tuer, plutôt que de laisser enlever ces reliques !

Les indigènes admettent l'existence de l'âme ou d'un esprit qui survit au corps. Cette âme doit occuper d'après les croyances locales dans la vie nouvelle, une situation équivalente à celle de la vie terrestre. Voilà pourquoi les chefs ordonnaient les sacrifices d'esclaves et de femmes, sur la tombe des notables ; et l'enterrement des victimes dans la même fosse que leur maître. Nous avons cherché à avoir de plus amples détails à ce sujet, mais ce fût en vain. Cette coutume barbare si elle ne se pratique plus à l'heure actuelle fut encore en honneur il y a peu d'années. Ce fut pour un délit de ce genre que Kakua fut condamné à Inongo il y a quelque temps. A la mort d'un des grands Longomo, conseiller principal du chef, Kakua avait fait jeter les trois plus jeunes esclaves et deux jeunes femmes dans la fosse du Longomo. A l'interrogatoire il ne nia point le fait mais l'expliqua en faisant appel à la coutume des ancêtres et à la nécessité de donner à l'esprit du Longomo défunt des compagnons pour rentrer dans la vie des esprits et lui permettre d'y occuper une place en rapport avec la situation qu'il avait de son vivant dans son village.

L'organisation tant sociale que politique des indigènes, est souvent très compliquée.

Chez les Bateke-Babomo, chaque groupe ou village, dépend de l'autorité du chef local. Point d'assemblée générale des notables des différents villages, point de chef commun.

Plus loin chaque village dépend d'un chef local, Mfumu na Buala, porteur de la médaille de Bula-Matari. Son autorité est peu importante, son pouvoir peu étendu. Il règle les questions d'ordre général, organise les chasses, la pêche, la récolte du vin de palme, la fabrication de la bière de canne à sucre, l'exploitation des herbes salines, les travaux de la forge, l'installation du village et le défrichement des terres à cultures. C'est à lui que le blanc s'adresse pour les corvées, le portage, la perception des impôts et la fourniture des vivres, etc. Son autorité dépend beaucoup du prestige du chef de poste. A l'Est des Batito, ces petits chefs médaillés, ne sont d'ordinaire que Mfumu na Bula-Matari ; les mfumu na Buala, qui administrent le village avec le conseil des Longomo, ayant évité les rapports directs avec l'autorité occupante. Grâce à l'influence de nos agents, ces Mfumu na Bula-Matari, ont gagné une certaine autorité. Les corvées disparaissent petit à petit, les difficultés des rapports avec les agents diminuent avec le progrès de la civilisation, les Mfumu na Buala de la région située à l'Est d'Oshwe, commencent à regretter la médaille de Bula Matari et cherchent à sortir de l'ombre.

Au dessus des Mfumu na Buala, se trouvent les Mfumu na Tse, les chefs de la terre. Dans une seule tribu on rencontre un, deux et parfois trois, Mfumu na Tse. Les limites des territoires qui tombent sous leur juridiction, sont aussi nettement établies que celles de nos provinces, A moins d'une prédominance toute particulière, les Mfumu na Tse, d'une même tribu, se considèrent comme absolument indépendants les uns des autres. Seul un conflit armé, avec une tribu voisine, peut les unir pour écarter un danger commun.

L'attribution de la grande médaille au chef des Bosongere donna lieu à de longues palabres, entre deux Nkumu na Tse, d'une puissance sensiblement équivalente. Les procès verbaux des grandes assemblées, qui s'organisèrent à Inongo, pour établir ce droit de priorité, doivent contenir des documents des plus précieux, sur l'organisation sociale et politique de ces populations et il est à espérer, qu'ils sortiront un jour de leur oubliette. Ebandu, le Nkumu na Tse de la région de Inongo, qui fut battu administrativement et vit octroyer la médaille à son concurrent Eketi ; ne se soumit jamais à la décision du Commissaire du district. L'unique conséquence de l'octroi de la grande médaille, fût de scinder les Bosongere, en deux groupes nettement hostiles l'un à l'autre.

Fig. 20. — Le grand chef Bombo, type caractéristique Nkumu-na-tse des Wadia.

Toutes les questions d'une certaine importance doivent être soumises au Nkumu na To, et ses sentences sont admises sans appel. L'établissement d'un nouveau village, le défrichement de nouvelles terres, les questions de succession, les grands litiges de chasse, tout doit être porté devant la cour du Nkumu na To. Son habitation est installée un peu en dehors du village. Elle comprend la hutte du chef, celle de ses femmes et une grande maison, réservée aux audiences. L'ameublement de ce local d'audience est très rudimentaire ; un trône formé de quelques branches d'arbres juxtaposées, placé en surélévation et tout autour un grand espace libre, l'aire bien battue. Au jour des audiences, le Nkumu na To, fait placer sa chaise sur le trône, ses quelques conseillers s'installent à côté de lui et les sujets peuvent s'asseoir à terre. Le Nkumu na To a le droit de percevoir l'impôt en nature. Sur chaque grande bête tuée à la chasse commune ou individuelle, éléphant, buffle ou antilope, une part bien déterminée, doit lui être réservée. En outre, chaque communauté paye annuellement une somme déterminée comme hommage au Nkumu, enfin toute question soumise à sa jurisprudence, doit être rémunérée convenablement. Le Nkumu na Toi, donne à des époques régulières de grandes fêtes, auxquelles peuvent participer tous les Nkumu na Bisele de son territoire. Les frais lui en incombent, de même, qu'il doit entretenir de ses deniers les musiciens de son orchestre. Le droit d'avoir un orchestre et de se faire escorter régulièrement par les musiciens, est une des grandes prérogatives des Nkumu na Toi des populations du Lac Léopold II. Quand Ebandja se croyant revêtu d'une autorité administrative, vint protester près de nous contre l'attribution de la grande médaille à son concurrent Etoti, il argumenta avec force gestes : [illegible] connu au Bala Bosari, Nkumu Etoti a-t-il autant de musiciens que moi ? Nkumu Etoti peut-il posséder une trompe en ivoire prolongée par trois écrans en bois ? Les bekombe de Nkumu Etoji sont-elles aussi nombreuses et aussi grandes que les miennes ? Pourquoi n'a-t-il pas un orchestre plus puissant que le mien, si Nkumu na To Etoti est le grand chef ? Peu convaincu par cette argumentation primitive, je fis remarquer au Nkumu Ebandja, qu'il ne tenait qu'au Nkumu Etoti d'avoir une trompe plus grande et plus de Lokombe, puisqu'il pourrait les faire sculpter. Aussitôt toute l'assistance protesta vivement et Ebandja conclut : s'il peut le faire pourquoi ne le fait-il pas ? Ne serait-ce pas la guerre ?

Les [illegible] na Tee, doivent devenir nos grands auxiliaires. Nous avons pour devoir de maintenir, dans certaines limites, leur autorité et leurs attributions. Dans l'administration de la région, la perception de l'impôt, la fourniture de la main d'œuvre, l'établissement de notre autorité, le concours bienveillant du [illegible] na Tee, nous assurera un succès incontestable, son opposition, au contraire, entravera profondément notre œuvre. Toute mesure qui se rattache à l'autorité des [illegible] na Tee, doit être prise avec grande circonspection, si l'on veut éviter des perturbations regrettables.

La durée du règne du [illegible] na Tee, est généralement courte, nous n'en avons point pu établir les causes, mais le fait est incontestable. A la mort du chef de la terre des [illegible] et des Bolia, quelques notables transportent le cadavre au cimetière des grands chefs. Le corps est [illegible] y restera pendant sept mois. Pendant ce temps le nouveau chef se prépare à recueillir la succession. Une nuit le [illegible], oiseau sacré de la tribu, lance son cri, annonçant à toute la population que l'esprit a désigné le successeur. Les petits chefs et les notables se rassemblent au village du nouveau [illegible] na Tee. La nuit celui-ci sort de sa hutte, parle au peuple et le [illegible], lui répond « [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] ». Quelques jours plus tard a lieu l'enterrement du chef défunt. Les notables sont envoyés aller reprendre le corps au lieu où il fut déposé, le placent dans un cercueil et au matin on l'enterre en grande pompe. Il semble que le corps reste au cimetière des chefs et que le cercueil ne contient en somme qu'un tronc d'arbre, mais ici encore, une enquête plus précise me paraît indispensable. L'enterrement se fait en grande cérémonie et puis le nouveau chef, est installé définitivement. Comment le chef entre-t-il en possession des secrets de sa puissance occulte ? Par qui apprend-il à doser le poison, à fabriquer les drogues, à préparer la médecine ? Voilà autant de questions qui restent à résoudre. En dehors de ces secrets, l'art médical n'est guère bien développé chez les indigènes. Une ficelle passée sur le front, l'application de ventouses et la scarification, guérissent les névralgies. Les ventouses sont formées par de petites calebasses percées d'un trou exigu. L'indigène introduit à l'intérieur quelques brindilles d'herbes très sèches, y met le feu et applique immédiatement l'ouverture de la calebasse contre la peau. Par suite de la combustion, le vide se forme à l'intérieur et l'aspiration se fait automatiquement. La scarification se fait au petit couteau [illegible],

CHAPITRE II

L'Habitat.

Conditions d'installation du village. — Dispositions générales des huttes. — Type de la hutte Bateke-Bamfumu. — Hutte conique Babema. — Forme de la hutte du Lac Léopold II. — Hutte à toit arqué de la Lukenie. — Villages du Sankuru-Kasai. — Hutte Bakuba. — Conclusions générales.

Quoique toutes les populations de la région que nous avons visitée, soient arrivées au stade sédentaire, les migrations locales et les déplacements des pénates sont assez fréquents. En somme l'habitation et le village ne sont stables, que pour autant que les ressources de l'emplacement et du milieu suffisent aux nécessités de l'existence de la communauté.

La première condition essentielle est celle du voisinage d'une source d'eau potable, d'un ruisseau, d'un marais, d'une ou si possible de plusieurs sources naturelles. Celles-ci sont assez nombreuses dans la région que nous avons parcourue. Leur eau est claire, limpide et rafraîchissante, le débit abondant et régulier, tant à la saison sèche, qu'à la saison des pluies. L'indigène en apprécie les avantages au point, que les femmes se rendent volontiers à la source située à 200 ou 300 mètres dans la forêt plutôt que d'aller puiser l'eau à la rivière.

À côté d'une source abondante, l'indigène cherche une situation salubre et il en tient compte dans le choix de l'emplacement futur de ses pénates. Un terrain un peu surélevé, sec, ouvert et situé à proximité de la forêt ou au milieu d'une plaine fertile, lui convient le mieux.

En dehors des avantages d'hygiène, ces endroits présentent un caractère de sécurité pour celui qui s'y établit. À la moindre alerte toute la communauté abandonne village et foyer, pour se lancer dans la forêt où elle est à l'abri et en toute sécurité.

Enfin l'indigène recherche un terrain fertile, condition essentielle à la réussite de ses cultures. Du bon rendement de ces dernières dépend pour une grande partie le bien-être de toute sa famille et même son existence.

L'emplacement nouveau devra donc répondre à toutes ces conditions indispensables. Si l'endroit qui y correspond peut se trouver dans une région très giboyeuse et non loin d'une rivière, marais ou cours d'eau riches en poissons, l'indigène ne manquera pas de porter son choix sur ce point privilégié. Ces conditions déterminent la durée de l'installation de l'indigène.

Rien n'attache l'indigène au sol ni au village. Les terrains exploités pendant des années, les cultures, les plantations la hutte elle-même ; le droit acquis par l'exploitation et le défrichement d'une partie de la terre inoccupée et ce sentiment inné qui nous attache nous civilisés, au village natal ; l'indigène ignore tout cela !

Lorsque la communauté a décidé le déplacement des pénates et que l'endroit propice à une nouvelle installation a été trouvé, tous les éléments adultes mâles s'en vont pour préparer le terrain. Ce travail est tout particulièrement ardu dans la région forestière. Alors que dans le pays des herbes, il suffit de couper les graminées, ou de les brûler simplement, puis de biner à fond l'espace réservé au nouveau village et ses champs de cultures et d'enlever tous les débris ; l'établissement d'un village en pleine forêt exige un effort et un travail beaucoup plus sérieux. Les premiers jours sont consacrés à la délimitation du terrain, au déblayage du petit bois, lianes, arbrisseaux, herbes, etc. Tout ce qui peut être coupé au couteau ou à la hache, est abattu. Les gros troncs sont entamés à la base, puis l'indigène entame tout autour les déchets du premier travail de défrichement et y met le feu. Deux ou trois jours plus tard, les géants de la forêt s'écroulent les uns après les autres au milieu d'un fracas indescriptible et des cris joyeux des indigènes. Le menu bois est vite débité, branches et couronnes coupées ; tandis que les gros blocs restent sur place.

Fig. [illegible] — Coin d'un village Bolia à peine défriché.

Rien n'est plus intéressant à voir que ces villages à peine défrichés, au milieu de la grande forêt équatoriale. La clairière encore mal définie, encadrée d'un dôme de verdure sauvage ce petit espace libéré où l'homme a décidé de s'établir. Toute la clairière est parsemée de gros troncs d'arbres, de débris de bois, de charbons de bois et de déchets de toute nature. Les souches des arbres coupés à 1 mètre environ du sol, se dressent de tous côtés, comme autant de témoins d'une vie et d'une végétation qui viennent de passer. Au milieu de cet amas de débris tortueux se dressent à gauche et à droite, comme semés au grand hasard quelques huttes toutes primitives. Ce ne sont en réalité que des abris, des coins de refuge, où l'indigène passe provisoirement la nuit et s'abrite contre l'humidité et les intempéries du climat. Leur aspect misérable, leur extérieur délabré et le peu de fini de leur construction, mon-hutte que l'indigène lui a construite dare-dare, sans y rattacher une importance quelconque. Cependant il y vit, en attendant, que la hutte définitive soit achevée, et ce provisoire dure quelquefois bien longtemps.

FIG. [illegible]. — [illegible], village Bakutu anciennement installé au milieu de la forêt équatoriale.

Ces premiers abris sont construits sans alignement ni méthode. Le matériel employé est des plus hétéroclites ; la forme des huttes est variable et, chose curieuse, n'a généralement aucune ressemblance avec l'habitation définitive ni la forme type de la région.

Chez les Bakutu et les [illegible], la hutte est rectangulaire et en moyenne deux fois aussi longue que large. Les parois latérales très basses n'atteignent que rarement 1,20 m. La porte est pratiquée dans le pignon, donnant sur la grande place du village et placée un peu latéralement. Le toit est à double pente, en courbe arrondie et ligne de faîte horizontale. Ses bords dépassent assez notablement les parois latérales et forment tout le long de la hutte, un petit auvent. L'indigène s'en sert pour y remiser une partie de sa réserve de bois de chauffage, des poteries et autres objets de moindre valeur.

Toutes les huttes sont construites séparément, placées parallèlement face à la grande artère et espacées de 10 à 15 mètres.

Comme matériaux de construction l'indigène emploie pour la charpente des pétioles de raphia, des bambous, des rotangs, de grosses branches équarries et des herbes pour recouvrir le toit. La porte est parfois faite en planches. Il arrive aussi, que de vieilles nattes servent à renforcer intérieurement le revêtement des parois.

A l'intérieur la hutte comprend deux pièces, séparées par une cloison médiane. La première tient lieu de cuisine, salle à manger, etc., la seconde de chambre à coucher.

Fig. 19. — Hutte Baboma — type ancien — en construction.

L'ameublement de la cuisine est des plus variés. Poteries, paniers, mortiers, pilons, tamis, et autres ustensiles sont suspendus aux parois ou rangés sur le côté. Au dessus du foyer formé par trois pierres, est suspendu un panier à claire-voie, où l'indigène dépose, à l'abri des rongeurs et de l'humidité ses réserves de viande et de poissons séchés et boucanés, du maïs, etc. Dans un coin on observe un amas de bois, combustible précieux, prélevé sur la réserve de l'extérieur et placé à l'intérieur pour mieux le faire sécher. Enfin dans un autre coin caché et bien isolé, se trouve le nid des poules.

Dans la journée, l'indigène ne se tient à l'intérieur de sa hutte que lorsqu'il fait trop froid ou trop humide au dehors.

L'intérieur de l'alcove du Baboma et du Bateke, est tapissé de grandes nattes. On n'y voit qu'un ou deux petits paniers et coffrets, où l'indigène enferme quelques objets précieux et des Nkisi ; deux, trois oreillers en bois sculpté, un lit et parfois quelques figurines humaines.

Le lit est formé par quatre petits pieux fourchus fixés en terre. Dans les fourches viennent se placer, les traverses solides du cadre du lit. Le sommier est formé de lattes de pétioles de raphia et le matelas remplacé, par une ou deux grandes nattes.

La hutte des Bankutu est également rectangulaire et divisée en deux compartiments. Cependant la porte donne généralement dans la paroi latérale. La hutte est placée en longueur, le toit à double pente et inclinaison oblique, déborde sur le devant et forme verandah. La ligne de faîte est horizontale.

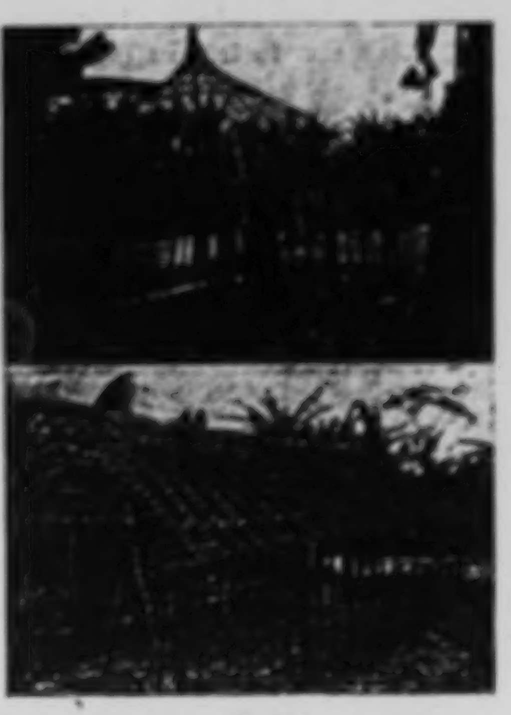

Fig. 46.

1) Hutte Bakutu en construction ; base carrée, toit conique.
2) Hutte Bankutu en construction ; base rectangulaire, toit en dièdre.

La demeure du chef est entourée d'un enclos et pour y arriver, il faut passer par une sorte de labyrinthe peu compliqué.

Les habitations sont groupées par famille, chacune occupant un espace déterminé, très souvent séparé de l'enclos du voisin par une palissade peu élevée et quelques plantations de bananiers. Ce groupement des huttes par famille donne au village Bankutu, un aspect et un cachet spécial, que l'on ne retrouve nulle part ailleurs. Le village forme une succession de petites cours allongées séparées par de petites cultures de bananes, arachides, maïs, etc. Certains villages ont 1 à 2 kilomètres de longueur, alors qu'ils ne comprennent que 25 à 30 familles.

Dans la région de Bokala, nous avons rencontré chez les Bankomo et les Bakema, la hutte de forme conique à base carrée. Elle ressemble tant à l'extérieur que par les détails de sa structure et ses dispositions internes à la hutte des Basonge, sauf que l'auvent qui surplombe la porte de la hutte Basonge fait défaut et que la porte glissière est remplacée par une porte à charnières s'ouvrant vers l'extérieur.

Cette forme spéciale de l'habitation indigène, étrangère à la région, y a été introduite par les Arabes, venus de l'Est. Pokol lui même, chef coutumier et incontesté des Bankomo de cette région, n'est en somme que l'ex-boy du chef Arabe décédé, qui a régné dans la région pendant près de dix ans. Comment les indigènes en sont-ils arrivés à adopter si rapidement cette hutte de forme nouvelle ? Nous l'ignorons ! Il est cependant possible que le chef Arabe en pénétrant dans la région, fut accompagné de quelques familles Baluba ou Basonge et que la première installation de cette hutte conique dans la région, fut faite par ces derniers. Les indigènes Bankomo, tombés sous l'influence du chef ou ayant accepté son autorité, ont peut-être imité la forme de hutte des premiers en se groupant autour du nouveau chef, implantant ainsi petit à petit, cette forme nouvelle et toute différente de la hutte ancestrale. Il n'est pas sans intérêt de remarquer, que les [illegible] de cette région, n'ont pas perdu tout souvenir de leur première hutte primitive. L'abri servant de hutte au Nkisi de chacun d'un de ces villages présente encore la forme de l'ancienne habitation et chose bien curieuse elle rappelle, toute minuscule qu'elle est, singulièrement la hutte Batéke.

Les huttes obliques ne sont point groupées par famille, mais construites sur une double ligne irrégulière. L'espace libre qui sépare les deux rangées de huttes forme l'artère principale du village ; l'ensemble étant encadré de riches cultures de bananiers et de manioc.

Les habitations des Baboma, des Wadia, des Bosongo et de toutes les populations de la rive droite du Lac Léopold II, Mfimi, présentent un aspect uniforme. Base rectangulaire, toit à double pente oblique, ligne de faîte horizontale, pignon triangulaire, véranda formée par le panneau du toit débordant de 1 m. à 1 m. 50 sur la façade principale, donnant sur la grande artère du village ; entrée dans la même paroi, porte coulisse à glissière.

L'ameublement de toutes ces huttes se réduit dans ses grandes lignes, aux ustensiles de la cuisine avec le grenier réservé pour la première pièce ; au lit pour l'alcôve. Celui-ci est construit sur pilotis surélevés de 20 à 30 cm. Les nattes servant de matelas, l'oreiller est formé par un simple bloc de bois à peine équarri, sauf chez les Baboma, qui emploient encore le petit escabeau oreiller que nous avons rencontré chez les [illegible]-Batéke.

Toutes les populations de cette région, mettent un grand soin à la construction de leur hutte. Après avoir bien délimité l'aire du nouvel emplacement, l'indigène plante les trois gros piquets qui doivent supporter les traverses principales. Il forme ensuite le cadre vertical de sa hutte en plantant, sur tout le périmètre, des fortes tiges bien droites, espacées de 70 cm. A ces tiges verticales, l'indigène attache les traverses horizontales formées de forts pétioles de raphia et espacés de 5 à 7 cm. Il en fait de même pour la cloison intérieure, tout en y appliquant des pétioles de raphia de moindre force et épaisseur. L'espace réservé à la porte reste ouvert. A ce stade l'habitation ressemble à une grande cage, largement ouverte vers le ciel ; dont les barreaux sont disposés horizontalement. Elle reste dans cet état pendant tout le temps que demande la préparation des matériaux de recouvrement interne. Dans ce but l'indigène coupe des feuilles de « [illegible] » genre de palmier, très commun dans toute cette région marécageuse. Les feuilles sont réunies par séries de quatre, les barbes ayant été au préalable repliées le long de la nervure et négligemment tressées. Les extrémités libres sont percées au moyen d'une fine lanière et les nervures sont reliées de 3 en 5 cms. Les feuilles ainsi préparées, l'indigène pénètre à l'intérieur de la hutte en construction et commence le recouvrement des parois. Procédant systématiquement il passe de bas en haut, attache les feuilles de « nse-nse » aux lattes horizontales et les place de façon à ce qu'elles se couvrent les unes les autres. La cloison ainsi tapissée est consolidée par quelques lattes placées verticalement et rattachées à la carcasse extérieure par des lanières de rotang. Ces cloisons sont très solides et de très longue durée. Le toit est généralement recouvert de chaume, mais il arrive très fréquemment que l'indigène se sert également de panneaux « nse-nse » pour couvrir sa hutte.

Chez les populations de l'Ouest du Lac, les huttes sont associées par séries de deux ou de trois et placées sur deux lignes parallèles. L'espace libre entre les groupes est très réduit, au point qu'à la première vue, toutes les huttes semblent se toucher. Les portes donnent toujours sur la grande allée.

Nous avons également visité quantité de villages où les habitations en pisé, construites par ordre administratif, s'étendaient sur toute la longueur du village, mais en général ces huttes considérées par nous comme un progrès d'hygiène et de bien-être, ne jouissaient pas des faveurs des indigènes. Le nègre avait exécuté le travail imposé, mais il s'était refusé à en user, sa hutte primitive répondant mieux aux nécessités de sa vie avait gardé ses faveurs et ses hôtes.

Chez les Tumba de la rive Est du Lac, nous avons observé, que la hutte tend à présenter certains caractères qui la rapprochent du type de hutte à toit arqué, que l'on trouve dans la région de Boli et plus au Nord. Le faîte, au lieu d'être droit, se prolonge sur les deux extrémités et s'incline de façon à donner à l'ensemble, l'aspect d'un arc, dont la tension porte spécialement sur les deux bouts. Pour certaines habitations les portes donnent encore dans la paroi latérale faisant face à l'artère principale et les huttes sont construites en séries plus ou moins rapprochées. Pour d'autres au contraire la porte est rectangulaire, dans la paroi de pignon et donne sur la petite vérandah, formée par le prolongement antérieur du toit. Les huttes construites sur ce type sont placées en ligne mais isolément et quoique l'espace entre les deux lignes forme l'artère principale du village chaque hutte a cependant, devant sa vérandah, une petite cour spéciale. Quant aux procédés de construction, ils sont identiques à ceux que nous avons notés dans la région Ouest du Lac.

Fig. 26. — Hutte Tumba à base rectangulaire et toit légèrement arqué.

Chez les populations de la Basse Lukenie, les huttes sont encore construites, d'après la même méthode et au moyen de matériaux identiques. Cependant l'entrée est presque toujours située dans la paroi de pignon et du côté du toit débordant, légèrement courbé formant vérandah. Lorsque les huttes sont isolées, on remarque encore dans la ligne de faîte, une tendance à la forme arquée, peu prononcée il est vrai. Il arrive cependant très fréquemment, que les indigènes s'entraident dans la construction du village et procèdent de façon à former de longues séries de huttes ininterrompues.

La ligne de faîte devient en conséquence continue et droite. L'ouverture servant de porte, est ménagée dans la paroi du pignon et donne sur un petit espace libre. Cette cour est commune à deux huttes voisines, mais les portes ne sont point placées en face l'une de l'autre.

Ce type d'habitation continue se rencontre le plus couramment, chez les Basakata de l'intérieur. Il est caractérisé par les soins minutieux que les indigènes mettent à sa construction et son achèvement.

Toutes les populations riveraines du Lac Léopold II et de la Basse Lukenie semblent, sous le rapport du type d'habitation et de la disposition générale des villages, se rattacher à un seul groupe ethnique, caractérisé par la hutte rectangulaire à toit en double pente oblique et ligne de faîte horizontale placée parallèlement à l'artère du village. Les huttes construites isolément, à toit légèrement arqué, et placées perpendiculairement à l'axe principal du village, que nous avons signalées à l'Est du Lac Léopold II, nous révèlent cependant certaines traces d'affinité ethnique avec les populations situées plus à l'Est. Avant de passer à l'étude de l'habitation de cette région, il convient de signaler, que chez toutes les populations de l'Ouest, la hutte du grand chef c. a. d. du chef de la terre, « Mfumu na tse », est contruite séparément, un peu en dehors de l'alignement général ou faisant face à l'artère principale. Cette hutte est entourée d'une palissade et l'enclos renferme à la fois la hutte royale, le palais de réception et les huttes des femmes du chef.

L'entrée de la cour du chef est interdite aux sujets, seuls les notables peuvent s'y présenter à l'occasion des audiences ; pour les recevoir le chef vient siéger dans la hutte servant de batiment de réception. Tout autour de l'enclos, le chef de la terre fait planter des arbres spéciaux du genre cactus. C'est là nous assura le futur successeur du chef des Mosengere de Penge, une prérogative royale très sévèrement observée. L'existence de ces enclos autour de l'habitation royale rappelle la coutume de la disposition en groupe par famille des villages Banfumu, et semble être un indice d'une certaine affinité entre ces différentes tribus.

FIG. 31. — Huttes Batitu en construction, toit arqué.

Dans la région des Ipanga-Batitu nous rencontrons à côté de la petite hutte à toit en double pente oblique, à faîte horizontal et recouverte de tuiles végétales laquelle sert de seconde installation provisoire, une forme de hutte qui rappelle le type du Nord du Lac Léopold II. La base est rectangulaire, mais la moitié antérieure forme vérandah ouverte ou fermée latéralement ; l'intérieur de la hutte est carré. Le toit est arqué, d'une courbe plus ou moins marquée. L'aire intérieure ayant été préalablement nettoyée, battue et préparée, l'indigène fait le tracé de sa hutte et plante sur le périmètre et la ligne médiane les supports des solives principales. Le pieu central a 50 à 75 ctm. de hauteur en plus que ceux placés aux deux extrémités. Ces derniers ont en moyenne 1 m. de hauteur en plus que les pieux des parois latérales. Les trois pieux de la ligne médiane, sont reliés par une forte traverse horizontale, tandis qu'une seconde traverse est placée au dessus. Celle-ci doit former arc. La courbe est obtenue en attachant aux deux extrémités de très fortes lianes, auxquelles l'indigène suspend de très gros blocs de bois. Le toit est couvert de pétioles de raphia pliés en dièdre, attachés à la solive du faîte et aux deux traverses horizontales des parois latérales. L'espace entre les gros pieux des parois est occupé par des tiges d'un diamètre moins important reliés à la traverse horizontale. Sur cette charpente, l'indigène, noue des tiges de raphia, placées horizontalement à 15 ou 20 ctm. de distance. Les parois du pignon sont construites de même, mais les extrémités des madriers verticaux sont rattachées aux traverses du toit. Les huttes sont recouvertes de « nse-nse » superposées d'après la méthode en usage chez les populations du L. L. II ; ou de grandes feuilles « ndele » formant tuiles végétales. L'indigène procède au recouvrement du toit avant de terminer les parois de sa hutte. Les séries « nse-nse » sont fixées directement sur la charpente de la toiture. Les tuiles « ndele » au contraire sont tressées, sur une natte à claire-voies horizontales très rapprochées, qui elle, est étendue et fixée à la charpente du toit. Il arrive très fréquemment que l'indigène recouvre la partie de la hutte formant chambre à coucher de « ndele » tandis que le toit de la vérandah, est couvert de « nse-nse ». Interrogé sur le motif de l'emploi de ces matériaux de nature si différente dans la même construction, Imumu chef du Batitu du territoire d'Oshwe, nous expliqua que les « ndele » forment de bonnes tuiles végétales, très résistantes et que grâce aux épines, fines comme des aiguilles dont la feuille est recouverte, les rongeurs ne peuvent y nicher. Dans les « nse-nse » au contraire les rats et souris, s'installent très volontiers. Ils coupent les feuilles pour en former leur nid et s'y reproduisent facilement, à moins qu'ils n'en soient chassés par la fumée des foyers. Voilà pourquoi, dit Imumu, nous recouvrons de préférence de « ndele » la partie de la hutte où nos femmes installent leur foyer.

Les parois sont généralement recouvertes de feuilles « ndele » ou bien de panneaux d'écorce d'arbre. Les parois en « nse-nse » sont excessivement rares.

La porte de la hutte donne sur l'intérieur de la vérandah. Celle-ci est toujours ouverte du côté de l'artère principale du village, parfois sur le devant et un des côtés et très rarement de tous les côtés.

Fig. 32. — Autre forme de la hutte Batitu en construction au village de Longinpila.

Dans la région des Bokala et dans de très rares villages Yaelima, nous avons trouvé cette même forme typique de hutte. Cependant ces cas étaient assez rares. Le plus souvent la hutte de cette contrée présentait un aspect qui ne nous rappelait le type Batitu que par l'existence d'une vérandah à toit plus ou moins recourbé dans le prolongement de l'axe principal.

La hutte Bokala-Yaelima est à base rectangulaire, toit à double pente oblique, ligne de faîte horizontale.

L'intérieur de la hutte comprend deux places, l'une servant de salon, cuisine, salle à manger, l'autre d'alcôve. La porte donne dans la première place et est percée dans la paroi qui fait face à l'artère principale du village. Toutes les huttes sont construites isolément, placées en longueur sur un alignement et de façon que les deux lignes parallèles forment le village. Les huttes sont construites, la charpente en pieux et pétioles de raphia, le recouvrement en « nse-nse » tant pour le toit que pour les parois. Les indigènes de la région de Bumbuli ne mettent en général que très peu de soins à la construction de leurs huttes. Si dans les villages il règne une propreté remarquable, l'aspect général souffre beaucoup de l'état délabré de la grande majorité des habitations. Même les huttes toutes nouvelles ne sont guère bien achevées, comparativement à celles des autres régions.

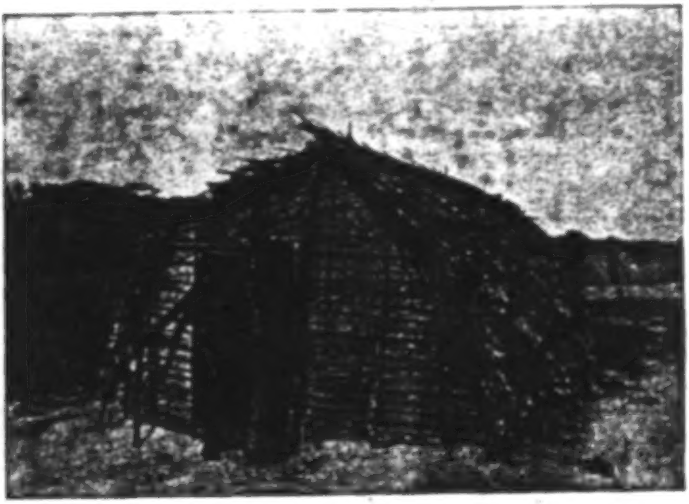

FIG. 33. — Hutte provisoire des Bokala-Yaelima.

L'ameublement de la hutte Batitu et Yaelima, ne diffère de celui des autres régions, que par la forme des ustensiles et la présence de chaises. Le lit est toujours très bas, à peine surélevé de 10 à 15 ctm. L'intérieur de la hutte n'est que très rarement tapissé de nattes. Il convient de noter dans l'ameublement, le grand panier séchoir servant de grenier, suspendu au dessus du foyer. Sa forme est exagonale, le rayon varie entre 1 et 1m. 50. Les bords sont droits, les lanières de suspension attachées aux six coins de l'hexagone et l'ensemble est tressé à jour, d'après la méthode des chaises cannelées d'Europe, technique spéciale dont nous n'avons point retrouvé d'autres applications dans toute la région. Non moins intéressantes sont les chaises, relativement rares chez les Batitu, communes chez les Bokala et d'un usage courant chez les Yaelima. Leur forme spéciale est caractéristique. Les soins minutieux que mettent parfois les indigènes à les orner de dessins sculptés et l'aspect artistique remarquable que présentent certaines d'entr'elles, leur donnent en général un cachet ethnique local très intéressant. On pourrait en dire autant des coupes en bois sculpté des cornes gravées et des vases en bois artistiquement travaillés que l'on croyait jusqu'à présent localisés dans la région occupée par les Bakuba et que nous avons retrouvé dans tout le territoire sud de Wumbuli.

La hutte de la région de Bena-Dibele-Kole, est généralement bien plus coquette, sa construction est beaucoup mieux soignée et l'ensemble est achevé avec ordre et méthode. La forme est rectangulaire, le toit à double pente et ligne de faite légèrement arcquée. Cette courbe, quelque légère qu'elle soit, est cependant très caractéristique et très constante. Elle rappelle indéniablement la forme typique de la hutte ancestrale.

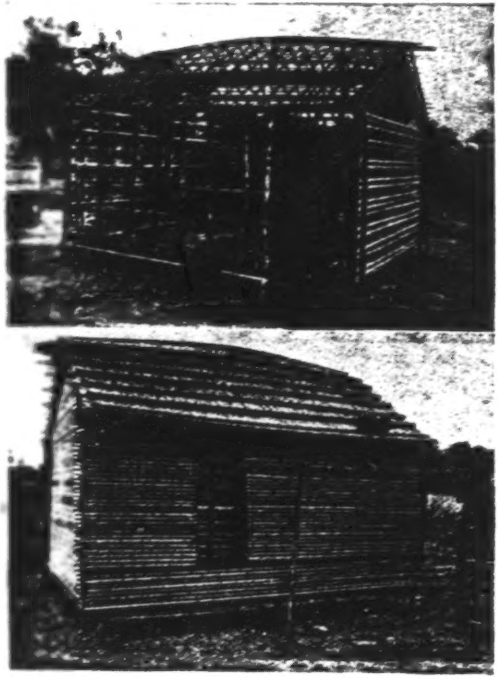

FIG. 34. — 1°) Hutte Bankutu-Bakuba en construction.
2°) Hutte Bankutu-Bankuba achevée.

La porte est située soit sur le côté, soit dans la paroi du pignon suivant que la hutte est orientée parallèle ou perpendiculairement à l'axe principal du village. Cette porte est toujours placée assez haut. Elle se ferme à glissière interne. « Nse-nse » et « ndele » faisant défaut dans toute la région, la charpente des huttes est en pieux et en éclats de raphia, les parois et le toit sont recouverts de feuilles de raphia tressées à plat en forme de natte.

Les huttes sont construites isolément, méthode qui rappelle encore les coutumes de la région d'Oshwe-Bumbuli. Il arrive mais très rarement, que l'indigène recouvre sa hutte d'herbes.

Dans cette région nous avons également pu observer que dans certains villages les huttes étaient groupées par famille et que chaque groupe formait un coin spécial nettement séparé du reste du village. Les diverses huttes d'un même groupe sont reliées par un enclos en pieux assez solides, hauts de 1 m. 75 à 2 mètres, et parfois recouvertes de nattes en feuilles de raphia. Toutes les portes des huttes d'un enclos, s'ouvrent vers l'intérieur de l'enceinte. L'ensemble forme le « Lupango ». A compter le nombre des huttes d'un Lupango, on peut établir, celui des femmes du chef ou maître de l'endroit, chaque épouse ayant son hôme.

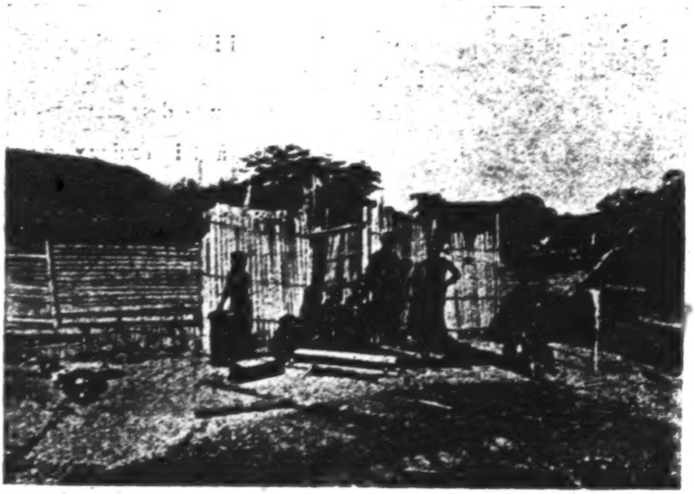

FIG. 35. — Intérieur d'un lupango et séchage des noix d'arachides. Région Bena Dibele-Kole.

Les « Lupango » sont d'introduction récente et dus à l'influence Arabe. On ne peut en tenir compte dans l'établissement des relations de parenté ou d'affinité ethniques entre les différentes populations. Entre les «Lupango» de la région de Bena Dibele-Kole et le groupement familial des huttes chez les Banfumu il n'existe aucun rapport.

Dans l'ensemble l'étude de la forme de l'habitation de ces différentes populations et de leurs dispositions générales ou particulières nous montre que contrairement à l'opinion générale ces deux facteurs sont très instables. Si nous devions classer les habitants de la région parcourue d'après la forme de leur hutte nous arriverions à cette conclusion bien singulière : existence de plus de groupes que de tribus.

Pour pouvoir en arriver à une division ethnique basée sur les caractères des us et coutumes se rapportant à cette partie de la vie indigène nous devons nous borner aux caractères généraux.

Envisagées sous ce rapport les populations visitées appartiennent toutes à un seul grand groupe ethnique, dont les caractères de l'habitation sont : la base rectangulaire et le toit à double pente, hutte des Bantu de l'Ouest !

Comme nous l'avons fait remarquer la hutte à toit conique, que nous avons trouvée autour du poste de Bokala, doit être considérée comme le résultat d'une influence étrangère et de l'infiltration d'éléments étrangers à la région.

Une étude et un examen plus détaillés des caractères spéciaux de la structure de l'habitation des diverses tribus de cette région nous montre que cette partie de la grande province ethnique de la région occidentale Africaine peut se diviser en plusieurs districts.

Le premier comprend la région occupée par les Bateke et les Babuende et est caractérisé par la hutte à base rectangulaire, toit à double pente courbée, le faite horizontal droit.

Cette forme type se rencontre également chez certaines populations de la région du Bas Congo et dans certains villages Banfumu.

Le second comprend le pays des Banfumu, Baboma, Wadia, Mosengere, Tumba, Bobaie, Basakata, Balesa et Batete. Il est caractérisé par la hutte à base rectangulaire, toit à double pente oblique en diedre, le faite horizontal.

Chez toutes les tribus situées à l'Est de la Mfimi-Lac Léopold II nous retrouvons très souvent, à coté de la hutte type décrite, des huttes à base rectangulaire, toit à double pente oblique et ligne de faîte arquée. Cette hutte type se retrouve, plus au Nord-Est et elle est caractéristique à la région des Ipanga et des Batitu. On la retrouve, chez les Bokala et les Yaelima, mais elle y est moins caractéristique et tend même à faire place à la hutte du second type. La hutte des Bashilele et celle de la région de Bena Dibele-Kole pourraient être classées dans ce troisième groupe, quoique la forme arquée du toit, soit très peu accentuée.

FIG. 36. — Hutte a toit arcqué de la Lokoro. Tribu Kundu.

L'unité ethnique des différentes populations peut ainsi se déduire de la forme générale, les variations locales justifient la division en trois groupes distincts dont les caractères spécifiques sont peu stables et les limites mal définies.

L'étude générale de l'orientation des huttes dans les villages, nous montre l'unité ethnique caractérisée par l'alignement en longueur qui s'observe dans toute la région.

Par contre l'étude détaillée du groupement des huttes dans la formation du village nous conduit à une division, plus ou moins différente que celle basée sur la forme type de l'habitation.

Les huttes du premier groupe sont construites isolément ou par groupe isolé la porte généralement aménagée dans le pignon donnant sur l'allée principale de l'agglomération ; celles du second groupe sont très souvent contigues par séries plus ou moins grandes et placées en longueur par rapport à la grande artère du village ; enfin celles du troisième groupe sont d'ordinaire placées isolément, orientées perpendiculairement à l'axe du village, l'entrée donnant sur la vérandah qui forme la place de devant de cette hutte. Cette disposition spéciale s'observe même dans les villages du second groupe où la hutte type du troisième groupe se rencontre. Par contre elle fait complètement défaut dans la région des Bashilele du Nord du Kasai-Sankuru et dans la région de Bena Dibele-Kole.

CHAPITRE III.

Les moyens d'existence de l'indigène

L'Elevage : Poules, chèvres, chiens. — L'Agriculture : Manioc, maïs, riz, bananes, arachides — La Chasse : Armes, pièges, nkisi, méthode individuelle, chasse en communanté — La Pêche : Méthode générale, barrages, nasses, pièges, harpons, arcs et flèches, lignes filets, claies.

Les populations du Congo-Kasaï-Lac Léopold II et de la Lukenie ne s'occupent que peu d'élevage. Elles ne possèdent point de gros bétail, tout au plus peut on trouver dans leurs villages quelques poules, de rares chèvres et des chiens de chasse ; ceux-ci participent au partage du gibier et vivent pour le reste au gré du hasard.

Les chèvres ne font l'objet d'aucun soin. Le jour elles circulent librement et s'en vont brouter dans la forêt ou dans la plaine. Parfois elles s'aventurent dans les plantations d'où les chiens de chasse les éloignent au premier signal. La nuit elles rentrent au village et se réfugient où bon leur semble. Lors de notre séjour au village de Toipolo, elles vinrent même nous déranger la nuit, alors que nous étions logés dans la hutte réservée aux étrangers.

Les poules circulent le jour dans le village et les plantations, couchent la nuit dans la hutte indigène. Elles y ont leur nid de ponte et la place pour couver.

L'indigène ne mange pas les œufs. Il les vend aux agents de l'Etat ou des compagnies, où on les rassemble pour les faire couver. La poule elle-même n'est guère consommée par l'indigène. Le plus souvent elle passe à la cuisine des Européen. La valeur moyenne était en 1913-14 de 0,50 fr. la poule, celle d'un œuf 5 ct. et le prix d'une chèvre de 5 à 15 francs.

Lors de l'établissement de nouvelles cultures, le premier défrichement incombe aux hommes. Ce travail se fait au couteau et à la hâche. La forme de ce dernier outil est la même chez toutes les tribus. Un manche en bois, terminé par un renflement en forme de massue, un fer triangulaire long et étroit encastré latéralement dans le manche.

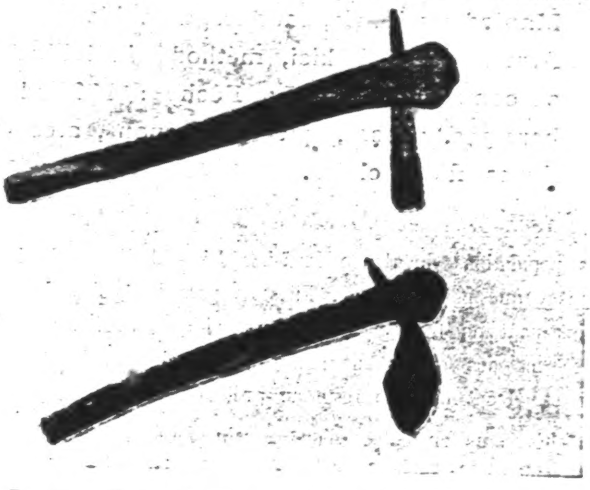

FIG. 37. — Hache et houe du Lac Léopold II. Lukenie.

Après le débroussement, les hommes entassent les déchets aux pieds des gros troncs et y mettent le feu. L'arbre sapé à sa base finit par s'écrouler et reste sur place.

Les femmes se chargent des autres travaux de culture. Ceux-ci varient très peu de l'une tribu à l'autre, et même les cultures variées de manioc, maïs, arachides, riz, bananes et canne à sucre ne demandent qu'un travail spécial assez rudimentaire.

La base de l'alimentation indigène des tribus de la plus grande partie de la région visitée est le manioc. L'indigène cultive le manioc doux et le manioc amer. Cette dernière variété est la plus répandue. Pour préparer le terrain la femme indigène se sert d'une houe en fer, de forme triangulaire à base évasée et sommet prolongé par une pointe. Ce fer est encastré latéralement dans un manche en bois grossièrement dégrossi et terminé par un renflement en forme de massue. Le but de ce dernier caractère est double : il sert à donner plus de prise à l'encastrement du fer et à renforcer le rendement de l'effort de l'ouvrier, sans cependant rendre l'emploi de l'outil trop fatiguant.

Fig. 38. — Première installation du village Longinpila dans un terrain nouvellement défriché. Tribu des Batitu.

Après le premier sarclage la femme forme à 80 cm. d'intervale, de petites buttes de 30 cm. de hauteur moyenne et y pique quatre à cinq boutures de manioc.

Les soins d'entretien des cultures de manioc se réduisent à un ou deux sarclages pour enlever les plantes adventives. Le manioc demande un terrain extrêmement fertile. Sa culture épuise le sol au point qu'après trois ou quatre ans, l'indigène doit déplacer ses plantations et abandonner le terrain défriché.

Le manioc doux atteint le maximum de son développement au bout d'une année, le manioc amer après 15 à 20 mois.

La récolte des tubercules ou racines de manioc se fait au fur et à mesure des besoins de la famille. La racine est bonne à manger à tout âge et à toute époque. Le rendement maximum coïncide avec le plein développement de la plante et non à la maturité complète. La moyenne varie entre 12 à 15000 Kg. à l'hectare. La femme indigène n'attend pas l'époque du plein développement pour commencer l'exploitation de sa culture. Elle limite la cueillette au stricte nécessaire pendant toute la saison des pluies. A cette époque le manioc gonflé d'eau, ne donne que peu de farine et se gâte facilement au rouissage.

FIG. 39. — Hutte du nkisi de chasse et bananier en fleur et à fruit au village de Madjuku, tribu des Bobaie.

Après le manioc, les bananiers occupent le premier rang parmi les cultures indigènes, au moins chez les populations du Lac Léopold II, de la Basse Lukenie et de l'entre Congo-Kasaï. Chez les tribus de la Haute Lukenie, les cultures de bananiers sont moins développées et dans la région de Bena-Dibele-Kole, elles disparaissent à peu près complètement.

Les indigènes cultivent de préférence la grande banane ; moins succulente, elle est plus farineuse et d'un rendement plus intense que la petite. Les bananeraies sont toujours établies à proximité du village et le plus souvent directement derrière les habitations. Il s'en suit que ces cultures prennent la forme générale du village et l'encadrent en quelque sorte.

Pour réussir, les bananiers doivent être plantés dans un terrain très fertile, bien défriché et labouré à fond. Pour activer la croissance et le rendement, les indigènes déversent dans les bananeraies, tous les déchets de la cuisine, les ordures, les cendres et balayures provenant du nettoyage régulier de l'intérieur du village et de la hutte et s'y réfugient pour satisfaire aux besoins de la nature.

La culture du maïs, est peu importante. Au-delà du poste de Tolo, le maïs semble être complètement inconnu. Chez les populations de la Mfimi, du Lac Léopold II et de la Basse Lukenie, les cultures de maïs sont très peu développées. Par contre nous avons rencontré de grands champs de maïs chez les Bateke et principalement chez les Banfumu des territoires de Kapanda. Il convient cependant de remarquer, que l'intensité de cette culture dans cette région était due, non à l'utilisation directe du maïs par l'indigène, mais à l'espoir de pouvoir en écouler avantageusement le produit chez les commerçants et travailleurs de Léopoldville — Kinshassa.

Le maïs est semé en poquets, distants les uns des autres de 30 à 60 cm. Les poquets sont creusés en terrain défriché à l'approche de la saison des pluies. Le maïs lève après quatre jours. A ce moment les cultures sont très exposées aux déprédations des oiseaux. Les enfants sont chargés pendant 4 à 5 jours d'y monter la garde du matin au soir et de les éloigner par leurs cris.

L'entretien comprend un sarclage et un démariage des poquets. Les cultures de maïs ne sont ni binées ni butées. Le maïs est parfois semé en culture dérobée dans les champs de manioc. La maturité du maïs se marque par les spathes jaunes et séchées. La récolte se fait quelque temps après la maturité. Le maïs est arraché par les enfants et les femmes ; les épis coupés sur place et transportés au village.

La culture du riz est inconnue dans toute la région visitée, sauf chez les populations de Bena Dibele-Kole. Avant les semis le terrain est sarclé. Le riz est semé par poquets dans le premier quart de la saison des pluies. Les soins d'entretien se réduisent à deux ou trois sarclages donnés quand la plante est dans son premier développement. La garde des cultures doit se faire régulière et ininterrompue du matin au soir depuis la floraison jusqu'à la récolte. Le riz est coupé au couteau, grappe par grappe. Les grappes sont réunies en courtes glanes. Celles-ci sont mises en javelles et aprés quelques jours, groupées en meules. Le battage se fait au village, en communauté de famille. L'indigène choisit une grande aire bien battue et se sert de longues perches. Le décorticage se fait au pilon, dans un mortier en bois. Le riz décortiqué est vanné, dans des panniers en éclats de rotang, d'une forme circulaire peu élevée à rebord renforcé. Le rendement moyen varie entre 2000 à 3500 Kg. par hectare.

Les cultures de riz servent moins à l'alimentation de l'indigène qu'au commerce. Généralement l'indigène, écoule sa récolte immédiatement aprés le décorticage.

Dans la région des Banfumu et chez les Bankutshu, les cultures d'arachides, sont assez prospères. L'arachide se développe le mieux dans une terre légère et ne convient point aux terrains défrichis de la grande forêt. La culture demande beaucoup de soins et un entretien régulier. Les champs envahis par les mauvaises herbes sont d'un rendement nul. La récolte se fait à maturité et incombe aux femmes, assistées par les enfants. Les arachides sont placées dans des hottes et transportées au village. L'indigène les étend au soleil pour les faire sécher. Deux ou trois fois par jour, il les tourne et les retourne. Au soir il rentre la provision dans la hutte.

Les plantations de cannes à sucre, sont établies dans les bas-fonds marécageux.

Tous les travaux de cette culture sont réservés aux hommes. On ne rencontre ces plantations que dans les régions où les indigènes fabriquent le Masanga ou bière de canne à sucre. Elles sont particulièrement nombreuses dans les villages de la Basse Lukenie et la Mfimi.

En général les indigènes cultivent encore quelques légumineuses, des patates douces et l'igname, mais en petites étendues et sans soins particuliers.

LA CHASSE.

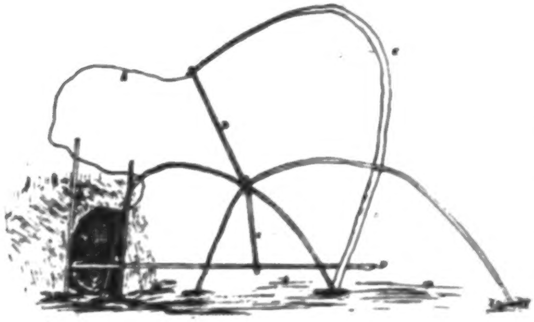
La chasse est réservée aux hommes. Ils la pratiquent, non comme un sport, un divertissement ou un délassement, mais dans l'unique but de se procurer de la viande et de la graisse.

Dès leur plus tendre jeunesse les garçons se réunissent, battent les herbes et attrapent souris, rats et autres rongeurs qui pullulent dans la brousse. Rien n'est aussi intéressant que de les voir à l'œuvre. A dix, quinze, vingt parfois, ils forment un grand cercle. Armés d'un bâton, ils battent les herbes et font un vacarme incroyable. Petit à petit le cercle se rétrécit et se déplace de façon à y comprendre un petit espace bien nettoyé. Les plus agés, les plus audacieux et les plus agiles y montent la garde ; l'œil vif, le regard fixé sur la lisière des herbes, prêts à bondir. Les traqueurs redoublent de zèle, frappent, crient, gesticulent et poussent insensiblement tous les rongeurs vers la petite clairière. Pourchassés, effrayés, les rats, souris, etc., fuyent éperdus. N'osant franchir le cordon des traqueurs, ils sont poussés vers la clairière, hésitent un instant avant de s'y engager et bondissent. Sans changer de place, les petits chasseurs les attendent et les saisissent au passage. Un coup sec, nerveux, et les voilà les côtes enfoncées, le crâne brisé. Pas un n'échappe ; ni leur taille (certains rongeurs sont gros comme des lièvres) ni les morsures, ni les égratignures ne font peur à ces bambins de trois, quatre ou cinq ans.

Les enfants s'occupent encore de capturer des oiseaux et petits rongeurs au filet et au piège. Ces derniers sont constitués par une tige flexible formant ressort et une corde à nœud coulant. Un système de petits bâtonnets à déclanchement automatique, oblige l'oiseau à engager la tête dans le nœud pour atteindre l'appât. A ce moment le jeu de petits bâtonnets se déclanche et la victime est enlevée par la ligne attachée à la tige-ressort.

Les indigènes placent également des pièges du même genre devant l'entrée des galeries de rongeurs ou autres animaux ou à l'endroit de leur passage régulier.

Au village de Madjuku, j'eus l'occasion de surprendre sur le vif le mécanisme d'un piège à rats. Devant la sortie d'une galerie, deux baguettes entrecroisées et recourbées en cerceaux ; une forte tige de rotang (E) fixée en terre, à l'extrémité de laquelle sont attachées deux cordes en piassava (A et B). L'une des cordes terminée en nœud coulant est placée le nœud ouvert devant l'entrée de la galerie. A extrémité de la seconde, est fixé un petit bâtonnet. (C) L'une des extrémités de ce bâtonnet passe derrière l'entrecroisement des deux cerceaux, l'autre est retenue par un bâton mobile, (D) placé transversalement entre les extrémités des cerceaux et de façon à barrer l'entrée de la galerie. En sortant ou en rentrant le rongeur passe la tête dans le nœud coulant, le bâton transversal (D) le gênant, il l'écarte des pattes, déclanche le bâtonnet d'arrêt (C) et la branche de tension (E) devenue libre se redresse. Automatiquement le rongeur est pris dans le nœud coulant, enlevé et étouffé par strangulation. La sensibilité de ce piège est remarquable ; le rongeur qui s'y engage est irrévocablement perdu.



Les indigènes établissent également des bricoles à antilopes. Très observateurs, ils découvrent rapidement l'endroit du passage régulier d'une antilope et la taille de l'animal. Ils placent à ce point, un nœud coulant en rotang, soigneusement dissimulé dans les herbes et les feuillages. L'animal y engage la tête au passage et s'emprisonne lui-même. Plus la victime se démène et plus le nœud se serre.

Pour les grands carnassiers, hyènes, léopards et grands chats sauvages, l'indigène place des trappes. Lors de notre séjour dans la région de Bongo, les indigènes du villages de Penge, vinrent soumettre au jugement du chef de poste Mr Molin, une palabre qui nous montra que le placement de ces trappes est réservé à des spécialistes qui sont responsables des accidents qu'ils peuvent causer.

Depuis quelques temps un léopard enlevait au village de Penge, poules et chèvres. Olondo, homme réputé pour sa science, fut appelé pour placer un piège. Il arriva, fit le « nkisi », plaça le piège et le lendemain le léopard fut pris. Il n'était pas mort. Olondo prit sa lance et d'un coup sec voulu achever le fauve. Mais il ne fit que blesser le léopard à l'épaule et sous l'exitation et la douleur, celui-ci parvint à s'échapper du piège. Une trainée de sang montra la route suivie par le fauve. Olondo rassembla les guerriers du village et les invita à se lancer à la poursuite du léopard. Il les divisa en deux groupes et prit la direction de l'un de ceux-ci. Bientôt ils arrivèrent à l'endroit où, à bout de forces, le léopard s'était caché. L'un des groupes fut invité à s'arrêter tandis que l'autre attaqua la bête. Olonde arriva le premier, et déjà sa lance menaçait le léopard, lorsque brusquement celui-ci s'élança dans le fourré. Dix pas plus loin il se heurta au barrage formé par les guerriers du second groupe. Pourchassé par Olondo, il bondit sur l'un d'eux, lui planta les griffes dans la tête et l'épaule, renversa sa victime et se préparait à l'achever, lorsque Olondo, accourut et le tua net d'un coup de lance. L'homme blessé fut transporté au village, il mit longtemps à guérir de ses terribles blessures et perdit un œil.

Or le blessé nommé Otete prétendit rendre Olondo responsable de l'accident. Olondo disait-il, avait fait « nkisi » mais il l'avait mal fait. Le léopard s'était échappé et Olondo avait alors proposé de poursuivre le fauve, mais il avait jeté un « ndoki » au moment du départ et voilà pourquoi le léopard s'était enfui et au lieu d'attaquer Olondo, s'était jeté sur lui. En conséquence il réclamait 1000 mitako de dommages et intérêts, 6 couteaux et 3 « makonga ». La demande d'Otete ne nous paraissait point fondée !

Or Ebandia grand mfumu na tze des Mosengere, nous expliqua : Lorsque Olondo fut appelé pour placer le piège et faire « nkisi » il demanda suivant la coutume 1000 mitako qui lui furent payés. Mais en retour Olando avait à tuer le léopard ce qu'il ne fit pas. Le léopard tomba dans le piège, s'en échappa et avant d'être tué, blessa Otete. N'a-t-il pas raison de demander le payement de la faute d'Olondo ? Pourquoi Olondo a-t-il réuni les guerriers pour poursuivre la bête au lieu d'établir un second, piège ? Olondo est la cause du malheur d'Otete et doit l'indemniser de ses souffrances.

Oiondo à son tour plaida sa cause et à notre grande surprise, commença par avouer que le « nkisi » du piège n'avait pas été bon ; mais ajouta-t-il le « ndoki » qui frappa Otete, n'a pas été jeté par moi mais par celui qui rendit le « nkisi » du piège inefficace. Si Otete a été blessé ce n'est pas de ma faute ; je ne lui doit donc pas le payement qu'il exige, mais je veux lui donner les 1000 mitako que j'ai reçus pour placer le piège.

La chasse aux éléphants et aux hippopotames se fait par pièges, trappes, à la lance et au harpon.

Les trappes sont formées de grands trous creusés sur les chemins fréquentés par les pachidermes. Ces trous ont de 3 à 4 mètres de longueur, 2 mètres de largeur et 4 à 5 mètres de profondeur. Dans le fond l'indigène enfonce des pieux en bois dont les extrémités, taillées en pointe, sont durcies au feu. L'ouverture est cachée par une natte de branches d'arbre et de lianes grossièrement tressées, recouverte de feuilles et d'herbes. Ces pièges forment un véritable danger pour la circulation dans le pays, aussi l'indigène doit-il en indiquer l'existence par un signe conventionnel bien mis en évidence. Entre Lokila et Gomo Erenge, villages Mosengere, j'ai constaté pour la première fois l'existence de ces poteaux indicateurs : un fort pieux fixé perpendiculairement en terre au sommet duquel l'indigène attache un cerceau et un bâton. Celui-ci est fixé obliquement en terre, en prenant pour direction la ligne droite qui conduit du poteau au piège. Si un indigène néglige le placement de l'indicateur, il perd ses droits au gibier pris au piège et est responsable des accidents qui pourraient résulter de sa négligence.

Un autre piège très souvent employé pour la chasse à l'hippopotame, est formé par une lourde pointe en fer suspendue au dessus du chemin, fréquenté par ces pachidermes. Le jour, ceux-ci se tiennent de préférence dans l'eau ou somnolent sur quelque banc de sable. La nuit ils sortent de leur refuge, pour aller brouter les herbes de la plaine. Le plus souvent l'animal à sa rentrée et à sa sortie de l'eau laisse dans la berge des traces très visibles de son passage. L'indigène installe son piège dans le voisinage de ces points, évitant toutefois de le placer à la galerie de sortie. L'expérience lui a montré que l'hippopotame, méfiant au possible, est mis en éveil par la moindre modification de l'endroit de la sortie et qu'immédiatement il en change l'emplacement.

La pointe de fer est encastrée dans un gros bloc de bois. L'ensemble est suspendu à 4 ou 5 mètres au dessus du sol. Une traverse, placée à un mètre du sol au travers du chemin ; est maintenue en place par le dispositif de déclanchement qui commande la suspension de l'arme. Au passage le pachiderme vient heurter la traverse, la déplace, fait sauter le déclanchement, rompt la suspension et la lance s'abat lourdement sur l'animal. Le piège est disposé de façon à frapper l'animal dans la nuque.

L'indigène pratique la chasse à l'arc et à la flèche ainsi qu'à la lance. L'arc et la flèche sont cependant plutôt des armes que des engins de chasse.

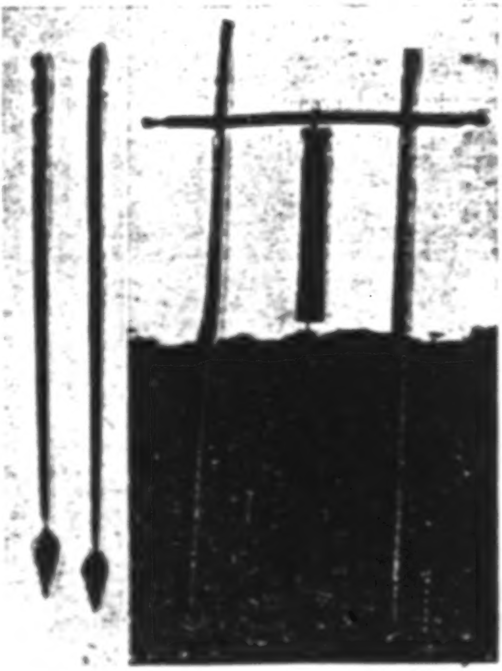


FIG. 40. — Lances de chasse et piège au gros gibier au Lac Léopold II.

Actuellement les populations du pays entre le Congo et le Kasai et les Baboma de la Mfimi ont abandonné ces armes. Quelques rares privilégiés possèdent des fusils à piston, armes généralement plus dangereuses pour celui qui s'en sert que pour le gibier. Quand l'indigène tire un coup de fusil, il tend les bras, dirige le canon vers le gibier et détourne la tête. S'il est arrivé, à force d'adresse et de patience, à quelques mètres du gibier sans éveiller son attention, le coup a chance de réussir. D'ordinaire l'animal est plus ou moins gravement blessé, à moins que le fusil surchargé n'éclate dans les mains de l'imprudent chasseur.

Les Bateke, les Banfumu et les Baboma conservent la poudre dans des petits récipients formés d'une simple calebasse ou découpés dans un bloc de bois dur. Les calebasses sont parfois recouvertes d'une gaine de peau de serpent ou de lézard, dans le but de mieux conserver la poudre à l'abri de l'humidité. Les poires à poudre, en bois sont généralement pyriformes, imitation probable de la forme de la callebasse. Elles sont munies d'un couvercle en bois s'emboitant très exactement sur le corps de l'objet et une lanière de suspension en cuir, fixée à deux œillets découpés dans le corps du récipient et passant par deux galeries latérales ménagées dans le couvercle. Très souvent ces poires à poudre sculptées, sont ornées de dessins gravés en bas relief, motifs linéaires placés en bandes. Les lignes sont tantôt circulaires, tantôt droites et parfois aussi obliques. Le fond de la poire à poudre est plat de façon à pouvoir la placer debout sur un plan horizontal. Le corps de la poire à poudre est prolongé par un goulot droit, cylindrique sur lequel s'emboite le couvercle.

Le type d'arc à lanière de tension en rotang est relativement rare. Nous ne l'avons retrouvé que chez les Tumba, les Balesa, les Babaie, les Batete, les Ipanga, les Batitu et les pygmées. Cet arc est formé par une tige de rotang, section convexe externe, meplat interne. La lanière de tension en rotang est attachée aux deux extrémités, mais préalablement passée dans de petites ouvertures percées dans le corps de l'arc à 4 cms. des extrémités. La section verticale de celles-ci est munie d'une rainure peu profonde. La tension de l'arc s'obtient en faisant passer la lanière dans ces crans.

Les flèches sont faites en faux bambou, les deux ailerons en feuilles passés dans une fente. Les pointes durcies au feu sont munies de légères entailles et enduites de poison. Ce poison n'est dangereux que lorsqu'il est bien frais. Il ne tue pas à petite dose mais engourdit l'animal blessé.

Les indigènes se servent plus spécialement de ces arcs et flèches pour la chasse aux oiseaux et plus rarement pour la chasse aux singes. Dans ce dernier cas ils emploient de préférence un arc fait d'une forte tige très élastique et très résistante. La longueur moyenne varie entre 80 centimètres et 1 mètre 10. La tige est progressivement amincie vers les extrémités et terminée en pointe munie d'un cran d'arrêt. La section verticale est convexe interne, meplat externe. La corde de tension est faite en fibres de bananier. La tension est fixe, c'est à dire que l'indigène ne détend pas l'arc au repos. La hauteur de la tension est 12 centimètres en moyenne, la portée effective de 150 mètres, la portée utile de 100 mètres en longueur et de 15 à 20 mètres en hauteur.

La fabrication de l'arc et des flèches est réservée aux hommes.

L'indigène fait un choix très minutieux du bois de ses flèches. Il doit être léger et très résistant. Après l'avoir gratté soigneusement au moyen d'un petit couteau, il taille l'une des extrémités en pointe, tandis que l'autre est découpée pour former le cran de placement sur la corde. L'une et l'autre sont légèrement durcies au feu. Les sections où doivent s'appliquer les ailerons sont grattées avec plus de soin. Les lignes de placement sont tracées à la pointe du couteau ; les ailerons formés de la moitié d'une plume d'aile d'aigle ou de pintade. L'indigène les place tous les trois à la fois et les fixe au moyen d'un fil en fibres, enroulé en spirales. Cette fine ligature est consolidée par de la résine de « Bulungu » appliquée très liquide et formant en conséquence une gaine très légère après dessiccation.

Fig. 43. — Basakata armés de lances, d'arc et de flèches.

Le dard de la flèche est terminé par une douille conique, allongée, dans laquelle s'encastre l'extrémité supérieure du bois de la flèche. La forme générale de la pointe, est celle d'une feuille oblongue, étroite, parfois munie d'un ou deux crochets. Cette forme se retrouve dans toute la région du Lac Léopold II et la Lukenie. L'entaille pour la corde de l'arc est très régulière et peu profonde, mais chez les Yaelima elle a parfois jusqu'à 5 cms. de profondeur. Le type de l'arc et de la flèche que nous venons de décrire sert également d'arme offensive et défensive. Jadis son importance comme tel devait être plus grande. De nos jours les guerres de tribu à tribu sont devenues à peu près impossibles. Par contre les attaques et vengeances individuelles sont encore assez fréquentes. Ce fait s'observe plus spécialement dans la région située à l'Est d'Opombo. Tout indigène libre Ipanga, Batitu, Bokala et Yaelima, possède son arc et ses flèches et n'hésite pas à s'en servir, tant pour se défendre que pour attaquer.

La chasse à l'arc et à la flèche se fait individuellement. Le produit en revient intégralement au chasseur.

Nous avons retrouvé chez les Yaelima une flèche dont la pointe mobile notablement plus grande, plus large et plus forte, est rattachée au bois par des cordelettes. Les indigènes se servent de ce genre de flèches pour la chasse aux antilopes et aux buffles. En blessant l'animal, la pointe de la flèche pénètre dans le corps, le gibier surpris s'élance dans la brousse ou dans la forêt. Le bois de la flèche heurté par les hautes herbes ou les lianes, se détache petit à petit. La pointe de la flèche, attachée au bois au moyen de la corde reste dans la blessure. A chaque secousse l'animal élargit sa blessure. Le bois de la flèche s'accroche à un moment donné aux lianes ou aux herbes; il en résulte que la pointe est violemment arrachée de la blessure qui est ainsi rendue mortelle. Cette arme très dangereuse est peu répandue et pour cause. L'indigène ne peut s'en servir utilement qu'à bout portant. La portée de l'arc est limitée, la flèche à pointe mobile lourde, le fer est très large et muni de barbelets. Pour arriver à planter cette flèche dans le corps de l'animal il faut pouvoir se glisser jusqu'à quelques mètres du gibier, arriver à bander l'arc sans éveiller son attention et le blesser au ventre. L'animal peut chercher dans une course folle et fatale son salut; mais il arrive aussi qu'il se retourne contre son agresseur. En toute circonstance le chasseur qui se sert de ces flèches ne peut le faire qu'en s'exposant à de grands dangers. Or, si l'indigène s'adonne volontiers à la chasse, il craint les dangers qui s'y rattachent. Seuls les vrais chasseurs intrépides, qui ont hérité quelque chose de l'instinct et de l'audace des Batua, utilisent ces flèches. Inunu, chef des Batitu de la région d'Oshwe, audacieux au possible, ne craignant ni animal, ni obstacle, ni danger, m'affirma que lui et quelques autres chasseurs n'hésitaient pas à attaquer l'éléphant au moyen de cette arme.

Le plus souvent l'indigène se sert de sa lance pour la chasse au gros gibier ou bien il se contente de placer des pièges.

Les populations situées à l'Ouest des Ipanga, ont abandonné la chasse à l'éléphant. Lors de notre séjour dans la région de Bobaie, des Basakata et des Balesa, les indigènes vinrent à plusieurs reprises se plaindre de l'invasion des éléphants dans leurs plantations de manioc et des dégats que ces visiteurs inopportuns y faisaient à chaque passage. Jamais ils n'ont songé à les attaquer. Pour les éloigner ils faisaient du feu et un vacarme infernal, tout en se tenant à distance.

Dans la région des Ipanga-Batitu et chez les Bokala-Yaelima la chasse aux éléphants est assez fréquente. Les chasseurs les plus audacieux les attaquent à la lance. Ces chasses se font individuellement. Le chasseur se couvre ou s'enduit de bouse d'éléphant. Il s'en rapproche avec mille précautions, évitant de réveiller l'attention de l'animal, toujours sur le qui-vive. Arrivé à portée utile, il plante sa lance dans le bas ventre de l'animal et s'esquive au plus vite. L'animal blessé s'élance au grand hasard jusqu'à ce que, épuisé par sa course folle et la perte de sang, il s'écroule définitivement. Le chasseur suit la piste pendant deux, trois jours, sans jamais se lasser ni perdre courage. De la perte du sang, de l'empreinte des pieds, de la largeur des pas et de bien d'autres signes, il déduit la probabilité du succès de sa chasse et tant qu'il lui reste un espoir il continue sa poursuite. Il arrive parfois que l'animal parvient à se débarrasser de la lance. Dans ces conditions le chasseur reprend le chemin du village tout en ayant soin d'annoncer à qui veut l'entendre son exploit. Il le fait non pour se créer une réputation mais pour s'assurer un recours contre celui qui viendrait à trouver l'animal, si par impossible, il venait à succomber quand même des suites de sa blessure.

La chasse en communauté est plus usitée. Les indigènes se servent de grands filets, de lances, de couteaux et de chiens. Le groupe se divise en rabatteurs, dirigés par un chef d'équipe et de guetteurs ou propriétaires de filets.

Fig. 45. — Un départ pour la chasse au pays des Yaelima Lances. Arcs Flèches et Filets.

La. première chasse indigène à laquelle j'eus le plaisir d'assister fût celle de Tua, chez les Banfumu.

Arrivé à l'entrée de la forêt choisie pour la chasse, le premier chasseur s'arrête, dépose son chien à terre et lui ordonne de se coucher et de ne plus bouger. Bien dressée, la bête obéit au premier geste. Le conducteur rassemble les chasseurs et leur dit qu'il va invoquer le nkisi pour assurer le succès de la chasse et il commence :

« Pourquoi n'y a-t-il pas de feu ? »

« Où donc est le bois ? »

Aussitôt les porteurs de filets déposent leur fardeau, et s'en vont à gauche et à droite rassembler du bois sec, dont ils forment un bucher. Un chasseur s'accroupit et allume du feu au moyen de son briquet. Quand le bois prend feu, le premier traqueur continue :

S'asseyant ensuite devant chaque filet, il siffle par deux fois dans un petit sifflet en bois, que Folikini le fumu na tze, lui a remis en même temps que le nkisi de chasse, frappe deux fois filets et grelots et prononce à voix basse quelques paroles mystérieuses. A chaque invocation le porteur du filet et le propriétaire du chien, font éclater une feuille sur le poing en frappant celui-ci de la paume de la main droite.

Un enfant apporte une poule blanche. D'un coup sec, le premier traqueur lui arrache la tête, arrose de sang tous les filets et les grelots en invoquant le nkisi, puis jette la poule sur le feu en la saupoudrant de la poussière rouge, brune et noire du nkisi, que Folikini lui donna au moment du départ. Cependant que la poule non déplumée rôtit sur le feu, l'un des chasseurs dépose à terre un paquet de petites coquilles (monnaie indigène). Chaque chasseur en prend une part égale, et la donne au premier traqueur.

Celui-ci ouvre alors la poule rôtie, les intestins sont jetés dans le feu en l'honneur du nkisi, au milieu des cris des chasseurs, puis chacun d'entre-eux vient recevoir sur une feuille de bananier sa part de la poule. Aussitôt ils arrachent des branches d'arbres, les jettent sur le feu, piétinent le tout et enduisent filets, grelots, chiens, arcs, flèches, lances et leur propre corps, de cendres : La cérémonie est terminée. La chasse va commencer.

Les porteurs de filets reprennent leur charge et s'en vont les placer dans la forêt.

Chaque filet a de 20 à 25 mètres de longueur. L'indigène le tend un tant soit peu obliquement, incliné vers les traqueurs. Ceux-ci attachent les grelots en dessous du ventre des chiens, et s'en vont former un grand arc de cercle dont les deux extrémités s'inclinent vers celles des filets. Nous suivons les propriétaires des filets. Ils se placent à 10 ou 12 pas devant leur filet, se cachent dans la verdure tandis que nous nous plaçons tout contre les filets, mais à bonne distance les uns des autres. Bientôt les cris des traqueurs, le cliquetis des grelots et les aboyements des chiens réveillent la forêt silencieuse.

Fig. 46. — Le placement des filets de chasse.

Nous chargeons nos fusils.

La voix du premier traqueur se fait entendre. « Aliende go... O..O ! » Les chiens viennent de lever un gibier, ils le poursuivent, les traqueurs crient, chantent, font du tapage et excitent leurs chiens. Il faut éviter que la bête affolée parvienne à se glisser entre eux. Bientôt nous entendons un grand cri suivi de beuglements plaintifs. Un buluku (petite antilope mauve : Cephalophus Maxwelli) vient d'être pris dans un filet. Le propriétaire s'élance de sa cachette, la petite bête affolée fait des efforts désespérés pour se dégager, mais s'enchevêtre de plus en plus. En un rien de temps, l'indigène l'a saisie et lui lie solidement les pattes.

En temps ordinaire il l'assomme, mais nous avons donné ordre de ne pas tuer le gibier, par crainte d'abimer les peaux.

Après la première vint une seconde traque, puis une troisième et une quatrième. Tout ce temps nous avons été aux aguets. Hélas ! pas une grosse pièce ne fut prise ! Vers trois heures nous reprenons le chemin du poste, suivis des chasseurs portant les 6 Buluku capturés. La chasse n'a pas été très heureuse. Il arrive souvent que les indigènes en reviennent avec 10 et 15 de ces petites antilopes, nous dit M. Borremans.

Parfois un éléphant est pris dans la traque, chose désastreuse pour les filets et dangereuse pour les chasseurs. Si la bête affolée s'élance dans les filets, elle les arrache, au grand danger du propriétaire, placé de garde, et si furieuse, elle se retourne contre les chiens, les traqueurs n'ont que la ressource de s'enfuir au plus vite !

Toute chasse faite en communauté est accompagnée de quelques cérémonies magico-religieuses. Cette coutume est commune à toutes les populations visitées, situées à l'Ouest de Dekese. Dans toute cette région nous avons retrouvé dans chaque village un petit endroit consacré aux esprits protecteurs de la chasse. Dans la région de Léopoldville et chez les Bateke en général, l'endroit fétiche est cloturé par de hautes tiges consolidées par des tiges transversales entre-croisées. Rarement on trouve à l'intérieur de ces enclos nkisi de chasse des crânes d'antilopes ou de buffles.

Chez les Banfumungu, nous retrouvons le même enclos, mais au lieu d'être adossé à la hutte indigène, il est placé devant l'entrée d'une petite hutte aux formes toutes spéciales, très caractéristiques. Le toit est à double pente, le faîte horizontal, les parois latérales rectangulaires, les deux autres en pignon. Une petite ouverture rectangulaire munie à l'intérieur d'une claie de fermeture est percée dans la paroi qui donne sur la cloture et sert de porte. A l'intérieur de la hutte nous avons observé un petit foyer formé de trois termitières minuscules, un lit recouvert d'une natte et une ou deux poteries usagées contenant des objets les plus hétéroclites, de la poudre de « ngula », du « mpembe » et de la terre noire. C'est dans cette hutte que le féticheur conserve le fétiche de chasse. Ce fut tout accidentellement que je pus constater le fait lors de mon passage au village de Mbomu, dans la région des Banfumu.

FIG. 47. - Hutte du Nkisi de chasse — Baboma — Au fond la hutte du type Basonge à toit conique et base carrée.

Au village de Bomu-fioti, la hutte de chasse était notablement plus grande, non entourée d'une cloture, mais devant l'entrée était construite une hutte minuscule ressemblant beaucoup à une très grande ruche à sommet pointu et fortement cintrée à la base. Cette hutte formait le sanctuaire du fétiche protecteur de la chasse. Tout autour s'accumulaient les crânes les plus variés, qui attestaient de la puissance du fétiche.

Au village Baboma de Wombali, la hutte du nkisi de chasse avait 2 mètres de long sur un mètre de large, le toit et les parois latérales étaient formés par de longs rotangs recourbés en forme d'une demie ellipse. La porte était percée dans la face antérieure. La hutte était couverte de chaume et entourée d'un enclos en rotang. A l'intérieur se trouvait un lit et trois poteries à nkisi. Quant au fétiche, s'il avait existé, les indigènes l'avaient enlevé avant notre visite. Les crânes de gibier gisaient tout autour de la hutte.

Des renseignements obtenus il résulte que l'entrée de la hutte au nkisi de chasse est interdite à la femme et à tout indigène dont la réputation de chasseur n'est pas établie par des prouesses aux chasses communes. La veille de la chasse organisée, c'est à dire la chasse au filet et en communauté le chef féticheur ou celui qui est désigné pour conduire la chasse, doit se retirer dans la hutte. Il y passe la nuit sans en sortir sous aucun prétexte et sans prendre la moindre nourriture. Si pour une cause quelconque il enfreint ces prescriptions, la chasse doit être remise au lendemain.

Au moment où tous les chasseurs sont réunis, c. a. d. vers 5 heures du matin, il en sort et emporte dans un petit sachet en feuilles de bananier, une partie des substances magiques, prélevées aux poteries « nkisi ». Ces substances seront utilisées aux cérémonies spéciales, qui se déroulent à l'entrée de la forêt, immédiatement avant la chasse. Au retour le crâne du plus gros gibier tué à la chasse, sera déposé devant la hutte en hommage de reconnaissance.

Pour les chasses individuelles, le chasseur dont la réputation est faite au point de pouvoir pénétrer dans la hutte fétiche, doit s'y retirer quatre jours avant de se mettre en marche. Il emporte ses armes, lances, couteaux, arcs et flèches et les garde à l'intérieur pendant tout ce temps. Il ne peut sortir de l'enclos, que pour satisfaire aux besoins les plus urgents et avant d'en sortir, de même qu'au moment de la rentrée, il doit arracher à un arbrisseau voisin une feuille, la déposer sur le creux de la main gauche fermée en godet et la faire sauter en frappant du plat de la main droite, ainsi que nous l'avons décrit, lors de l'exposé des cérémonies de la chasse au « Buluku ». La nourriture doit lui être apportée par un homme et prélevée sur la part réservée à un autre chasseur de réputation. Les sorties de nuit et toute relation sexuelle sont sévèrement interdites. Au retour de la chasse, les crânes doivent être déposés devant la hutte, celui de la plus grosse pièce fixée sur un des pieux de l'enclos. Nous avons pu acquérir deux objets fétiches trouvés à l'intérieur de ces huttes. Le premier vient du village Banfumu de Mbomu et a été acquis dans les circonstances décrites plus haut. Ce fétiche est sculpté en forme d'une figurine humaine, représentant un homme debout. La tête seule a fait l'objet d'un certain soin de travail, le corps est à peine ébauché, le sexe grossièrement indiqué, les jambes mal définies, les bras manquent. Une corde en fibres de bananier tordues est nouée en guise de ceinture au dessus des hanches. Toute la figurine a été enduite d'une pâte de « ngula ».

FIG. 49. — 2°) Fétiche de chasse Banfumu.

Le second a été acheté au village de Bakomu et diffère notablement du premier. Un panier en éclats de rotang haut de 18,5 ctm. et d'un diamètre de 27 cms. à fond carré est rempli d'un mélange compact de « mpembe », de terre noire, de « ngula » et de minerais de fer très finement broyés. L'ensemble a été arrosé d'eau et de sang de poule, mélangé et malaxé de façon à en former une pâte épaisse. Dans cette pâte coulée dans le panier le féticheur a fixé deux figurines et une pointe de lance, sculptées en bois. Les figurines sont très primitives et très peu ouvragées. Leur aspect, l'état d'usure et de vieillesse qui les caractérisent leur donnent un caractère très ancien. L'acquisition de ces fétiches ne fût point facile. En dehors de l'opposition des indigènes en général nous eûmes à vaincre la résistance des chasseurs qualifiés et à nous assurer le concours du féticheur.

Au delà des Baboma la hutte consacrée aux ésprits protecteurs de la chasse disparait petit à petit. De figurines fétiches, nous n'avons plus retrouvé la moindre trace.

Chez les Basakata et les Wadia de la Mfimi, de même que chez les Bobaie et les Balesa, nous avons rencontré dans quelques villages de petites installations toutes rudimentaires rappelant de loin les coutumes Baboma-Banfumu-Bateke. La hutte a fait place à un petit abri très bas, ouvert à tous les vents et adossé à un beau tronc de bananier. Sous cet abri nous avons noté, quatre poteries en terre cuite bourrées d'un amalgame de substances les plus diverses ; quelques crânes d'antilopes, sur le devant une corne d'antilope piquée en terre, contenant une substance liquide, épaisse, d'une nature douteuse. Un arc et une flèche étaient suspendus à l'intérieur. Enfin une calebasse, une termitière et un crâne de buffle étaient déposés à terre. Nous avons cherché vainement à déterminer la signification, l'usage et le but de tous ces objets. Les indigènes se bornaient à nous répondre : « nkisi » Mundele.

FIG. 49. — Hutte de nkisi de chasse et bananier en fleur et en fruit au village de Madjuku, tribu des Bobaie.

Au tronc du bananier était suspendu un beau régime dont les premiers fruits étaient bien murs. Tout en interrogeant les indigènes, j'arrachais une de ces bananes. Immédiatement je fus assailli de protestations. Ces bananes n'appartenaient-elles pas au « nkisi » ? Ce régime était tabou ! Personne n'avait le droit d'en prélever un fruit ! Quelques indigènes s'étaient lancés dans les bananeraies et en rapportaient des bananes en masse. Ils en avaient les mains pleines. Tous me les offraient en échange de la banane prise au bananier du « nkisi » et quand je finis par la leur remettre, ils la fixèrent dans la paroi intérieure du toit de l'abri à « nkisi »

Au village, Bobaie de Madjulu, la hutte nkisi est remplacée par un grand panier, entouré de gros blocs de bois et recouvert d'herbes. Une grande poterie à chikwangue, brisée, était placée au dessus ; quelques sticks étaient placés tout autour et au sommet de deux d'entr-eux, les indigènes avaient suspendus de grandes calebasses. Ici encore il me fût impossible d'obtenir un renseignement précis au sujet de l'usage ou de la signification de chacun de ces objets en particulier. Les quelques rares crânes de petites antilopes déposés à l'intérieur du panier, rappelaient encore vaguement la coutume des huttes « nkisi » de chasse des Bateke-Banfumu.

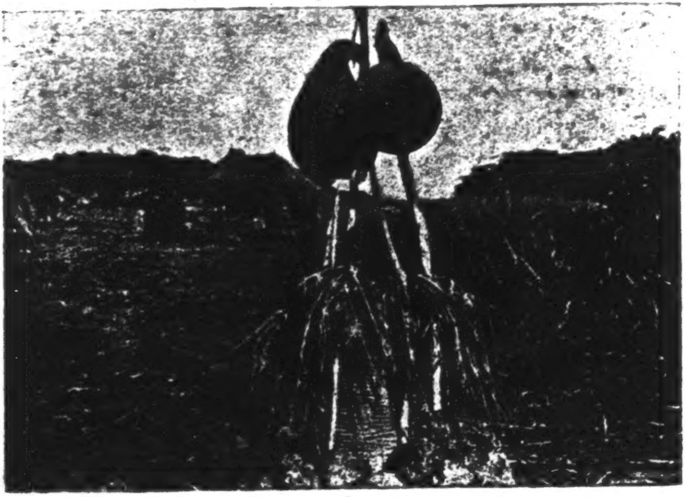

Fig. 50 — Fetiche de chasse Bobaie du village Madjuku.

Chez les Tumba, les Wadia de la rive droite du Lac Léopold II et les Mosengere, toute trace de hutte disparait. Au village Wadia d'Ibali, une grande poterie était placée au dessus d'une branche terminée en trident aux arêtes opposées. Cette poterie était remplie aux 3/4 d'une boue rougeâtre très épaisse. Quelques éclats de faux bambou, deux, trois pointes de flèches et un petit arc étaient plantés dans cette pâte. Au pied du stick, les indigènes avaient entassé toute une série de crânes d'antilopes et de buffles. Seules ces dépouilles rappelaient vaguement le fétiche de chasse de la région du Kasaï.

Il est possible que cette forme très simple du « nkisi » de chasse soit aussi la plus primitive, et qu'elle se rattache, le plus à la coutume ancestrale, les abris primitifs des populations voisines et les huttes caractéristiques des tribus Bateke-Banfumu, n'étant en somme qu'un développement de la coutume de la branche mère de ces populations; coutume qui voulait que le crâne du plus gros gibier tué à la chasse fût consacré aux esprits protecteurs de la chasse et déposé au pied de la représentation matérielle de ces esprits.

Dans la région d'Oshwe et de Bumbuli, nous n'avons pas retrouvé trace de cette coutume. Cependant chaque village possédait son fétiche de chasse. Celui du village Yaelima de Yanga est parmi les plus intéressants. A proximité d'un groupement de quatre huttes situées un peu à l'écart de l'agglomération principale, s'élève un grand arbrisseau. Tout à côté deux pieux fourchus placés à 1 m. 20 de distance, et, à terre, une branche droite qui peut se placer dans les fourches. Une petite section de calebasse est suspendue au moyen de deux lianes dont l'une est fixée à l'arbre, l'autre à l'un des pieux fourchus. La calebasse contient les substances au pouvoir magique : un mélange de « mpembe » et terre noire, le tout formant une boue pâteuse. Avant de partir à la chasse faite en communauté, chaque chasseur propriétaire d'un filet doit passer devant ce fétiche. La pointe d'une de ses flèches ou celle de la lance sont trempées dans la petite calebasse et une partie de la boue qui y adhère est étendue sur les filets. Au retour de la chasse les indigènes viennent suspendre un morceau de chair d'une des bêtes tuées, à la traverse placée sur les deux pieux fourchus. La coutume du dépôt des crânes semble inconnue dans la région.

Le fétiche de chasse des Bokala du village de Yoshomo Monene est placé au milieu de l'agglomération indigène. Il est formé de deux pieux terminés en fourche qui peuvent être reliés par une branche transversale tout comme la charpente du fétiche de chasse des Yaelima. Le grand arbrisseau a été remplacé par une herbacée aux feuilles touffues. La calebasse aux substances magiques est placée à terre entre la touffe d'herbes et l'un des pieux. Les coutumes et cérémonies avant le départ pour la chasse en communauté sont identiques à celles que nous venons de décrire.

Quant aux relations entre le féticheur, le fétiche de chasse et le chasseur isolé nous les ignorons n'ayant pu obtenir de renseignements à ce sujet dans ces régions.

Fig. 51. — Fétiche nkisi de chasse des Yaelima.

Dans toute la région que nous avons parcourue, les grandes chasses se font en communauté. En général tous les hommes y participent y compris les jeunes gens dès l'âge de 15 ans.

J'eus à plusieurs reprises l'occasion d'assister aux grandes chasses indigènes notamment à Tua, à Bongo, à Oshwe et à Bumbuli. Celle qui fut organisée à notre intention par le chef Batitu, Inunu du village Yembé fût très intéressante.

Tous les indigènes adultes étaient rassemblés et armés de longues lances, d'arcs et de flèches. Les filets avaient été transportés depuis la veille dans la forêt. Ce fut d'abord au village un défilé de chasseurs, des danses désordonnées, des cris de guerre et d'appel au gibier, puis tout le monde se groupa et nous partimes pour la forêt.

Arrivés à l'endroit où étaient cachés les filets, tous les chasseurs s'arrêtèrent: Le grand maitre de la chasse prononça un long discours, invoqua la puissance des « nkisi » de la chasse, conseilla à ses hommes d'être courageux et pleins de confiance car ils étaient accompagnés de trois blancs dont deux envoyés par le grand Bula-Matari de Na-Mputu, pour voir comment ils vivaient et comment ils chassaient. Or les Batshitu étaient depuis longtemps de grands chasseurs. N'étaient-ils pas eux les gens de la forêt? A la fin de son discours il arrache quelques feuilles, les écrase et les frotte sur les filets, puis les chasseurs se mettent en marche, les uns pour tendre les filets, les autres pour cerner le gibier et le chasser ensuite vers les filets. Bientôt on entend la voix des traqueurs qui encouragent les chiens. Devant chaque filet, un chasseur attentif armé d'une longue lance attend le gibier pour l'achever.

Toutes ces populations ont conservé la coutume de la chasse au filet et à peu de chose près, elle se fait d'une façon identique dans toute la région. Seules les coutumes et cérémonies d'un caractère religieux ou magique s'accentuent et se développent au fûr et à mesure que nous avançons de l'Est vers l'Ouest, au point que, chez les Banfumu, elles occupent une place prépondérante dans l'organisation générale des chasses faites en communauté.

Dans la région de la Boriempe, nous avons observé une méthode spéciale, d'un usage courant pour la chasse aux buffles. Cette région est excessivement giboyeuse. Les buffles s'y rencontrent en de nombreuses bandes. Comme la contrée est très peu visitée par les Européens, le gibier y vit encore dans une sécurité relative et il y est bien moins craintif qu'ailleurs. Pour donner la chasse aux buffles, les indigènes de cette région se réunissent à cinq ou six. Chacun d'entr-eux est armé d'une ou de deux sagaies et de son couteau. Les sagaies ont généralement une lame longue, étroite à double tranchant. La hampe en bois est légère, mais très solide et très souvent terminée par une pointe en fer. Les chasseurs emmènent chacun cinq à six petits chiens, méthodiquement dressés à la chasse. Ainsi équipés les chasseurs s'embarquent et s'en vont en pirogue explorer la région. Aussitôt qu'ils aperçoivent un troupeau de buffles, ils descendent à terre. Les chiens sont muselés et transportés par les hommes pour empêcher qu'ils ne donnent l'éveil au gibier. Les chasseurs s'en rapprochent autant que possible. Deux d'entr-eux s'avancent avec mille précautions, et arrivés à portée utile, ils lancent autant que possible sur la même bête leurs sagaies. Aussitôt les autres chasseurs enlèvent la muselière et lachent leurs chiens sur le troupeau. Surpris, les buffles poussent de grands beuglements et s'enfuient au grand galop. La bête blessée ne tarde pas à se séparer du gros du troupeau et est bien vite distancée. Les chiens traqueurs, dressés à cette chasse, abandonnent la poursuite du troupeau pour s'accrocher à la victime blessée. Ils l'attaquent avec acharnement, s'accrochent aux pattes, à la queue, mordent à la gorge et au bas ventre, tout en évitant les cornes. Le buffle au paroxysme de la fureur, se défend farouchement; distribuant à gauche et à droite, coups de tête, de cornes et de sabots. Cependant les chasseurs se rapprochent, la victime harcelée de tous côtés par la bande de chiens, ne les aperçoit ou ne les remarque point. Brusquement ils s'élancent, poussent de grands cris et plongent leurs sagaies dans le ventre et la nuque du buffle. Blessée à mort, la bête s'abat. Assaillie par les chiens, qui s'acharnent toujours, elle est impuissante à se défendre davantage. L'un des chasseurs tire son couteau et d'un coup sec lui tranche la carotide.

Le produit de la chasse en communauté est partagé entre toutes les familles du village, tout en tenant compte des droits spéciaux du chef et des notables.

La chasse individuelle, ne donne lieu à aucun partage, sauf quand il s'agit d'un buffle, d'un léopard ou d'un éléphant. Du buffle la queue revient de plein droit au chef indigène, qui s'en sert comme chasse mouche et insigne de dignité. Du léopard la dépouille est réservée au chef, qui en forme un pagne, qu'il mettra bien en évidence, lors des grandes fêtes et danses publiques. De l'éléphant la trompe et les défenses reviennent au chef, les crins sont réservés en partie aux chasseurs et en partie aux notables de la localité qui s'en servent pour la fabrication de colliers.

LA PÊCHE.

Dans la région des rivières, des marécages et des lacs, la pêche est une des principales ressources de l'indigène.

A l'inverse de la chasse, réservée aux hommes, la pêche est pratiquée par les hommes et les femmes. Cependant ces dernières ne s'en occupent que très irrégulièrement et ne pratiquent que la pêche au barrage. Celle-ci consiste à endiguer une partie du lit d'une rivière ou d'un marais. La digue est généralement établie à la saison des pluies, mais tant que les eaux montent les femmes laissent toutes les écluses large ouvertes. Vers la fin de la saison des pluies, elles procèdent au rétrécissement du couloir d'écoulement et placent les grandes nasses devant les ouvertures. Ces nasses sont attachées à de forts pieux en bois fixés dans la berge de la digue. Elles sont faites en éclats de nervures de feuilles de raphia et tressées à claire-voies plus ou moins larges. La forme extérieure est toujours la même. Cylindrique à l'une des extrémoitié, l'autre étant formée le long du diamètre, la nasse ressemble à un grand cône dont le sommet est formé par une ligne. Ces nasses se construisent sur une charpente formée de deux, trois ou quatre cerceaux. Le diamètre de ceux-ci varie suivant la place qu'ils occupent. Ils sont placés à l'intérieur de la nasse, le plus large à la base, le plus étroit vers la partie supérieure. Les ligatures transversales, alternes, internes, externes doubles ; sont espacées de 10 à 15 cms. et généralement faites en lanières de rotang. La nasse interne ou nasse d'entrée, est tressée en forme d'un large éventail, de forme conique, à base ellipsoïdale. Le sommet libre forme l'ouverture d'entrée. Les extrémités des éclats sont partiellement entrecroisées à l'intérieur, afin d'empêcher le poisson pris, de rebrousser chemin et de s'échapper.

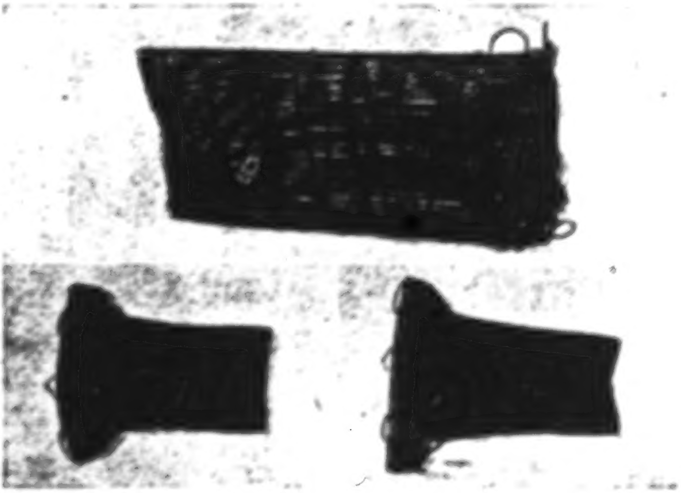

FIG. 33. — Nasses de pêche utilisées par les populations du Lac Léopold II.

La fabrication des nasses est réservée aux hommes. Le travail se fait à plat. Le treillis formé est fixé par la charpente.

L'ouverture de la nasse se fait par la ligne supérieure en détachant la ligature.

Au fur et à mesure que les eaux descendent, la femme déplace la nasse. Matin et soir elle vient inspecter le piège et enlève le poisson capturé.

Lorsque la descente de l'eau est terminée, les femmes se groupent et remontent la rivière ou pénètrent dans le marais. Occupant toute la largeur, elles descendent, chassant devant elles le poisson resté dans la partie endiguée. Elles font un bruit à tout casser, frappent l'eau au moyen de larges baguettes ou produisent des jambes et des bras un fort remous. Le poisson chassé et effrayé, s'enfuit tout éperdu et finit par se faire prendre dans la nasse. S'il essaye de rompre le cordon, les femmes n'hésitent pas à le prendre à la main et à le lancer sur la berge.

Cette chasse au poisson est des plus intéressantes. Les femmes s'y amusent beaucoup, à condition que dans la mare endiguée ne se trouve pas de poisson électrique.

Lors de notre passage à Kunzulu, nous eûmes l'occasion d'assister à une de ces chasses au poisson. Les femmes s'y adonnaient de plein cœur depuis un certain temps. Pataugeant dans la boue, frappant l'eau à tour de bras, fouillant les herbes et les racines, elles s'encourageant les unes les autres par des appels et des chants. Tout à coup une femme lança un cri perçant. Comme une volée d'oiseaux surpris, toutes les pêcheuses s'élancèrent vers la berge et se sauvèrent dare-dare. Celle qui venait de donner l'alarme fut une des premières à se trouver sur la berge. Elle se frottait énergiquement les jambes en répétant « mbisi, ndoki ! mabe ».

Intrigué, je m'en approche et je l'interroge. Elle m'explique qu'un poisson électrique l'avait touchée au passage. Comme je riais de sa frayeur, elle me lança très énergiquement « mbisi ndoki, mabe mingi ! mundele ! mingi ! mingi !

Malgré toutes mes instances, les femmes s'obstinèrent à ne pas reprendre la pêche !

Désireux de voir le poisson, cause de tant d'émoi, je fis rassembler mes hommes et moyennant la promesse d'un franc par homme et une pata (5 francs) pour celui qui enlèverait le fameux « mbisi ndoki » sept d'entr'eux entrèrent dans la mare et la chasse-pêche recommença. Les femmes se tenaient sur la berge. Curieuses, elles encourageaient les pêcheurs, mais pas une ne songea à se mettre de la partie.

Bientôt l'un des hommes poussa un cri et se sauva au plus vite. Ses compagnons surpris hésitèrent un instant et reformèrent la chaîne. Le fuyard fût l'objet des railleries des spectatrices. Honteux et confus, il retourna au milieu de ses camarades, fouilla de tous les côtés les eaux et les herbes et finit par attraper le poisson si redouté. Un nouveau cri lui échappa, mais cette fois-ci il tint bon. Les muscles contractés la figure torturée par la douleur, il enleva et lança le mbisi ndoki sur la berge. Puis tout fier il vint toucher le matabiche promis. Le poisson avait à peine 18 cms. de long. Voulant me rendre compte de la force de la décharge, je le pris en main. Une petite secousse, suivie de plusieurs nouvelles décharges distancées de 4 à 5 secondes, toutes peu sérieuses. Comme je plaisantais les indigènes et que je leur reprochais leur peur non fondée, un indigène m'apporta un seau d'eau et me proposa de plonger le « mbisi ndoki » dans l'eau. Je le fis et immédiatement je reçus une décharge si brutale, qu'irrésistiblement, je retirais la main. Les indigènes riaient et de bon cœur. Piqué au vif, je replongeais la main dans l'eau et j'attrapais à nouveau le poisson. Le « mbisi ndoki » lança une décharge plus forte que la première. Elle fût suivie de onze nouvelles décharges successives dont l'intensité allait en décroissant, puis le poisson devint inoffensif. L'expérience me fit cependant comprendre la crainte que ces poissons électriques inspirent aux indigènes. Pour peu qu'ils aient atteint une taille sérieuse, leurs décharges doivent être très dangereuses, si pas mortelles.

Après la chasse dans la partie endiguée, il reste généralement encore quelques poissons qui ont réussi à passer le cordon. Les femmes se munissent alors de paniers et mettent la mare à sec en déversant l'eau au dessus de la digue.

Très souvent les femmes endiguent une partie d'un marais ou d'une rivière et déversent ensuite l'eau au moyen des paniers sans établir des nasses, ni attendre l'abaissement du niveau de l'eau.

Dans les trois cas :

1°/ placement de la nasse devant l'ouverture d'écoulement de l'eau ; 2°/ chasse dans la partie endiguée ; 3°/ mise à sec de la section ; le produit de la pêche est partagé en parts égales, entre les femmes qui ont participé au travail.

Ces trois méthodes de pêche, sont en vogue chez toutes les populations riveraines du Congo Kasai, du Mfimi, du Lac Léopold II et de la Basse Lukenie.

Dans la Haute Lukenie; à partir du secteur d'Oshwe, la fabrication des nasses disparait. C'est à peine que de temps à autre les femmes endiguent une partie des rivières et ruisseaux de l'intérieur pour les vider au moyen de paniers et capturer ainsi le poisson.

Les Ipanga, Batitu, Bokala et Yaelima ne s'occupent point de la pêche. Ce sont des gens de la forêt et non point des hommes de l'eau. La chasse est leur principale occupation, la pêche leur est inconnue.

Ces tribus se distinguent sous ce rapport complètement de leurs voisins de l'Ouest. Cependant il convient de remarquer que même parmi ces derniers, tous les clans ne s'occupent point de la pêche. Les groupements de l'intérieur ne pratiquent pas plus la pêche que leurs frères du secteur d'Oshwe et de Bumbuli. Les nasses et autres engins dont nous parlerons ultérieurement sont inconnus des uns comme des autres. Sous ce rapport toutes ces populations ont un caractère commun, rappelant leur origine commune. Mais dans la Basse Lukenie et plus vers l'Ouest, une partie de la population, les Bandzali ou gens de l'eau se sont adaptés aux conditions nouvelles du milieu et de l'habitat. La rivière devint pour eux une source de richesse et de bien être et une partie de leur activité sociale s'orienta vers l'exploitation de cette ressource précieuse.

Actuellement la pêche et la fabrication du sel forment à peu près les seuls moyens d'existence et indiscutablement les occupations principales de tous les groupements riverains de la région de Léopoldville, de Kwamouth, du Lac Léopold II et de la Basse Lukenie. Chez toutes les tribus de cette région, nous avons pu distinguer nettement les groupes de l'intérieur, s'occupant principalement de la chasse et les groupements riverains s'adonnant de préférence à la pêche et la fabrication du sel.

Il s'estformé de cette façon deux clans dans un même groupe ethnique ; l'un et l'autre appartiennent à la grande famille désignée du nom de la tribu et cependant pour cette partie de leur vie, leurs mœurs, us et coutumes diffèrent totalement.

A la saison sèche, on voit les indigènes des villages situés à deux et trois heures de marche à l'intérieur, venir établir des campements à la rive et y former de véritables pêcheries. Les renseignements qui suivent se rapportent à ces groupes et s'appliquent à toutes les populations de Léopoldville au secteur de Tolo inclusivement. Les rivières, lacs et marais de cette région sont excessivement poissonneux. A titre de renseignement, nous donnons ici la liste de quelques noms indigènes de poissons anotés par M. Bayens et se rapportant aux Bandzali de la région de Tolo : « kinkure mbieme, lepari, ignogniengе, mpushu, lokanga, itike, mokonga, n'sombo, loana, sabere, Iboie, moelo, n'ikulu, m'binga, pesule, m'butu, mondja, mshime, mockiki, lupungu, ompara, n'vunu, longelenzali, monkie, komoe, ikeke, koshoie, nokama, singa, n'guikemen, m'pio, mwiki, ekambela, lekumu, elangu, evuya, mekamo, m'beli, motume., idzore, kebaie, kupu, mokeja, kevuni, mopa lekeje, mipari.

Outre la pêche au barrage ces différents groupes font la pêche individuelle et la pêche en communauté.

La pêche individuelle comprend:

1°/ La pêche à l'hameçon ou à la ligne.

Le hameçon est formé d'un très fin éclat de faux bambou, replié sur lui-même et maintenu en forme d'hameçon, par une fine fibre de raphia. Cette fibre de raphia est prolongée et forme la ligne de pêche. Elle est munie d'un éclat de bambou servant de flotteur. L'indigène ne s'attarde pas à surveiller sa ligne. Il attache les lignes munies de hameçons à une corde faite en fibres tordues. Les lignes sont distancées de 30 à 50 cms. La corde est longue de 10 à 15 mètres et attachée des deux côtés à un bâton. L'indigène plante dans le lit de la rivière deux pieux. Il y attache les deux extrémités de la corde en ayant soin de la tendre perpendiculairement au courant. Les lignes munies du flotteur et du hameçon sont déroulées, l'appat formé d'une boule de chikwangue ou d'un ver de terre, fixé au hameçon et l'ensemble est lancé à l'eau. Sous la poussée du courant, ces lignes sont entrainées et se placent parallèlement les unes aux autres retenues par la grande corde tendue au dessus de l'eau. Le poisson attiré par l'appat, le prend et avale en même temps l'hameçon qui lui reste dans l'estomac. Tout effort pour s'en débarrasser, ne peut que le ferrer plus solidement. L'indigène passe 4 à 5 fois pendant le jour, le long de la corde et relève une à une les lignes. Le poisson pris est détaché en coupant la fibre du hameçon, éventré et lancé dans la pirogue.

Le hameçon est remplacé par une pièce de la réserve en attendant qu'au nettoyage de la prise, l'indigène retrouve celui qu'il vient de couper.

L'indigène pratique également la pêche à la ligne de fond et la ligne dormante sans flotteur. Le hameçon est d'un plus grand calibre et le plus souvent en fer. La corde solide est enduite d'huile, pour la rendre plus durable. L'appat formé d'un morceau de chikwangue recouvre tout le hameçon. La ligne est lancée à l'eau, lestée au moyen de cailloux et attachée à un pieux fixé sur la berge. L'indigène ne lève ces lignes qu'au matin et au soir. Elles ne servent qu'à la pêche au gros poisson.

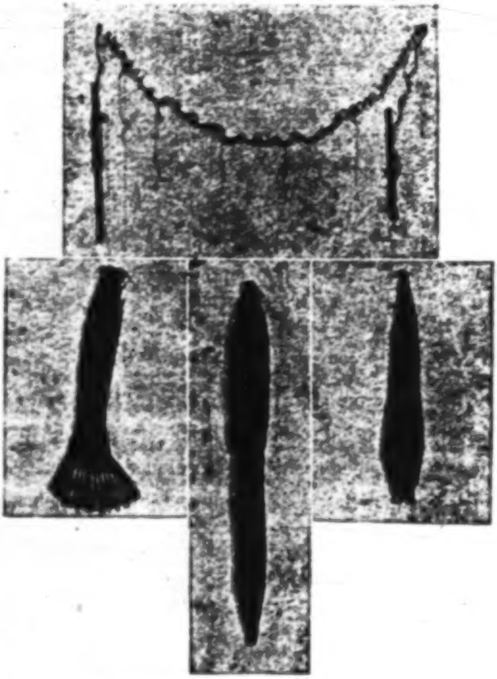

FIG. 54. — Nasses et lignes de pêche utilisées au Lac Léopold II.

2°/ La pêche à l'arc et la flèche. Elle est un des moyens dans lesquels les indigènes excellent pour capturer le poisson. Aux heures chaudes de la journée, ils s'installent commodément dans leur pirogue glissée entre les herbes et attendent patiemment qu'un gros poisson vienne errer à la surface de l'eau. Aussitôt ils bandent l'arc et lancent la flèche. Habiles tireurs ils ne manquent que bien rarement leur but. Généralement le poisson transpercé de part et d'autre, est enfilé sur la flèche. Gêné dans ses mouvements il essaie vainement de plonger. L'indigène dépose son arc, calcule son élan, plonge, ramène le poisson et remonte dans sa pirogue.

3°/ La pêche au harpon, est spécialement pratiquée pour la capture des poissons, qui vivent dans la vase. L'indigène s'y adonne avec une véritable passion. Debout dans sa pirogue, il se laisse entraîner au fil du courant, avance lentement sans que le moindre trouble de l'eau ne vienne effrayer le poisson. D'ûn mouvement lent, régulier, méthodique, il plonge son harpon se laissant guider par son instinct et le hasard. Les secousses provoquées par les efforts du poisson atteint, cherchant à s'échapper, avertissent le pêcheur expérimenté de son succès. Immédiatement il accentue la pression et puis d'un mouvement lent, régulier et méthodique il retire le harpon, évitant de détacher la prise par un mouvement trop brusque.

Le harpon de pêche est formé d'une hampe en bambou mesurant environ 2m 50 sur laquelle sont fixées à l'aide de ligatures en éclats de rotang quatre tiges en bois. Au sommet de chacune de ces quatre branches, est fixé une pointe en fer munie de quatre crochets et terminée par une douille de forme conique.

Les dimensions des nasses en éclats de rotang avec entrée barbelée vers l'intérieur varient de l'une à l'autre, mais toutes sont construites d'après la même technique. A l'intérieur l'indigène dépose un appât et plonge la nasse toute entière dans l'eau. Le poisson attiré par l'appât cherche à s'en emparer et pénètre dans la nasse par l'entrée aménagée à cet effet sur le côté. Cette entrée facile de l'extérieur, est hérissée de pointes vers l'intérieur, qui empêchent le poisson de sortir de la nasse. La forme des nasses à petits poissons est longue, tubulaire et étroite. Elles s'ouvrent à l'une des extrémités. L'entrée est placée vers le milieu de la nasse. Les nasses qui servent à capturer les gros poissons ont une forme tronconique, le sommet en ligne droite. L'entrée du piège, construite sur le même principe que celle des petites nasses, est placée à l'avant de la nasse, l'ouverture vers l'intérieur. Ces nasses se placent devant les couloirs de sortie des marais et rivières endigués.

5° La pêche au piège généralement établi dans les eaux au courant assez intense. Le piège a une forme conique, la base mobile formant un couvercle, le sommet étant prolongé par un fort rotang flexible formant ressort. Une liane est attachée à l'extrémité de ce rotang. Un trapèze libre est fixé au corps de la nasse. L'appât s'attache à l'intérieur de la nasse à un éclat de rotang. Celui-ci est relié à une petite traverse, mobile sur les côtés du trapèze. La liane fixée à l'extrémité du rotang ressort, passe à l'intérieur de la nasse par une des mailles voisines de l'arc de consolidation de l'entrée et est attachée au couvercle mobile. Le piège est construit de façon à ce que non armé, le couvercle ferme l'ouverture sous l'effet de la tension du rotang-ressort. Pour armer le piège l'indigène attache vers le milieu de la liane, un éclat de rotang auquel est fixé un petit bâtonnet. L'extrémité (A) de ce dernier passe derrière la barre du trapèze ; la pointe (B) est mise en arrêt sur la traverse mobile (C). A cette dernière, l'indigène relie un éclat de rotang, à l'extrémité duquel il fixe l'appât. Celui-ci est formé d'une noix de palme non dépouillée de sa pulpe. Pour atteintre l'appât le poisson s'engage dans la nasse, prend l'appât, l'attire et déplace la traverse de déclanchement (C). Les arrêts (A) et (B) deviennent libres, le rotang ressort se détend et le couvercle se ferme, emprisonant le poisson.

Le poisson pris dans une pêche individuelle appartient au propriétaire du piège ou à celui qui l'a placé. L'indigène respecte ce droit, les coutumes punissent d'ailleurs très sévèrement les délits. La loi indigène est rigoureuse au point que celui qui dans l'occurrence serait pris en flagrant délit de vol, s'expose à être chassé de la communauté.

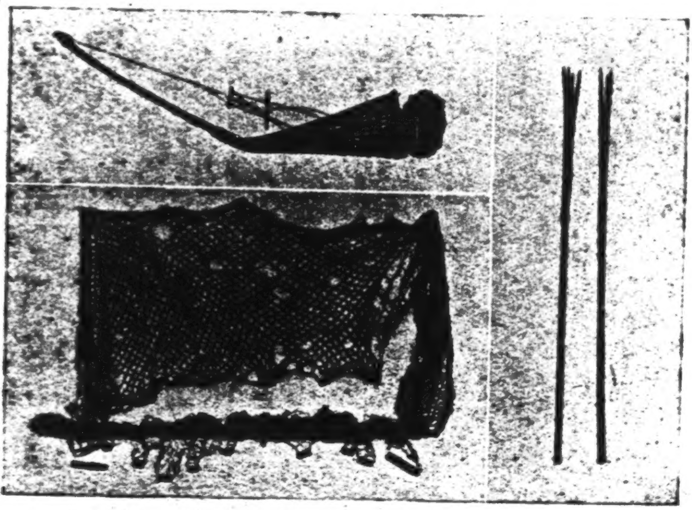

Fig. 56. — Piège à poisson. — Filet de pêche muni de flotteurs. Harpons de pêche du Lac Léopold II.

Le rendement de la pêche individuelle n'est guère très important ; elle n'est d'ailleurs exploitée que pour varier un peu le menu et ne réussit qu'à cause de la richesse énorme de ces rivières poissonneuses.

La pêche en communauté est beaucoup plus productive. Certaines tribus, ou pour être plus exact, certaines familles des populations de la Mfimi-Lac Léopold II - Basse Lukenie en font une véritable industrie. Celle-ci est particulièrement florissante chez les riverains du pays des Basakata, Balesa et des Mosengere.

Dans la région de la Basse Mfimi de même que le long des rives marécageuses de la Basse Lulonga, les installations de pêcheries indigènes sont très nombreuses. Elles sont copiées sur un type uniforme et ne présentent jamais un caractère d'établissement fixe. A la fin de la saison des pluies on voit les familles des riverains quitter temporairement leur village, pour aller s'établir le long des rivières marécageuses. Hommes et femmes s'y transportent ; les enfants, les vieillards et quelques indigènes valides restent au village pour garder les pénates.

Les campements de pèche sont établis d'une façon très rudimentaire. Les huttes ne forment que des abris, des refuges.

La récolte des herbes salines destinées à la fabrication du sel est la principale besogne des femmes ; les hommes s'occupent de la pèche.

Toutes les méthodes de la pèche individuelle sont appliquées mais la grosse besogne se fait en communauté.

Les procédés sont assez variés ; signalons :

1° L'endiguement des embouchures des petites rivières et affluents secondaires avec placement de la nasse devant le couloir d'écoulement et la chasse au poisson décrite plus haut.

Parfois les indigènes encerclent une partie des rives herbeuses, pénètrent dans l'enclos et fouillent les herbes pour y capturer les poissons. Si voulant prendre le large les poissons essaient de s'enfuir ils s'enchevêtrent dans les mailles du filet.

3° Pêche au moyen de claies. Cette méthode est la plus courante ; elle est plus facile et de meilleur rendement que les autres. Les claies sont formées par de grands éclats de rotang ou de raphia, placés parallèlement à 1 ou 2 cms. de distance. Les lacis de tressage en rotang sont espacés de 20 à 30 cms. La hauteur des claies varie de 66 cms. à 2m50 ; la longueur de 10 à 20 mètres. Ces claies servent à établir des barrages dans la rivière, les marais, les criques et devant les embouchures des petits affluents. Elles sont fixées à des pieux et placées perpendiculairement dans le lit de la rivière. Les indigènes les mettent en place au moment de la première descente des eaux. Un peu en amont des claies ils jettent dans la rivière quantité de branches, munies de leurs feuilles, de façon à ménager un abri au poisson arrêté à la descente. Au moment où les eaux sont très basses, les indigènes remontent la rivière sur une très grande distance. Ils pénètrent dans l'eau, forment un cordon serré et méthodiquement il descendent vers la claie. Tout le poisson est chassé vers le barrage. Arrivés à 25 ou 30 mètres de la claie, les indigènes introduisent dans l'eau une nouvelle claie. Une partie des pêcheurs sont chargés de maintenir cette claie verticalement. Les autres pénètrent dans l'enclos formé par les deux claies, enlèvent branches et herbes d'abri et commencent la chasse au poisson. Ils sont munis d'un panier tronconique et tressé à claire-voies. Le pêcheur pose le panier devant lui, sur le lit de la rivière, la grande ouverture vers le bas. S'il y a du poisson pris dans le panier, le pêcheur en est prévenu par de légers heurts contre les parois, causés par les poussées du poisson cherchant à s'échapper. Le pêcheur y plonge la main en la passant par l'ouverture supérieure, fouille tout l'intérieur, saisit le poisson, lui brise la colonne vertébrale et retire la proie pour la lancer dans la pirogue ou sur la berge.

Le produit de la pêche est transporté au village provisoire, le poisson est éventré, nettoyé et jeté sur l'enfumoir. Celui-ci est formé d'un treillis en rotins d'épaisseur moyenne, soutenu par des traverses placées sur des pieux fourchus fixés en terre. La hauteur moyenne est de $1^{m}25$, la largeur de $2^{m}50$, la longueur de 5 à 10 mètres. En dessous de ces enfumoirs-séchoirs les femmes entretiennent nuit et jour un feu alimenté d'herbes et autres débris peu secs, d'où émane en conséquence une forte fumée. Deux fois par jour tout le poisson est retourné. Après 8 à 10 jours l'opération est terminée. Le poisson séché et enfumé est soigneusement emballé après avoir été trié et classé par grandeur. Une partie de ce poisson forme la réserve familiale, le reste servira d'objet d'échange. Quand l'enfumoir est à peu près libre les hommes remontent la rivière et recommencent la pêche.

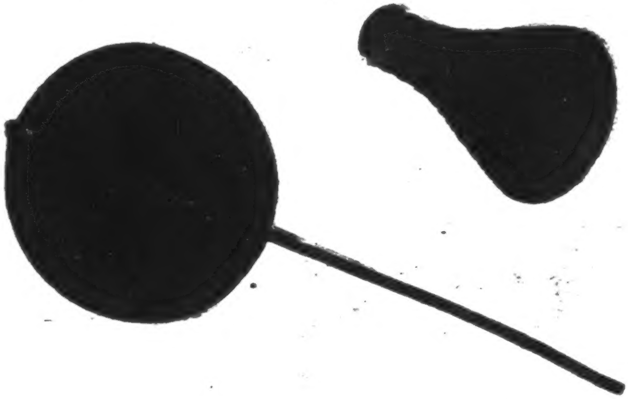

FIG. 57. — Paniers utilisés pour la pêche au Lac Léopold II.

On peut difficilement se rendre compte de l'importance de cette industrie et de la quantité incroyable de poissons que les pêcheurs parviennent à capturer pendant leur séjour dans la région des herbes salines. Nous avons assisté un jour à une de ces pêches miraculeuses, organisée grâce au bienveillant concours de M. Molin. La rivière n'avait été barrée que pendant une nuit, les indigènes ne la remontèrent que sur 150 mètres de distance et en pleine saison sèche, ils ramenèrent quatre grands paniers remplis de poissons.

Le produit de la pêche en communauté est partagé à la fin de la saison. Une part est réservée au chef, les propriétaires des claies de barrage reçoivent une part spéciale ; le restant est partagé entre tous les membres du groupement qui ont participé à l'entreprise.

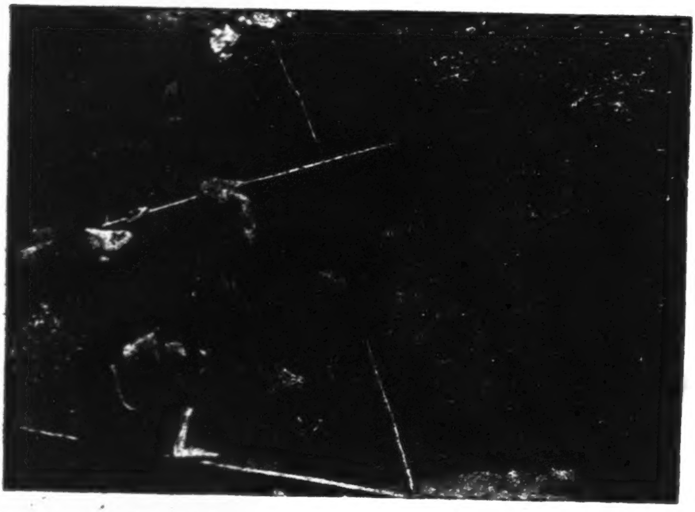

FIG. 58. — La pêche au barrage chez les Mosengere. — Concentration des claies et capture des poissons encerclés.

Pour terminer l'étude sur les moyens d'existence des populations du Kasai - Lac Léopold II - Lukenie, nous pouvons conclure que de l'ensemble des coutumes se rapportant à l'agriculture, l'élevage, la chasse et la pêche il résulte que dans ces différentes branches de la vie, le primitif subit l'influence du milieu, il a adapté ses facultés aux ressources spéciales que la nature lui mettait sous la main, en portant de préférence son activité vers l'exploitation et la mise en valeur des ressources les plus abondantes de la région. Cherchant dans la lutte pour la vie, à obtenir avec un minimum de travail un maximum de rendement, les indigènes issus d'une même branche ethnique aux caractères identiques, ont modifié petit à petit les us et coutumes. En tenant compte du milieu nouveau dans lequel ils étaient amenés par suite des migrations et du déplacement des pénates, certaines familles ou certains groupements se sont réunis pour exploiter en communauté les ressources spéciales du nouvel habitat et tandis que leurs frères de l'intérieur gardaient les coutumes ancestrales, eux ils les abandonnaient au moins partiellement et les remplaçaient par des usages adaptés aux nouvelles conditions de l'existence et du milieu dans lequel ils venaient de s'établir.

Dans l'ensemble nous notons comme caractères ethniques spéciaux :

1° Uniformité dans la culture du manioc, base de l'alimentation de toutes ces populations.

2° Sélection de la culture du maïs sous l'influence de l'encouragement éphémère de Bula Matari chez les populations du Congo-Kasai, et de la culture du riz sous l'influence arabe dans la région de Bena Dibele-Kole. Contrairement à ce que nous avons observé pour le maïs, l'innovation introduite par les arabes tend à s'implanter sérieusement dans la vie de ces indigènes et la culture du riz arrivera probablement à éliminer celle du manioc.

3° Formation d'une zône de culture de canne à sucre dont le développement est en raison inverse de l'étendue des palmeraies.

4° Absence complète de tout élevage un tant soit peu sérieux.

5° Uniformité dans les procédés de chasse en communauté et développement progressif des coutumes et pratiques religieuses s'y rapportant de l'Est vers l'Ouest, correspondant à une décroissance de la chasse individuelle à l'arme blanche. Ce fait nous permet de supposer qu'en principe dans la culture ancestrale, la chasse se pratiquait sans un recours spécial à une force ou un esprit protecteur quelconque ; l'homme primitif ne se basant que sur sa force, son adresse, son audace et la nécessité. Le rendement minime et les accidents de ce sport dangereux auront poussé les primitifs à se grouper ; premier pas vers la chasse en communauté. Au cours de celle-ci des accidents doivent être survenus, atteignant les uns, épargnant les autres. Sans causes apparantes, telle chasse fut heureuse, telle autre nulle. Les indigènes ne pouvant saisir le pourquoi de ces faits en ont naturellement attribué l'origine aux esprits, d'ou résulta le désir de gagner les faveurs de ces esprits. Ainsi s'expliquent les croyances et les pratiques magico-religieuses dont l'intensité, le développement et l'extension sont en raison directe de la disparition de la chasse individuelle.

Nous nous trouvons ainsi devant un exemple typique de l'influence du milieu sur l'évolution et le développement des us et coutumes se rapportant à une partie de la vie des populations primitives de toute la région. Aussi nous ne nous croyons pas autorisés à déduire de la ressemblance des coutumes qui se rapportent à ces quatre branches de l'activité économique de la vie indigène, à l'existence d'une relation ou parenté ethnique quelconque. Seules les traces de coutumes générales, communes à toutes les populations, que nous avons relevées au cours de l'étude, pourraient éventuellement être considérées comme des indices de l'origine commune de toutes les tribus de la région que nous avons visitée.

Le fait que tous les groupements, clans, ou familles, qui sont venus s'établir dans un milieu favorable à l'industrie de la pêche ont adopté les mêmes coutumes appropriées à l'exploitation méthodique de ces ressources nouvelles, montre qu'à conditions égales d'habitat, l'homme a une tendance dans l'exploitation de ces ressources à l'adaptation de coutumes à méthodes identiques. Par contre l'identité des moyens, des outils, des objets, etc. employés à cette exploitation nouvelle, de leur technique, de leur construction, de la méthode de leur utilisation ; en un mot la ressemblance caractéristique des ustensiles, outils et engins de l'industrie nouvelle sont indiscutablement des preuves de l'existence de relations ethniques entre ces différents groupes. Or comme dans l'occurrence, ces groupes appartiennent à des tribus bien déterminées et distinctes les unes des autres, Mosengere, Basakata, Baboma, Wadia et Banfumu ; ces caractères spéciaux forment une preuve éclatante de l'unité ethnique, de l'origine commune et de la parenté ancestrale de ces différentes populations.

L'ALLUME-FEU.

Partout la méthode indigène tend à disparaître rapidement devant l'introduction des allumettes, quoique la plupart des indigènes aient conservé leur briquet primitif et s'en munissent toujours quand ils vont en voyage. Si la boite d'allumettes fait défaut, ou que par suite d'une circonstance quelconque ; humidité athmosphérique, traversée d'une rivière ou d'un marais, etc ; les allumettes ne s'enflamment plus, l'indigène sort son briquet et fait du feu par la méthode indigène.

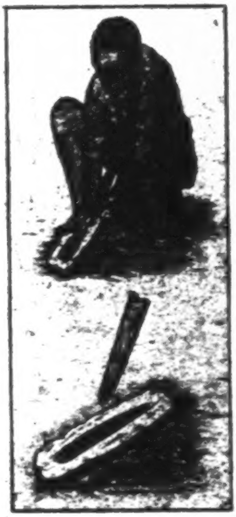

Fig 59.
Allume-feu par friction.

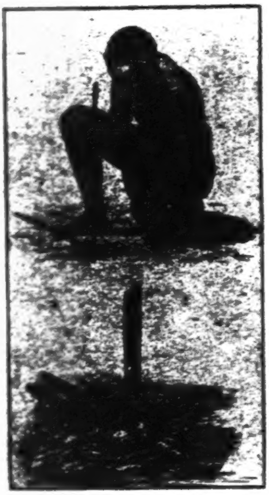

Fig. 60.
Allume feu par giration.

Le briquet des Bateke et des Banfumungu de la rivière se compose d'une lame de fer ou d'acier de 3 à 8 cms. de long sur 2 à 3 cms. de large ; d'une pierre à feu, simple éclat de gneiss, silex, pierre à fusil ou fragment de quartz et de l'amadou. Toute matière sèche et très inflammable peut servir d'amadou ; des feuilles séchées, etc., mais les houppes de fibres végétales que les indigènes recueillent sur les troncs de palmiers ou de bananiers sont d'un usage courant.

Pour obtenir le feu, les Bateke et les Banfumungu de la rivière, préparent un petit bouquet de brindilles sèches au milieu duquel ils déposent une pincée de leur amadou, quelques battements du briquet et une étincelle y met le feu. Un petit point incandescent à peine perceptible, un rien suffit. Aussitôt l'indigène souffle tout doucement dans le bouquet, active le feu, agite légèrement le plumeau de brindilles et bientôt la flamme jaillit.

Pour obtenir le feu par la méthode par friction ou frottement longitudinal, l'indigène se sert de deux morceaux de bois, l'un large et plat d'une essence douce, l'autre long et plus ou moins régulier cylindrique, mais d'une espèce très dure.

Lors de mon voyage à l'intérieur de la région du Kasai-Mfimi-Lukenie, j'eus l'occasion de surprendre sur le vif la manière de se procurer du feu par cette méthode notamment à Bomu, chez les Banfumungu ; à Mpa chez les Mosengere, à Kempa chez les Basakata, à Lubamiti chez les Wadia, à Wambia chez les Batitu, à Wumbuli chez les Bokala et enfin à Lopori chez les Yaelima.

Partout l'indigène procède de la même façon.

Quand il est seul il place à plat par terre le morceau de bois doux, creusé d'une rainure parallèle à l'axe ; s'accroupit et maintient le bois sous l'un des genoux. Tenant le bâtonnet de bois dur des deux mains, il en frotte énergiquement la pointe dans la rainure en lui imprimant un mouvement de va et vient continu. Au bout d'un rien de temps, une fine sciure carbonisée s'amasse à l'une des extrémités de la rainure. En moins d'une minute on voit y apparaitre un point en ignition. L'indigène a eu soin de préparer l'amadou d'avance. Il y dépose le petit foyer incandescent, souffle et bientôt la flamme jaillit.

Quand ils sont plusieurs, ce qui est généralement le cas, un homme place le pied sur la planchette à rainure, tandis qu'un second s'accroupit et frotte la pointe du petit bâton dans la rainure, comme s'il voulait la creuser davantage.

Dans la méthode par giration ou frottement rotatif en usage chez les populations de la région de Bena Dibele-Kole et chez une partie des Yaelima de l'Est, le briquet est formé par deux fines baguettes de forme cylindrique. L'une des baguettes, découpée dans un bois assez tendre, est munie d'une ou de plusieurs encoches. L'autre, arrondie à l'une des extrémités, est d'une essence dure. La baguette aux entailles est placée au dessus de l'amadou, l'autre tenue perpendiculairement, l'extrémité ronde encastrée dans l'entaille. L'indigène imprime à cette dernière un rapide mouvement de rotation en la faisant tourner entre les deux mains, en même temps qu'il les fait glisser de haut en bas de façon à augmenter autant que possible la pression.

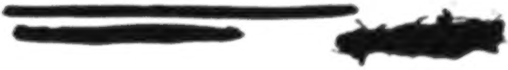

FIG. 62. — Deux baguettes, l'une munie d'encoches.

La grande habileté consiste à produire ce mouvement avec le moins d'arrêts possible. Aussi les indigènes sont-ils généralement plusieurs à ce travail. L'un tient la baguette aux encoches en place, un second fait tourner l'autre bâtonnet, tandis qu'un troisième, s'apprête à continuer le mouvement de giration aussitôt que son compagnon arrive au bas de la baguette. A son tour celui-ci relayera l'autre. Au bout de quelques séries de rotations, une petite pointe incandescente apparaît dans la sciure carbonisée de l'encoche, une étincelle tombe sur l'amadou et celui-ci s'enflamme.

L'aire de dispersion de ces trois méthodes de se procurer du feu, forme dans la région parcourue trois zones ethniques distinctes.

La première n'englobe que les Bateke et une partie des Banfumungu et se caractérise par l'usage du briquet à lame en acier et pierre à feu.

La seconde, système par friction ou frottement longitudinal, s'étend depuis l'intérieur du territoire des Banfumungu jusqu'au milieu de la région occupée par les Yaelima.

La troisième, système par giration ou frottement rotatif, comprend la limite Est du pays des Yaelima et de toute la région de Bena Dibele-Kole.

Cette dernière méthode a également été signalée chez les Balesa et nous avons pu constater que certains indigènes de la région la connaissaient et s'en servaient ; mais elle n'est pas propre à la tribu, et doit avoir été introduite dans la région par des soldats ou travailleurs de l'ancien poste de Tolo, venus de régions ou cette méthode était connue.

Il est d'autre part possible que les Yaelima de l'Est, aient emprunté cette méthode aux populations du Sud, quoiqu'il ne nous ait pas été donné d'obtenir des renseignements précis à ce sujet. Ce qui permet cependant d'émettre cette hypothèse, c'est que dans certains villages Yaelima, nous avons retrouvé les méthodes par friction et par giration, et dans ces cas les indigènes employient de préférence la dernière. Il faut noter que la méthode par giration moins fatiguante est aussi la plus rapide et permet aux indigènes de se relayer. Elle leur donne un maximum de rendement avec un minimum de travail. Rien d'étonnant en conséquence de constater que là où les indigènes ont pu en observer les avantages, ils ont eu soin de l'adopter.

A notre avis la méthode par friction ou frottement longitudinal, doit être considérée comme ayant été jadis exclusivement employée par toutes les tribus, depuis les Banfumungu jusqu'aux Yaelima. Cette méthode se rencontre, peut-être encore chez les tribus de la région de Dekese, malheureusement nous n'avons pu établir le fait.

Toutes ces populations appartiendraient sous ce rapport à un même groupement ethnique, qui se distingue nettement du groupe des tribus de la région de Bena Dibele-Kole.

LE SEL.

La fabrication du sel occupe dans la vie de certaines tribus de la région du Kasai-Lukenie, une place importante. Ne trouvant dans leur pays ni salines ni eau salée, les indigènes ont cherché à se procurer ce précieux condiment indispensable à l'alimentation en l'extrayant des plantes.

Là où la pénétration des produits d'importation n'a pas éliminé la méthode indigène, l'extraction du sel est une véritable industrie nationale. Toute la communauté y collabore.

Chez les Bateke, les Banfumungu, les Baboma et une partie des Wadia, l'introduction du sel a banni complètement de la vie l'emploi et la fabrication du sel indigène.

Celui-ci diffère suivant la région, pour autant que nous n'envisageons que les matériaux employés dans la fabrication.

Chez les Mosengere, les Wadia, les Tumba, les Basakata et les Bobaie, les indigènes se servent exclusivement des herbes salines qui poussent en grande abondance dans les marais et le long des rives marécageuses de certaines rivières de cette région.

Dans le pays des Ipanga, des Batitu, des Bokala et des Yaelima où cette précieuse ressource fait défaut, les indigènes se servent des troncs de bananiers et principalement de la fleur des palmiers dont les cendres sont très riches en matières alcalines.

La récolte des herbes salines se fait vers la fin de la saison sèche.

A cette époque les groupes de Mosengere, Wadia, Tumba, Bobaie et Basakata de l'intérieur, quittent leurs villages pour aller s'établir de long des rivières aux rives marécageuses.

Ils choisissent un emplacement favorable à l'établissement de quelques huttes, qui leur serviront d'abris pendant leur séjour temporaire dans la région. Ces huttes sont généralement très mal conditionnées. Construites en hâte et sans soins, elles forment plutôt des abris provisoires, des refuges de nuit, que des habitations.

Jadis toute l'étendue de la plaine marécageuse couverte d'herbes salines était partagée en secteurs.

Chaque groupe indigène y possédait sa section bien délimitée dont l'exploitation lui était réservée.

L'emplacement des huttes occupées par chaque groupe exploitant, était fixé et choisi de façon à se trouver au milieu de la réserve ou domaine familial.

L'époque de la récolte des herbes salines et la durée de l'exploitation étaient réglementées ; en un mot la Fabrication du sel était une industrie nationale, régie par des lois spéciales auxquelles toute la tribu était tenue de se conformer strictement.

Actuellement les groupes récoltent les herbes salines là où ils le jugent le plus favorable, sans tenir compte ni des coutumes ni des droits du passé. Cette récolte incombe aux femmes.

Tandis que les hommes s'occupent de la pêche, les femmes, armées d'un grand couteau, coupent les hautes herbes, qui poussent dans les marais ou le long des rives inondées de toutes les rivières de la région des Mosengere-Basakata. Quand la nature du sol et le niveau de la rivière le permettent, les herbes sont étalées sur place, pour sécher au soleil ; tandis que dans les endroits inondés, la femme charge la récolte sur la pirogue et la transporte ensuite à l'emplacement du village, installé provisoirement le long de la rive. Les herbes séchées sont tassées par groupe qui dans leur ensemble nous rappellent les meules de foins de nos fermes Européennes.

Lorsqu'une famille juge que sa récolte d'herbes est suffisamment grande, le chef du groupe prépare le terrain ou four d'incinération. La terre de petites termitières finement broyée, est mélangée au limon de la rivière. Le tout, fortement travaillé et malaxé de façon à former une pâte consistante et souple, est étendu sur une petite excavation de 15 à 20 centimètres de profondeur et de 1 à 2 mètres carrés de surface.

Quand ce pavement est bien sec, les femmes se mettent à l'œuvre. L'une d'elles charge le four d'incération et l'allume tandis que les autres apportent à pied d'œuvre les herbes des meules.

Au fur et à mesure que le premier tas se consume, la femme chargée de l'incinération y jette de nouvelles gerbes et le travail se poursuit sans arrêt, accompagné d'un petit chant monotone jusqu'à ce que la récolte complète d'herbes salines soit brulée.

L'incinération dure généralement toute une journée. Pendant ce temps et pendant la période de la préparation du four d'incinération toute relation sexuelle est strictement défendue entre le chef de la famille et la femme chargée de surveiller l'incinération des herbes salines.

Lorsque la dernière brindille est brulée, que le feu est éteint et que les cendres se sont refroidies, les femmes les entassent dans de grands paniers.

Cependant le chef de la famille a confectionné une espèce de grand entonnoir en vannerie, formé de larges et solides éclats de rotang reliés par de fines lanières de pétioles de raphia et de lianes. La hauteur de ces entonnoirs varie de 2 à 3 mètres, le diamètre de la grande ouverture atteint 1m. 50 à 2 m. tandis que le fond est formé par le faisceau d'éclats de rotang reliés tant bien que mal, par une large lanière de rotang. Cet entonnoir est placé debout entre trois ou quatre bâtons fixés dans le sol. Un vase en terre cuite est placé en dessous de l'entonnoir. Les femmes garnissent toute la surface latérale interne de cet entonnoir de feuilles de bananier placées les unes au dessus des autres, de façon à rendre les parois latérales du réservoir absolument imperméables. Elles versent ensuite les cendres de l'incinération dans l'entonnoir, les pressent et les tassent autant que possible.

Lorsque l'entonnoir est rempli aux trois quarts de la hauteur, la femme va puiser une dizaine de pots d'eau, soit environ 50 litres et les verse sur les cendres. Cette eau met deux et parfois trois jours à s'infiltrer complètement. Quand les cendres sont saturées d'eau, la femme verse à nouveau deux ou trois pots d'eau dans l'entonnoir. Dès lors il se produit un écoulement lent d'eau fortement salée, par suite de la dissolution des matières alcalines solubles que comprennent les cendres. Elle est recueillie dans le vase en terre cuite placé en dessous de l'entonnoir. La femme obtient ainsi quatre à cinq pots d'une forte solution de sel et deux pots d'une eau moins saturée de sel. Après avoir remisé ses six ou sept pots d'eau salée, la femme allume son feu et place au dessus de celui-ci une ou plusieurs écuelles en terre cuite dans lesquelles elle verse petit à petit le contenu des pots à forte solution de sel, qu'elle fait bouillir.

A la suite de l'évaporation il se forme au fond et sur les parois de l'écuelle un premier dépôt de sel

La chaleur que dégagent ces foyers d'évaporation est si intense qu'il est impossible de s'en approcher de près ; aussi la femme a-t-elle soin de se munir de deux longues louches pour remplir à distance les écuelles placées sur le feu au fur et à mesure que l'évaporation avance. Le tout est laissé sur le feu jusqu'à ce que toute l'eau salée soit évaporée. Même après l'évaporation complète la femme laisse le vase sur le foyer, active le feu, de façon à sécher complètement et solidifier le dépôt de sel. Celui-ci prend naturellement la forme de la poterie, qui en fin de compte surchauffée éclate, tandis que le bloc de sel reste intact.

Quand la fabrication du sel est terminée, le groupe familial reprend la route du village. Les installations temporaires sont abandonnées et pourront à l'occasion être utilisées par d'autres familles qui en disposeront comme elles l'entendent.

Le produit de la fabrication du sel est partagé en deux parties.

L'une comprend la réserve familiale, calculée d'après les besoins de chaque famille du groupement, clan ou village ayant entrepris l'exploitation. Le reste est réparti entre tous les membres qui ont participé à la récolte, à part égale, sauf que le chef, et la femme qui fût chargée de surveiller l'incinération des herbes reçoivent une part double.

Le sel réservé aux besoins de la famille est employé dans la préparation des aliments et reste la propriété inaliénable de la famille. La part attribuée aux participants de l'extraction devient leur propriété privée.

Chacun, tant l'homme que la femme en dispose à sa guise. Le plus souvent les indigènes s'en servent comme objet d'échange. Chez certaines tribus notamment chez les Mosengere, les Wadia, les Basakata et les Bolaie, les blocs de sel font office de monnaie, ou d'objet d'échange d'un usage courant dont la valeur est déterminée par le poids.

Fig. 64 — Evaporation de l'eau saturée de sel chez les Basakata.

Avant notre pénétration dans la région et plus spécialement avant l'introduction du numéraire et l'imposition de celui-ci par l'administration, le sel occupait dans la vie économique de ces primitifs un rôle beaucoup plus important.

Actuellement il ne s'emploie plus que dans les transactions locales.

Le forgeron et sa famille par exemple, ne participent jamais à la fabrication du sel. Il échange les produits de son métier, couteaux, pointes de flèche ou fers de lance contre la réserve des fabricants de sel.

Il arrive même souvent que les fabricants de sel, vendent le surplus de leur fabrication comme une simple marchandise, au plus offrant. Ils l'apportent au marché, l'exposent en vente, en discutent le prix au même titre que les carottes de manioc, le poisson fumé, la viande boucanée et les paniers d'arachides.

Chose singulière et intéressante à constater, le produit de cette vente ne revient pas intégralement à la femme propriétaire du sel.

Ce fût tout à fait par hasard, que j'eus l'occasion de noter le fait.

Le 18 septembre nous étions à Tenden-Gomo, village Mosengere situé à 7 journées de marche au N. W. du poste de Bongo ; lorsque vers 5 heures du soir, tandis que je me reposais des fatigues d'une journée d'observations dans le village, le vieux chef s'amena majestueusement, suivi d'une femme et de 5 indigènes.

Palaba Mundele, dit-il, et, sans plus de façon, la séance fût ouverte.

La cause ne fut pas ordinaire et le plaidoyer fût si beau que cette affaire nous intéressa. Voici les faits :

La femme, veuve, divorcée, ou séparée, pour la 10ème fois d'après les dires de son dernier époux, pour la 7ème fois de son propre aveu, vint demander au Mundele, de pouvoir se divorcer pour la 11ème ou la 8ème fois. Peu importait le nombre disait-elle, c'est pour convoler en justes noces avec un jeune célibataire Mosengere de 20 ans.

Il y a 10 lunes disait-elle, j'étais sa femme et d'un geste où perçait la haine et le dégoût elle montra son dernier mari. J'avais un enfant. Il était atteint de cette maladie de Nam-Putu (maladie du sommeil) dont on meurt toujours ; et mon mari craignant la contagion m'envoya dans la forêt avec ordre formel d'y rester jusqu'à la mort de mon enfant ou de l'y abandonner. Je partis, je fus seule et abandonnée. Je soignais mon enfant, travaillant le jour, le veillant la nuit. Jamais mon mari ne vint me voir, ni m'apporter des vivres, ni m'aider, ni demander de mes nouvelles ou des nouvelles de mon enfant. L'enfant est mort le . . . . . lo . . . . . lo . . . . . . ilo . . . . . ilo . . . . . seule je l'ai enterré ata . . . . uta . . . . ita . . . . to . . . . seule je l'ai pleuré ndo . . . ndo . . . . indo . . . . ondo . . . . et puis j'ai repris le chemin du village. Quand mon mari me vit rentrer, il voulut m'introduire dans sa hutte et reprendre les relations ; mais je lui ai dit ve . . . . . ve . . . . . ohe . . . . . ve ! Il voulut me forcer à me soumettre nhu . . . . . nhu . . . . . nhu . . . . . ihu . . . . . ohu . . . . . Je lui ai planté mes doigts crochus dans la figure et ailleurs et il est parti ! nla . . nla . . nla . . ola . . nula . . . Depuis il n'a plus insisté hi . . hi . . ihi . . ohi . . . Je n'avais pas oublié ce que j'avais souffert, quand chassée et abandonnée, je soignais seule mon enfant dans la forêt. Aujourd'hui je veux prendre un autre mari ; moi je ne vivrai pas sans un homme. Mon mari actuel serait trop content he . . . he . . . he . . . ihe . . . ohe . . . mais il m'empêche de me marier et mon futur a peur de ses ndoki. Mais vous Mundele na Bula Matari, vous lui direz qu'un homme qui chasse sa femme et son enfant du foyer, qui l'abandonne dans la forêt et qui pendant des lunes ne s'en occupe plus, n'a pas le droit de la forcer à rester près de lui et que mon nouvel époux peut me prendre sans crainte. Que Bula Matari le dise.

Ce plaidoyer fût appuyé de gestes les plus extravagants et singulièrement expressifs. Rien qu'à la regarder, à l'observer, à écouter les variations de sa voix, je compris toute la cause. Elle montra comment elle avait conduit son enfant dans la forêt, combien elle l'avait soigné et caressé, comment il était mort dans ses bras, combien elle l'avait pleuré. Elle nous montra comment de ses deux mains elle lui avait creusé une tombe, et comment la haine dans le cœur elle était revenue au village quand ses yeux étaient secs et qu'elle ne savait plus pleurer son enfant. Ce furent alors les scènes mimées du retour, les propositions amoureuses de son mari, son refus, la colère puis la lutte en règle. Jamais je n'ai assisté à une scène où la mimique des sentiments et des pensées fût aussi parfaite.

Cependant le mari en question avait écouté un peu à l'écart et en dehors de la portée des doigts crochus de son épouse exaltée. Il l'interrompait de temps à autre par des exclamations et des gestes qui semblaient être des protestations. A son tour il défendit sa cause.

Je suis son 10ème époux et elle est une de mes 6 femmes. Elle ne veut plus de moi ; il m'en reste 5 et cela me suffit. Elle veut se marier avec ce va-nu-pied et il désigna le futur mari. — Ceci lui valut de la plaignante une gifle bien appliquée et donnée avec une dextérité et une habilit[illegible] qui nous en disait long. — Soit dit-il, mais qui me restituera la dot que j'ai payée à l'oncle de cette femme ?

Moi dit la femme !

Qui me remboursera les mitako que la femme a enlevés à son retour de la forêt pour les cacher ailleurs ?

Qui me rembousera les impôts que Bula Matari m'a fait payer pour cette femme ? A 2 francs par 13 lunes pendant 5 fois 13 lunes, ne voilà-t-il pas 5 fois 40 mitakos soit 200 mitakos que j'ai payés pour elle ? Qui me les rendra, Bula Matari, les mitakos que j'ai remboursés à son dernier mari, si elle s'en va ?

La femme voulut intervenir à nouveau. mais M^r^. Molin, chef territorial en tournée l'arrêta. Simplifions la question, dit-il.

Votre femme peut s'en aller et se marier à un célibataire, si la dot de 1000 mitako est restituée ! . . . Est restituée répéta l'auditoire.

L'impôt de Bula Matari ne peut en aucune façon intervenir dans la question. Ahurissement des hommes ! Exclamations de joie et satisfaction chez les femmes.

M^r^. Molin se mit à leur exposer au long et au large les raisons et les motifs qui justifiaient cette décision, mais malgré tout, les indigènes et le chef ne semblèrent nullement convaincus ni de la logique ni de la justice de cette décision. Mais Bula Matari avait dit : « ne peut en aucune façon intervenir dans la question » et ils se soumirent ! Enfin resta la question des mitakos volés.

A qui reviennent ces mitakos demanda M^r^. Molin, et l'homme et la femme se lancèrent en avant en criant : à moi !

Ecoutez Mundele, dit la femme, et si je mens qu'il le dise et je lui rendrai tous les mitakos. Quand j'étais sa femme et que mon enfant vivait encore j'allais avec lui et les autres femmes à la rivière faire la provision de poissons et récolter les herbes pour faire du sel. A qui appartiennent les cendres des herbes coupées si ce n'est à la femme ? A la femme répéta l'auditoire.

Chaque femme ne met-elle pas sa part dans le grand entonnoir d'où on extrait le sel pour la famille ; mais ne garde-t-elle pas le reste pour elle ? Ces mitakos ne proviennent-ils pas de la vente du sel que j'ai donné à mon mari pour le porter au marché ? Au marché ! A qui reviennent ces mitako Mundele ? Si ce n'est à moi !

Nve Mundele ! Nve Mundele répèta l'auditoire et le mari exposa à son tour.

Ces mitakos proviennent de la vente du sel de cette femme ; mais qui porta son sel au marché ? Qui le vendit ? Qui fit la route ? Qui fit le transport ? Qui rapporta les mitakos ? Ces mitakos n'étaient-ils pas à elle et à moi ? . . . A elle et à moi ponctua unanimement l'auditoire ?

Tranchons dit M^r^. Molin, il faut en finir et la sentence fût prononcée. Restitution de la dot sans indemnités pour les impôts payés et partage des mitakos du sel à part égale pour elle et pour lui !

Du coup la femme se précipita dans une hutte. Elle en sortit quelques secondes plus tard, chargée d'une grande hotte. Elle la déposa devant nous, enleva un paquet de mitakos, en fit le partage et dit ; ne sont-ils pas dix fois cent ? . . . Dix fois cent ! Puis son mari les enleva. Elle replongea les bras dans la hotte et en sortit une nouvelle botte de mitako, les groupa en deux séries et dit, les mitakos du sel ne sont-ils pas partagés exactement ! Et le mari enleva la moitié du produit de la vente du sel attribué à sa femme, conformément à la sentence de Bula Matari, avec sa nouvelle conquête.

De ceci il résulte clairement que le produit de la vente du sel, propriété de la femme revient à part égale au mari et à la femme. A l'une à cause de son travail, à l'autre à cause des peines et déplacements occasionnés par la mise en vente du produit.

Chez les Wadia, les Tumba, les Babaie, les Basakata et les Balesa. j'eus occasion de constater le même fait. Tant que la femme échange directement sa part du sel fabriqué en communauté, elle garde pour elle l'intégralité du produit de l'échange ; mais quand le mari est chargé de la vente il a, d'après la coutume indigène, droit à une partie du produit.

Cependant le partage ne se fait pas aussitôt après la vente. La somme totale est placée en lieu sûr, une cachette connue du mari et de la femme. Les époux entassent les mitakos, ils thésaurisent jusqu'au jour où de commun accord, ils en font le partage. La coutume réserve à l'homme le 1/4 et les 3/4 à la femme.

Cette coutume n'existe pas chez les tribus situées à l'Est des Balesa. La récolte d'herbes salines ne peut s'y faire, car elles ne poussent que très peu dans la région. Les troncs de bananier, de palmier et la fleur des palmiers ne sont pas assez abondants pour songer à l'établissement d'une grande exploitation. Les femmes parviennent à peine à rassembler les matériaux nécessaires à la fabrication du sel indispensable à la vie courante. Tout le village collabore à la récolte. L'incinération et l'extraction du sel se font au village, d'après le procédé que nous venons de décrire, mais le produit est partagé entre toutes les familles en proportion du nombre de membres de chacune d'elles. La quantité dont on dispose est généralement si restreinte qu'elle peut à peine suffire aux besoins de la vie courante, aussi la valeur du sel y est notablement supérieure à celle qu'y attribuent les populations des régions où abondent les herbes salines.

La différence que nous observons ici entre les populations Mosengere, Basakata et les tribus situées plus à l'est, ne peut être considérée comme un caractère ethnique spécifique. Elle résulte simplement des conditions locales de l'habitat de ces tribus. Elle ne peut servir de base à l'établissement d'une relation ethnique quelconque entre les différentes populations de la région, mais elle forme un exemple typique de l'influence qu'exerce le milieu sur certaines coutumes indigènes.

L'ouverture des régions de la haute Lukenie au commerce Européen élimine petit à petit la fabrication du sel par la méthode indigène.

Nous avons remis quelques échantillons de sel indigène récoltés au cours de notre voyage, à M. L'Heureux, attaché au laboratoire du Musée, qui a bien voulu nous transmettre les résultats de l'analyse.

Sel nº 1215 récolté chez les Mosengere

Pertes au feu	1,28
Insoluble	0,49
Chlorure de potasse	46,80
Chlorure de soude	39,56
Sulfate de soude	9,94
	98,07

Il faut ajouter de légères traces de nitrates, de légères traces de fer, des traces de chaux (0,01 °/o), de fortes traces d'acide phosphorique (0,34 °/o), des traces de magnésie (0,09 °/o).

Notons l'absence totale de CO_2.

Ce sel, provenant de la calcination de plantes, se présente comme du sable gris sâle. Il possède une odeur caractéristique qui n'est pas tout à fait désagréable. Il est très riche en sel de potasse : ce qui le rend impropre à l'alimentation. A haute dose, les sels de potasse provoquent l'inertie motrice des muscles sans contracture ; le cœur se ralentit et s'arrête en diastole.

Il peut servir comme engrais pour les végétaux très riches en potasse. Sa teneur en potasse est environ du double de celle des sels de Strassfurt connus de nos agriculteurs sous le nom de « Kaïnite ».

Le sel n° 2679bis, a l'aspect d'un sable très fin, de couleur noirâtre.

Au point de vue chimique, il n'offre aucun intérêt, au point de vue botanique, il s'agirait de savoir si le produit provient d'une seule espèce de plante, s'il provient de la calcination des feuilles, des jeunes pousses, du tronc, des racines, etc...

Comme aliment il est à rejeter.

Il peut être employé comme engrais.

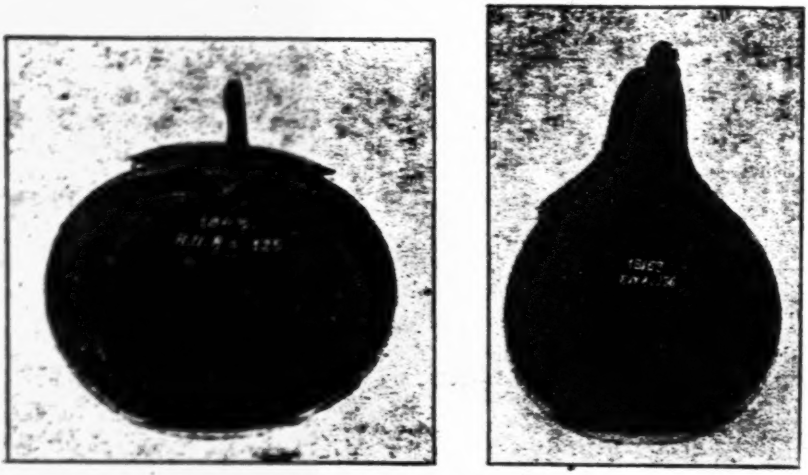

FIG. 66. — Calebasses salières utilisées par les populations du Lac Léopold II.

PRÉPARATION DES ALIMENTS,

Le manioc peut être considéré comme l'aliment principal, la base de l'alimentation de toutes les populations de la région visitée.

Depuis les Bateke de Léopoldville, jusqu'au Bankutshu de Bena Dibele-

Kole ; toutes les tribus cultivent le manioc, récoltent les tubercules, les rouissent, en extraient la farine dont ils fabriquent des chikwangues.

Les indigènes connaissent deux espèces de manioc, notamment le manioc doux et le manioc amer.

Le manioc doux n'est pas très estimé à cause de son goût fade et le peu de consistance des chikwangues.

Abstraction du rouissage, que seul le manioc amer doit subir, la préparation de la chikwangue est la même ; que la farine provienne du manioc doux ou du manioc amer.

La première récolte des carottes de manioc se fait 8 à 10 mois après la plantation. Cependant les indigènes n'entament sérieusement leurs cultures qu'à la seconde année. La femme seule s'en occupe.

Les carottes de manioc, entassées dans de grandes hottes sont transportées au puit de rouissage : une mare d'eau putride, sâle, boueuse, d'où s'échappe une odeur de putréfaction et de fermentation très désagréable, est spécialement réservée à cet effet.

Les racines de manioc y restent plongées pendant cinq à huit jours, afin de les faire fermenter et leur enlever ainsi le goût amer. Au bout de ce temps, la femme s'en retourne à la mare, se retrousse autant que le lui permet son pagne primitif, entre dans le marais où elle s'enfonce jusqu'à hauteur des genoux et plongeant les mains et les bras dans la boue elle en retire une à une les racines et les jette sur la berge. Quand sa provision lui parait suffisante, elle l'entasse dans sa hotte et s'en va la laver à la rivière. Rentrée au village elle coupe les carottes, les laisse sècher un tant soit peu au soleil, et enlève ensuite la pelure. Les Bakete, les Banfumungu et toutes les tribus de la Mfini-Lac Léopold II-Lukenie jusqu'à la limite du territoire des Bobaie, Balesa, hachent les sections de racines de manioc, avant de les réduire en farine; les Ipanga, les Batitu, les Yaelima et les Bokala les écrasent entre les doigts, avant de les jeter dans le mortier.

Le couteau à chikwangue a une lame à deux tranchants, une nervure médiane longitudinale et une forme ovale longue et relativement large. Il se termine en pointe aux deux extrémités. L'une de celles-ci s'encastre dans une poignée en bois à section biconcave verticale formant manche.

Actuellement le Musée ne possède encore que deux couteaux de ce genre. On les retrouve cependant dans chaque hutte indigène du Kasai-Mfimi-Lukenie jusqu'au secteur d'Oshwe mais il est presqu'impossible de les acheter aux indigènes. La femme ne pouvant s'en passer un jour, et n'en ayant jamais de réserve ; ne cède à aucun prix son couteau à chikwangue.

Après avoir hâché les carottes de manioc aussi finement que le lui permet l'outil primitif dont elle dispose, la femme en retire les fibres ligneux, les restants d'écorce et autres corps durs, puis elle prend l'etuti auquel elle imprime des deux mains un mouvement de demi roulement alternatif en avant et en arrière. Tout en faisant ce travail, elle a soin de remuer de temps à autre la farine et d'enlever les impuretés qu'elle y trouve.

Quand la farine est bien fine, la ménagère l'arrose d'un peu d'eau, la pétrit, la travaille, en forme une pâte consistante d'une couleur blanc-gris-pâle, la malaxe et en éloigne avec un soin minutieux, jusqu'à la toute dernière trace d'impureté. Elle divise alors sa pâte en morceaux de la grosseur d'un décimètre cube, qu'elle roule en boules plus ou moins régulières, ou en forme de saucissons longs de 20 à 25 cm. Ces boules ou saucissons sont soigneusement enveloppés de feuilles de bananier ou de masisa et le tout est entouré d'éclats de rotang ou de raphia très souples servant de lien à ficeler.

Chez les Ipanga, les Batitu, les Bokala et les Yaelima, nous n'avons nulle part retrouvé le pilon d'écrasement. La femme se sert au contraire du long pilon cylindrique et d'un mortier en bois, grossière planche très épaisse, lourde, de forme tantôt carrée, tantôt ronde, mais toujours très irrégulière. Très souvent le mortier est formé d'un panier en éclats de rotang ou de raphia de forme rectangulaire à rebords très peu élevés.

Fig. 68. — Baboma hachant le manioc.

Au lieu d'écraser le manioc pour en faire de la farine elle le pétrit et travaille la pâte de la même façon et dans le même mortier.

Quand la pâte est suffisamment travaillée et que toute trace d'impureté en a été éloignée, elle la roule en saucissons et les enveloppe de feuilles de bananier comme nous venons de le décrire plus haut.

Les Basongo-Meno et les Bankutshu, pilent le manioc dans de grands mortiers en bois, de forme cylindrique, irrégulière et se servent de très grands pilons. La hauteur des mortiers et la longueur des pilons obligent les femmes de cette région à se tenir debout pour préparer la farine de manioc ; tandis que dans la région du Kasai-Mfimi-Lukenie y compris les secteurs d'Oshwe et de Bambuli, les femmes sont assises à ce travail.

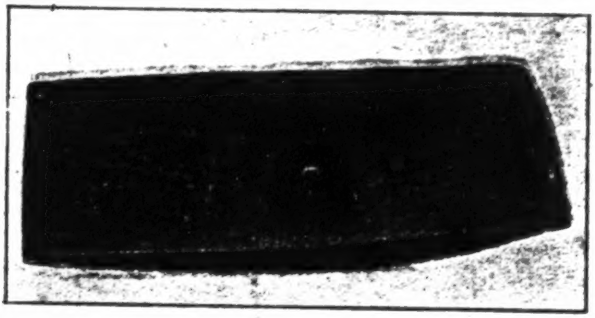

Fig. 69. — Mortier à manioc avec poterie pilon (l'étuti). Tribu des Banfumu.

En outre les premières ne peuvent enlever au cours de leur travail ni fibres, ni corps durs ou autres impuretés, qui se rencontrent dans la farine. Aussi ont-elles soin de la tamiser.

Le petit panier tamis a la forme d'une large calotte aux bords peu élevés et le fond est tressé à jour.

La farine tamisée est recueillie dans de petits paniers, puis transformée en pâte, roulée en petits pains, enveloppés de feuilles de bananier ou de masisa, comme nous venons de le décrire.

La cuisson des chikwangues se fait d'une manière identique chez toutes les populations visitées.

Au fond d'une marmite en terre cuite la femme place un gril en bois. Elle y verse de l'eau jusqu'au niveau de ce gril, tapisse tout l'intérieur de la poterie de feuilles de bananier et y place les pains ou saucissons les uns au dessus des autres. Non seulement elle en remplit le vase, mais elle en entasse encore bien au dessus du bord et recouvre le tout de nouvelles feuilles de bananier, liées et ficelées avec tant de soins et de précautions que le tout est hermétiquement clos. La poterie est placée sur le feu, pendant plusieurs heures. La cuisson des chikwangues se fait donc à la vapeur.

Après la cuisson la pâte de farine de manioc a pris un aspect de pain très gras, ambré, très légèrement translucide sur les bords et de consistance plutôt molle. C'est la chikwangue; la fameuse Kwanga des indigènes qui remplace dans leur alimentation notre pain.

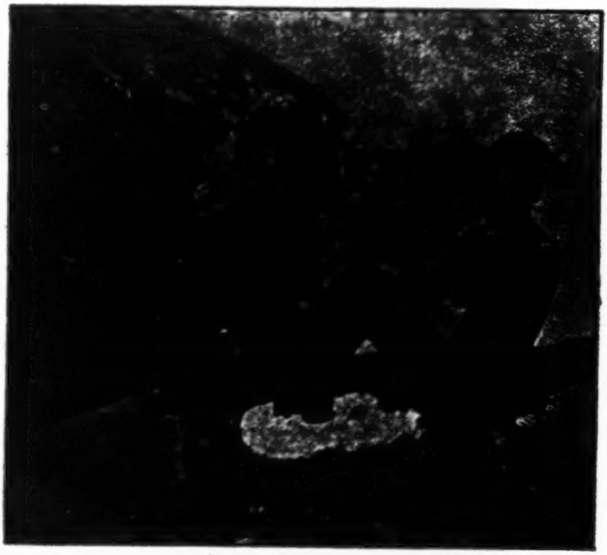

FIG. 70. — Femmes Yaelima préparant le manioc.

Si la méthode de cuisson est la même, partout où nous avons passé, la poterie employée à la cuisson diffère notablement d'une région à l'autre.

Du Stanley-Pool à la région de Bumbuli, les indigènes se servent d'un grand vase en terre cuite généralement très peu ornementé, à surface extérieure irrégulière, rugueuse, marquée de lignes verticales.

Les quelques spécimens que nous avons récoltés sont les seuls que possède le Musée du Congo Belge.

La forme est ovale, allongée, le fond si peu arrondi que la poterie ne pourrait être placée verticalement sur un plan horizontal. L'ouverture supérieure est large. Le bord peu élevé et très incliné chez les Balesa, les Bateke, tandis que chez les Ipanga et les Batitu le bord est plus large et moins incliné. Ces dernières poteries sont en outre très souvent ornées de deux ou trois lignes gravées circulaires. Au fur et à mesure que l'on s'avance vers l'Est, la forme ovale tend à disparaître. La marmite devient sphérique, le bord plus large et l'ornementation gravée plus régulière et plus soignée.

Chez les Bokala et Yaelima, les vases servant à cuire les chikwangues ont le fond en forme d'une calotte sphérique, le bord renversé assez large, le col et la panse à arêtes vives et nettement coudées. L'ornementation gravée est formée par deux ou trois lignes circulaires placées immédiatement au dessus de la coudure de la panse. Ces lignes parallèles sont entrecoupées en trois ou quatre places par de petits groupes de huit à dix petits creux. La partie coudée de la panse est en outre très souvent ornementée de lignes obliques entrecroisées.

Ces types de poteries à chikwangues semblent être les formes modernes.

Les pièces très anciennes, dont nous avons heureusement pu retrouver un spécimen encore intact; présentent une forme moins caractéristique. Le fond est rond, irrégulier, la panse plus ou moins coudée mais sans arête vive, le col légèrement recourbé sans surface plane nette.

Les Bokala, les Yaelima, etc., placent un gril en bois au fond du vase à chikwangue; tapissent l'intérieur de feuilles et tassent les pains de farine de manioc en petits monticules au dessus du bord de la poterie. Pour assurer la stabilité de ces pyramides d'une nature spéciale, ils fixent très souvent un lacis en cordes, genre filet à grosses et larges mailles; à la moulure du col. L'ouverture supérieure de ce filet peut s'ouvrir et se fermer à volonté et les pains à chikwangue s'y entassent, comme dans un filet. Il arrive aussi que le gril en bois est remplacé par une cloison en terre cuite prolongeant le bord de la poterie. Cette cloison est percée de larges ouvertures rondes. Les poteries de ce genre sont cependant très rares. Nous n'avons pu en trouver que quelques spécimens. Les indigènes n'y tiennent pas beaucoup; ils les considèrent comme peu pratiques pour la préparation des chikwangues, mais ils les emploient volontiers pour sécher et fumer leurs provisions.

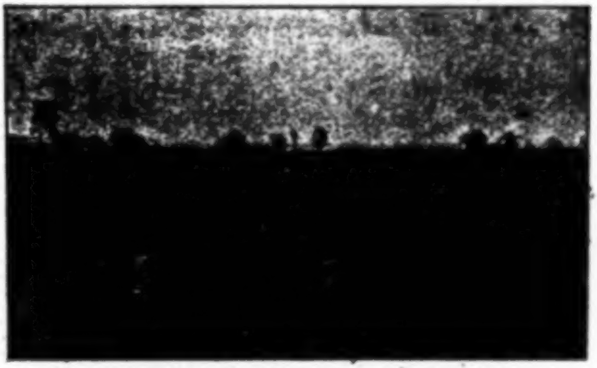

Fig. 72. — Chikwangues apportées au poste.

Au delà des Yaelima, notamment chez les populations de la région de Bena Dibele-Kole, la poterie servant à cuire les pains de manioc ressemble plutôt aux anciennes marmites en terre cuite d'Europe. La forme est sphéroïdale, très régulière, le col un peu recourbé, arrondi et légèrement cintré. La partie supérieure de la panse est ornée de larges lignes circulaires, de petites lignes placées en arcs de cercle et de petits pointillés. Ces poteries ont une couleur brune-noire marbrée et sont couvertes d'une légère couche de vernis.

La cuisson des chikwangues se fait également par la vapeur. Il convient cependant de remarquer que la chikwangue n'occupe pas le même rang prépondérant dans l'alimentation des populations de la région de Bena Dibele-Kole, quoiqu'elle en forme encore de nos jours un des éléments principaux.

FIG. 73. — Bateke triturant le manioc.

Les Basongo Meno et les Bankutshu, mangent également le Kifunge, pain de manioc qui se prépare comme suit : la ménagère met chauffer de l'eau dans un grand récipient en terre cuite à fond arrondi, genre de large calotte sphérique, la panse à peu près droite, mais cependant à arête vive, le col non cintré, légèrement évasé. Lorsque l'eau commence à bouillir, elle y jette la farine de manioc par petites quantités à la fois, mélange constamment le tout au moyen d'une longue spatule en bois poli. Lorsque la farine a absorbé à peu près toute l'eau, le vase est enlevé du feu et on ajoute rapidement une nouvelle quantité de farine de manioc tout en ayant soin de tourner vivement le mélange. On obtient ainsi une sorte de pain mou que les indigènes appellent Kifungo. Les Bankutshu et les Basongo Meno, se servent également de la farine de maïs ou de millet pour la fabrication du Kifungo. L'un et l'autre sont pilés dans les gros mortiers servant à fabriquer la farine de manioc et le tout est passé dans les tamis en vannerie.

Le Kifungo se mange toujours à chaud. La ménagère le sert sur un plat en bois préalablement frotté d'huile de palme.

Nous voyons ainsi que les populations de la région de Bena Dibele se distinguent des autres tribus non seulement par la manière de fabriquer la farine de manioc, la forme des ustensiles, mortier, pilon, tamis et poteries employés à cet effet; mais encore par l'usage spécial de la farine de manioc et l'emploi de la farine de maïs et de millet dans la fabrication du Kifungo. Il y a donc là, sous ce rapport deux groupes ethniques qui semblent bien distincts l'un de l'autre. Malheureusement il est bien difficile d'établir si le Kifungo est bien propre à la civilisation de ces indigènes, où s'il a été introduit dans leur vie par les populations Basonge-Baluba du Sankuru-Lubefu. Interrogés à ce sujet les indigènes nous disaient tantôt qu'ils fabriquaient le Kifungo depuis toujours, tandis que certains vieillards prétendaient que dans leur enfance le Kifungo était encore inconnu.

Fig. 74. — Femmes Batetela égrainant le maïs et préparant les légumes

Ainsi que nous l'avons observé, les populations situées à l'Ouest de la région de Bena Dibele-Kole cultivent le maïs. Cette culture est d'une importance secondaire, sauf dans la région des Banfumungu de Kapanda et d'Engrei.

Le maïs récolté avant la maturité se mange frais ou grillé au dessus d'un petit feu. Les épis qui mûrissent sur pied, sont soigneusement égrainés ; les graines pilées dans un mortier en bois au moyen d'un pilon cylindrique ; la farine vannée ou tamisée.

Le mortier à farine de maïs est formé par un tronçon d'arbre muni d'une ouverture rectangulaire creusée dans la surface extérieure, et perpendiculairement à l'axe du tronçon. Ces mortiers sont très primitifs, mal travaillés et très rudimentaires. A côté de ceux-ci on en retrouve parfois qui sont mieux achevés, petits cubes munis d'un tenon ou d'une liane. Remarquons toutefois que chez les Banfumu du S. E. de Tua, nous avons trouvé un mortier de forme analogue dont les indigènes se servaient pour préparer les légumes.

Les tamis à farine de maïs de cette région sont également d'un type spécial. Les parois sont ajourées à claire-voies. La forme générale se rapproche d'une grande bouteille à fond carré, corps cylindrique, col étranglé et bord légèrement évasé.

La ménagère mélange la farine de maïs à l'huile de palme, en forme une pâte plus ou moins épaisse, l'enveloppe soigneusement de feuilles et la fait bouillir pendant 10 à 15 minutes. Ce plat, le Mokwoi des Basakata Mosangere est servi tout chaud, généralement un peu assaisonné d'huile de palme et de poivre pili-pili. Quand l'occasion s'en présente l'indigène y ajoute du poisson ou de la viande. Il est très estimé chez toutes les populations de la région des Batetela-Tadima, mais doit plutôt être considéré comme un plat de luxe que la famille ne peut s'offrir qu'en des circonstances spéciales.

La racine de manioc doux, cuite dans la cendre est un plat plus commun. On le sert tout chaud avec des boutures de verdure du manioc préparées en légumes.

Les patates douces répandues dans toute la région, sont épluchées, cuites à l'eau, écrasées en purée, mélangées à l'huile de palme et servies avec viande ou poisson.

Les arachides se mangent bouillies ou grillées; parfois encore la femme les écrase crues et les mélange à la farine de manioc, ou s'en sert dans la préparation des repas à la place de l'huile de palme.

Quoique les indigènes ne mangent que peu de légumes, exception faite des ignames et des patates douces, les épinards, l'oseille indigène, la petite tomate, une espèce de pourpier et toute une série de feuilles que la femme va cueillir dans la forêt, figurent de temps à autre au menu de la table indigène. La ménagère les écrase dans son petit mortier au moyen d'un pilon cylindrique et met le tout étuver à petit feu, dans de petites casseroles en terre cuite.

Chez certaines tribus, notamment chez les Bokala et les Yaelima, ces petites poteries ont un couvercle en terre cuite, muni d'un petit tenon vertical, tandis que dans les autres régions, la femme recouvre sa casserole, tant qu'elle est placée sur le feu, d'un éclat de calebasse, d'une écorce ou d'un fond d'une poterie usagée.

La banane joue un grand rôle dans l'alimentation indigène. De Léopoldville à Kole, nous avons trouvé les bananiers dans tous les villages, tant autour des postes de l'État, qu'au loin à l'intérieur du pays. La banane se mange crue, grillée, cuite, séchée au soleil et fumée au dessus des claies. Les bananes séchées sont réduites en farine et servies, bouillies, avec les autres plats.

La viande quels que soient sa provenance ou son état, est dévorée avec avidité par toutes les populations. L'indigène en est réduit à se contenter de ce que le hasard lui apporte, du produit de sa chasse et de ce que les Mundele lui abandonnent. Les indigènes ne disposent pas d'assez de moyens pratiques, pour se procurer une nourriture animale abondante. Dans les villages de l'intérieur on ne mange pas souvent de la viande. La perspective d'une bonne ration de viande suffit pour obtenir de l'indigène les plus lourds travaux. Durant tout notre voyage, nos porteurs n'ont jamais réclamé ni par suite des longues étapes, ni à cause des charges trop lourdes, ni au sujet des fatigues, tant qu'ils obtenaient leur ration de 1 à 2 kilogs de viande tous les soirs.

L'indigène aime passionnément la viande, et rien, mais absolument rien ne se perd, des animaux tués à la chasse. Les intestins sont tout spécialement appréciés. Les indigènes les vident très hativement et n'hésitent pas à les manger tout crus. Le plus souvent cependant ils les découpent en petits morceaux qu'ils font bouillir dans de grandes marmites en terre cuite. La graisse est très soigneusement recueillie et conservée pour servir ultérieurement dans la préparation des légumes et des sauces. Le reste est servi avec des légumes, des chikwangues, du kifunde, etc.

La viande coupée en petits morceaux, assaisonnée d'un peu d'huile de palme, de poivre et de sel, est mise sur le feu pour bouillir. Cette préparation se fait dans de petites poteries, qui servent en même temps de plats.

Chez les Bateke et les Banfumungu de l'Ouest (région Tua, Kunzulu, Kwamouth) la forme de ces ustensiles rappelle beaucoup celle des écuelles. Le fond est arrondi, le bord droit légèrement évasé ou cintré et peu élevé.

Chez les Banfumungu de l'Est (région de Tua, Bokala) au contraire ces ustensiles affectent une forme tout autre et peu connue, jusqu'à présent ; une large calotte sphérique très peu élevée, dont le bord large de 2 à 3 ctm, a été replié vers l'intérieur et présente une surface nettement horizontale.

Chez les Baboma de la région de Bokala, Wombali, Mushie, de même que chez les Wadia et les Basakata de l'Ouest, le bord des écuelles présente cette même incurvation caractéristique, mais les parois sont beaucoup plus régulières et bien mieux achevées. La forme est d'ailleurs légèrement différente. Le fond est arrondi, très plat, la panse peu élevée et légèrement incurvée, le bord rentrant horizontal.

La courbure rentrante des parois de certaines poteries se terminant par un bord horizontal intérieur est une caractéristique que nous retrouvons encore, quoiqu'elle soit beaucoup moins accentuée, dans les écuelles employées au même usage chez les Moengere, les Tumba, les Bobaie, les Basakata et les Balesa. Toutes ces populations semblent ainsi avoir une certaine affinité ethnique caractérisée par cette forme spéciale du bord de la poterie. Cependant la forme générale des divers vases que nous avons récoltés dans cette région, nous montre qu'à côté de ce caractère général uniforme, ces différentes tribus ont cependant chacune leur poterie particulière. Celle-ci doit être à notre avis considérée comme un dérivé de la forme primitive, connue et employée par la branche ethnique principale de ces différentes populations. Chacune d'entr'elles a modifié à son goût, ses inspirations, les circonstances et les nécessités locales, la forme primitive; à tel point qu'il s'est créé chez chacune d'elles une forme typique spéciale, qui n'a conservé de la forme originale que les deux caractères essentiels, la courbure plus ou moins accentuée des parois et le bord horizontal intérieur.

Chez les Ipanga, les Batitu, les Bokala et les Yaelima, la forme des petites poteries servant à la préparation de la viande est tout autre. Ici nous ne trouvons ni courbure régulière de la paroi, ni bord horizontal interne. Bien au contraire, le fond est une calotte sphérique, la panse nettement coudée à arête vive, la paroi supérieure ornée de dessins incisés, le bord légèrement incliné et incurvé vers l'extérieur. L'ornementation est celle que nous avons remarquée sur les poteries à chikwangues de cette région.

Plus à l'Est, chez les Basongo-Meno et les Bankutshu, la forme est à nouveau bien différente. Le fond arrondi est surmonté d'une paroi oblique interne sans rebord et placée à arête vive. Cette paroi est généralement très ornementée de dessins incisés et même de moulures en relief.

Pour conserver la viande les indigènes procèdent de deux façons différentes.

Pour les quantités peu importantes, la viande est découpée en morceaux d'un à trois kilos, enfilée sur un bâton et grillée au dessus d'un petit feu. Ce procédé ne donne guère de beaux résultats. Après cinq ou six jours la viande boucanée de cette façon se gâte, ce qui n'empêche point l'indigène de la consommer. C'est la viande et non l'odeur que je mange, dit-il, car après le dîner la viande a disparu et l'odeur nous reste!

Pour les grandes réserves, la viande est découpée en morceaux d'un demi kilog. à un kilog. ; puis mise à bouillir pendant une petite heure sur un feu vif, dans une eau assez salée et bien pimentée. Les morceaux sont ensuite boucanés au dessus d'une grande claie, généralement placée au milieu du village. Cette claie, faite de gros rotins ; de branches vertes, repose sur quatre pieux fourchus, haut de 90 ctm. à 1^{m}20. En dessous de cette claie la femme entretient un feu lent, dégageant beaucoup de fumée. La viande bouillie est légèrement tassée et recouverte de grandes feuilles de bananier. Elle reste sur cette claie deux ou trois jours. Au bout de ce temps elle est boucanée à fond, noire comme du charbon, sèche et coriace, mais elle se conserve presque indéfiniment.

Fig. 75 — Enfumoir de la communauté.

La ménagère emporte sa provision et la dépose dans son grenier, à l'intérieur de sa hutte où elle est à l'abri des rats, des souris et des autres maraudeurs qui fourmillent dans les huttes indigènes.

La cuisson de la viande se fait généralement dans de grands vases en terre cuite.

Chez les Bateke et les Banfumungu ils ont la forme d'une sphère irrégulière dont la partie supérieure a été sectionnée.

Chez les Baboma et les Basakata au contraire ces poteries ont une forme cylindrique, large, un peu élevée, à fond plat. Chez les Bolaie, les Balesa et les Batete, le fond est arrondi, large, peu élevé, prolongé par un goulot tronconique assez élevé, orné de dessins gravés, très réguliers et peu artistiques, panse à arêtes vives, petit bord très évasé. Cette forme se rencontre quoique moins régulièrement chez les Basakata. Elle semble très commune dans la région des Kundu, voisins Nord des Bolaie, Balesa, Batete.

Les Ipanga et Tadima se servent de poteries analogues à celles qu'ils employent pour la fabrication des chikwangues, tandis que les Basongo Meno et les Bankutshu, ont une poterie de forme évasée, fond à calotte sphérique, la panse légèrement cintrée, l'ornementation composée de fortes moulures creusées et en relief.

Ces mêmes poteries servent également chez toutes ces tribus à la préparation et la cuisson des poissons.

Les populations riveraines du Congo-Kasai-Mfimi et de la Basse Lukenie, ainsi que les Wadia et les Bosangere de la Boriempe-Lolonga s'occupent beaucoup de la pêche.

Le poisson ne se mange jamais cru. Les indigènes le font bouillir ou le mangent séché ou fumé.

Pour conserver le poisson, les indigènes le fument sur de grandes claies analogues à celles qu'ils emploient pour boucaner la viande.

Certaines populations, notamment les tribus de la Mfimi-Lac et de la basse Lukenie, se servent également d'une poterie d'une forme spéciale, rare et inconnue jusqu'ici. Nous n'avons pu rapporter que deux spécimens heureusement très caractéristiques de ce type.

Fig. 76. — Ceinture en rotang

Cette forme est ouverte à la base et fermée à la partie supérieure par un grand disque percé d'ouvertures. Les parois sont cintrées. Le diamètre de l'ouverture inférieure, est un peu moins grand que celui du plateau supérieur. Il varie de 45 ctm. à 90 ctm.

Ce pot séchoir « Kenge » comme l'appellent les indigènes, se place sur trois morceaux de bois formant trépied. Au centre du trépied la femme entretient un feu lent, de feuilles, d'herbes et de bois vert, provoquant à l'intérieur de la poterie une fumée épaisse. Les poissons évidés sont placés au dessus du disque. Ils y restent de quatre à cinq jours exposés à l'action continue du feu et de la fumée. Au bout de ce temps ils sont suffisamment boucanés et séchés pour être conservés pendant plusieurs mois. Il va de soi que ces poteries, ne peuvent servir que pour la préparation et la conservation de petites quantités de provisions. Elles font partie des ustensiles de la ménagère indigène de ces diverses tribus. Elle s'en sert d'ailleurs également pour fumer les chikwangues, sécher les bananes, les carottes de manioc, les épis de maïs et parfois pour boucaner la viande. Les carottes de manioc, les bananes, les épis de maïs et autres fruits que l'on veut sécher, ne sont pas exposés à une forte fumée, mais à un petit feu de bois bien sec, donnant une très petite flamme ardente ou si possible présentés à la réverbération d'un foyer incandescent de charbon de bois.

Les chikwangues toutes préparées, garnies et enveloppées de leurs feuilles, sont placées pendant six à huit heures au dessus du « kenge » tandis que en dessous la ménagère entretient un feu de charbon de bois. Séchées et boucanées de cette façon les chikwangues se conservent très longtemps.

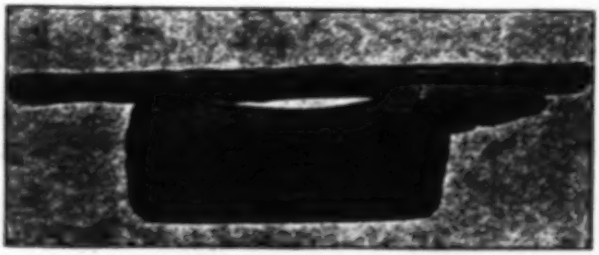

FIG. 78 - Mortier et pilon employés à la préparation des légumes et de l'huile de palme.

A défaut du « kenge » la femme se sert parfois d'une poterie à fond plat, percé de petits trous et à parois verticales. Celle-ci s'adapte au dessus d'une vieille poterie à chikwangue, « mpoko-kepinga » dont le fond a été brisé.

Le mpoko-kepinga, se place au dessus du foyer. La femme consolide et ferme les jointures du mpoko-kepinga et du vase à fond percé « kenge » au moyen d'une pâte de terre glaise et de terre à poterie.

Au delà des Batete, nous n'avons plus rencontré cette forme particulière de poterie. Les Ipanga-Yaelima, de même que les Basongo Meno et les Bankutshu, semblent en ignorer l'existence et en tout cas ne s'en servent pas.

J'en viens à l'importante question de huile de palme. Antérieurement nous avons déjà fait remarquer, combien la ménagère indigène, s'en sert fréquemment dans la préparation des repas. Cette huile remplace le beurre et la graisse de la cuisine européenne. La cueillette des régimes de noix de palme et la fabrication de l'huile est d'une grande importance pour toutes les tribus.

Ce que dit M. Engels à ce sujet dans son étude sur les Wangata peut s'appliquer à toutes les populations que nous avons visitées.

Dans chaque village un ou plusieurs indigènes, choisis parmi les plus agiles et les plus audacieux, (les casse-cou de l'endroit) ont la spécialité de cueillir les régimes du palmier. Ils le font non seulement pour eux-même, mais aussi pour d'autres, moyennant une légère rémunération.

FIG. 79. — Installation réservée à la fabrication de l'huile de palme.

La cueillette des régimes du palmier présente toujours un certain danger. Il faut monter au sommet du palmier atteignant parfois 20 et 25 mètres et là, se livrer au dur travail de dégager et de couper le régime.

Les méthodes d'ascension varient suivant la hauteur des palmiers. Chez toutes les tribus que nous avons visitées, nous avons pu observer deux façons différentes de procéder (voir fig. 77).

Si le palmier est bas, l'indigène monte jusqu'au régime en utilisant comme échelon des boutures de pétioles coupés. Si le palmier est très élevé, l'indigène se sert d'une ceinture en rotang qui encercle l'homme et le tronc du palmier.

Rien n'est intéressant comme de voir monter l'indigène jusqu'à la couronne d'un palmier. Il le fait avec une habilité et une rapidité vraiment extraordinaires. Suspendu dans sa ceinture, les pieds appuyés contre le tronc du palmier, il avance rapidement par petits bonds, tout en remontant constamment la ceinture. Arrivé à la hauteur de la racine du régime, il se dresse ou s'assied sur une des feuilles et à coups de hache ou de couteau il dégage le régime, le coupe et le laisse tomber au pied du palmier. Les femmes se chargent de rassembler les noix, enlèvent sur place celles qui sont restées attachées au régime, les nettoyent très soigneusement et transportent le tout au village.

Suivant que la ménagère désire fabriquer une petite ou une grande quantité d'huile de palme, elle procède de deux façons différentes.

Dans le premier cas, elle jette les quelques noix de palme dans un récipient en terre cuite, à moitié rempli d'eau et met le tout sur le feu à bouillir pendant une bonne heure. Lorsque le brou de la noix est devenu tendre, elle jette l'eau, enlève les noix et les place dans un petit mortier en bois pour séparer le noyau de la pulpe. Elle se sert à cet effet du pilon en bois et du mortier employés à la préparation des légumes. Lorsque le brou est complètement séparé de la noix, la femme l'enlève et en extrait le jus en le pressant très fortement dans les mains. Les noyaux sont jetés.

Pour le second cas chaque village possède une installation spéciale réservée à la fabrication de l'huile de palme. Cette usine toute primitive est généralement située un peu en dehors des habitations. Chacun y a accès et elle appartient à toute la communauté, mais chaque famille s'en sert pour son usage personnel.

Elle comprend un grand trou de forme tronconique ayant de 60 à 70 ctm. de diamètre à la partie supérieure, de 20 à 30 ctm. à la partie inférieure et une profondeur variant entre 60 et 80 ctm. Le fond et les parois sont tapissés de sections de pétioles de raphia, placées les unes à côtés des autres, la surface arrondie tournée vers l'intérieur du creux. Les noix légèrement bouillies, sont versées dans cet entonnoir servant de mortier. Le brou est séparé du noyau au moyen d'un grand pilon en bois. Les noyaux sont jetés. La pulpe enlevée du trou est fortement pressée entre les mains pour en extraire l'huile.

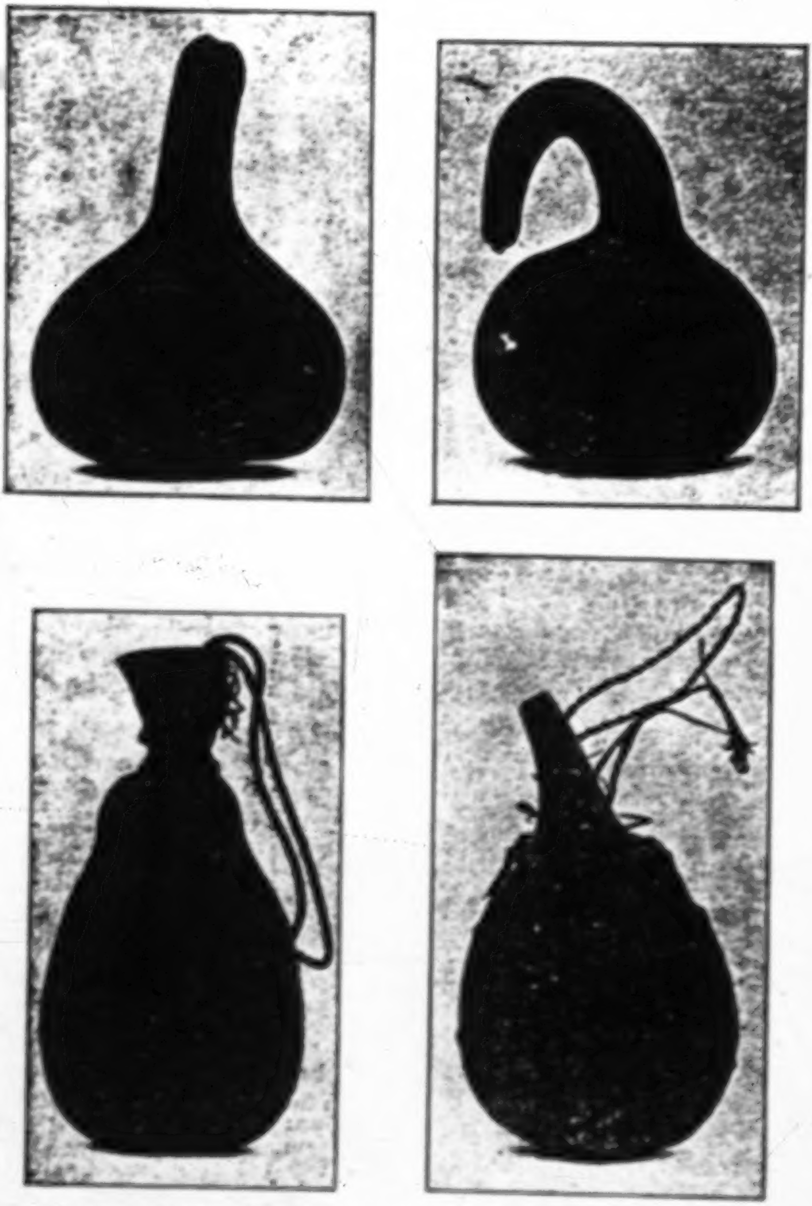

Fig. 80. — Calebasses servant de récipient pour l'eau, le vin, la bière et l'huile.

A proximité de l'entonnoir mortier creusé en terre, se trouve un établi formé par deux ou quatre pieux fourchus, les uns plus hauts que les autres, au dessus desquels les indigènes placent des grandes sections d'écorce d'arbre. La femme jette la pulpe, dont elle a extrait l'huile, sur cet établi, l'étale et allume un petit feu en dessous des larges sections d'écorce formant gouttières. Sous l'influence de la chaleur, une partie de l'huile restée dans la pulpe s'écoule lentement et est recueillie dans le récipient en terre cuite placé à l'extrémité inférieure de la gouttière. Enfin ce qui peut rester d'huile de palme dans la pulpe en est extrait par torsion. L'indigène a construit dans ce but une grande barre fixe, très solide, à laquelle il attache l'une des extrémités d'un pressoir fait de jeunes lianes et de fins rotangs tressés. La pulpe encore toute chaude est placée dans ce pressoir et le tout est très fortement tordu de façon à en extraire jusqu'à la dernière goutte d'huile.

Les indigènes recueillent et conservent l'huile de palme dans de grandes poteries couvertes de feuilles de bananier, dans des calebasses ou si possible dans des bouteilles d'importation. Les grandes dame-jeannes dépouillées de leur emballage protecteur sont particulièrement recherchées, à cet effet.

Nous avons signalé plus haut les usages principaux que fait l'indigène de l'huile de palme dans la préparation des aliments et le rôle important qu'elle occupe dans l'alimentation de ces primitifs. Plus tard nous aurons l'occasion d'y revenir, quand nous examinerons la place qu'elle tient dans la toilette indigène.

Un mot maintenant des excitants. Les aliments en général et la viande en particulier sont toujours très fortement assaisonnés de condiments.

L'excitant le plus répandu est le pili-pili ou poivre rouge. Ce piment, fruit du capsicum minimum, qui ne dépasse guère 1 à 1,5 ctm. de long a une saveur extrêmement brulante. Il se retrouve à l'état sauvage dans toute la région que nous avons parcourue. Toutes les tribus le connaissent et s'en servent régulièrement.

La récolte et la préparation du pili-pili sont spécialement réservées aux femmes. Au retour des champs, la femme étale les fruits sur une natte, devant sa hutte et les laisse sécher 5 à 6 jours. Parfois elle les mélange tout frais à l'huile de palme rehaussées, de sel. L'indigène se sert de cette sauce pour assaisonner suivant son goût les plats du jour.

Quand le pili-pili est bien séché, la femme le pulvérise dans un petit mortier en bois au moyen d'un pilon cylindrique, ou d'une petite section de défense d'éléphant. La forme des mortiers employés à cet effet par les différentes populations du Lukenie, est assez variée. Depuis les Bateke jusqu'aux Batete, nous n'avons rencontré que des mortiers très primitifs creusés dans un tronc d'arbre. Chez lez Yaelima Ipanga cet ustensile est mieux soigné et plus achevé. La forme rappelle assez bien celle d'une petite boîte rectangulaire sans couvercle mais muni d'un tenon. Chez les Basongo Meno et les Bankutshu, de la région de Bena Dibele, Kole, nous avons récolté des mortiers aux formes très simples et très primitives, tandis que d'autres étaient bien ouvragés et soigneusement sculptés. Tous ont cependant le caractère commun d'une forme allongée verticale et sont munis le plus souvent d'un pied. Les pilons sont toujours très longs.

Nous voyons ainsi apparaître à nouveau trois zònes ethniques caractérisées par la forme spéciale de ces ustensiles. Il est évident, que ce seul fait ne pourrait servir de base à une classification ethnique quelconque, mais il peut avoir une valeur et une importance relatives dans les conclusions générales, basées sur l'ensemble des caractères ethniques de ces différentes populations.

Réduit en fine poudre, le poivre de pili-pili, est mélangé au sel, pour assaisonner les aliments après la cuisson. Toutes les sauces sont relevées, par une copieuse pincée de ce piment. Les viandes en sont saupoudrées voire même farcies de piments entiers.

Lorsque les indigènes sont en voyage, ils se contentent de cueillir quelques graines de pili-pili et en expriment le jus qu'ils égoûtent sur les aliments en cuisson.

La noix de kola est également très connue comme excitant et s'emploie beaucoup. Le kolatier se retrouve un peu partout. L'indigène récolte le fruit et le mache. La femme ne s'en sert pas.

D'après les croyances indigènes, la noix de kola, assure la fécondité de la femme pour autant que les relations sexuelles se produisent pendant la nuit qui suit l'emploi de cet excitant par l'homme.

L'usage régulier du kola provoque des excitations nerveuses très intenses. Nous avons remarqué que l'adolescent ou l'homme dans sa première force ne l'emploient guère. Seuls les gens agés s'en servent régulièrement. Kakua, le vieux chef indigène, en machait du matin au soir. Un jour que je lui en fis l'observation, tout en lui demandant s'il ne craignait pas les suites funestes de cet abus, il me montra fièrement les cases de ses sept femmes, en me disant, « demandez leur si elles n'ont pas d'enfants ! »

Dans la série des excitants nous pourrions signaler encore la noix d'arachide, très employée par toutes les tribus ; une espèce de petit pois de terre et certaines racines d'arbres connues des indigènes mais dont nous n'avons malheureusement pas pu déterminer la nature exacte. Il convient d'ailleurs de remarquer que la plupart des indigènes emploient les excitants, tant comme condiments que comme médicaments, contre les maux d'estomac, les coliques et comme purgatifs.

FIG. 81. — Transport de la réserve de bois pour le foyer.

La préparation des aliments et des repas incombe, chez toutes les tribus, exclusivement aux femmes. Celles-ci y mettent toujours le plus grand soin.

La cuisine, si réellement cuisine il y a, est toujours des plus simples. S'il fait beau, elle se fait au grand air au milieu du village, devant ou derrière la hutte et très souvent à l'ombre des bananiers. Si le temps est pluvieux ou froid, la femme prépare les repas à l'intérieur de la hutte.

La préparation des aliments et des repas ne donne nulle part lieu à une cérémonie quelconque. Cependant nous avons pu remarquer chez les Bankutshu, une coutume bien singulière.

Un jour, pendant que je discutais le prix de quelques objets ethnographiques au village d'Olombo, je vis une femme s'approcher d'un indigène et lui présenter successivement trois petites sections de pétioles de raphia. L'indigène accepta les trois éclats, en garda un, brisa le second en rendit la moitié à la femme et lui remit également les trois quarts du troisième. Intrigué par ce manège, j'en demandais l'explication à l'indigène qui me répondit :

N'est ce point ainsi que nos femmes nous avertissent que le repas est prêt ?

Et les sections de raphia ?

N'aurai-je pas trois plats, de la chikwangue, du riz et de la viande ?

Pourquoi garder l'une, briser l'autre et en remettre des parties a cette femme ?

N'ai-je pas réservé un quart de la viande, la moitié de la chikwangue à ma femme, en gardant le reste pour moi ?

Ainsi la femme vient annoncer trois fois par jour à son mari, que son repas est prêt et lui dit en même temps, de quoi il se compose. L'homme en accepte ce qui lui convient et abandonne le restant à la femme. J'ignore si cette coutume existe chez d'autres tribus, mais la chose me parait probable.

Les indigènes prennent trois repas par jour, le matin, vers midi et le soir après le coucher du soleil.

Jamais la femme n'est admise à partager le repas du mari, ni à manger dans le même groupe que lui.

Les chefs mangent toujours seuls, loin des yeux du vulgum pecus.

Les restants des repas sont d'ordinaire abandonnés aux enfants et aux femmes.

Chez aucune des tribus visitées, nous n'avons trouvé table, cuiller, ou fourchette.

Les aliments sont placés dans de petits paniers en éclats de rotang ou de raphia, tressés à jour, au fond garni de feuilles. Parfois le plat est en bois ou en terre cuite.

Chez les Bateke-Banfumungu, nous avons récolté certains plats en terre cuite ressemblant beaucoup aux assiettes à soupe d'Europe, mais moins réguliers de forme et plus profonds. Chez les Baboma-Wadia-Batete au contraire, les plats rappellent plutôt nos assiettes plates. Chez les Ipanga-Yaelima les plats en vannerie] sont surtout à la mode, tandis que dans la région de Bena Dibele-Kole, on retrouve le plat poterie, genre de calotte sphérique très évasée, et des plats en bois. Quelquefois aussi, de simples feuilles font office d'assiette, à moins que les aliments ne soient servis dans les poteries de cuisson.

Le tout est déposé à terre.

L'homme s'accroupit sur sa natte et puise lentement de la main à même les plats en passant de l'un à l'autre suivant son goût.

Le repas est toujours silencieux. Même quand plusieurs amis dinent ensemble, ils ne parlent ni ne discutent jamais pendant les repas.

Après le repas, les indigènes se lavent soigneusement les mains et les dents, et se rincent la bouche à plusieurs reprises.

LES BOISSONS.

L'eau est l'unique boisson qu'ils prennent au repas, et encore n'en usent-ils que bien rarement. A défaut d'une coupe en bois ou en terre cuite, ils se servent d'une section de calebasse ou simplement d'une feuille enroulée en forme d'un petit sachet conique.

L'eau provient généralement d'une source, située à proximité du village. Les indigènes n'emploient l'eau de la rivière que lorsque celle-ci est bien claire. La femme et les enfants sont chargés de chercher de l'eau, corvée qui bien souvent est très dure. J'ai visité bien des villages situés le long et à proximité de la rivière, dont la source d'eau potable se trouvait à 20 et 30 minutes du centre.

A certaines heures du jour et plus particulièrement le matin, au premier lever du soleil, les femmes et les enfants s'en vont, la calebasse ou la gargoulette placée en équilibre sur la tête, chercher la provision pour la journée.

L'eau est conservée dans de grandes calebasses ou dans des gargoulettes en terre cuite, placées à l'abri du soleil dans un coin de la hutte.

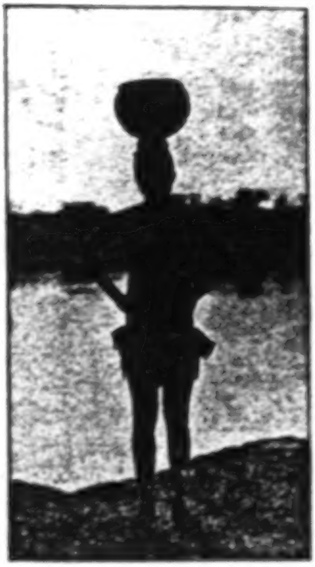

Fig. 43. — Porteuse d'eau.

La forme de ces gargoulettes varie notablement suivant les différentes régions, et certaines d'entre-elles nous semblent même caractéristiques de certains groupements ethniques.

Chez les Bateke et les Banfumungu de l'Ouest la forme sphérique à goulot droit prédomine.

Chez les Maboma de Bokala-Wombali et les Banfumungu de l'Est, la forme est nettement sphérique, munie d'un tout petit goulot, type entonnoir, n'atteignant le plus souvent qu'un à deux centimètres de hauteur. Cette forme est toute nouvelle. Nous avons heureusement pu en récolter plusieurs spécimens. Les Bateke de la région de Stanley Pool se servent d'une gargoulette et qui ressemble aux carafes d'importation Européenne. Cette forme est particulièrement commune dans la région de Léopoldville-Kinshasa.

Chez les Bobaie du N. E. les Balesa-Batete, les Ipanga-Batitu et les Bokala-Yaelima, la gargoulette a une panse sphérique et un col droit. Cette même forme se rencontre également chez les Bankutu et les Basongo Meno de la région de Bena Dibele-Kole.

Remarquons cependant que dans la région des Ipanga-Yaélima, les gargoulettes sont relativement rares, les indigènes se servent couramment de grandes calebasses, très souvent munies d'une anse et d'un pied en rotang ou bambou.

En dehors des repas les indigènes ne boivent de l'eau que pour calmer leur soif Chaque fois que les porteurs arrivent à une rivière, ils ont soin de s'y baigner et de s'y rafraichir.

En plus de l'eau boisson ordinaire de toutes les tribus, nous avons retrouvé suivant les régions : le vin de palme appelé malafu, la bière de canne à sucre dite masanga et le pombe ou bière de maïs.

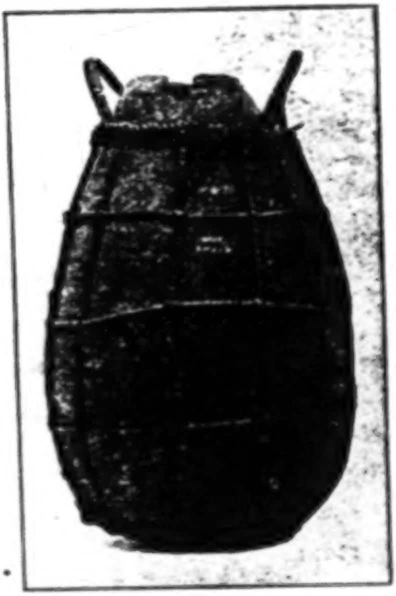

Fig. 84. — Calebasse à l'huile de palme servant également à la conservation de l'eau.

Le vin de palme, le malafu indigène, quoique estimé, n'est d'ordinaire pas très recherché, surtout lorsque l'indigène peut le remplacer par le masanga ou bière de canne à sucre. Nous l'avons trouvé cependant chez toutes les populations, mais il n'y a en réalité, que les Ipanga-Yaelima et les Basongo Meno-Bankutu, qui en font un usage régulier.

Dans les autres régions la récolte du vin de palme se fait particulièrement dans les villages situés à proximité des postes de l'État ou des installations des sociétés commerciales et au profit des blancs. Ces villages ont généralement un récolteur de métier.

La récolte se fait par incision. Le palmier Nsese, le raphia et l'élais, sont particulièrement mis à contribution.

Pour récolter le vin de palme, l'indigène a trois méthodes d'ascension. La première est celle que nous avons décrite pour la récolte de régimes de noix de palme, la seconde consiste, à appliquer contre le tronc du palmier une perche échelle, ou à fixer au tronc même des échelons. La troisième à creuser dans le tronc du palmier des trous servant de marchepied. L'indigène monte jusqu'à la couronne, coupe une feuille du palmier au ras du chou. Dans la blessure il creuse une ouverture assez profonde, y fixe une foliole de palmier, qui fera office de sonde conductrice. A l'autre extrémité de cette sonde l'indigène fixe une calebasse. La sève du palmier qui remplit le creux de la blessure, s'écoule lentement par la sonde dans la calebasse. De bonne heure au matin l'indigène vient la reprendre.

Frais, ce vin me parut délicieux ; fermenté je l'ai jugé inabsorbable !

Les indigènes au contraire n'en veulent que lorsqu'il à fermenté pendant trois ou quatre jours.

Une autre méthode plus simple mais moins avantageuse consite à abattre le palmier, couper la couronne et récolter la sève qui s'écoule. Un palmier peut donner de cette façon, un maximum de 10 à 15 litres de vin et est définitivement perdu. Le vin est d'ailleurs d'une qualité bien moindre ; jamais un indigène n'oserait le présenter au chef de poste.

La bière de canne à sucre, le masanga des indigènes, est la boisson la plus recherchée.

Fig. 45. — Brasserie à Masanga chez les Basakata.

Dans certaines régions, notamment chez les Basakata Balesa, nous avons trouvé dans chaque village, une et parfois deux grandes installations réservées à la fabrication de cette bière. Ces brasseries sont situées un peu en dehors du village. Le matériel est très élémentaire. Une grande place bien nettoyée, un sol bien battu, un toit en paille abritant une espèce de grand bassin, genre de pirogue, deux ou quatre battoirs, une forte barre fixe, une presse en lianes, un bac réservoir et des calebasses.

La canne à sucre est cultivée sur une assez grande échelle et en communauté. Un peu avant la maturité les indigènes la coupent. Hommes, femmes et enfants s'entraident dans ce travail. Toute la récolte est transportée sous le hangar de la brasserie ; la canne à sucre coupée en morceaux est jetée dans le bassin, où deux et parfois quatre hommes se chargent de l'écraser autant que possible au moyen de grands battoirs, et de la réduire en une espèce de pulpe blanchâtre. Quand cette pulpe est suffisamment fine, les indigènes la placent dans le tordeur en lianes, fixé au dessus du bassin réservoir, placé en dessous de la barre fixe. Afin d'empêcher la presse de s'enrouler par suite de la torsion, ils y placent perpendiculairement à la barre de torsion un bâton. Deux hommes impriment ensuite à la presse un énergique mouvement de torsion, extrayant par pression jusqu'à la dernière goutte du jus sucré. Le liquide est recueilli dans le grand bassin réservoir, puis versé dans de grandes calebasses et transporté au village. Frais le massanga est réellement agréable, rafraichissant et délicieux. Il ne produit aucun effet enivrant. Les indigènes ne le boivent cependant pas tant qu'il n'a pas fermenté. Ils y ajoutent des écorces d'un petit arbuste de la plaine, entourent les calebasses des déchets de la canne à sucre, les exposent au soleil pendant un à deux jours et provoquent une fermentation très active.

La bière de canne à sucre est toujours dégustée en communauté.

Toutes les grandes cérémonies donnent lieu à de fortes beuveries. Mariage, naissance, décès, enterrement, retour des grandes chasses, apparition de la nouvelle lune, visite d'un chef voisin et même notre arrivée dans certains villages sont autant d'occasions pour organiser de grandes fêtes indigènes, où l'absorption d'énormes quantités de calebasses de massanga est à l'ordre du jour. Les indigènes se réunissent à l'ombre des grands arbres du village ou sous le hangar public. Les calebasses de massanga, sont placées au centre, ou déversées dans de grandes poteries. Chacun y puise à discrétion, tant qu'il y en a et tant qu'il le peut. Cependant la musique bat son plein, on chante et on danse. Bien souvent on fume du chanvre et on boit toujours jusqu'à l'ivresse brutale. Nous aurions difficilement nous rendre compte des quantités énormes de cette boisson capiteuse, que certains indigènes peuvent absorber. Pokai, le chef Baalumongo d'Engwé ne s'arrête d'ordinaire qu'au dixième litre, et il n'est pas le plus grand consommateur. Très souvent les fêtes dégénèrent en rixes sanglantes. Pour un rien l'indigène enivré, se met en colère, se querelle et n'hésite pas à se servir de ses armes.

Chez certaines tribus, notamment chez les Basfomongo, la femme ne peut sous aucun prétexte assister aux grandes fêtes, participer aux grandes libations. Pokei, nous assura que c'est à cause de leur caractère rancunier qu'elles en sont exclues. « Nous, les hommes, disait-il, nous nous battons parfois au milieu de ces fêtes, mais le lendemain n'avons nous pas oublié nos querelles ? Elles se battraient aussi ; savent-elles seulement garder leur langue même quand elles n'ont pas bu le masanga ! Le lendemain elles se disputeraient encore entre-elles. Les maris s'en mêleraient. Une querelle au village serait la suite de toutes les fêtes ! Non, les femmes ne peuvent boire le masanga »

On aurait tort cependant de croire que les femmes observent strictement cette défense. Oh non ! Plus d'une boit son petit verre de masanga au fond de sa hutte et à l'occasion s'en verse volontiers un peu de trop. Le masanga n'est pas taboo pour elles !

La bière de canne à sucre se sert dans des petites coupes en terre cuite, dans des sections de calebasses et dans des coupes en bois.

A l'Est du territoire des Balesa Batete, le masanga semble inconnu, ou du moins nous ne l'avons pas trouvé, ni chez les Ipanga-Batito, ni chez les Bokala-Yalima.

Chez les Basongo Meno et les Bankutu de la région de Bena Dibele-Kole, les indigènes consomment principalement le vin de palme.

Ils fabriquent également une bière très médiocre de maïs ou de millet.

Pour faire cette bière, l'indigène fait fermenter dans des pots en terre cuite, le maïs ou le millet écrasé et trempé dans l'eau de source.

Ces poteries ont une forme qui se rapproche plus ou moins de la gargoulette à panse sphérique, mais à goulot très large et plus élevé. Elles sont généralement très grandes. Les coupes qui servent à boire le vin de palme et la bière chez les Basongo Meno et les Bankutu sont toujours creusées dans du bois. On en retrouve de toutes les formes, depuis le simple petit tonnelet non ornementé jusqu'à la figurine humaine merveilleusement ouvragée. Dans certains villages, notamment à Tipolo et à Bakoho, nous avons retrouvé des coupes en corne de buffle, ornementées de dessins sculptés. Parfois des coupes en formes de cornes sont creusées dans le bois, ces dernières sont généralement plus grandes et mieux ornementées.

La présence de ces coupes en bois dans la région de Bena Dibele-Kole n'est pas sans intérêt. Jusqu'à présent on ne les avait renseignées que chez les populations de l'entre Kasai-Sankuru et certains auteurs les considéraient même comme une caractéristique des populations Bakuba. Nous reviendrons dans la suite sur ce sujet.

L'anthropophagie si elle a existé jadis, a disparue. Interrogés à ce sujet, les indigènes ont l'habitude de nier énergiquement toute connexion avec cette coutume barbare, mais ils ne se gênent par pour accuser leurs voisins des pires méfaits. A notre avis les populations de la région de Bena Dibele-Kole étaient anthropophages et s'y adonnaient encore jusqu'en ces derniers temps. Même il nous paraît probable, qu'actuellement encore dans une occasion favorable, ils ne résisteraient pas à la tentation.

Fig. 86 — Enfants Bobala.
L'un d'eux montre les signes de Géophagie.

La géophagie est plus commune. Chez toutes les populations les enfants mangent de la terre. Chez les Basakata, les Lesa, les Bosengere les Wadia, tous les indigènes et en particulier les femmes sont géophages.

La terre à poterie et l'argile de certaines termitières sont très recherchées.

Les indigènes mangent la terre plutôt comme friandise et peut être aussi comme médicament. Prétendre qu'elle constitue un aliment serait chose exagérée, car la quantité absorbée est minime.

Nous avons soumis quelques échantillons de terre comestible, recueillis au cours de notre voyage, à notre collègue M. L'Heureux, qui a bien voulu en faire l'analyse. Voici ses conclusions : « L'échantillon a l'aspect d'une » terre glaise. Celle-ci happe à la langue, elle est grise noirâtre par les » déchets organiques qu'elle contient ; elle est assez dure au toucher, mais » se broie aisément au mortier.

CHANVRE ET TABAC.

Plus désastreuses sont les conséquences de l'usage du chanvre.

Cette triste passion, qui semble avoir été très répandue chez certaines populations, tend heureusement à disparaître, grâce à l'intervention énergique du gouvernement.

Malgré les recherches les plus minutieuses que nous avons faites ; nous n'avons pu retrouver que quelques rares preuves de l'existence de cette funeste coutume.

Vue de face

FIG. 87. — Pipe à chanvre ornée de Nkisi.

Chez les Banfumungu de Mpenzi, nous avons cependant retrouvé chez des indigènes des échantillons de chanvre et des pipes-calebasses, le tout caché au fond de la couchette en dessous du lit.

Interrogé au sujet de l'usage de ces pipes, Lekana, le chef des Banfumungu de la région, commença par nous donner une réponse dilatoire. Brusquement je lui demandais s'il ignorait l'usage de la botte de chanvre que j'avais trouvé dans la même hutte. Il me dit simplement : « le blanc sait tout ! Pourquoi me demander à quoi servent ces pipes ? »

Les quelques pipes à chanvre récoltées au village de Mpenzi, sont ornementées de plumes, de perles, de petits sachets en étoffe de raphia ou lambeaux d'étoffe d'importation contenant des substances les plus diverses ; de la terre blanche, des écailles des cauris, du ngula, etc. Or l'ensemble de toutes ces choses hétéroclites forme la base de la plupart des objets, Nkisi ou Ndoki des Banfumungu. Leur présence suffisait à elle seule pour me porter à rattacher à ces pipes une signification que jusqu'à présent je ne leur soupçonnais pas.

Interrogés à ce sujet, les indigènes de Mpenzi, leur chef Lekana en particulier, furent très catégoriques. « Bula Matari a défendu l'usage du chanvre, mais n'est-ce pas Nkisi ? »

« Pourquoi ne pourrons nous pas nous en servir ? »

Lorsque je leur eus exposé les conséquences néfastes de cet usage, Lekana me demanda : « Quand nous fumons le chanvre sentons nous en» core la douleur ? Nos malades ne savent-ils pas dormir après avoir » fumé le chanvre ? Faire oublier les douleurs et les souffrances ; ren» dre le sommeil aux malades est-ce faire du mal ? Le chanvre n'est-il » pas Nkisi des malades ? »

J'eus beau insister, expliquer, parler, rien n'y fit ; le chanvre et la pipe à chanvre étaient et restaient Nkisi.

Ce n'est donc pas simplement par pure passion que le Banfumungu fume le chanvre et qu'à défaut de pouvoir le faire en toute liberté il s'y adonne en cachette. Ce n'est pas uniquement le besoin de continuer une habitude invétérée qui le pousse à éluder les prescriptions sévères qui en interdisent l'usage.

La croyance à la force magique, à la puissance occulte mais bienfaisante, de ce narcotique l'empêche de délaisser la pipe à chanvre. Tant que cette croyance existera chez lui il gardera cette pipe et n'abandonnera pas la coutume. Si nous pouvions arriver à lui faire comprendre que bien loin d'être Nkisi, le chanvre est un Ndoki cause première de bien des souffrances, douleurs et maladies, la lutte contre l'emploi et l'usage du chanvre serait terminée dans toute la région des Bafumungu.

Je n'oserais pas en dire autant des tribus des autres régions.

Chez les Wadia de Lubamiti, les Bolaie de Lebi et ailleurs encore, j'ai récolté quelques pipes calebasses, sans cependant pouvoir établir que les indigènes s'en servaient pour fumer le chanvre. Aucune d'elles n'était ornementée d'une façon quelconque permettant de soupçonner que les indigènes y rattachent un caractère magique ou religieux. Les indigènes s'en servaient d'ailleurs régulièrement pour fumer le tabac.

L'usage du chanvre est cependant général depuis Léopoldville jusque dans la région de Bena Dibele-Kole, mais la coutume ne nous semble pas avoir pris une extension aussi grande dans la région du Lac Léopold II-Lukenie, qu'au Sud du Kasai-Sankuru.

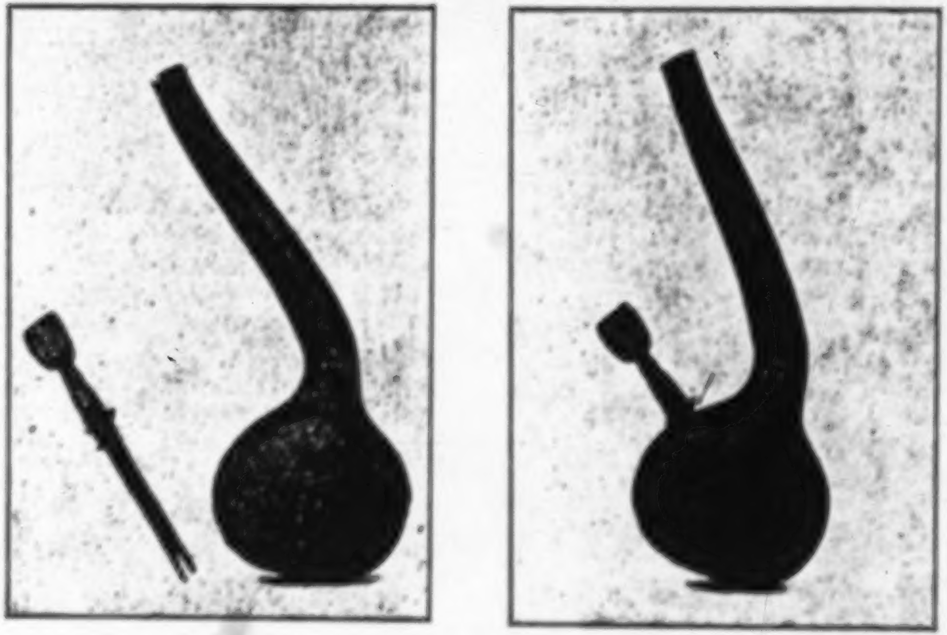
La forme de la pipe calebasse dépend essentiellement de la calebasse même. Elle est naturellement très variable. Cependant nous croyons pouvoir partager ces pipes en deux catégories ; l'une comprenant les pipes à simple panse sphéroïdale et à long tuyau ; l'autre des pipes calebasses à double panse sphéroïdale avec étranglement médiane et sans tuyau.

Cette dernière forme se rencontre plutôt dans la région de l'entre Congo-Kasai-Kwango.

Nous ne pouvons cependant y retrouver un caractère ethnique spécial à cette région, car cette forme de la pipe calebasse se rencontre également chez d'autres tribus où, de même que chez les Bafumungu, nous avons récolté des pipes calebasses à simple panse sphéroïdale et long tuyau servant à fumer le chanvre.

Le fourneau de la pipe calebasse est formé d'un tube en bois, bambou ou d'une section d'un pétiole de feuille de bananier. Dans la panse inférieure de la calebasse l'indigène creuse une petite ouverture circulaire dans laquelle s'engage le tuyau fourneau.

L'extrémité inférieure de celui-ci, est toujours taillée en forme de biseau ou de fourche.



Fourneau et tuyau détaché. Fig. 66. — Pipe à chanvre. Fourneau et tuyau en place.

L'embouchure est percée au sommet de la seconde panse.

Généralement très réduite, il arrive fréquemment, qu'un mince disque en bois ou en ivoire muni d'une petite ouverture y soit fixé au moyen de résine. Nous avons retrouvé un spécimen présentant ce caractère spécial, chez les Tumba du village indigène situé à proximité d'Inongo.

Avant de se servir de sa pipe calebasse, l'indigène retire le fourneau, remplit d'eau jusqu'au tiers du contenant la seconde panse et replace le fourneau dans l'ouverture. L'extrémité inférieure plonge ainsi dans le liquide et la pipe forme narghilé.

L'aspiration de la fumée du chanvre se produit en faisant le vide à l'intérieur de la calebasse. La fumée passe au travers de l'eau et les impuretés qu'elle entraîne y restent suspendues.

Une pipe calebasse trouvée dans la hutte de Matari, chef des Banfumu du village de Kapanda, situé à proximité de Kwamouth, présente le caractère spécial d'avoir le fourneau double.

Pour fumer le chanvre l'indigène se sert du simple tube en bambou fixé dans la panse de la calebasse ; tandis que pour fumer le tabac il adapte au dessus du tube un récipient en terre cuite formant un fourneau spécial dont la capacité est notablement plus grande.

La raison de l'emploi de ces différents fourneaux réside dans la manière même de fumer le chanvre et le tabac.

Le chanvre se fume par petites quantités à la fois et la pipe que le Banfumungu emploie à cet effet est sa propriété privée.

L'indigène ne fume le chanvre que lorsqu'il se sent à l'abri des regards indiscrets, caché dans la brousse ou au fond de sa hutte et à porte close.

Le tabac au contraire se fume au grand air, dans les grandes réunions et la pipe bien bourrée passe de bouche en bouche.

Aussitôt que le chef a aspiré une ou deux fortes bouffées il passe la pipe à son voisin. Dans l'occurrence la petite capacité du tuyau fourneau qui est assez grande pour le peu de chanvre que l'indigène fume discrètement, est trop réduite pour y bourrer de quoi permettre à chaque membre du cercle d'y puiser une bonne bouffée. Aussi Matari a-t-il soin d'y fixer un fourneau à capacité plus grande de façon à pouvoir suivre la coutume.

Comme nous l'avons fait observer plus haut, la pipe calebasse à simple panse sphéroïdale et long tuyau se rencontre surtout dans la région du Lac Léopold II et de la Lukénie.

Des sept spécimens de ce genre que nous avons récoltés, un seul provient des Bankumungu, tandis que les autres appartiennent aux différentes tribus de la région précitée.

Le fourneau est d'ordinaire formé d'une section de bambou ou de l'extrémité d'un pétiole de feuille de bananier. Toutes ces pipes forment narghilé.

Celle que nous avons récoltée chez les Yaelima est munie d'un fourneau découpé dans un noyau de noix de palme. Ce fourneau est fixé au moyen d'une pâte de résine de Bulungu sur un tuyau en bambou dont l'extrémité inférieure taillé en fourche plonge dans l'eau.

Les indigènes se servent de préférence de ces sortes de pipes pour fumer le chanvre, quoiqu'il nous soit arrivé plus d'une fois de constater qu'ils s'en servaient également pour fumer le tabac.

La coutume de fumer le tabac dans une pipe commune ne semble pas très en honneur chez les populations de la Mfimi-Lukénie. En général chaque indigène possède une pipe.

Chez les tribus du Lac Léopold II, de même que chez les Basakata, Bolia et les Batito, la pipe à tabac est d'ordinaire formée par une simple nervure de feuille de bananier. Très souvent l'indigène fixe à l'extrémité inférieure de celle-ci un petit fourneau en terre cuite. Celui-ci est toujours des plus primitifs et intéressant à cause de sa forme irrégulière, longue, mince et légèrement recourbée. L'indigène en a indiscutablement emprunté l'idée, à la forme que présente le fourneau de la pipe constituée par la simple nervure de la feuille de bananier. Celui-ci ne résista guère à l'usure ; en fumant le tabac l'indigène brula le fourneau de sa pipe. Primitivement il le remplaça par un autre, découpé dans un morceau de bois plus dur et plus résistant, mais bientôt il en arriva à se façonner un fourneau en terre cuite tout en lui gardant la forme primitive.

Les pipes à fourneau en bois de cette région sont très rares. Nous n'en possédons qu'une seule provenant des Batitu du village de Longinpila.

Au delà des Batitu dans la région de Bumbuli, chez les Bokala et les Yaelima, la pipe est formée d'un long tuyau en bois, généralement un peu recourbé et muni à l'une des extrémités d'un petit fourneau en terre cuite et à l'autre d'un fémur de singe servant d'embouchure.

Il arrive que le fourneau en terre cuite soit remplacé par un fourneau en bois, le plus souvent orné de dessins sculptés et représentant très souvent une tête humaine. Cette dernière forme est très commune dans la région de Bena Dibele et Kole. Certains spécimens sont très artistiquement ouvragés.

A côté de cette forme caractéristique nous avons retrouvé un autre type non moins intéressant. Le fourneau et le tuyau sont toujours formés d'une branche creusée d'une essence spéciale. La forme est légèrement recourbée, l'extrémité supérieure légèrement évasée formant le fourneau. A l'autre extrémité du tuyau l'indigène fixe une petite calebasse de forme sphéroïdale percée de deux ouvertures dont l'une sert d'embouchure. Cette calebasse est légèrement bourrée de fibres de raphia et d'herbes sèches servant à tamiser la fumée de tabac.

En dehors de cette forme primitive nous avons récolté certaines pipes appartenant à la même classe, mais dont la calebasse embouchure avait été remplacée par une embouchure en bois, parfois ornementée de dessins linéaires sculptés et de petites lamelles en cuivre incrustées dans le bois.

Nous avons trouvé ainsi dans la région des Yaelima-Bankutsu deux formes de pipes très caractéristiques qui semblent indiquer une certaine relation ethnique entre ces différentes populations. Nous ignorons si ces mêmes formes se rencontrent chez les populations de la région de Dekese mais cela nous semble très probable. Le long de la rive Nord du Sankuru entre Lodi et Isaka nous avons rencontré cette même forme, d'où il résulte qu'au moins dans la région Sud de Dekese, la zone ethnique caractérisée par ces deux formes spéciales de la pipe indigène comprend toute la région de Bumbuli à Bena Dibele-Kole. Ces formes se retrouvent d'ailleurs encore en dehors de ce territoire, notamment au Nord chez les Bakuba et les Bashilele. Il convient cependant de remarquer qu'au Nord la pipe munie d'un fémur servant d'embouchure est excessivement rare, tandis qu'au Sud celle munie d'une calebasse embouchure ne se rencontre que très peu. Ceci semble indiquer que nous nous trouvons ici en présence d'une zône de contact, où nous retrouvons les traces des relations ethniques qui relient les populations de cette région aux tribus du Nord et du Sud. On peut établir par là que les tribus Bakuba et Bashilele du Kasai-Sankuru, se rattachent aux populations de l'entre Sankuru-Lukenie et qu'elles ont même des affinités ethniques avec les populations dont le territoire s'étend bien plus au Nord.

Dans la région des Banfumu et des Bateke, nous trouvons deux formes de pipes à tabac, l'une à grand fourneau servant à la communauté, l'autre plus petite, le fourneau en terre cuite, le tuyau et l'embouchure en bois, employée individuelement tant par les hommes que par les femmes. A côtés de ces pipes nous avons également retrouvé quelques spécimens dont le fourneau et le tuyau étaient en fer. Ces pipes sont généralement très longues et ont un caractère plus primitif que les petites pipes en terre cuite et tuyau en bois. Il est d'ailleurs probable que ces dernières ont été fabriquées d'après des modèles importés. Nous les avons surtout trouvées dans les villages situés à proximité des grands centres et des postes de l'État. Elles présentent dans leur forme une analogie frappante et évidente avec les pipes d'importation.

Nous avons rencontré cette même forme chez les Bayansi de la rive droite du Kasai et au Nord de Kwamouth. Ces indigènes se rattachent ainsi au groupe des Bateke-Banfumungu. Ainsi apparaît une nouvelle zône ethnique, et le territoire que nous avons parcouru peut se subdiviser sous ce rapport en trois régions ethniques.

La première comprend tout le territoire occupé par les Bateke Banfumungu, les Bayansi et une partie des Bahoma et se caractérise :

1°/ par l'usage d'une pipe calebasse — fétiche-akisi — servant à fumer du chanvre.

2°/ l'emploi de pipes à grands fourneaux en terre cuite servant à fumer le tabac en communauté et l'existence d'une petite pipe à tabac, propriété individuelle et employée tant par les femmes que par les hommes.

La seconde s'étend de l'embouchure de la Mfimi, jusqu'aux confins du territoire des Batitu.

La pipe à chanvre n'est pas nkisi, la pipe à tabac, très primitive, est formée d'une nervure de feuille de bananier, très souvent munie d'un fourneau en bois ou en terre cuite. La femme ne fume ni le tabac ni le chanvre et la coutume de fumer la pipe en communauté n'y est guère en honneur.

La troisième zone est celle où nous avons rencontré la pipe à tabac en bois, munie d'une embouchure calebasse ou d'un chalumeau en os de singe. Elle comprend toute la région des Yaelima-Bankutshu y compris les Bashilele et les Bakuba et très probablement la région des Dengese.

En général les indigènes aiment beaucoup à fumer le tabac. Ils le font de préférence quand il fait froid, prétendant que cela active la chaleur du corps.

Le tabac n'est pas cultivé en grandes étendues, la culture en est toujours strictement limitée aux besoins de celui qui l'entreprend. Lorsque l'indigène veut fumer le tabac, il arrache une feuille de la plante, la fait sécher à la chaleur d'un foyer, l'écrase et la réduit en poudre. Une pincée de ce tabac sommairement pilé est placée dans le récipient formant fourneau de la pipe et recouverte ensuite d'un charbon de bois incandescent. L'indigène aspire fortement la fumée, jusqu'à ce qu'il en ait la bouche pleine, la retient pendant quelques instants et la rejette ensuite en ouvrant largement la bouche et détournant légèrement la tête. Il arrive très fréquemment qu'il aspire une partie de la fumée ce qui provoque toujours d'une toux violente, l'apparition de larmes et parfois un malaise assez sérieux.

Fig. 98. — [illegible] fumant le tabac.

Si les indigènes sont réunis en groupe, ils se passent la pipe de voisin à voisin, après avoir aspiré une bonne bouffée. L'attente du fumeur est très souvent marquée de signes d'impatience et celui qui se risquerait à prendre à la pipe plus que ce qu'il lui revient s'exposerait à une dispute en règle.

Les femmes ne sont jamais admises au cercle des fumeurs. Elles ne se réunissent d'ailleurs pas entre elles pour fumer, mais le font toujours isolément.

Comme nous l'avons dit plus haut les conséquences de l'usage du chanvre sont des plus funestes.

Au premier plaisir sensuel succède une excitation nerveuse intense. Le fumeur perd rapidement le sentiment de la réalité. Ce qui l'entoure ce qu'il voit ce qu'il touche, ce qu'il entend prend des proportions démesurées. Incapable de se dominer, de se maîtriser, il passe d'un excès à l'autre. Un rien le met en colère et le fait rugir de fureur, et un instant après il bondit de joie, gesticule, danse et chante sans rime ni raison. Puis survient l'affaissement général, la chute brusque des nerfs surexcités. Le fumeur s'assoupit et dort. Quand-il se réveille il n'a plus le moindre souvenir de ce qu'il a fait, ni de ce qui s'est passé. Il se sent très abattu et a les yeux brillants et hagards.

Les fumeurs de chanvre deviennent généralement fous et le plus souvent fous furieux.

Fig. 90. — W'adia fumant le chanvre.

Devant les ravages que produit cette funeste passion, le Gouvernement en a défendu la culture, la vente, le transport, la détention.

Malgré ces ordonnances, la sévérité de leur application, les efforts des agents et missionnaires et les effets pernicieux de l'usage du chanvre, les indigènes restent fortement attachés à cet excitant et en usent encore beaucoup en cachette, comme nous l'avons fait remarquer plus haut. Chez certaines tribus, notamment chez les Bamfumungu et les Baboma, le chanvre est considéré comme un nkisi ou amulette préservant des maladies et guérissant les malades. Ceci nous explique les nombreuses difficultés que rencontre l'administration à vaincre cette passion. La suppression totale de l'emploi du chanvre qui s'impose dans l'intérêt matériel et moral des indigènes, sera une œuvre de longue haleine. Cet excitant, cette cause de plaisirs sensuels, cette passion sacrée et qu'il croit bienfaisante, ce nkisi, l'indigène ne l'abandonnera qu'après une lutte longue, persévérante et énergique.

CHAPITRE V.

Les soins donnés au corps.

Hygiène. — Fabrication du savon. — Nguia et Mpembe. — Déformations artificielles. — L'épilation. — Limage des dents. — La coiffure. — Parures et objets suspendus au corps. — Tatouage par incision. — La circoncision.

Celui qui n'a été que temporairement en contact avec les indigènes a une tendance à nous les dépeindre comme des êtres peu soucieux de leur toilette, ignorant les principes d'hygiène et de propreté, disons même sales et crasseux. Pour peu que l'on ait l'occasion de pénétrer dans la vie de ces primitifs, on se rend bien vite compte de l'inexactitude de ces jugements, basés sur une observation hâtive et superficielle. En étudiant de près les coutumes de l'indigène, en l'observant dans sa vie quotidienne et régulière, on note quantité de petits faits, qui nous montrent que l'indigène, insouciant en apparence de toute mesure d'hygiène, et de soins de propreté, tient compte des principes rudimentaire d'hygiène et qu'il s'efforce par quantité de petits faits à les appliquer dans sa vie.

A première vue la hutte indigène ressemble à un taudis, son aspect très souvent délabré, l'entrée étroite et basse, l'absence de fenêtres ou de cheminée d'aérage et le désordre qui règne généralement dans la place qui sert de refuge, de cuisine, etc., sont autant de causes de l'impression désagréable que produit une rapide investigation. Cependant l'indigène met un grand soin à la construction de son habitation. La femme s'acharne au nettoyage régulier de l'intérieur de sa hutte. Si, poussant nos investigations plus loin, nous passons dans l'espace réservé aux époux, que nous étudions de près l'organisation et les dispositions de ce qui tient lieu de chambre à coucher, nous constatons, qu'il y règne toujours une propreté qui contraste singulièrement avec l'impression désagréable du premier contact. Les parois sont tapissées de nattes; le lit primitif est construit en surélévation pour éviter le contact désagréable et peu hygiénique du sol. Au dessus du lit l'indigène étend une natte; l'oreiller d'un usage courant, lui permet de se reposer dans une attitude favorable au repos.

Presque journellement tous les indigènes prennent un bain. Le plus souvent ils vont à la rivière aux heures les plus chaudes de la journée, parfois de grand matin ou vers le soir. L'enfant y participe dès sa tendre jeunesse. Outre ces bains réguliers, l'indigène se lave souvent tout le corps à l'eau chaude. Il s'enduit ensuite d'une légère couche d'huile de palme, pour assurer la souplesse à la peau et éviter qu'elle ne souffre trop sous l'action des rayons solaires.

Avant et après chaque repas l'indigène a soin de se rincer la bouche. Après le repas il se nettoie les dents au moyen d'une petite brosse en rotang ou en bois tendre, dont les fibres constituent les soies.

Un réel souci de propreté préside à la préparation des repas. Tous les aliments sont lavés, nettoyés et bouillis avant la consommation. Les ustensiles qui servent à leur préparation sont minutieusement entretenus et nettoyés. Malgré les conditions primitives de la préparation de la farine de manioc, celle-ci est aussi pure que si elle avait été préparée par une méthode perfectionnée et un outillage moderne. Non content de l'entretien des ustensiles dans lesquels la femme sert les repas elle a soin de les tapisser au moment opportun de feuilles fraîches et bien propres.

Les indigènes ont les ongles des mains et des pieds coupés courts.

L'entretien des pieds s'explique par mesure d'hygiène et la nécessité de prendre des précautions pour éviter la vermine, qui s'installe de préférence à ces endroits (chiques) ; l'entretien des mains ne peut s'expliquer que par le soin de propreté qu'implique la façon indigène de prendre les aliments.

Le savon d'importation n'est point encore d'un usage courant quoi que nous en ayons trouvé dans de nombreuses huttes indigènes.

Beaucoup de femmes indigènes savent fabriquer le savon. Leur procédé est des plus simples. Des épluchures desséchées de bananes, des troncs de papayers, des écorces, des fruits de divers végétaux et les déchets des noix de palme sont réunis, brûlés, les cendres soigneusement recueillies et mélangées à une certaine quantité d'eau pour être bouillies. A la première ébullition la femme enlève les cendres et les impuretés qui viennent flotter à la surface. L'ébullition est continuée ensuite jusqu'à évaporation quasi complète. Quand il ne reste dans le récipient qu'un dépôt épais et sirupeux gris-noirâtre, la femme le retire du feu, le lave et le malaxe d'eau fraîche, jusqu'à ce qu'il ait pris une couleur plus claire. Elle y ajoute ensuite de l'huile de palme, délaie le tout avec grand soin et remet l'ensemble sur le feu. La masse est remuée pendant toute la durée de l'ébullition et celle-ci poussée jusqu'à ce que la femme obtienne un mélange dont la consistance dépasse légèrement celle de nos savons mous.

Deux échantillons de ce savon, l'un provenant des Mosengere, l'autre des Basakata ont été soumis à l'analyse au laboratoire du Musée du Congo Belge. Voici les résultats obtenus :

Savon n° 11500

Humidité : (110 °/₀)	1,07 %
Cendres	9,86 %	sur matière sèche.
Corps gras total	84,24 %	» » »
Substances étrangères	2,45 %	» » »
Substances terreuses	0,22 %	» » »
Insaponifiable	9,23 %	» » »

Alcalinité des cendres en Na_2O sur cendres totales : nulle.

Conclusions :

Le produit analysé n'a de savon que le nom. C'est de l'huile végétale, (probablement de l'huile de palme) mélangée à des matières terreuses sans aucun pouvoir saponifiant.

Cendres	27,80 %	sur matière sèche.

Alcalinité des cendres en Na_2O sur cendres totales : 28,25 %.

Conclusions :

Savon contenant une quantité de corps gras trop faible, comparativement à celle qu'accuse le savon bien fabriqué. La teneur en substances terreuses est excessive. Il est à supposer que la lessive alcaline utilisée pour la préparation de ce savon examiné n'a pas été décantée soigneusement avant son emploi.

Le savon indigène n'est employé qu'aux soins de la toilette.

L'indigène ne se contente pas de s'enduire le corps d'huile de palme, l'homme et plus spécialement la femme se saupoudrent très souvent de poussière de Tukula. Les femmes en fabriquent un fard, dont elles aiment à se couvrir tout le corps par esprit de coquetterie. Cette coutume est tellement répandue parmi les populations du Lac Léopold II, que dans certaines régions, la fabrication du ngula est devenue une véritable industrie locale. Ce fait s'observe spécialement chez les Basengele. Dans un village voisin du poste de Bongo nous avons compté 25 installations consacrées à la fabrication de la poudre de ngula. L'établi le plus simple est formé par deux blocs de Tukula ou bois rouge, un petit récipient contenant de l'eau, une poignée de sable et une petite brosse en piassava. L'un des blocs est placé à terre. La femme est assise au travail. Le second bloc est placé à plat sur la surface supérieure du premier. Cette face est humectée d'eau et saupoudrée de sable. La femme tient le bloc supérieur des deux mains y imprime un mouvement de va et vient ou rotation et a bien soin de tenir les deux faces de frottement humides. Sous l'effort du frottement et l'action des grains de sable faisant fonction de lime râpe on obtient une poussière rouge, fine, à peu près impalpable, mélangée d'eau. L'art de cette fabrication consiste à procéder de façon à ce que le sable racleur se mélange le moins possible à la poussière de bois. L'habilité de certains fabricants est si grande, que l'on parvient à peine à retrouver dans leur ngula, quelques traces de sable. (1)

Dans la région des Mosengere, le métier à ngula est d'ordinaire plus perfectionné : une forte écorce d'arbre sert de cuvette. Sur cette cuvette sont fixés 5 ou 6 bâtons assez forts auxquels l'indigène attache l'un des blocs de Tukula. Un dispositif spécial permet de fixer ce métier. Certains indigènes en sont même arrivés à établir devant leur hutte avec un [illegible] très rudimentaire un métier perfectionné, permettant de fabriquer le ngula tout en se tenant debout. Quatre forts pieux fixés perpendiculairement en terre soutiennent à 15 centimètres du sol un grand bassin en écorce d'arbre. A un mètre de hauteur, des traverses horizontales sont attachées aux extrémités fourchues de ces pieux, et sur ces traverses ils fixent l'un des blocs de Takula. Un récipient en terre cuite suspendu dans les trois branches d'un pieux fixé en terre juste à côté de l'établi, contient le mélange d'eau et d'une minime partie d'huile. Une brosse faite d'une section de bois tendre plonge dans le mélange et permet à l'artisan de mouiller à volonté le bloc de Takula. Une petite calebasse sectionnée contient la réserve de sable, qui sert à racler la poussière de bois sous l'effort du frottement. Malgré toute l'habileté de l'ouvrier, ce sable se mélange à la poussière raclée et doit en conséquence être remplacé de temps à autre. Le fabricant de ngula, se tient debout devant l'établi. Le mélange d'eau, de poussière de ngula et de quelques grains de sable, tombe dans le bassin réservoir au fur et à mesure que le travail avance. Quand le stock est assez grand, l'indigène tresse des petits paniers de forme tronconique, d'une contenance moyenne d'un décimètre cube. La pâte de ngula est tassée dans ces paniers et l'ensemble suspendu ensuite sous l'auvent à l'abri du soleil. Au bout de quelques jours la pâte s'est desséchée, le cône du ngula est moulé, détaché du moule, enveloppé de feuilles de bananier et soigneusement ficelé au moyen de lanières de rotang, éclats de bambou ou de fibres de raphia.

La réserve familiale reste en général dans les réservoirs des métiers à ngula ; toute la production moulée est écoulée sur les marchés étrangers.

Les paniers servant de moules à ngula sont tous tressés d'après une même technique. Des lanières de rotang sont placées par série de quatre en croix, sans être entrelacées ou tressées au point de croisement. Le fond du panier est formé par le cadre de croisement. Les lanières sont relevées sur les quatre côtés de ce carré et maintenues par une ligature en fibres de raphia tordues, puis les parois sont tressées à technique simple c'est-à-dire d'entrecroisement alternatif de la lanière verticale et de la bande transversale. Comme tous ces moules présentent toujours une hauteur et un diamètre approximativement uniformes, les cônes de ngula ont à la fois la même forme et un poids très régulier. Les indigènes en font un objet d'échange très employé dans leurs relations commerciales. Pour certaines régions le cône de ngula est devenu de cette façon une véritable monnaie ayant cours régulier d'une tribu à l'autre.

Au passage des steamers à Bushie s'organise régulièrement un marché, où les gens de l'intérieur échangent les produits de leurs industries contre les objets importés qu'apportent les noirs au service des Blancs. Les cônes de Ngula, comptent parmi les principaux objets d'échange et sont cédés à un cours très élevé. Dans la région de Ibeke le vieux chef Kua Kua était grand trafiquant de Ngula. Régulièrement il passait avec quatre ou cinq de ses femmes, emportant de la région de l'entre Kasai-Lukenie des produits divers, pour aller les échanger contre le Ngula fabriqué dans la région de la Lukeru.

Dans toutes les régions du Congo Central, la forme du Ngula d'échange est celle du cône allongé tronconique. Par contre chez les Basongo Meno et plus à l'Est, le ngula se présente le plus souvent sous forme de boule. L'indigène de ces régions s'en sert souvent pour l'ornementation de ses poteries, objets en bois et pour teindre les fibres des tissus à broder. Il le conserve dans des boîtes à fards, sculptées dans du bois de Tukula, d'ordinaire ornées de dessins très artistiques. Il s'en sert encore pour colorier sa coiffure.

Quelques échantillons de Ngula ont été soumis à l'analyse du laboratoire du Musée, voici les résultats des analyses.

Ngula-Bam.

Le produit préparé par les indigènes se présente sous la forme d'une masse comprimée rouge brique. Elle comprend des matières colorantes rouges, du bois en sciure, du sable. Elle renferme une notable quantité de cendres : 10,36 %.

Elle a été concassée, tamisée et traitée par de l'alcool éthylique à chaud : nous avons obtenu une espèce de sirop fortement coloré en rouge foncé. Le sirop a été filtré, puis évaporé ; il a laissé un résidu ressemblant à une couche de laque laquelle, sous la pression d'une spatule s'écaillait en paillettes mordorées, très légères.

Nous avons recherché les dissolvants de ce produit et quelques propriétés chimiques générales :

1°/ L'alcool éthylique, l'alcool méthylique et l'acétone le dissolvent complètement en beau rouge écarlate.

2°/ L'alcool amylique donne une dissolution entière, claire, d'un rouge vineux.

3°/ L'éther sulfurique le dissout incomplètement en donnant une solution claire, jaune, fluorescente.

4°/ Le chloroforme le dissout aussi imparfaitement, donne un léger trouble et une fluorescence verte-jaune.

5°/ Le benzol et le trichloréthylène ne le dissolvent presque pas et offrent une fluorescence verte.

6°/ Le tétrachlorure de carbone le dissout difficilement, la solution reste claire et est légèrement teintée de rouge.

7°/ L'acide acétique glacial pur donne une dissolution complète d'un beau rouge écarlate.

8°/ L'acide acétique à 50 %, ne dissout absolument rien.

9°/ L'eau distillée ne dissout rien.

10°/ Les solutions alcalines de potasse donnent une magnifique dissolution complète d'un beau rouge vineux foncé.

11°/ L'hydrogène sulfuré fonce la liqueur sans donner de précipité.

12°/ L'eau de chaux : la liqueur se fonce et tient en suspension un léger précipité brun lie de vin.

13°/ Alun : même action que la chaux ; le précipité est beaucoup moins abondant.

14°/ Sels de plomb : la liqueur se fonce et donne un précipité assez abondant, brun lie de vin.

15°/ Sels de fer : Le chlorure ferrique fait virer la teinture en violet foncé opaque.

16°/ Sels de cuivre : la liqueur obtenue est moins foncée qu'avec les sels de fer.

17°/ Employé comme polissage, il a donné d'excellents résultats sur l'acajou, le hêtre, le bois blanc du Canada.

Nos recherches nous indiqueront les usages industriels auxquels on pourra le destiner.

L'attaché au Laboratoire du Musée, (signé) L'HEUREUX.

En dehors du ngula l'indigène s'enduit parfois aussi le corps d'une espèce d'argile blanche, que l'on rencontre assez fréquemment dans le lit des rivières. L'indigène l'appelle « Mpemba ». Son usage n'est de loin pas aussi généralisé que celui du ngula et nous croyons que l'indigène y rattache une force magique plutôt qu'une tendance d'ornementation. L'usage du « Mpemba » s'observe surtout chez les populations du Congo Kasai, Lac Léopold II et de la Lukenie jusque dans la région des Bolia.

Nulle part nous n'avons remarqué que l'indigène s'en enduisait tout le corps. Les quelques femmes en deuil que nous avons rencontrées étaient couvertes d'une boue jaune grisâtre et non de « Mpemba ». Nous croyons d'ailleurs que l'usage du « Mpemba » est réservé au chef, ses femmes, peut-être aux notables et à leur famille, mais il nous a été impossible d'établir sûrement l'exactitude de notre hypothèse. Interrogés à ce sujet, les indigènes se sont toujours bornés à des réponses douteuses et évasives. Le chef indigène ne se présente que rarement à une grande assemblée sans avoir la figure et parfois les bras et le buste barriolés de signes tracés au « Mpemba ». A l'occasion de toutes les réceptions officielles, le chef, quelques notables et parfois certaines femmes de chefs, avaient les yeux encadrés d'un rectangle plus ou moins régulier tracé au «Mpemba».

Les déformations artificielles que nous avons observées au cours de notre voyage sont :

1°/ L'épilation.
2°/ Le limage des dents.
3°/ Le tatouage par incision.
4°/ La circoncision.

L'épilation est pratiquée par toutes les populations des régions parcourues. L'indigène enlève jusqu'au dernier poil du corps. Ce qui ne peut être arraché est rasé avec grand soin. Pour les parties du corps difficiles à atteindre, hommes et femmes s'entraident mutuellement. Les sourcils et les cils sont également arrachés, tandis que la barbe et les moustaches sont, au contraire, soignées avec grand orgueil. Il n'arrive que très rarement que la barbe soit bien fournie. Nous n'avons rencontré qu'un cas bien caractéristique : l'heureux possesseur de cette belle barbe ou était fier au possible et Natali, chef des Banfumu de Kwamouth était navré de n'avoir le menton garni que de quelques rares poils, alors qu'un de ses notables, était doté d'une si belle barbe.

Chez les populations Bateke-Banfumu jusqu'aux Ipanga, les indigènes se rasent assez souvent la base du cuir chevelu, sur toute la circonférence du crâne. Leur coiffure présente l'aspect d'une calotte très régulière.

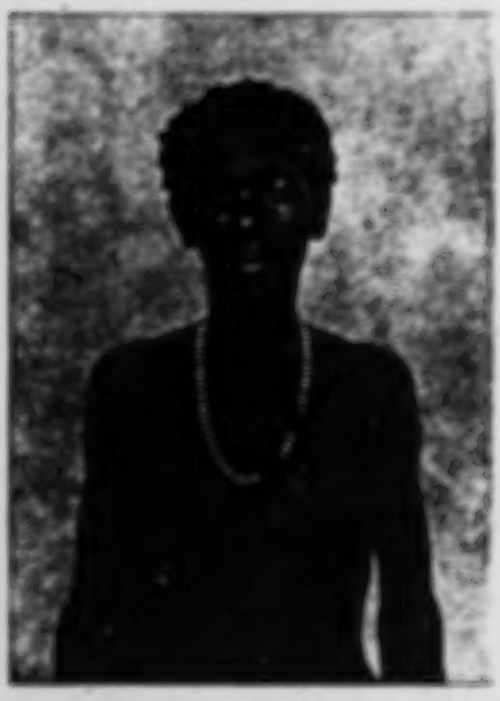

Fig. 98. — Type Bateke à longue barbe, les cils et sourcils épilés.

Chez les Tetela, nous avons rencontré des hommes qui avaient le crâne complètement rasé à l'exception d'une bande au-dessus de la nuque. Une coutume analogue doit avoir été en honneur chez les Bateke et les Banfumu, mais la section non rasée était plus large.

Chez les Tetela et jusque dans la région des Bankutshu du Nord de Bena Dibele, les indigènes se rasent les cheveux de façon à élargir le front. Celui-ci est nettement découpé en angle droit et encadré par deux coins en saillie au-dessus des tempes.

Notons que la coutume de raser une partie du cuir chevelu n'est guère générale. Les formes types que nous venons de décrire s'observent régulièrement mais ne sont point portées par tous les indigènes. Il nous a même semblé qu'elles sont un peu l'apanage des chefs, des notables et de leur famille, mais nous n'oserions point affirmer qu'il y a eu l'occurrence un droit, une prérogative effective.

Les Bateke et les Banfumu se liment les incisives médianes de la mâchoire supérieure en forme d'un triangle isocèle, les brisent ou les arrachent. Nous avons observé cette coutume chez quelques Baboma. La majorité de ceux-ci ont cependant les dents limées en pointe, coutume qui se retrouve jusque dans la région des Bakala et le long de la rive Nord du Kasai jusqu'au 21° long. E. Gr. Basongo-Meno semble signifier « gens aux dents limées » et serait le nom employé par les populations du Sud pour désigner leurs voisins du Nord dont ils ignoraient le vrai nom. La coutume de la déformation des dents tend à disparaître rapidement. Déjà la jeune génération ne s'y soumet plus et il nous est arrivé souvent d'entendre désigner du nom de Basongi c. à. d. sauvages les indigènes aux dents limées. L'opération de la déformation des dents se fait au moyen d'un petit burin en fer et d'un maillet en bois. Le forgeron du village s'en charge moyennant une légère rémunération. Les dents sont cassées à petits coups secs, le patient étant assis, la tête s'appuyant sur les genoux de l'opérateur, qui se tient debout derrière le patient. L'opération très douloureuse comprend plusieurs séances. Les dernières sont consacrées au limage qui se pratique au moyen d'une petite lime indigène.

Les cils et sourcils soigneusement épilés.

L'indigène s'occupe tout spécialement de sa coiffure ; certaines d'entre elles sont de vraies petites merveilles, fruits d'un long et patient travail. Hommes et femmes y attachent une grande importance. Ils s'évertuent à faire toujours mieux et plus coquet. Comme tout indigène est coiffeur par naissance et qu'ils s'entr'aident avec un désintéressement absolu, il s'en suit que la coiffure varie non seulement d'une tribu à l'autre, mais que nous avons observé les formes les plus disparates dans une même tribu.

FIG. 97. — Déformation des dents au Lac Léopold II

FIG. 98. — Déformation des dents et coiffure chez les Batende.

Une méthode très en vogue consiste à s'enduire les cheveux d'une pâte assez épaisse d'huile de palme et de ngula, de séparer les mèches et de les enrouler de façon à en former de petites boules très irrégulières. Pour rehausser cette coiffure, l'indigène n'hésite pas à enfiler dans la chevelure des noix d'arachides, soigneusement enduites de pâte de ngula, de façon à cacher la fraude.

Une coiffure très courante au Lac Léopold II et dans la Basse Lukenie, comprend une infinité de petites tresses achevées recouvrant toute la tête, retombant sur le front, les oreilles et la nuque. Ces tresses sont tantôt placées en étoiles partant du sommet de la tête, tantôt en bandes croisées, tantôt partiellement parallèles puis centrifuges des côtés, parfois concentriques ou placées en spirales. L'élément plus civilisé a une tendance à adopter la coiffure à grande crête de coq, simple, double ou triple.

Chez les Basengere et les Bolia, nous avons beaucoup admiré une coiffure en auréole mobile. Sur tout le contour de la tête une étroite bande de cheveux étaient tressée finement. Les tresses étaient montées sur de très fins éclats de raphia placés en couronne. L'indigène pouvait à volonté abaisser ou relever cette coiffure, d'où il résultait que tantôt il semblait coiffé d'une calotte bien lisse, tantôt d'une couronne placée en éventail. Cette coiffure était très prisée chez les Basengere. Chez les Tomba et les Wadia, la coiffure en mèches coniques était à la mode chez les hommes. Les femmes [illegible] recherchaient pour les grandes fêtes la coiffure en gros bourrelet relevé, circulaire, rehaussé par une bande en fibres tressées, ornée de une ou de deux rangées de cauries.

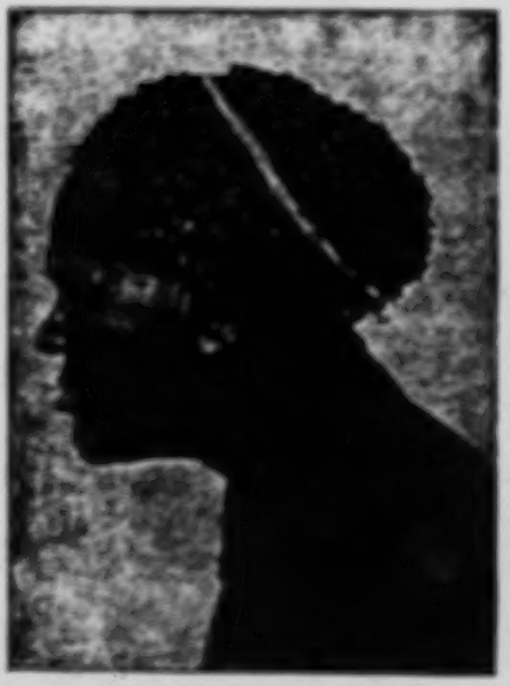

FIG. 97. — Coiffure rehaussée de raphia d'un chef [illegible]. Cils et sourcils sont soigneusement épilés.

Toutes ces formes de la coiffure indigène ne présentaient cependant aucun caractère stable. Nous les rencontrions plus ou moins régulièrement dans l'une et dans l'autre région sans que nous puissions y rattacher un caractère nettement local.

Par contre certaines formes d'un port moins général, présentent une caractéristique ethnique bien déterminée. Tel est le cas pour la coiffure en chignon prolongeant la tête des [illegible]. Cette coiffure et l'ensemble de la tête avec les cils et sourcils épilés, le crâne en grande partie couvert de petites houppes de cheveux crépus, barbe, moustache et le tatouage peigné des tempes et des joues, voilà bien la forme type et caractéristique, correspondant à l'idéal artistique des Bateke-Banfunu. Tous les indigènes voudraient l'adopter, mais les grands chefs et les notables peuvent s'en glorifier. C'est d'après ce modèle, que les Bateke-Banfunu, exécutent les figurines, souvent renseignées comme fétiches, mais qui sont en réalité des Nkisi, protecteurs des enfants. Pour les grands comme pour les petits, le pauvre comme le riche, la forme de ces « nkisi » est uniformément la même. Elle se rencontre dans toute la région, depuis le Stanley-Pool jusqu'au Kwango et spécifie notamment les populations Bateke-Banfunu, dont elle établit à merveille l'unité ethnique.

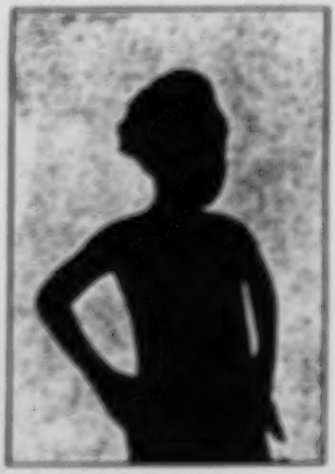

FIG. 98. — [illegible] avec sa coiffure en [illegible].

Une coiffure non moins caractéristique est celle que portent les notables de la région des Ipanga-Tadima. Les cheveux séparés par une ligne médiane partant du milieu du front pour s'arrêter dans la nuque sont réunis en deux tresses latérales. Prenant racine au-dessus des oreilles, les tresses contournent et se terminent sous le menton, où elles sont parfois nouées. Jadis les cheveux du sommet de la tête étaient tressés sur une petite circonférence en bourrelet droit. Seule la favorite du jeune chef des Batiba portait encore cette coiffure ancestrale lors de notre passage dans la région. Cette dernière coiffure semble avoir été très répandue dans la région des Tadima et peut-être bien plus à l'Est. Elle correspondait au type ethnique de la région, d'après lequel les artistes sculpteurs exécutèrent la grande majorité des statuettes, figurines et coupes si remarquablement ornementées que nous possédons de cette région. Nous retrouvons d'ailleurs ces mêmes formes jusque chez les Bankutshu de Bena Dibele-Kole, chez les Bakuba et chez les Bashilele. Ces diverses tribus ont en outre reproduit dans leurs sculptures les dessins des parties rasées de la coiffure, si singulière et si caractéristique. Sous ce rapport ces diverses tribus se rattachent les unes aux autres et leur affinité ethnique apparaît très nette. Malgré leur éloignement actuel et l'absence de toute relation de tribu, la parenté ethnique se dessine clairement dans les souvenirs qu'elles ont gardés de la culture ancestrale.

Ces diverses constatations nous autorisent à diviser les populations en trois groupes bien distincts :

1°/ Le groupe Ekonda-Basengele avec sa coiffure en bourrelet surplombant la nuque, le reste du crâne rasé ou les cheveux coupés courts.

2°/ Le groupe des Iyanga et populations de l'Est avec leur coiffure en deux tresses contournant les oreilles pour passer sous le menton et bourrelet droit au sommet de la tête.

B) Le groupe des tribus du Lac Léopold II et de la Basse Lukenie jusqu'aux Ipanga où la coiffure en petites tresses prédomine.

Le goût de la parure est plus ou moins développé chez toutes les populations de la région du Kasai — Lac Léopold II — Lukenie. Les objets sont passés dans la coiffure, s'attachent au cou, se portent aux poignets, et aux chevilles ou servent d'ornement à la ceinture.

De Stanley-Pool à Mushie, la femme glisse dans sa coiffure une couronne de cauris, au poignet et à l'avant-bras elle porte parfois des bracelets en laiton ou en verroterie, au cou elle suspend des colliers en laiton ou des fibres enfilant des perles d'importation. Très souvent le collier lui passe des épaules sous le bras. Dans toute cette région, la parure d'importation prédomine, mais les chefs ont conservé quelques ornements spéciaux de l'ancienne époque notamment le collier et bracelet en laiton ciselé et le collier orné de dents de léopard ou de lion. Il se rattache à ces dernières parures un privilège, une prérogative, un droit d'usage. Elles sont en quelque sorte des insignes de dignité. Dans la grande toilette de Natali, vrai type du petit chef indigène, chaque détail semblait avoir une signification spéciale. En notre honneur et pour nous en imposer, il avait mis son plus beau costume : une vieille tunique du régiment des Guides Belges ; autour du cou une chaîne avec médaille de l'État, l'apanage du chef indigène reconnu par le Gouvernement. A la même chaîne il avait attaché un petit sifflet, et les cinq ou six médailles de l'impôt de ses femmes. Au-dessus de cette chaîne, il avait passé le collier des chefs indigènes, en laiton ornementé de dessins ciselés. Sa peau était d'un noir luisant de graisse et d'huile. Le visage était barré de la pointe du nez au sommet du front par une large ligne rouge faite d'huile et de poudre de ngula ; autour de l'œil droit était peint un grand cercle, blanc au-dessus et jaune en-dessous. Ses cils étaient fort longs, et poudrés de blanc, tandis que les sourcils avaient été soigneusement arrachés. La tête était couverte d'une épaisse chevelure, courte et crépue. A la partie postérieure, elle formait un gros chignon-bourrelet, auquel s'adaptait une petite coiffure en cordelettes tressées, teinte de ngula et reluisante de graisse. Une longue perle bleue se balançait à la partie inférieure de cette coiffure originale, et une grande plume de coq se dressait sur le tout. Les tempes et les joues étaient marquées d'une série de lignes parallèles peu accentuées, tatouage qui semble être tracé au peigne de fer et qui est caractéristique de tous les Bantomongo. De la main gauche Natali tenait le grand bâton de marche, orné au sommet, d'une petite clochette en fer et sous le bras droit il portait le chasse-mouche queue de buffle, insigne réservé au chef. Tel était Natali ; chef indigène dont les ornements indiquaient l'autorité ; reconnu par l'État, dont il possédait la médaille, polygame ayant payé l'impôt de ses femmes, impot dont les petites plaques-quittances pendaient au collier ; sorcier, féticheur, connaissant l'art de fabriquer des Nkisi et des poudres magiques qui bariolaient son visage.

FIG. 106. — Un vieux chef indigène du Lac Léopold II, orné de ses insignes, et accompagné de ses deux femmes et de son joueur de Lokombe.

Non moins intéressante est la tenue de grande cérémonie des chefs des tribus du Lac Léopold II. Elle varie suivant l'importance du chef, mais elle comprend toujours une certaine quantité de cauris et un ou plusieurs disques en laiton attachés à la coiffure et au pagne. Le droit de porter la coiffure à disques, date d'une époque éloignée et est réservé par la coutume ancestrale aux chefs et grands notables.

L'usage s'en retrouve le long de toute la Lukenie. Du Lac Léopold II à Dekese, ces disques présentent tous les mêmes formes et motifs d'ornementation. La fabrication en est réservée aux grands forgerons après autorisation préalable du Nkumu ou roi de la région.

Les dépouilles de léopard, les cloches en fer ou en laiton suspendues à la ceinture et le droit d'y fixer certains couteaux d'une forme spéciale, forment également l'apanage des chefs et des notables dans toute la région du Lac Léopold II et de la Lukenie.

Nous nous trouvons donc en présence de diverses manifestations de la vie matérielle qui sont autant d'indices de l'origine commune ou de la parenté de ces diverses tribus.

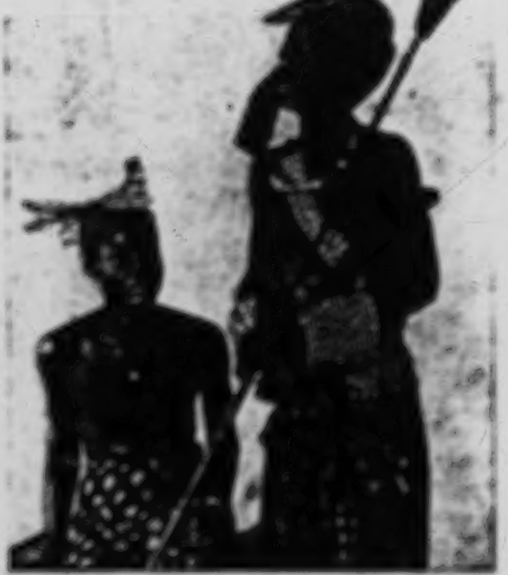

Fig. 109. — Chef religieux du Lac Léopold II et son conseiller, prêtre principal de la tribu, tous deux en costume de gala.

Chez les populations du Lac Léopold II, les ornements fixés dans la coiffure sont rares. Les épingles à cheveux semblent inconnues, les peignes sont faits en éclats de raphia. La femme recherche plus spécialement les parures en métal, fer, laiton ou cuivre, tandis que les chefs et grands notables portent volontiers des ceintures, colliers, bracelets et bonnets garnis de cauris. Le collier en laiton massif est très en vogue. Plus il est lourd, plus il charme. Il nous est arrivé de voir des femmes portant des colliers pesant jusque 15 livres. Ces colliers sont rivés au cou des favorites des grands chefs ou des notables fortunés. En cas de divorce ou de séparation le propriétaire les enlève sans se soucier des souffrances ou des cris de la victime. Les femmes ne semblent nullement être incommodées de ces parures encombrantes. Rarement elles les entourent de tissus pour atténuer le frottement de ces masses sur les clavicules.

Les bracelets et anneaux aux chevilles sont relativement rares comme parures chez les [illegible] et autres tribus riveraines du Lac. Chez les Bokala et les [illegible] nous les avons rencontrés de temps à autre.

Les grandes élégantes [illegible] et Bokala portent de lourds anneaux en laiton passés au-dessus des chevilles, des bagues de laiton aux doigts (tant des mains que des pieds) et des ceintures en cuir ornées de perles en laiton, tandis que les colliers en laiton massif disparaissent petit à petit au fur et à mesure que l'on s'avance vers l'Est. Chez les Yaelima et les Bokala on n'en retrouve pour ainsi dire plus du tout, mais les femmes et les hommes recherchent les bracelets en fils de laiton. Ils en forment des gaines passant du poignet au coude. On n'y porte, à de rares exceptions près point d'anneaux aux chevilles. Quelques notables s'affublent de colliers en perles d'importation. La ceinture ornée de perles en laiton y est d'un usage assez courant. Dans la région de Bena-Dibele Kole, les ornements en cuivre ou en laiton semblent disparaître petit à petit, devant la pénétration des perles d'importation. Les colliers en verroterie ont d'ailleurs pénétré dans toute la région que nous avons parcourue. Leur vogue est particulièrement grande chez les femmes Ipanga et Bolia. L'homme préfère les colliers en poils de queue d'éléphant ou un simple anneau de laiton.

Fig. [illegible] — Deux femmes [illegible] et un enfant portant autour du cou des colliers en laiton massif.

Les bracelets et les bagues en laiton sont portés par les hommes, de Stanley-Pool à Kole. Les notables [illegible] et [illegible], portent des bagues à toutes les phalanges des doigts. Ceux qui en ont les moyens en mettent même aux doigts des pieds. Au cou ils passent ces colliers en fibres auxquels ils suspendent : les cornes et amulettes à Nkisi. Il se rattache à ces colliers ... une idée religieuse, un pouvoir magique plutôt qu'une recherche d'ornementation.

Fig. [illegible]. — [illegible] le chef [illegible] de [illegible].

Les enfants sont d'ordinaire surchargés de parures très voyantes, perles blanches piquées dans la coiffure, colliers et ceintures en verroterie, amulettes et grelots attachés à la ceinture. Nous croyons cependant que ces objets n'ont pas pour but principal la parure mais la sécurité de l'enfant. Il est bon de dire, que la mère fixe les plumes dans la coiffure de son enfant et attache à la ceinture des grelots et des sonnettes pour le retrouver plus facilement, s'il vient à s'égarer dans les plantations ou dans la brousse. Aussitôt que l'enfant est assez avancé en âge pour retrouver son chemin et rentrer seul au village, grelots, sonnettes et plumes sont délaissés définitivement.

D'après leurs parures, les populations de la région de Stanley-Pool Kole, se divisent donc en cinq groupes.

Le premier comprend les Bateke-Bamfunuka-Baboma où les parures sont relativement rares tant chez l'homme que chez la femme.

Le second englobe toute la région des populations du Lac Léopold II et celle de la Basse Lukenie, caractérisé par le collier en laiton massif porté par les femmes, les ornements garnis de cauris et les plaques de laiton portés par les notables et les chefs.

Fig. 107. — Un groupe d'enfants des Bolia.

Le troisième comprend les Ipanga et les Bolia avec la ceinture ornée de perles en laiton, des bagues aux mains et aux pieds et les anneaux en laiton massif portés au-dessus des chevilles, parures spéciales aux femmes.

Le quatrième se caractérise par la gaine d'anneaux de laiton, enveloppant les bras, du poignet au coude, et porté tant par les hommes que par les femmes Bokala-Yaelima.

Le cinquième comprend la région de Bena-Dibele-Kole, où les parures d'importation ont remplacé les ornements primitifs.

En dehors de toutes ces parures d'un usage régulier dans la vie courante et journalière, l'indigène a encore ses toilettes de parade et de cérémonie.

Nous avons donné une description du costume de parade de Natali chef des Bankutu de Kapanda.

Le chef Etoti, vieil inexorable Wadia portait lors des grandes cérémonies une coiffure en cordelettes tressées, ornée de trois disques en laiton. Il avait en outre un collier en poils de queue d'éléphant, auquel était suspendu un tablier de forme triangulaire orné de huit disques en laiton, autant d'indices de sa grande puissance et de son titre de plus ancien et plus grand Mbomu ou [illegible] de toute la région du Lac Léopold II. La figure était enduite de ngula, les yeux cernés de [illegible], sur les bras une longue ligne blanche. Il tenait d'une main le chasse-mouche royal et de l'autre deux cannes de chef.

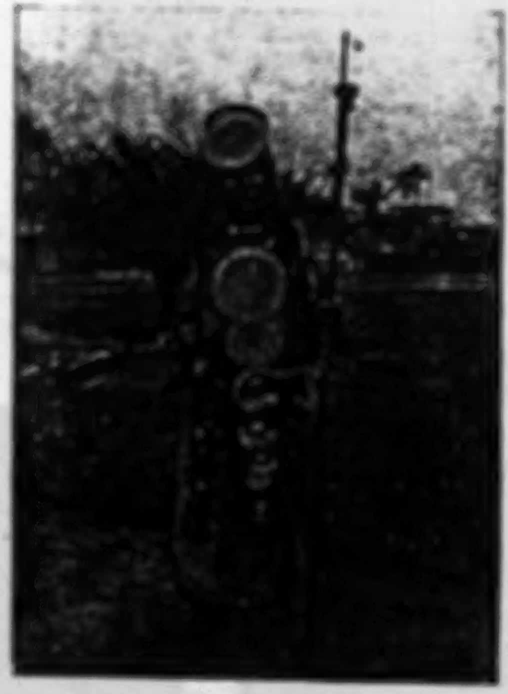

Fig. 446. — Etoti, vieil inexorable chef des Wadia en grande toilette.

Kakoo le chef déchu des Bolia, portait en toute circonstance sa coiffure en cordelettes tressée, ornée de la grande plaque en laiton. La ceinture était garnie d'une dépouille de léopard et de deux clochettes en fer, autant de prérogatives réservées au Mbomu. A une chaîne en laiton passée en bandoulière était suspendu le grand couteau royal passé dans une gaine; et Kakoo ne se séparait jamais de son grand arc ni de sa boîte de flèches armées de grands dards en fer.

Fig. [illegible]. Toilette de danse des fiancées [illegible] de la région de Wombali. — Tatouage du dos.

Lors des danses et des cérémonies, les femmes attachent à la ceinture les objets les plus hétéroclites et y fixent souvent de grandes branches touffues. Chez les Iyanga et les [illegible], ainsi que dans la région de Wombali et de Dekese, les danses de fiançailles et de mariage sont exécutées en toilettes spéciales très ornementées de perles et de cauris.

Ces parures ne présentent aucun caractère stable. Elles dépendent du goût, des caprices et de la fortune des indigènes, mais certaines parties du costume de parade que les fiancés portent aux danses des fiançailles semblent avoir une signification spéciale sur laquelle nous reviendrons ultérieurement.

De Léopoldville à Kole, les populations connaissent et pratiquent le tatouage. Il diffère cependant de l'une région à l'autre par la variété des motifs et dessins, la régularité de son application, le degré de son extension et la méthode ou la manière de son exécution.

Chez les [illegible] et les [illegible], nous avons remarqué deux tatouages distincts : celui des hommes et celui des femmes.

Chez l'homme la figure est couverte de raies striées parallèles, irrégulières, légèrement incurvées, peu profondes et recouvrant les joues, depuis les tempes jusque vers le menton. Chez la femme le tatouage du visage fait défaut; par contre le ventre est régulièrement recouvert de petites lignes ou pointillés allongés, en relief, juxtaposés les uns aux autres et recouvrant tout le corps, depuis le creux de l'estomac jusqu'au bas ventre.

Tribu des Wadia.

Le tatouage de l'homme se fait par de simples incisions généralement pratiquées à l'âge de 7 ou 8 ans à l'approche de la virilité. Chez la femme le tatouage se pratique à toutes les époques de la vie.

D'après les renseignements que nous avons obtenus, avant notre pénétration, la jeune fille se faisait tatouer avant la puberté. Le but était double : vanité personnelle et provocation du mâle. Seule la dernière raison justifie actuellement la pratique dans la région où notre influence s'est fait ressentir effectivement. L'introduction des étoffes Européennes, le développement de la vie économique et le progrès de la civilisation ont amené la femme à se vêtir, à cacher et à soustraire aux regards indiscrets son grande partie du corps. Le petit pagne primitif s'est transformé en une jupe plus ou moins longue, qui cache aux yeux du public la partie du corps couverte de tatouages. Dès lors, la femme ne peut plus en faire un objet de coquetterie. Si malgré cela certaines d'entr'elles continuent à se faire tatouer tout comme les anciennes matrones, c'est qu'elles espèrent ainsi attirer l'homme, lui plaire, et pouvoir participer plus rapidement aux plaisirs de la vie intime. Interrogés à ce sujet, les indigènes sont très affirmatifs. L'homme prétend que l'existence des [illegible]

[illegible] — Tatouage chez la femme [illegible]

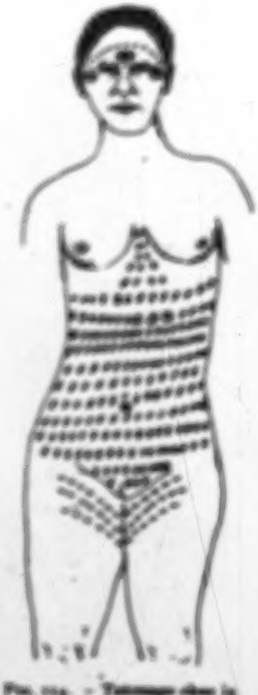

Fig. [illegible] — Tatouage chez la femme [illegible] de tatouage sur ces parties du corps de la femme est une cause provocatrice très active, résultant essentiellement des mouvements très accentués de la femme dans le contact sexuel. Cette explication qui d'après les indigènes semble être l'unique motif de l'application du tatouage chez la femme de certaines tribus, — et tel est à notre avis le cas chez les Bateke, les Bantomongo, les Baboma et jusqu'à un certain point chez toutes les populations riveraines du Lac Léopold II — nous permet également d'expliquer le caractère spécial du tatouage de la femme Yaelima, qui s'étend tout autour du mont de Venus, suit le pli de l'aine et se poursuit en cercles concentriques sur la partie supérieure interne des cuisses. Les cicatrices de tatouage de ces parties du corps de la femme généralement plus régulières et d'un relief plus prononcé, caractères qui s'accentuent d'ailleurs en raison directe du voisinage du pubis. Il ne peut y avoir une raison de coquetterie qui ait présidé au tracé de ces bourrelets cicatrisés ; leur présence est en grande partie cachée, même par le pagne le plus simple et le plus primitif, Chez certaines tribus le pagne recouvre complètement cette partie du corps et la femme indigène mettant beaucoup de soin et de pudeur à les cacher aux yeux du public [ce n'est qu'à grande peine que nous sommes parvenus à constater leur existence. Remarquons en passant que malgré de sérieux efforts nous ne sommes jamais parvenus à décider une femme indigène de l'intérieur à passer devant l'objectif non recouverte de son pagne. Les civilisées, demi-mondaines du pays ou ménagères étaient, il est vrai, moins farouches. Les indigènes ont aussi fait une distinction entre ce tatouage et celui qui s'étend sur d'autres parties du corps, notamment les bras, le dos et le visage.

Les tatouages du dos, des bras et de la gorge ont toujours un caractère essentiellement décoratif. Nous les avons spécialement rencontrés chez la femme, élément coquet par nature même chez les populations de civilisation toute primitive. Il leur manque généralement le caractère d'uniformité qui spécifie si bien le tatouage de race. Celui-ci se retrouve sous sa forme la plus caractéristique chez l'homme. Il affecte en particulier le front, les tempes, les joues et parfois la poitrine. Chez certaines tribus la femme a adopté également cette déformation artificielle spécifique de l'homme ; ailleurs elle a un tatouage spécial, qui se distingue nettement de celui du sexe fort ; enfin chez certaines populations la femme n'a pas de tatouage de race.

Fig. 116 — Tatouage chez la femme du Lac Léopold II et basse Lukenie

Nous avons vu plus haut, que chez les Bateke, les Banfumungu et les Baboma le tatouage caractéristique de l'homme est formé par les raies striées de la figure, tandis que celui de la femme est constitué par de petits pointillés en relief, juxtaposés en lignes plus ou moins parallèles horizontales, recouvrant le corps depuis le creux de l'estomac jusqu'au bas ventre. Ce même dessin se retrouve chez les femmes de toutes les populations riveraines du Lac Léopold II et chez celles des tribus de la Lukenie jusqu'au secteur de Bumbuli. Il convient cependant de remarquer, que dans cette dernière région le relief est moins net et moins accentué. Il diminue d'ailleurs en règle générale au fur et à mesure que l'on s'éloigne du Lac. Sous ce rapport toutes ces populations semblent donc pouvoir être rattachées au même groupement ethnique et il est probable que ce tatouage caractéristique est un des caractères de la civilisation ancestrale, conservé jusqu'à l'époque actuelle par toutes les branches du groupement primitif, nonobstant les migrations et les déplacements. Dans cette même région le tatouage de l'homme consiste en une petite rosace, formée par un gros point central et deux ou trois cercles concentriques en relief ornementant les tempes. Dans la région du Nord du Lac Léopold II, l'indigène y ajoute généralement une ligne de petits points traversant tout le front.

Chez les Tumba, les Mosengere, les Wadia et les Basakata-[illegible] au contraire, cette ligne est remplacée par une série de petites incisions en relief, formant dans le creux de la racine du nez une petite crête de coq.

Chez toutes ces tribus la femme a également adopté le tatouage de race, quoi qu'il convient de remarquer, qu'il nous est arrivé assez souvent de rencontrer des femmes n'ayant aucun tatouage sur la figure ; tandis que chez d'autres nous observons tantôt la rosace seule, tantôt la rosace et la crête de coq ou la figure traversant le front et parfois les trois tatouages combinés.

Chez les Ipanga et les Batita le tatouage comprend les dessins de la figure et ceux du sternum. Le tatouage de la poitrine est formé par une ligne verticale de petites cicatrices linéaires, parallèles obliques et légèrement tordues, tracées depuis la fourchette sternale jusqu'à l'ombilic. A gauche et à droite de cette ligne principale, nous observons une double rangée de petits traits obliques, séparés les uns des autres par une bande de un à trois centimètres de largeur. Le tatouage de la figure comprend une double ou une triple série de lignes obliques, disposées de façon à figurer les palmettes et une petite crête formée par de courtes incisions courbes, tracées à la racine du nez. D'après une photographie envoyée par Mr Timmermans, ce même genre de tatouage se rencontre également chez les Yaelima. Nous devons faire remarquer à ce sujet qu'au cours de notre voyage dans cette région, et malgré nos nombreuses recherches, nous n'avons nulle part pu observer le fait. Aussi croyons-nous à une erreur de transmission. Les types sont probablement des Ipanga-Batitu se trouvant peut-être accidentellement dans la région des Tadima.

Le tatouage de la femme Ipanga et Batitu, diffère assez notablement de celui de l'homme ; abstraction faite des dessins de la figure. Les lignes de petits pointillés que nous avons observées et décrites chez les femmes des populations de l'Ouest, sont très répandues dans toute la région. Chez certaines femmes, ces cicatrices s'étendent non seulement sur le ventre et le haut de la cuisse mais couvrent tout le corps et parfois même les bras.

Dans la région du secteur d'Oshwe, notamment vers les limites Est du territoire occupé par les Batitu, nous avons en outre rencontré quelques femmes dont les tatouages les différenciaient notablement de leurs sœurs de l'Ouest. Les palmettes des tempes sont remplacées par une série de cercles concentriques dont le centre est constitué par un petit point en fort relief. Ce point est placé à égale distance entre l'œil et l'oreille. Ces femmes n'étaient probablement pas originaires du pays. Elles y étaient arrivées, à notre avis, par échange ou peut-être bien par rapt. Elles appartenaient probablement à la tribu des Bokala ou des Tadima, quoique nous n'ayons pas pu faire confirmer le fait par les indigènes. Chez ces dernières tribus le tatouage est très en vogue. La femme en particulier semble affectionner très vivement ce genre d'ornementation.

Les dessins sont si multiples et si variés, que nous ne pourrions songer à en donner une description détaillée. Nous croyons pouvoir diviser dans l'ensemble les motifs en trois grandes classes ou catégories.

1°) Le tatouage de race ou de tribu.

Celui-ci comprend une série de petites courbes tracées au-dessus de la racine du nez, analogues à celles que nous avons observées antérieurement chez les Ipanga-Batitu, mais généralement plus marquées et plus accentuées. L'identité de ce motif caractéristique semble établir une affinité entre ces deux groupements, mais il convient de remarquer que le motif des tempes diffère notablement de l'une région à l'autre. Nous retrouvons ici la rosace des populations du Lac Léopold II mais beaucoup plus large.

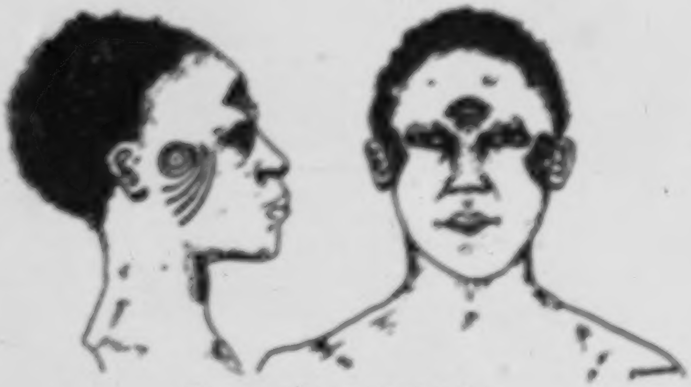

Fig. CXI. — Tatouage Bokala-Yaelima.

Les cercles concentriques s'étendent sur les tempes et se poursuivent très souvent bien au delà en arcs de cercles toujours concentriques jusque sur les joues.

Hommes et femmes ont adopté ce tatouage.

2°) Le tatouage sexuel, réservé aux femmes.

Celui-ci comprend les cicatrices en relief qui affectent toutes les parties du corps depuis la gorge des seins, jusqu'à mi hauteur des cuisses.

3°) Le tatouage ornemental ou tatouage de coquetterie.

Celui-ci s'étend irrégulièrement sur toutes les autres parties du corps en y comprenant les bras et le dos.

Les tatouages de la seconde catégorie forment une série de triangles sphériques, concentriques dont le sommet est en réalité constitué par le mont de Vénus.

Les figures entre les seins et l'ombilic sont assez variables d'un sujet à l'autre. Les rosaces et les palmettes prédominent très nettement. L'homme ne pratique pas ce genre de tatouage, la femme y met, par contre beaucoup de soins, d'où nous croyons pouvoir conclure que le but principal qu'elle poursuit est une recherche sensuelle dans les rapports sexuels.

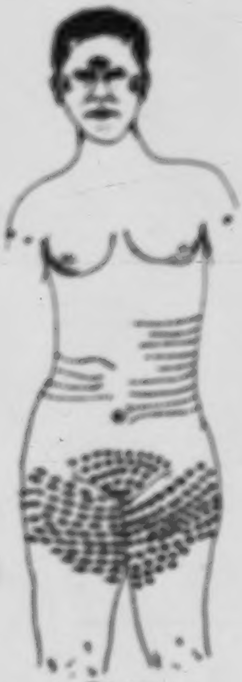

Fig. [illegible].
Tatouage [illegible].

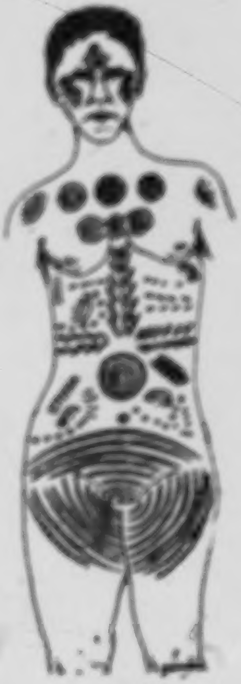

Fig. [illegible].
Tatouage [illegible].

Les motifs ou figures de la troisième catégorie sont extrêmement va-visibles et on ne peut plus irrégulières, comme nous l'avons d'ailleurs fait remarquer plus haut. Abstraction faite des rosaces concentriques, nous y avons observé les dessins les plus variés ; des petits points, des lignes de pointillés, des croissants, des losanges, des palmettes et d'autres figures s'entrecroisent, se coupent, se superposent et sont mêlés de telle sorte, que l'on croirait ces cicatrices jetées au grand hasard sur tout le corps.

Hommes et femmes les ont adoptés, mais la femme en particulier semble les affectionner. Sous ce rapport les Bekala et les Yaelima se différencient nettement de leurs voisins de l'Ouest. Par contre, ils semblent se rapprocher sérieusement des tribus de l'Est, notamment des populations de la région de Dekese. Des photographies envoyées par M. Van den Broeck et renseignées comme provenant des Dengese nous montrent en effet la ressemblance indéniable des figures du tatouage des Yaelima et ces derniers. Cependant chez des Dengese, les figures sont généralement plus régulières, la rosace des tempes plus petite et encadrée le plus souvent d'une série de deux ou trois lignes de petits points dont une se prolonge parfois sur le front. Une autre figure, non moins caractéristique est formée par une bande de trois lignes parallèles tracées de façon à former l'ambolo indigène, genre d'un double huit couché horizontalement.

Ce motif se trace généralement au dessus du nombril et sur le bras et se rencontre presqu'exclusivement chez la femme.

Enfin les petits points cicatrisés, qui ornementent le cou chez certaines femmes Dengese, nous montrent que ces dernières se rapprochent autant des populations de l'Est que de leurs voisins de l'Ouest.

Le tatouage caractéristique des femmes de la région de Bena Dibele-Kole, tant Basongo Meno que Bankutshu, consiste précisément dans ces séries de petits points cicatrisés ornant le cou, les tempes et le front. Il convient d'y ajouter, le dessin qu'elles se tatouent très souvent sur le haut du bras. Ce motif formé par trois lignes parallèles brisées, placées en forme d'un losange aux côtés déplacés, peut être considéré à juste titre, comme un caractère spécial à cette région.

Les tatouages de la poitrine, du ventre et du bas ventre, sont moins uniformément adoptés par les femmes de cette région, mais là où ils existent, le dessin est toujours d'une régularité remarquable et formé par de petits points en fort relief juxtaposés les uns aux autres.

En résumé nous croyons pouvoir diviser les tatouages de race des diverses populations que nous avons visitées, en 4 groupes.

Le premier comprend le tatouage peigné des Bateke-Banfumungu-Baboma.

Le second est caractérisé par la rosace des tempes et la crête semi-concentrique de la racine du nez et englobe toutes les populations riveraines du Lac Leopold II, de la Lukenie à l'exception des Ipanga-Batito.

Le troisième groupe se distingue par le tatouage en crête semi-concentrique de la racine du nez, et les palmettes des tempes, motifs que nous avons observés chez les Ipanga Batito et jusque chez les Bokala.

Enfin le quatrième groupe est constitué par les petits points bourrelets, dont la femme de la région de Bena Dibele-Kole s'orne le cou et le front, ainsi que la figure caractéristique du haut du bras.

Antérieurement nous avons fait remarquer que grâce aux documents photographiques de M. Van den Broeck, nous avons pu établir que les populations du secteur de Dekese, se rattachent sous le rapport des tatouages plus spécialement aux voisins de l'Ouest, quoiqu'elles présentent cependant de grandes ressemblances avec les tribus de l'Est. Leur territoire doit donc être considéré comme une zone mixte ou région de transition entre les deux groupements ethniques.

L'étude des différentes figures du tatouage ornemental, nous permet de subdiviser la région parcourue en deux grandes provinces.

La première comprend toutes les populations dont les tatouages ornementaux sont rares et peu développés. Il ne saurait être question dans l'occurrence de véritables figures ; les tatouages étant invariablement formés par de petits points alignés horizontalement.

Cette région s'étend de Léopoldville à Oshwe.

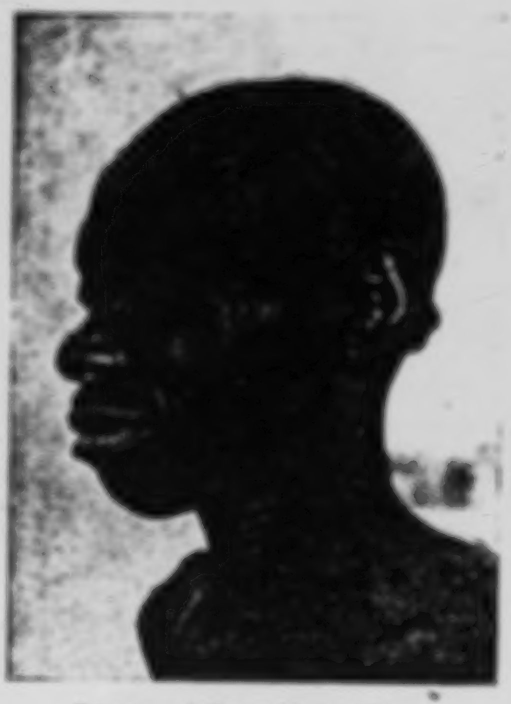

Fig. 129. — Coiffure et tatouage Yaelima. Type de Longomo ou notable.

La seconde englobe les tribus à tatouage ornemental très développé. Elle s'étend sur le restant de la région que nous avons visitée, en ayant comme centre principal la région des Yaelima. L'étude que nous avons faite des multiples figures que nous avions remarquées dans cette région, nous a démontré que les variations sont si nombreuses, si diverses et tellement entrelacées, qu'il est totalement impossible d'établir sur cette base des secteurs ethniques présentant des caractères bien établis.

Enfin si nous n'envisageons que les figures de tatouage auxquelles nous avons attribué, si pas une origine du moins un caractère familial, (provocation aux rapprochements sexuels) nous constatons que dans toute la région ce genre de tatouage est particulier aux femmes.

De Léopoldville jusqu'aux confins du territoire des Batito et même chez certaines femmes Bokala ce tatouage est formé (pour autant qu'il existe encore) par une série de petits points alignés, tout comme les tatouages ornementaux.

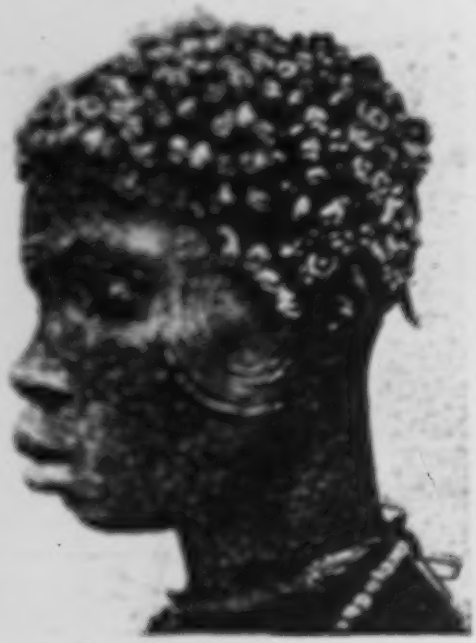

FIG. [illegible] — Tatouage Yaelima et coiffure relevée par des noix d'arachides enduites de ngula.

Chez les Ipanga Batito, ces figures ornent parfois les bras et une partie du dos, tandis que chez les autres tribus elles sont moins développées.

Dans la région des Yaelima, des Dengese et en partie chez les Bokala, ce tatouage comprend une série de lignes concentriques brisées dont le pubis forme le centre principal.

Nous ignorons si ce tatouage est également pratiqué par les femmes Basongo Meno et Bankutshu, mais la chose nous paraît probable. Cependant nous pouvons affirmer que chez ces populations, ce tatouage ne s'étend guère sur le haut des cuisses en dehors de une ou deux lignes de petits points incisés parallèles au pli de l'aine.

Les incisions du tatouage ornemental et sexuel sont généralement faites par des femmes quoiqu'il arrive parfois que l'homme s'en charge.

L'opération se fait à des époques très irrégulières et un peu à tous les temps de la vie. Elle comprend d'ailleurs toujours plusieurs séances généralement espacées de dix à quinze jours.

Le couteau de tatouage, qui est également employé pour l'épilation, est formé par une petite lame en fer, de forme évasée dont le tranchant très effilé est arrondi.

Le patient est assis ; au moyen de mpemba, l'opérateur trace sur le corps, les dessins ou motifs à inciser, pince la peau entre le pouce et l'index de la main gauche et d'un coup sec du bistouri il trace la ligne. La plaie est saupoudrée d'une fine poussière de charbon de bois pulvérisé, de mpemba et d'une poudre faite d'écorce d'arbre séchée et écrasée. Ce mélange sert à ralentir la cicatrisation. Cette opération se répète trois ou quatre fois jusqu'à ce que le relief des bourrelets de cicatrisation soit jugé suffisamment prononcé.

Chez les Bateke, les Bamfumungu et les Baboma, les tatouages de la figure s'obtiennent en griffant ou grattant la peau au moyen d'une espèce de peigne en fer, polydenté, à pointes relativement larges et obtuses. L'opération ne comprend chez ces populations qu'une séance et les plaies ne sont pas saupoudrées de poussière. Ces deux procédés s'expliquent par la différence qui existe entre les tatouages de race et les figures ornementales cicatrisées de la femme, chez ces tribus. Les premiers sont de simples blessures cicatrisées et les autres des cicatrisations en relief.

Les tatouages de race sont toujours tracés avant les autres figures ; en 1913-14 les garçons et les filles y étaient astreints avant d'atteindre l'âge nubile.

Les tatouages familiaux sont généralement ébauchés quelques temps avant le mariage de la fille pour être rapidement développés dans les dernières semaines qui précèdent l'union.

Quant aux tatouages de coquetterie ou figures ornementales, aucune règle ne semble présider à l'époque de leur application. Quand la femme se fait même déjà vieille, elle n'hésite parfois pas à se laisser tracer encore de nouvelles incisions.

Il est probable que la coutume du tatouage disparaîtra bientôt de la vie de ces populations. La pénétration des principes de la civilisation européenne, doit invariablement supprimer cette coutume primitive.

Nous avons d'ailleurs pu observer le fait lors de notre visite au village des boys, travailleurs et soldats de Léopoldville, de Kinshasa et autres grands centres. Dans ces villages les enfants et même les jeunes gens ne sont plus tatoués. Les jeunes filles le sont très peu, et ne conservent en général que les incisions sur le bas de l'abdomen. Les tatouages de race font totalement défaut. Dans les villages de l'intérieur, moins influencés par la pénétration des principes de la civilisation, les tatouages sont, au contraire très en vogue à l'époque actuelle. Nous admettons que la coutume du tatouage est actuellement à l'apogée de son règne dans la région que nous avons visitée.

FIG. 16. — Retour des champs.

Cette coutume ne survivra probablement pas bien longtemps à notre pénétration.

Il serait très difficile d'établir l'époque approximative de son introduction dans la vie de ces indigènes. Nous croyons cependant pouvoir considérer le tatouage de race comme une des caractéristiques ethniques propres à la culture contemporaine et non comme une coutume spécifique de la civilisation ancestrale, transmise de génération en génération et conservée, voire même développée par elle. La preuve la plus évidente de ce fait nous est donnée par les observations que nous avons faites sur les vieillards de la génération actuelle, ceux-ci n'ont en général pas le tatouage de race. Les vieilles femmes qui ne portent aucune traces de tatouage ornemental ou ethnique sont plus rares. Les incisions ornementales font plus souvent défaut que les cicatrisations de la tribu, et nous n'avons rencontré que de rares cas où le tatouage sexuel faisait défaut.

Ces faits nous montrent à toute évidence qu'à l'époque de la jeunesse des vieux de la génération actuelle, le tatouage, s'il était de la coutume, n'était d'application à peu près régulière que chez la femme et présentait à l'origine un caractère essentiellement familial dans cette région.

La femme supporte sans manifester la moindre souffrance, sans une plainte, ni même un soupir, les douleurs des incisions. Elle se soumet même avec une certaine joie mélangée d'un petit sentiment d'orgueil, à cette coutume sachant qu'elle gagne ainsi dans l'estime du mâle.

Ce point occupe à notre avis une place beaucoup plus importante dans la vie de la femme des populations primitives que l'on ne le suppose d'ordinaire. Il nous apparaît comme le seul motif de la majeure partie des variations que nous observons dans la toilette de la femme indigène.

La préoccupation de plaire, le désir de l'homme, amenèrent la femme à rechercher de tout temps les moyens qui lui permettraient de se faire tatouer le plus souvent et le plus tôt possible. Ce désir naturel, cette nécessité innée, sont causes que la femme supporte stoïquement toutes les tortures, toutes les souffrances. Dans la vie des primitifs, le côté sexuel prédomine naturellement. Ainsi pouvons nous expliquer et en quelque sorte comprendre, pourquoi les tatouages furent au début l'apanage exclusif de la femme de cette région, et comment elle arriva à en orner l'organe sexuel et les alentours immédiats, pour le développer ultérieurement et s'en couvrir à peu près tout le corps, fut-ce, peut-être, par esprit de simple coquetterie.

Introduction

101 This study deals with the marriage laws and customs of a large group of the Nkundó [Nkundu] people. Therefore, it would be useful at the beginning to give some general information about this people, who are very interesting from the ethnological standpoint. Then we can define the specific purpose of our investigation.

101
131 The Nkundó or Mongo occupy almost the entire length of the central basin of the Belgian Congo, from the Lulonga-Lopori [rivers] in the north all the way to Lake Leopold II, and beyond the Lukenie [River] as far as the Kasai [River]. In the west they touch the Congo River only south of the "Ruki" (1); the western part of the old Lulonga District is occupied by the Ngombe, whose territory extends as far as the Maringa [River] (known to the natives as Lǔwo) upstream from Basankusu (Basǎnkoso according to the natives). (2) In the east they may be found as far as, and even beyond, the Lomami. In the southeast they have penetrated into the northwestern part of Sankuru District. At the present time it is still impossible to delineate precisely their eastern and southeastern boundaries; the Bambólé, the Bahamba, the Mǐtuku, the Bangelengele, [4] the Balengola, the Basongola, and even the Batetela and the "Bakusu," are either Móngo or very closely related. (1)

---

1. Ruki is probably a corruption of Bolóki, a tribe of fishermen living downstream on the banks of this river, which the natives prefer to call Loilaka.

2. According to Bittremieux and Lestaeghe, a few Nkundó remain on Nsumba Island near Nouvelle-Anvers (Congo, 1922, Vol. 1, p. 194).

101 1. See Donckerwolcke, in Kongo-Overzee, Vol. 1, p. 235, and my article in Congo, Vol. 1, p. 13. The fact that Donckerwolcke

101 classifies the Bakela (or Boyéla), who are unquestionably pure Móngo, among the Wakutshu [Wakusu] or Batetela is highly significant.

161 It is impossible to give an exact figure for the size of the population we have just defined. In any case one can estimate that it is more than a million.

184 Throughout the huge territory occupied by this people, only insignificant differences in institutions or language can be observed. Greater divergences appear in the material manifestations of culture.

563 In my opinion it is likely that certain groups which belong among the Nkundo-Móngo as far as culture and speech are concerned, may be distinguished from them in genealogy and history. Among these are the true Elíma or riverain people (the Bolóki, the Eleku, the Elínga of the upper Lomela and the upper Tshuapa), (2) the Ngombe tribes

2. We exclude a few Libinja and Basokó clans living near Coquilhatville, since they are clearly of alien origin. The native name for the Tshuapa [River] is Jwafa or Jafa and, higher up, Lwafa. Among the Bongandó and the Bahamba it is called the Laha.

of the Lomelà, the Mbólé, the Bakutu of the Lomela-Tshuapa (with whom one should probably include the Ntómbá and the Nkóle), (3)

3. See my article in Congo, 1931, Vol.1, pp. 21 ff.

and perhaps also the Mpámá and the Losakanyi. (4). This likelihood

4. The latter are erroneously called Losakanja by Father Schebesta in Vollblutneger und Halbzwerge, p. 199. They seem to have lived formerly on the lower Momboyo River (Luilaka); the land on which Flandria Mission has been established still bears their name.

M 101 563 does not exclude the possibility of a distant kinship, but the present state of our knowledge makes the solution to this question impossible; for very close resemblances may be explained by a common origin as well as by a period of living in close contact, and differences may be due to diverse origins [5] or to a temporary separation at a certain point in history.

P M 101 563 144 A considerable number of Pygmoids or Pygmiforms (1) (Batswá, Jŏfe, Balómbe, Bilángi, Boné) are to be found scattered among the Nkundó. They share a community of social and economic interests with their "masters." The Botswá belongs to his master and depends on him, but he is not, strictly speaking, his slave. His master not only has rights over him; he also has obligations to fulfill. Most of the Pygmoids are to be found in the western part of Nkundó territory; in the east they are very rare.

M 101 173 The Nkundó-Móngo came from the north or northeast, while the Mbólé claim to have come from the northwest, and the Bakutu from the west. (2)

M 101 A word should be said about the name of these people. Ordinarily, we call them the Nkundó-Móngo. The first of these names is used in the west and in the south, the second especially in the north and in the east. The Elángá of the Losanganya region are called the Mongo éâ Lolo, or the Upstream Móngo, by the peoples to the west of them. Foreigners call all these peoples, including the Nkundó, the Mbólé, the Bakutu, etc., by the name of Móngo. In literature one sometimes encounters the name of Lolo or Balolo. (3) But, as we have seen, lolo is not a proper noun but simply the word meaning "upstream"

---

1. This name was proposed by Father Schebesta, op. cit., p. 170.

2. See my study, previously cited, passim.

3. For example, the name of the Protestant mission of the Lulonga is "Congo Balolo Mission."

101 (in other dialects translated as nkoto).

The people are called Nkundó or Móngo, never Bankundó or 101 Bamóngo. The prefix ba is often heard, as it may be used in front 193 of all proper nouns, similarly to the French usage in les Molière, les Rubens, etc. [or the English usage: the Browns, the French, the Nkundó]. The singular prefix bo is also used, but only rarely. [6]
I have heard it only in the expression: ale ô bonkundó mongo, "He is a real Nkundo." This statement was made only in speaking of a foreigner who had successfully assimilated the Nkundó language and culture. It is possible, however, that it has a broader meaning.

Is it possible to discover an etymology for these names?
101 Móngo is a common noun signifying something excellent, expecially a person. People say móng'ěy'ǒna, "a fine child," móng'ěy'ǒmoto, a superb woman." (The name should be compared also with the term imóngo, which denotes the state of being of a person who is well thought of, prosperous, rich, etc.) The form of the word does not change in the plural. The name Nkundó is more difficult to explain, if an explanation is at all possible. (1) If the name is to be related to some other word, the only possibility is the verb kundola, "to unearth what has been buried." But to unearth what? The corpses of one's enemies, in order to prove one's daring by eating them? Or copper rings, which would mean their wealth? The possibility is there, but we have no direct evidence. According to Fathers Bittremieux and Lestaeghe (on p. 195 of the article mentioned), some maintain that Nkundó means nkóló, "master." But what is the basis for this explanation? (2)

1. The word is Nkundó not Nkundu or Kundu. The assertion that the initial n is not part of the word, but is simply a nasal sound which must precede a consonant in the native sound system, shows a real lack of linguistic knowledge.

2. In contrast to the Batswá, the Nkundó and other groups are Baotó (sing. Bootó), meaning non-Batswá.

101 The explanation that I judge to be the most plausible is that Nkundó means "people of the interior." As a matter of fact, the name is almost always used in contrast to Eliñga, "riverain people," and sometimes in contrast to other groups. But the original meaning of the term was probably broadened through contact with other Negro groups and with Europeans; it may thus have become the more or less specific name of the group. Still it should be noted that if you ask a Ngombe whether his tribe is Eliñga, "riverain-fishermen," [7] he may answer you, "Among us there are Eliñgá and there are Nkundó." His reply would confirm our supposition. The word is thus a synonym of Nkondaka, which is found in several dialects at the equator. (1)

> 1. See my cited article, p. 19. I have also heard this term among the Lifumba. Nkondaka should be compared with the name Ekonda, and with bokonda, "forest on dry land," and with the verb konda, "to silt up, to be filled with alluvium, to become dry ground."

One often hears the Bombwanja contrasted with the Bokóté. In many cases Bokoté is a synonym for Nkundó, in the present-day meaning of the word. In his study of the Wangatá (Revue Congolaise, Vol. 1, 1910), Engels, who knew these peoples well since he was among other things administrator of the territory of Bokatola, already contrasted the Bombwanja and the Bokóté. It seems to me that this name is the true name of the people in question, or at least for a great portion of them. It has no other meaning in the language of the present day. Etymologically, however, it may be related to the verb kóta, "to grow old," or to another kóta, as in kóta likambo (elsewhere bótola), "to end a dispute by pronouncing a final judgment," kóta lisoló, "to have the last word in a discussion," kóta esé, "to ensure peace and order in the village," and in the verb derived from it, kótela, "to be competent, skillful."

Leaving aside the Mbólé, etc., as well as the tribes of the Lukenie [River], we can distinguish a number of different groups within the Nkundo-Móngo: the Nsongó (Mbonje), Elañgá, Bosaka, Bongandó, Boyéla, Ekonda, etc. Each of these contains a number of subdivisions or tribes.

101 We have excluded the majority of these groups from the scope of our study and have confined ourselves to a territory limited as follows: it is bound in the north by the Ruki-Tshuapa; in the east by the Salonga as far as the Mbɔ́lɛ́ boundary; in the south by a line running from the junction of the Luilaka and the Lwɛ́le to the northern boundary of the Bombwanja of the Lokolɔ́ and then to the boundary of the Ekonda; in the west by the Boloko, a tributary of the Ruki. In other words, we are considering only a very small part of the territory of the Nkundɔ́ tribes. But [8] it is the only part we have been able to investigate thoroughly. We are including the Bombwanja and the Elíngá who have settled in the area thus outlined.

101 563 The Elíngá live only along the big rivers. In our area they include in addition to the true Elíngá (of whom there are only about ten clans belonging to the Bolɔ́ki group, who have settled between Ikɛ́ngɛ́ and Bokɛ́le and Mpakɔ́, and the four or five Eleku villages on the Salonga), the Nkɔ́le and Ekonda (1) villages who have adopted the way of life and customs of the Elíngá. (2)

As to the Bombwanja, their clans may be found scattered throughout the area. They are more or less dependent on clans of other peoples with whom they live and form hamlets of a sort in a great many villages. A solid bloc of them is to be found in the vicinity of Bokátola. It is constituted as an independent district [chefferie] even though, according to "custom," it "belongs" as a julɛ́ (pl. baulɛ́), "subject," or "subjugated clan" (the verb is uja) to certain Bokɔ́tɛ́ villages or groups. (3) It is quite possible that these

3. The same is true of the Bombwanja group of the Lokolɔ́. Other clans are scattered among the Elángá beyond the Tshuapa. All of them are beyond the scope of this study. The Bombwánja are divided into Basuné and Bonkoso, and the Boendé are considered their bónankáná (sister's son).

Bombwanja were originally Mbólé, for certain words and idioms in their dialect are reminiscent of the Lombólé.

Let us briefly enumerate the other tribes -- "pure" Nkundó -- who form the subject of this study:

1. The Injóló, "sister's son" (bonankáná) of the Ntómbá and the Bolénge who live beyond the Boloko. They are divided into three groups [9] -- Engónjó, Wesé, and Ngombe, (1) each of which comprises a subdistrict [sous-chefferie] for administrative purposes. A small segment is to be found outside the area under discussion, between the Boloko and Coq. (2)

2. The Boángí (and their subgroup, the Besombó), related to the Bokála of the Losanganya region. (3)

1. West of their territory are to be found the remains of a group of former inhabitants of the area, whom the present inhabitants call Tompoko (or Basékå Bofáka l'Eléké) but who are completely unknown to me.

2. The southern Injóló are often called Imoma.

[114]

3. On the ethnographic map of the Belgian Congo prepared and published by Dr. J. Maes, the territory of the Boangi is marked with the name "Bokuala." There is no tribe or village by that name. Unless an insulting and humiliating nickname (bokwala, "slave") is involved, the name may result from an erroneous use of the name of the present chief of the Boangi, Bokwála.

101

3. The Ionda, related to the Bonyanga living north of the Tshuapa.

4. The Wángatá-Ntómbá, of whom one group is settled near Igende at the junction of the Tshuapa and the Momboyo, and another on the Jwalé. Other parts of this tribe may be found near Coquilhatville (district [chefferie] of the "Tumba"), near Bokote (Ikengo district), and at the middle section of the Luilaka, between Waka and Bonkoto (Nkundêngolo, or Wafanya and "Tumba"). (4)

> 4. At the present time it is impossible to determine the exact relationship between the Ntómbá and the Wángatá. In general the latter are treated as a subdivision of the Ntómbá, together with the Inganda and the Ikengo. Moreover, we do not know yet whether these Ntómbá are related to other tribes bearing the same name which are frequently encountered (on the Lopori, in the vicinity of Lake Tumba, and Lake Leopold II, among the Bakutu, etc.), or whether these are no more than groups bearing the same name. It should be noted that on the map previously mentioned, the Wǎngatá are placed much too far north; actually they are all to be found south of the Ruki.

5. The Bakáala, who seem to be more or less related to the Wǎngatá.

6. The Bonkoso.

7. The three sister tribes of the Bongíli, the Bombomba, and the Lifumba (the Beloko are a subtribe of the latter). [10]

8. The village of Bomángola, wedged in among the Lifumda. This village contains no more than thirty taxpayers but since it belongs to the Nsongó, the oldest of all Nkundó-Móngo groups, it is considered as a separate district. (1)

> 1. Their primacy has always been recognized and respected by the Lifumba.

619 9. The Bongale. Three large villages belonging to this group are to be found in the territory under discussion. In order of their size they are: Bongale wǎ Botóló (among the Lifumba, between the Bonsómbé, Lolíma and Saási rivers), Bongale wǎ Ilinga (among the Bakáala, near Ikéngé), and Bongale wǎ Bo̲so̲ngú (among the Bonkoso, [563] near Bempumba). The difference between their rules of exogamy and those of the other tribes confirms the view that the Bongale are not true Nkundó. (2)

2. See Chapter V, Article III. There are several other small Bongale groups, but I do not know whether they are related to those mentioned above. Among them are those living near Bo̲nye̲ka (Busira) among the Boángi (Bokála, Boénjola). They may be descended from different ancestors who all bore the name Ngale. The same name may indicate an identical origin, but it may also be derived from different individuals whose names were the same. This statement is generally applicable.

The tribes living between the Jwalé and the Boloko, with whom the Bolénge and the Ntómbá between the Congo and the Boloko are sometimes classified, are grouped under the general name of Ilángá by the Boángí, Injó̲ló̲, and Elángá. (3)

[114] 3. The Bokele tribe listed on the above-mentioned map does not exist. Could this error be due to an incorrect extension of the name of a Boloki village near Bokúma which is called Bokélé?

The Nkundó-Mó̲ngo̲ came from the north or the northeast. (4)

[825] 4. The following note may be of interest: The stories and songs of the Nkundó indicate a

The groups under discussion here lived for a time on the banks of the Luwo (Maringa) and the [11] upper Ikelemba, (1) then under pressure from other Móngo tribes, they crossed the Tshuapa-Ruki. They evicted the Ekonda and settled in their present location. This exodus must have taken place a fairly long time ago; it is impossible to determine the date and difficult to make any estimates. In any case it must have occurred 150 to 200 years ago.

These peoples are primarily farmers; they grow chiefly 241 bananas, manioc, yams, colocasia [taro], sweet potatoes, sugar cane, and various vegetables and condiments. The food crops they grow, together with what they gather and the Elaeis palm trees provide them with a continuous and abundant food supply, as long as elephants do [231] not interfere. Their domestic animals include chickens, goats, and 224 dogs. (2) Hunting is a pleasant change of activity rather than an [825] recollection of an animal of the leopard family which they call bokonga. Their description of it corresponds to the lion. Some soldiers and other expatriates, who were also young people, shown representations of a lion immediately identified it with their bokonga.

[173] 1. It appears that between the Ikelemba and its tributary the Losálifa, there is still a bonkom tree called w'ãmenga (of bald heads) under which, according to tradition, the ancestors held their councils. Nearby there is a bosáu whose fruits never ripen.

[177] 2. Ducks have been introduced fairly recently, but they were known long before colonial times. They came from the south. Sheep have been introduced only in the last few decades, and they are found only in a few villages on the river banks in the lowlands.

224 absolute and inescapable necessity for those tribes who have Batswá, since the latter provide them with a certain amount of the necessary meat, though in insufficient quantity. The people hunt in groups and individually -- in the latter case primarily by means of traps.
Fishing with nets is also very widespread, although various other methods are also known. The picking of fruit, caterpillars, mushrooms, 222 vegetables, etc. continues to be popular.

Among trades, that of the smith is foremost. However, iron 463 casting has been abandoned at the present time. Copper is brought in from other peoples by tribes serving as intermediaries. Wood sculpture is rapidly disappearing. Basketry [12] remains popular.
[286] Weaving no longer exists at the present time; in fact, looms can no longer be found in the region.

593x The family is patriarchal and the political organization corresponds to it; there are only heads of families. Indeed, among the Nkúndó the family is the complete nucleus and foundation of the society.
The result is a democratic and oligarchic government, but one very different from any we would call by that name in Europe.
554 Certain men become prominent because of their intelligence, their eloquence, their bravery, or their wealth, having great influence and often giving the appearance of chiefs whose authority extends beyond their own clan, but none of them has ever founded an empire. In the past the Bongíli were the most courageous tribe, and the one most feared. Besides, their geographic location was in their favor, as they had the Lifumba and the Bombomba, two sister tribes, on each side of them.

[517] The artistic tastes of the Nkúndó are directed chiefly toward 538 music and the dance. Their oral literature is also very rich; it includes, for example, the epic of Nsongó and Lianja (1) and that of the tortoise.

1. The most important portions of this epic have been translated and published by Father Boelaert, M.S.C., in Congo, 1934, Vol. 1, pp. 49 and 197.

771 In matters of religion the Nkundó recognize the existence of a Supreme Being: Njakomba or Mbombiándɛ́, creator and ruler of all that exists. They do not worship him in any way, however; all their religious practices are addressed to guardian and ancestral spirits. (2)

2. On the subject of the religious conceptions of the Nkundó, see a detailed study by Father Boelaert, M.S.C., in Hooger Leven, 1934, pp. 1612 and 1636, and 1935, pp. 12 and 60.

197 The language of the Nkundó is beautiful, harmonious, flexible, and rich. It has all the qualities needed to become a literary language and is admirably suited to the requirements of teaching. Furthermore, its various dialects are spoken over a considerably large territory, in fact over one of the largest language areas [13] of the Congo. 797 214 In addition to the religious and devotional books of the Catholic missions, a fairly large collection of various academic textbooks is available in this language, thanks primarily to the zeal of the Protestant missionaries. The latter have also published a complete translation of the Bible. Several vocabularies and small grammars have been compiled, and in recent years a large dictionary and an expanded grammar have been added to these, both compiled by A. and L. Ruskin of the Bongandanga Mission. For several years the Protestant mission at Bolenge has been publishing a native magazine, and the Catholic mission is pushing ahead with preparations to publish one also.

114 Father Shebesta's book, Vollblutneger und Halbzwerge, includes a chapter on the Nkundó in which the author gives a good general description of this people. Nevertheless, some of the details given must be accepted with reservations.

121 The general information given above is enough to give the reader a superficial knowledge of the Nkundó.

The purpose of this work is to give a more extensive account of their institutions pertaining to marriage.

As we have previously stated, we are considering only a portion of this people. All our statements cover only the fraction we have delimited. The family institutions of other Nkundó groups are not accounted for, as they are less known to us and we do not want 121 to present anything we have not thoroughly investigated. We have not stepped outside the geographic limits set forth except for a few incidental remarks. Although the cultural uniformity of the Nkundó-Móngo is remarkable it is not, of course, absolute. And if we have used the title Mariage des Nkundó (Marriage among the Nkundu), we have done so because it was difficult to find one which would be more appropriate for the geographic and ethnic limits of [14] this study. It is very likely that in most cases our data are valid beyond the limits we have laid out, but to generalize upon it before making a thorough study of each group would be contrary to all scientific method. The reader is therefore earnestly requested to take these remarks into account and to abstain from giving our conclusions too broad a scope.

Familial institutions in themselves and in their totality are outside the scope of this book. But since they are based on marriage, they have an important place within our framework. We must necessarily touch upon them, but we will limit our excursions into that realm to what is required to make the general description intelligible. On the other hand, the study of marriage throws a good deal of light on familial institutions.

The words "family," "clan," "group," etc. recur frequently. 128 596 614 The family is an entity smaller than the clan, and the latter is subordinate to the group. Since it is very difficult to give a precise definition, however, we have taken the trouble to make a clear distinction only when necessary. (1) [Editor's Note: Elsewhere we use them more as generic terms or even as synonyms. In order to make family relationships and the expressions used by the Nkundó to designate them more comprehensible, we are attaching an example of a genealogical table.]

113 I know of the following previous studies on the same subject:

Engels, "Les Wangata," Revue Congolaise, 1910, which also deals with marriage.

G. Kaptein, "Familieleven en -zeden bij de Inboorlingen van den Evenaar," Congo, 1922, Vol. 1, p. 531. [15] This study covers 113 more ground than ours, since it even includes a discussion of the Mbole.

H. Brepoels, "Het Familiehoofd bij de Nkundó-Negers," Congo, 1930, Vol. 2, p. 332.

124 We have tried to make our data as complete as possible. We have given here not only the major trends and basic principles, but also the particulars, even those that seem most insignificant. They are always interesting, and sometimes more so than one may have suspected at first. All the material has been discussed over and over again, in private and in public, with very varied people at different times and places, and the points that presented the greatest difficulty were gone over countless times.

121 In general we have preferred to use the descriptive and analytic method. We have drawn conclusions and principles from the data. Although case histories naturally lengthened the text of this work, we have not hesitated to insert them at various points. They are the best means of bringing out certain rules or customs and bringing to life the psychology of our people.

69 In this respect a remark should be made whose importance deserves our attention for a moment. The examination of judicial cases of which we have been direct or indirect witnesses does not provide a scientific certainty about the laws -- or "the customs," to use the term so frequently applied (1). For not all [16] that is done

1. It is unfortunate that this term has become so fashionable, for it lacks precision. Indeed, it may mean simply "practice, usage," or it may be used in the legal sense of "a practice having the force of a law." Often a confusion between the two meanings is created, and all customs are considered to be legally obligatory, when actually, some practices are outside common law, and others are in opposition to it. For the sake of precision in ethnographic and ethnologieal works, it would be well to use this ambiguous term as little as possible and to distinguish clearly among legal procedures, the laws and custom or usage.

121 69 is in accordance with justice. The observation that the natives behave in one fashion or another, and that this or that palaver is often settled in a particular way, is not a sufficient basis for concluding that such is the law.

Infractions of the rules of social justice are more frequent than one would suspect. The principles are good, but often passions prevent their application, and frequently there are neither sanctions to support a weakness of will nor rewards to stimulate loyal adherence.

121 114 69 Furthermore, one should not invoke the variability and continuous transformation of native law (as does Dr. T. Seitz, for example, in Africa, Vol. 3, No. 1, p. 89) without first establishing whether the judgments rendered have been in conformity with the law. The remark made by this eminent author further on in his article, "Welche Rolle dabei das Machtmoment," etc. . . . weakens his first statement and shows precisely that an accurate knowledge of legal prescriptions cannot be attained solely on the basis of the verdicts of tribunals, and that partiality often plays a considerable part. The observation made by the former governor of the Cameroons may be applied to the Belgian Congo and often to "civilized" countries as well -- partially and the abuse of power are nowhere unknown.

121 69 We must also take into account the possibility of the judges' ignorance, as well as our own difficulty in understanding their sentences, since important points of fact and law are sometimes left unmentioned, and yet are implied.

It is not surprising that there are complicated cases where it is very difficult for the natives, however intelligent and impartial, to settle the dispute and provide a fair and legitimate solution. The law cannot foresee for every case the infinite variety of personal, local, and modal circumstances that may occur.

Only the analysis and comparison of diverse cases, [17] their solutions, sanctions, and consequences, together with discussions with discreet and impartial natives who are knowing and skillful and who have learned to know us and to understand what we want to learn from them, and who are sincerely disposed to help us at the same time, can produce a rational and reasoned certainty which conforms to reality. These conditions are numerous, and it is difficult to find them

121 all fulfilled in one person. But such individuals do exist, if in the 69 person of the investigator they find sympathy, broad ideas, a lack of all European racism, understanding, a knowledge of their language, and a benevolent devotion to their interests, individually and as a group.

Even if one has the good fortune to find a native who, after 121 much experience, reaches the point where he will say spontaneously:
124 "This is done often, but it is against the law; the law says thus and so; this decision of the tribunal was partial for such or such reason," -- an infinitely valuable situation, but one which arises very rarely -- one is not thereby absolved of the need to check his statements. But the further one goes, the more it is possible to be aware of the reality and to appraise the informant's value in this sphere and the usefulness of his statements.

These considerations are particularly valuable in making the 121 distinction between obligations and social decorum or good manners, 183 between legal obligations and obligations of kinship and mutual 671 assistance. In current practice the Nkundó make no clear lines of demarcation between these categories, since they have never codified their law or attempted to set up a clear and precise classification. They feel no more need for this than, for instance, they or even we "civilized" people bother about setting up a grammar for our native tongue, which we speak correctly and without the slightest difficulty, purely out of habit.

An investigation in the legal domain is made [18] very diffi-[124] cult by the patriarchal and feudal character of these peoples, added to the lack of writing. Not only is there an adaptation to circumstances -- the felicitous flexibility of native laws -- in which jurisprudence plays a great role, but the Nkundó, while knowing well what is lawful and what is not, generally does not clearly understand the nature of an obligation, and above all he does not know its source.

One's chances of obtaining good results in the inquiry are 121 greatly increased by the use of hypothetical cases, presented to the 124 individuals one knows best and whom one knows to be in no way involved. It is always worthwhile to use this method as a means of completing and perhaps correcting conclusions based on the examination

121 of actual legal cases. It is almost impossible to gain access to the 124 latter unless one is armed with an official order. A thorough knowledge of the language of the tribe in question is required, however, for the use of imaginary cases.

In describing various laws and practices, we have tried to reproduce the explanations given by the Nkundó and to add our own views when it has seemed appropriate to do so. The careful reader will have no trouble distinguishing between these two very different sources.

I am very well aware that many ethnologists do not like 121 chercheurs de brousse [bush explorers] to become involved in these questions, and that they prefer to receive from the latter only raw data on which they can build their theories. All ethnographers of the bush and forest will readily recognize their inadequacy in matters of theory. But this very real disadvantage due to a lack of training is offset by a definite advantage. They know the natives much more intimately, not only with respect to the immediate subject of their study, but also as regards other aspects of their lives, particularly their psychological make-up and general mentality, with which they may have had direct and daily contact for many years. [19] They are therefore more likely to come to conclusions which are in accordance with reality. The "armchair" ethnologists sometimes seem to assume that the men in the bush are capable of being no more than collectors of data. Yet the majority of them have had an intermediate education, especially in the humanities, and many of them have attended institutions of higher learning (universities and others). There are professional jurists among them, for example. Therefore, these observers are capable of reliable judgments, and many of them, through their studies in philosophy, are equipped with the rules of logic and highly developed critical powers.

It is true that it is not up to us to build theories; the range of our investigations is always limited. A knowledge of theories is very interesting and useful, but it is by no means necessary. In fact such knowledge may sometimes be dangerous, since it is easy for it to unduly influence our judgment in a way that is against the best interests of science. Thus we do not care whether our facts are in 121 conformity or in opposition to this or that ethnological theory. We are presenting the facts in their entirety, the material portion of the culture as well as its intellectual, psychological, and moral basis. Theory should be based on these facts, not the facts adapted to suit the theories.

In the text of this work the reader will find repetitions, foot-121 notes, and references. We would have preferred to omit these,
114 since they are always tedious, but their presence was dictated by the nature of the material and by the strictly scientific nature of this work, which we wanted to retain at all costs. We hope in fact that those who wish to study it thoroughly will find these repetitions not an obstacle, but a valuable aid which will help them to obtain a total and precise picture of the material.

Although I have taken the greatest care and all possible precautions to present to the reader only facts and evidence which correspond to reality, and to document [20] everything as completely as possible, this work will inevitably contain gaps, imperfections, even one mistake or another. (1)

This material is not exempt from such faults, and it would be pure presumption to pretend otherwise. But science could not advance, nor could the practical purpose of our knowledge ever be accomplished, should we try to achieve the perfection that can be the result only of successive studies by different people, before presenting the results of our research to the public. I would be gratified if others would check my data, criticize it, and supplement and correct it wherever necessary. I hope that this work will also stimulate them to make a similar study of the other segments of the Nkundó-Mongo so that at last we may have a total picture of the matrimonial institutions of this very important people.

1. This is especially true with regard to the legal significance of certain practices, a most delicate point of inquiry, which has yet to be thoroughly investigated -- particularly, certain questions concerning the origin of marriage in its various forms.

114 I should like to express one more wish relevant to this subject. A number of studies by civil servants and government agents, containing a good deal of ethnographic data on various subjects, lie in bales in the bureaus of the Congo, waiting for the day when they will serve as fodder for ever-hungry termites. Would it not be possible to make these documents -- at least the better ones -- available to the public? Even if they contain gaps and errors, they will be gratefully received. They will lead other researchers to explore these questions thoroughly, and through emulation, criticism, and discussion, we will develop an increasing and more accurate knowledge of the natives, [21] their history, their way of life, their laws, their customs, and their mentality, which will be of great benefit for all colonial work.

Some of the terms used in one or another part of this study may appear too coarse. I would rather have avoided them, but I would have had to use veiled expressions and circumlocutions which would have adversely affected the clarity of this work and therefore its value, for it is intended for a purely scientific purpose. I trust the indulgent reader will therefore excuse their presence.

124 Here and there case histories are given in full. I believe that the details are not without interest, since they give a living picture of the mentality of our people. Most of the incidents were [114] collected in the vicinity of Flandria, the area with which I am most familiar. Here and there I have taken the liberty of passing judgment and of recommending solutions to certain problems. I should like to say that in these cases I am expressing opinions which are purely personal.

000 The map appended to this work makes it possible for the reader to find a tribe or village which is under discussion and shows its geographic position amidst the groups that comprise the Móngo-Nkundó people.

I wish to express my sincere gratitude to all those who have in some way contributed to this work: His Excellency Monsignor Ed. Van Goethem, our venerable vicar apostolic, who gave me permission to carry it out and always encouraged me in my research, understanding fully its practical value for a sensible adaptation which will enable us to establish the Church on a firm foundation; my colleagues, Father Trigalet and Father Wauters, as well as Brother Brants, who took upon 000 themselves a large portion of our joint labor, leaving me with leisure to pursue this work; all the natives who have had confidence in me and have assisted me with their valuable evidence and explanations, among them Bakutu Bonifasi, Ali Ntefeji, Mpetsi, Esal'ey'olaka, [22] Ikanya, Bolongo Lokolo, B. Ekamba, Bosembu, Piosi Isia, and countless others all of whom I cannot mention, for the list would become too long.

I am deeply indebted to the Honorary Attorney General, Mr. A. Sohier. This eminent jurist was kind enough to look over the entire manuscript and to point out obscure or ambiguous passages and indicate places that called for added explanations or revisions in the text. Thus he has made a great contribution toward the final form of this work, and a good part of its merit is due to him. [23]

Chapter I

Preliminaries and Generalities

581 Marriage is comprised of a sexual aspect, an element of attachment or affection, and a utilitarian element. Only exceptionally is a union based on but one of these. This is true not only of marital unions, but also of extramarital relationships which are not transitory.

This law, which can be considered general and universal, holds true also for the Nkundó. Before embarking on a detailed study of marriage among these people, it would therefore be useful to see what form these aspects take among them.

Let us begin with the utilitarian aspects, which can be dealt with in brief. From that angle, the Nkundó's wife is to him the person who will attend to the satisfaction of his daily needs with respect to nourishment (cooking and farming) keep his hut clean and orderly, and raise his children. Thus, for him, she is a housewife and mother.

Cases of marriage for political or economic reasons occur, but they are the exceptions, so that we can leave them out of consideration.

581 Moral qualities are often involved in the choice of a wife. But strictly speaking, the marriage is not one of reason; the cause of it is more likely to be affection.

The affective and sexual aspects of the question require longer discussion.

Therefore this chapter is divided into two parts:

I. The emotional life
II. The sexual life of the Nkundó [24]

Part 1

The Emotional Life of the Nkundó

000

[Editor's Note: The Nkundó are capable of real affection. That affection takes varying forms and attains different degrees according to the nature of the persons in question. In successive articles, we will treat:

I. Affection among relatives
II. A special form of the latter: the creation of a Bolúmbú
III. Friendship
IV. Love between husband and wife]

Article I. Affection among Relatives

152
602 The Nkundó feel a deep affection toward members of their kin group. I am of the opinion that they love them as much, if not more, than most Europeans, but are not capable of as great a devotion. To understand this condition, one need only consider that affection is instinctive. Our people say: botéma nd'ikoma, "the heart is like a package," that is to say, it does not choose the object of its love, but rather the object presents itself spontaneously. (1) Devotion on the

1. Or lolango ale nsembe éy'otéma, "love is an innate, spontaneous product of the heart."

152 602 other hand almost always involves reasoning and is founded on a high morality based on religion. Furthermore, the questions (of property, inheritance, etc.) which so often divide relatives from each other do not exist among the Nkundó, whose patrimony is held in common. [25] Among them the members of a family need each other absolutely and constantly; they cannot sustain the struggle for existence unless they remain well united. A man isolated from his kin is a pariah, for in all matters of importance he must count on them for help, protection, and defense. Therefore he is, so to speak, forced to make common cause with the rest of the family and to keep his proper place within it.

This may help us to understand that among these people there are fewer reasons for a cooling of family affections and more reasons for maintaining good relations. But it would be wrong to attribute their love to some kind of egoistic calculation. Their affection is sincere and spontaneous. But the above facts explain why the dis- [578] unity and quarrels which are so frequent in Europe are unknown among the Nkundó; they are settled at once and do not have time to become bitter or deeply rooted. A very rare exception does not invalidate this generalization.

1. Parents and children

593ˣ Parents sincerely love their children. Their affection is not lessened with age; there is only a somewhat greater tenderness toward the very young, whom they readily carry and fondle. The indulgence which they show for the faults of their offspring is tempered by anger when they are exasperated by misbehaviour, more often than by a rational concern for the child's training. The spouse who has not suffered from the child's error does not react against him but on the contrary is led by his affection to protect him. Parents insistently try to excuse and defend their children when they have misbehaved. (1)

(1). It should be noted that the same thing may also frequently be done among many Europeans.

Nevertheless, the general good of the clan wins out over affection.

593x [882] If the whole family [26] suffers through the misbehaviour of adolescents, the latter will not be spared by the father. But the mother will often take their sides for, not belonging to her husband's family, she allows only her heart to speak. The familial-political organization of this people requires that fondness have its limits; otherwise it could lead to disorder and anarchy.

593x 855 It cannot be said of Nkundő parents, as one often reads about other peoples of the Congo, that they do not care for their children, who are self-sufficient and obliged to provide for their own needs from the age of six or seven. Our people are always feeding and even coddling their children; even when the latter are married they are always well received in their parents' home and lavishly treated. It is quite true that the young people spend much time in the forest looking for various kinds of food, but that is part of their games and amusements, a phase of their education, and at the same time their contribution to the maintenance of the household (a contribution which cannot be omitted from any serious education, and it is regrettable that it should be omitted by so many European families. (1)

1. Education will be dealt with more extensively in Chapter X, Article VIII.

593x 581 In the matter of marriage parents generally respect the feelings of their children. A father who is motivated by avarice and, above all, by the need for a certain sum of money or its equivalent, may sometimes let the voice of self-interest predominate over that of the heart.

It goes without saying that one may encounter aberrations of fatherly feeling, but such cases are exceedingly rare. (2)

2. For an example see Chapter II, Article XI, 3, B.

593x Though parents love their children without distinction and without consideration of their faults, vices, etc., they are not exempt from a certain amount of partiality; a particular child [27] will 595 receive more attention, will get his way more readily -- as among ourselves. These preferences do not give rise to jealousy among brothers as long as they remain within the limits of fairness, which they almost always do.

[556] Some rich men who have a dominant social rank have a means of expressing their preference for one of their daughters, a means which is a demonstration of their wealth and at the same time an assertion of their position. This practice will be described in the article that follows.

The children for their part sincerely love their parents. This love is composed more of respect for the father and of more tenderness for the mother, as is the case among Europeans. The same variants of sentiment, depending on whether the child is a boy or girl, are to be found among the Nkundó. The children may be remiss in their dutiful affection and respect, but these are exceptions due to thoughtlessness, stubbornness, or sudden anger. (1) Here one does [152] not encounter the deep discord that among Europeans divides parents and children, nor the coarseness and brutality of which one reads quite often in our newspapers. Among the Nkundó these family dramas are unknown.

[155] Nevertheless, what we have said above does not exclude disobedience. The Nkundó child, too, prefers play to work and freedom to discipline. He tries to shun the commands of his parents which tie him down and keep him from frolicking with his companions. (2)

Love for the mother is especially deep. No matter how old a Nkundó may be, his feelings of tenderness for her do not decrease; he always remains her child. Whenever he feels pain, disappointment, or sorrow, one word is on his lips: ngóya, "mother." Among these

2. One of the first words learned by a Nkundó child is mbói, "I don't want to."

593x people the innate feeling which links mother and children retains all its original spontaneity. [28]

593x 152 Nkundó parents and children do not give each other any special external signs of affection, however, as do some other peoples.

At death the sincerity of affection between parents and children is plainly visible. Their moving anguish comes to the surface noisily and often pathetically. Even older men are not ashamed to weep like children. What we have said is in no way altered by the fact that the light-heartedness of their character makes it easy for them to shift from one emotion to another. (Actually, the same thing may be noted in Europe.) (1)

1. See my article on the funeral customs of the Nkundó which is to appear in Anthropos.

2. Brothers and sisters

From the love that Nkundó children feel for their parents naturally springs their affection for their brothers and sisters, which is strong and sincere. Our remarks concerning the nature and qualities of the children's feeling toward their parents are applicable here. Such quarrels as occur seldom become bitter. On the one hand, the affection between brothers and sisters is deep and sincere, and on the other, their social and economic interdependence naturally reinforces the ties between them.

Mutual assistance is an outgrowth of their love; brothers and sisters often help each other.

After the death of his father and uncles, the eldest brother is the natural defender and protector of his younger brothers and his sisters, even though they may be married.

593x 595 152 A definite difference can be observed between the intensity of affection present among uterine brothers and sisters and the sentiments shared with others. The bonds between children of the same mother are much more intimate and their affection much greater than it is toward brothers and sisters who have different mothers. This too is entirely [29] in accordance with the universal qualities of human nature and shows that monogamy is superior to polygamy in bringing about the unity, harmony, and happiness of families.

593ˣ 152 With reference to signs of affection, grief at the time of death, etc., the observations made for parent-child relationships hold true here -- mutatis mutandis.

3. Various relatives

602 The Nkundo's affection extends toward all members of his family, that is, all those with whom he feels linked by blood and common origin. These relatives are much greater in number than in Europe, because Nkundó kinship includes many more generations. The intensity of affection decreases with the distance of the degree of kinship. But the Nkundó knows and feels that he belongs to a large family, and he remains attached to all its members. He can find a home with any of them. This accounts for the fact that in the centers, men from the same village will look for each other and consider each other "brothers." Actually, that is what they are, since in general each village consists of only a single kin group. [621]

Although here, as in the case of brothers and sisters, common interests play a part in maintaining bonds between family members, the feelings of affection are not based on selfish considerations. The latter only reinforce these feelings, which are truly innate among the Nkundó. Among the various relatives the strongest attachments are developed between grandparents and grandchildren, uncles and aunts and nephews and nieces, male cousins and female cousins, etc.

603 Among the Nkundó as among Europeans there is a very strong affection between grandparents and grandsons, even greater, one might say, than between parents and children (the expression is: bǒna [30] l'onkáná, ndekí nd'ônkáná). But the relationship degenerates into compliance and weakness on one side, and into disrespectful carelessness on the other.

604 A Nkundó loves his paternal uncles and aunts and treats them like "fathers," and his maternal uncles and aunts like "mothers." Naturally, his feelings toward them are not as affectionate as for his parents, but they are an extension of these in an attenuated form.

605 The same situation holds true for the bonds which link him to his cousins, whom he calls "brothers" and "sisters." The children of his paternal aunt are his "fathers," however.

Article II. The Bolɔ́mbɔ́

178
In the old days, if an extremely rich man wanted to show his affection for one of his daughters and show off his wealth, he made that daughter bolɔ́mbɔ́. Today this custom has almost completely disappeared. (1) It has been almost impossible to maintain the practice because of a greater distribution of wealth and the reduction of leisure due to the work imposed by the white man. This work has been imposed directly in the form of forced labor, labor on roads, economic projects, etc., or indirectly because a sum had to be raised for the payment of taxes. All this has made it more difficult to bring large numbers of people together for ceremonies lasting days and weeks. (2) Nevertheless, the custom must be described here.

562
[602]
When a native wanted his favorite daughter to become bolɔ́mbɔ́, he had first to obtain the consent and financial support of all his kin. Then enormous preparations were made, for everything had to be special -- beverages, various foods, dances. On the date which had been set and made known through messengers to the entire region, an enormous crowd gathered at his house. Public festivities went on day after day. In an address suited to the occasion, he announced to those assembled his intention to set his daughter up as a bolɔ́mbɔ́. Two relatives or two of the father's wives then stripped off the girl's

1. On the left bank of the Luilaka it disappeared a good many years ago. The Injóló still followed it until quite recently.

2. One might suppose that the new uses of wealth made possible by economic development would have contributed to the disappearance of this custom. Theoretically such might have been the case, but in fact these developments were not involved in the change that has been noted.

562 clothing and dressed her in valuable furs, especially in part of the 556 pelt of a striped antelope called mpangɔ́. In some villages she was permitted to wear leopardskin in front as well as in back.

Then the father would decree (-bɛ́kya) that since his daughter [582] had become bolɔ́mbɔ́ she would always wear furs and would stop working, and that she would be given in marriage only to a very rich and influential man, not to the first comer. Therefore, a synonym for bolɔ́mbɔ́ is bɔ̌na ɓâ boɛ́ko, "child of the decree, a child set apart, forbidden."

This ceremony may be held regardless of the child's age, at any time between three years and adolescence.

When the ceremony is ended the girl withdraws (-ulama, transitive -uja) into a hut specially prepared for this occasion, which is called ileke. Her seclusion lasts only a few months. When certain natural needs oblige her to leave the house, she goes out the back way through the banana grove and hides as much of herself as possible under a mat. She does not walk on the bare ground; her feet must not [285] touch the earth. That is why mats are spread everywhere she steps. She does no work; her food is prepared by her mother, sister, aunt, etc., or by a slave. When it comes to her toilette, she washes her hands not in water, but in palm oil. [32] All these practices are marks of respect and honor.

When the period of seclusion is ended, the girl's father gives a second feast, with dances, drinks, etc., and the bolɔ́mbɔ́ comes out walking on mats. But there is no further ceremony. From then on the girl is no different from other girls. But she retains the sign of her distinction, the wearing of furs, and she does no housework.

The marriage of a bolɔ́mbɔ́ always occurred very late, since a [582] man who wanted to take her for his wife had to collect a good deal of [558] wealth before he could take the risk of asking for her hand. Should his attempt prove fruitless, he was exposed to ridicule in the whole region.

184 Among the tribes living on the left bank of the Luilaka any 556 man who was rich and of good family could ask for the hand of a 562 bolɔ́mbɔ́ in marriage. Among the Injɔ́lɔ́, on the other hand, the re-582 quirements were more complicated. The suitor had to belong to another tribe or group. For instance, a girl who belonged to the 184 Engɔ́njɔ́ group would be given only to a man from the Wesɛ́, the 556 Ngọmbẹ, or a neighboring tribe, but never to an Engɔ́njɔ́. All the 562 Engɔ́njɔ́ considered the bolúmbú their sister. Thus when the future hus-582 band went to the family of the bolúmbú to ask for her hand, every village barred his way by means of a fence. All the bride price valuables which he carried with him were taken from him, and an equivalent amount in various kinds of goods, such as hens, ducks, dogs, mats, etc., was substituted for it. That is, he exchanged bride price valuables for nkomi valuables [dowry]. (1) The suitor could pass only when the village that barred his way had nothing left with which to continue the exchange. If he found his riches exhausted, he had to go back home to replenish the supply. Everything he gave in this [33] fashion was counted as bride price, jěngí (1) and everything he received was part of the nkomi [dowry]. (2)

582 It is understandable that under these conditions asking to marry a bolúmbú was a luxury that the common man could not afford. The suitor had to belong to a rich and influential family all of whose members would assist him.

When the suitor finally succeeded in clearing a passage to the father of the chosen one with sufficient treasures, the latter put no further obstacles in his way. As for the girl, she felt exceedingly honored and delighted that a man loved her so much that he would go to so much trouble and spend such a vast amount out of affection for her.

As for the rest of the proceedings, the bride price payment was made in the same way as for any other marriage. But when the

4. See Chapter VII, Article IV.

He did not allow his daughter to leave without giving her at least one ebɛ́sa to wait on her. (5) Thus when Bolángɛ́ w'Ioma of Lokɔ́ndola

5. See Chapter VII, Article III.

(Injɔ́lo, Ngombe) married Bonjɛ́ngɔ́, daughter of Ilɔ́njɔ́ y'Ôkákema of Bompɔ́ma (Injɔ́lɔ́, Engɔ́njɔ́) (who died in 1934), the bride received from her father four bibɛ́sa to do the work, as well as a young cousin who was to stay with her [34] to bring her firewood. In this way the father made sure that his beloved daughter would retain her honorable position as a great lady.

556 562 The husband, who wanted his wife to retain her superior status, now makes her his bolɔ́mbɔ́ as well. (1) The term was: Bɔ̌n'ɔ̌w'olɔ́mbɔ́

1. See Chapter VII, Article III. That is, unless she is his first wife. See ibid. and Article I.

átswá ɔ́ wǎlɛ́ ɔ́w'olɔ́mbɔ́ ɛ́k'ɔ̌me. He would say to those assembled: "Her father proclaimed her bolɔ́mbɔ́, and I proclaim her bolɔ́mbɔ́ as well (Is'ékáɛ́ ɔ̂ɛ́kvákɛ́, emí mpɛ́ njɔ̂ɛ́kya â ng' ɔ́kɔ́)."

What was the reason for the existence of this custom?

556 562 According to the natives it was a public assertion of the father's high social position and at the same time the greatest token of affection he could bestow on his daughter; the two things were inseparable. Not every native had the right to make his daughter a bolɔ́mbɔ́. On the contrary, he had to hold an especially prominent rank, that is to say, he had to be a wealthy, influential, and powerful head of a family. All the ceremonies, practices, and rules involved in this institution point in that direction. A comparison with the bolɔ́mbɔ́ wife (1) leads additional plausibility to this explanation.

556 562 178 As we have said, this custom is in the process of disappearing completely. In certain tribes such as the Beloko, subtribe of the Lifumba, a substitute has actually been introduced. The favored daughter is dressed and adorned as before, except that European materials have replaced the furs. But the public character of the older institution has disappeared. The occasion is not surrounded with so many ceremonies. Finally, the girl is not called bolɔ́mbɔ́, for a new name has been invented; it is bondelɔ́ɔ́ngola, "the white man raises (educates) her." [35]

Article III. Friendship

572 Friendship is not unknown to the Nkundɔ́. It is founded on the same basis as in Europe. I have seen more than one instance of true mutual affection between persons who were in no way related. Among the Blacks with whom I have associated there are some whom I personally consider sincere friends and who have shown me real affection, helped me to the full extent of their powers, and shown me complete confidence. There have even been some who have not been afraid to place themselves in serious difficulties and who have gone so far as to incriminate themselves in order to clear me, thereby exposing themselves to troubles and sanctions.

---

1. See Chapter VII, Article III. Unless she is his first wife. See ibid, and Article I.

572
[201] Friends seldom or never give signs of their affection, apart from gifts and mutual assistance. Men are seldom seen embracing, although women do so frequently.

The Nkundó are familiar with friendship pacts (called boseka or, among the Bombwanja, likandeko) (1). Two persons of the same sex are bound to one another in friendship (kota boseka or likandeko) [431] in the presence of a witness (ndonga), whose duty it is to deliver the gifts that are exchanged.

The conclusion of a friendship agreement is actually a custom of the women; men -- usually the husbands -- create friendship bonds only secondarily, in imitation of their wives. This pact is not automatically hereditary; the children may continue it -- through the same ndonga as their fathers -- but they are free to let it lapse. (2)

Two elements may be distinguished in the friendship pact: congeniality or affection and mutual assistance. The latter is in itself a sign of friendship, but it is not infrequently the sole reason for the pact among men who seek reciprocal support by this means. [36] As for the women, it may be said, on the contrary, that gifts are considered purely as tokens of affection and their bonds are based exclusively on affection. Often women who are very fond of each other do not bind themselves in a friendship pact but are content to show their affection in all simplicity. Men also may be very good friends without having recourse to a pact. But the conclusion of an agreement makes their relationship public and thus protects it against deleterious influences such as misunderstandings, disagreements, outbursts of anger, etc. One might say that the pact represents the addition of the element of reason to the element of emotion.

1. Bofilí among the Ekonda, mbale among the Batswa.

2. See also a special reason for friendship pacts in Chapter IV, Article I.

572 Unlike the affection among relatives, friendships cool and even end. This is especially true for pacts based purely on mutual assistance. Thus, if one of the friends is somewhat too stingy in comparison to the other, a rupture quickly results.

[561] The Nkundó also have especially affectionate feelings for their "age mates" (bonɛ́ngɔ́, pl. banɛ́ngɔ́), that is, for all those who were born the same day, week, month, or period as they. They feel united by special ties. Among themselves age mates consider and treat each other as brothers, help and assist each other, etc.

Their affection is natural; the sort of selfishness that may be found among "friends" is not present among age mates.

Their relationship is so close that if the occasion arises, they lend each other their wives. (1)

1. See Chapter VI, Article VIII, 1.

[551] Lastly, individuals bearing the same name (ndoí, pl. bandoí) show real affection toward each other; they help each other and exchange gifts. They make no pact as do the boseka, however.

It should be noted that these various bonds do not exist between persons of opposite sexes, among whom they would be condemned as concubinage. [37]

Article IV. Conjugal Love

583x The question has often been asked: how about love among these peoples? Do husbands and wives really love each other? We are not speaking here of sexual passion, which is generally present in addition to love between man and woman, but which in itself is clearly distinct from it. Love is the result of various emotions -- congeniality, affection, mutual appreciation, admiration, devotion, etc., and we judge the perfection of love according to the presence or absence of any one of these elements and their degree.

The question is by its very nature a very delicate one to answer. Actually, it is difficult to observe ~~and~~ analyze clear and precise facts pertaining to the subject. Our notion of it must of 593x necessity be derived from a logical conclusion based on a great many particular instances. Yet these might have explanations other than those we give them. Thus we could attribute the presence of true love or its absence to the effects of causes of which we are unaware. Nevertheless, we cannot keep from presenting below a few facts which will enable us to draw a conclusion that is adequately in accordance with reality.

There is no question that the love found here lacks the purity which it has among certain groups of Europeans or certain other peoples, [181] especially good Christians. No one is astonished that pagan peoples, practicing their atavistic and degrading customs, have not achieved the general delicacy of sentiment or more especially the moral height of so noble a virtue as has been nourished and developed by centuries of Christian influence.

In addition, the instability of marriage, the possibility of its dissolution, and the presence of polygamy by no means tend to develop the purity of love; on the contrary, they tend to debase it. Finally, [38] the liveliness and sincerity of family affections, which we have described in Article I, naturally result in a reduction of conjugal love -- all the more so since, because of the patriarchal structure of native society, the Nkundó needs his kin more than he needs his wife.

Thus there is much selfishness, which is one of the characteristic signs of moral decadence and little devotion. A wife will seldom remain with a husband who suffers from an incurable illness, is impotent, or has become too poor for her taste. The Nkundó consider this the natural state of affairs and are not at all ashamed to admit it, even in front of a missionary.

593x 588x The same is true of a husband's relationship to his wife. If she has become incapable of fulfilling at least one of the purposes for which he married her, why should he keep her? If she has given him sons, they will want to keep their mother, and their entreaties combined, perhaps, with a feeling of compassion for one he has loved, might persuade him to keep her. Her sons will provide for her subsistence to which their father will make a contribution from time to time, and her daughters will take care of her and prepare her food. But some men will insist on getting rid of this burden in spite of 593x 586x everything. But they only succeed if they have no sons old enough to defend their mother. Differences in behavior are due to the character of the persons involved. (1)

1. See Chapter VIII, Article I.

797 593 159 Only religion can bring about a radical change in this domain. We are still far from our goal, but a few serious Christians have already begun to adapt to the requirements of a higher morality and to deal with their wives in conformity with the sanctity of marriage though he or she may be ill. Yet it is more difficult for them to do this than for the others, since this same morality forbids [39] polygamy and all other means of satisfying passion.

An admirable case is that of Bekau Marie, daughter of Esalé D'Iámbo (Bonkoso). Her husband, Bokombeembe Pierre of Mbalá, suffered from leprosy for many years. He could no more perform the sexual act than do any real work. His wife therefore had to support herself with the help of her son. In spite of her freedom, her separation from her native village, and the ill feelings borne her by her husband's family, she did not want to leave him but decided that she would continue to devote herself to him. (1)

1. Her action is due only in part to Christian influence. That is why this case belongs here to the exclusion of some others I could describe, which are due solely to the influence of Christian morality upon the souls of the individuals.

593x 578 sides with his family against his wife does not have the approval of those who judge the conflict simply as neutral spectators. In such a case it is usually felt that the couple do not love each other very much. And often the marriage soon breaks up. But if the union is maintained nevertheless, its continuation is generally attributed to a fear of the consequences of dissolving the marriage, which would be even worse. The same sort of variation among individuals is to be found in the matter of a wife's devotion to the interests of her husband's family.

593x 596 It is not possible to compare a native household to the households of good simple people at home, where [40] the family is composed solely of parents and their children. Here it extends further; the husband's interests are also those of his parents, brothers, uncles, etc. As we will see in connection with marriage by inheritance it is not unusual for a woman to remain attached to her deceased husband's family. Others are more interested in enriching their own families.

593x 159 579 The following is a historical instance of a wife who was very devoted to her husband's interests, though there seemed to be room in her make-up for pride and personal glory. (1): Bolɔ́mbɔ́ wă nsánjí, daughter of Bokombe of Litɔ́li (Bombwanja), was married to Bonyeme w'ěnyuká of Bonganda (Bonkoso). One day (her father having died in the meantime) she went back to visit her brother, Bompelí w'ělombo, who had left Litɔ́li to settle in his maternal village, Etɔ́o of the Boɛ́ndɛ́. They began to quarrel. Bompelí maintained that Bonyeme wasn't worth much, that his wealth was exaggerated, that it was a mistake to honor him, etc. Bolɔ́mbɔ́

1. According to my estimates, this episode is about a hundred years old. I knew two men who had recollections of it: the eldest (Longwokó of the Basɛ́ká Bengóngó, Bongíli) was about twenty years old when it occurred. A greatgranddaughter of Bonyeme (Mputɔ́ Sofie) is now in her forties.

593 defended her husband. Finally, since they could not agree, Bompelí 159 ordered his sister not to return to her husband, so that she could be 579 married to another man. For he had decided to test the valor of Bonyeme by making war on him, and she could not see her husband taken prisoner by her own brother. Nevertheless, Bolómbó remained determined and departed in haste. When she reached her husband she told him everything. In the meantime all the Boéndé and other Bombwanja clans were taking up arms. Enyuká, for his part, passed the news on to all Bonkoso villages, as well as their relatives by marriage, dependents, and Batswá. The various groups of combatants stationed themselves near the village of Bonganda in what is today the forest of [41] Boóngónjou, between the Lomeké and the present location of Besombó, Lofelí, and Engónjó. The Boéndé army was taken unawares by the Bonkoso, who attacked and after furious combat routed them, leaving a number of dead on the field. Bonyeme proposed a peace. He took pride in not being surpassed in generosity. With a truly princely munificence he was not satisfied with only paying all the clans who had lost members but in addition sent Bompelí all that the latter needed in order to compensate Bombwanja groups for the loss of their members and, on top of this, brought him a whole fortune to complete Bolómbó's bride price.

587 The Nkundó are well acquainted with cases of widows who, having reached middle age, take a solemn oath not to remarry or ever go near a man again. Among the stronger sex such cases are almost nonexistent. Cases of women who, when sick and dying wanted to remain near their husbands, cited later (Chap. VI, Art. II, 4) should be noted here, as well as preferences for monogamy (Chap. VII, Art. VI, VII).

593 Bearing in mind the explanation given at the outset, I think I can state that most marriages contracted by the Nkundó are love matches. Marriage for political reasons or for certain material advantages have certainly existed. And especially at the present time, there are parents who push their children into marriage for the sake of financial or social gains.

Our conclusions may not be accepted by a number of colonials. Yet I feel they are valid in the limited sense indicated here. Arguments

593x against the presence of love are based chiefly on the instability of 581 unions, the high frequency of divorce, infidelity, and polygamy -- objections which we shall examine in somewhat greater detail.

To judge the situation properly, we must first distinguish 593x between the sexes, which are not at all alike in this respect. Furthermore, 562 among women [42] we must distinguish between those who are wives of polygamous men and those who are not.

Let us speak first of all of the men. They seem superior to the opposite sex in the matter of conjugal love, at least if we base our conclusions on their greater fidelity. Divorce is almost always [586] caused by the wife. As a matter of fact, this is quite natural. The man marries at a fairly mature age and therefore becomes involved when he is well aware of what he is doing, while the girl most often becomes engaged before the age of discretion and is thus unable to choose according to her own heart.

On the other hand, the polygamous man's heart must be divided.
595x As we will see suo loco, he has a special love for one of his wives.
His love for the first one deepens, becomes more rational, more deliberate, whereas his love for his favorite would seem to be more a matter of emotion in the strict sense of the word. As to the others, he has usually chosen them of his own will and perhaps has even seduced them to the point of making them leave a previous husband.
It would therefore seem unfair to deny the presence of some affection toward them.

562 But is the term "love" still applicable? According to the 593x European point of view, conjugal love is exclusive. Among the 152 Nkundô this does not seem to be the case. It has often been said 595x that the polygamist considers his wives, with one or two exceptions, as human capital, so many production machines. I would not deny that the harem constitutes human capital and a source of wealth, but in my opinion such a statement is much too extreme and absolute.
In most cases a real affection for his wives must be attributed to the polygamist. I understand this affection to be a kind of love in reduced proportions. And I compare this situation -- mutatis mutandis -- to that of someone who loves several friends at the same time. It is 593x possible to speak of love toward several individuals in spite of differ-562 ences in its intensity, depending on the various persons who [43] are 595x its objects, although we may consider such a divided love as very 152 imperfect. But whatever name one calls it and however weak in intensity one finds it, it is impossible to deny its existence.

Among women, it is necessary to distinguish between wives
595x of monogamous men and those of polygamists, especially in the case
152 of "supplementary" wives. It is not hard to understand that among the latter, love is more likely to cool. Since the husband must divide his attentions and signs of affection, if only to preserve harmony, the situation could hardly be otherwise, even without the fact of very early marriages. In addition to the above-mentioned case of the cooling of affection among wives in polygamous marriages, there is no question that in these marriages, a community of souls, feelings, and interests is not established between wives and husbands to the same extent as in monogamous marriages. However, one could not state as a general rule that the wife of a polygamist does not love him, at least to some extent, depending on the individual. To maintain à priori that a man cannot be loved simultaneously by several women is logically inadmissible and contrary to the facts. Here it happens quite often that a wife leaves her polygamous husband for another because she has transferred her love to the latter. It is for the exceptions that proof should be required. Even if there are many of them, they do not invalidate the cases of real affection.

When a polygamist returns home after a long absence, he is often the object of affectionate demonstrations by his wives which are surprising to Europeans. The women fall at his feet, embrace his legs, roll on the ground, and perform contortions out of joy and emotion. It is true that the freedom resulting from colonization has done much to cool these fine sentiments.

Is it beside the point to quote the saying of [44] polygamists'
[539] wives: bokungɔ ɛ́kafola bitɛ́fɛ́, lolango ɛ́kafola botɛ́ma, "the bokungɔ tree divides its branches, love divides the heart"? And then there is the following fable which teaches true love: a polygamist who has three wives, is accidentally wounded and lies dying on the opposite side of the river. His wives run to the shore but find no canoe. The river is infested with crocodiles. The chief wives refuse to risk their 595^ 152 lives by swimming across; it is the least important one who throws herself in the midst of the dangers to go and help her husband.

In most cases a woman no longer feels affection for her husband when she has given her heart to a lover. She stays with him because it would be hard to do otherwise. Her husband continues to have the use of her body and her arms, but she no longer gives him a place in her heart. As this proverb so subtly expresses it:

[539] bǒm 'akwěta, ḿ bw'â nkánge; bonsámb'ákwěta, omeka é ńtegume, "the husband calls you, 'I am sick and may die'; the lover calls you, 'I will try to come.'"

595X 586x The objection concerning the frequency of divorce is difficult to handle because the question is very complicated. First of all, the fact that a couple remains together, that they remain faithful to one another, is no proof of love in a society where the idea of duty is very strong. A Christian woman may come to feel a real aversion for an unfaithful husband, yet she may remain with him out of a sense of duty, out of love for the children, etc. Conversely, in a society where the idea of duty is relaxed or does not exist spouses may readily be unfaithful to one another, although basically they love each other; if it is easy to divorce they will do so rashly, for trivial reasons, without realizing that there is still love between them. (1)

1. The Honorary Attorney General A. Sohier has informed me that the experiences of his long judiciary carreer entirely confirms my statements. Their truth is reflected in the fact that for some years now in European countries, it has been necessary to permit divorced couples to remarry each other. Thus we see that they find each other again after several years of separation.

The first of my two assertions is not to be found among the Nkundó, [45] since they have no moral concept of duty in our sense. But it sometimes happens that a couple who no longer love each other remain together because it is not possible for them to separate.

595x 586x The first part of my second assertion applies to the Nkundó, as will be apparent in the course of this description. But the second part does not, for Nkundó law and practice does not allow divorce for trivial reasons; rather the procedure involves so many particular stipulations and conditions that their fulfillment becomes quite difficult (see Chapter VIII).

Other facts should be noted. Statistics for European peoples of the present time should be closely examined and reflected upon, and conclusions should be drawn. How many divorces, broken marriages, and dramas of misconduct appear here! Nevertheless, it is impossible to conclude that there was no love among the individuals who later found themselves in these unhappy situations. It is very likely that they were married out of true love and with the best intentions. But in the course of circumstances they have allowed their love to cool. The moral framework of their lives was not strong enough to hold them back. Their surroundings often accelerate, rather than check, their fall. Social authority does not counteract the destructive tendencies, or at least not enough. If in addition inner forces of resistance are lacking, the passions triumph and finally destroy their love.

Things are no different among the Nkundó. It is only fair to take these facts into account in making comparisons, rather than passing judgment in abstracto. It is too easy to lose sight of these considerations, simple though they are. Especially when dealing [46] with a people so different from ourselves, we are often inclined a priori to consider them inferior from every point of view and in all areas, often without being aware that we are doing so.

To arrive at a reliable conclusion based on positive evidence, we would have to have complete and precise statistics. But these are lacking. Therefore, the only thing we can say is that, side by side with many women who no longer live with their first husbands, there are others whose first marriages continue until death.

Yet here again we must take care not to draw hasty conclusions. We should only consider the cases of people already dead. In addition we must exclude broken engagements from our count and include only marriages that have been legitimately contracted in the strict sense of the word -- that is, including only women for whom at least the walo has been paid. Furthermore, for our present purposes, we can 595x 586x only consider the marriages of adult individuals through the nkumbó, that is to say, unions that are truly and perfectly voluntary on both sides. Finally, we should exclude those wives of polygamists who prefer monogamy and have taken advantage of an opportunity to break their unions in order to enter into a marriage contract with a bachelor. It seems to me that when these reasonable considerations and restrictions are taken into account, the figures established will not argue against the stability of Nkundó marriages to the extent that one might have thought at first. Or at least that is my impression, derived from the many cases that have come to my attention and that it has been my duty to investigate thoroughly in the course of my ministry as a priest.

The 112 marriages recorded in our last two books at Flandria can be broken down as follows (1): 18 widows, (2) 6 inherited wives, [47] 1 replacement, 3 cases of women who had broken marriages entered into before puberty, 29 wives of polygamists, 18 divorced wives of monogamous men, and 37 first marriages. If we exclude the replacement, the marriages of children and of former wives of polygamists, but include widows and women who are inherited, we arrive at 37 + 18 + 6 = 61 persons for whom their present marriage is still their first, as against 18 clear-cut cases of divorce.

[797] Nevertheless, it should be noted that these figures are based on only a tiny minority of the population and on that part which, from our point of view, may be considered the best, because these people are willing to submit to the yoke of Christian morality. In addition these people are in their prime, and it is impossible to say whether later on they will persevere in these good inclinations. But in any case these instances show that faithfulness to a promise can, and in fact does, exist among the Nkundó.

595x 837 Without a doubt one of the most beautiful aspects of love in general, and marital love in particular, is conjugal faithfulness. As will be shown in detail in Chapter VI, Article VII, 2, the Nkundó do 595ˣ 837 not appreciate marital fidelity the same way we do. A wife's unfaithfulness is severely punished by the laws. But adultery may be discovered and known to all without causing shame or remorse. This is a marked difference between our way of thinking and that of the Nkundó. They maintain that a passing infidelity which is not followed through does not denote an absence of love for one's spouse, even if it is repeated. In spite of the implausibility of this statement, I had to accept it, for those who argued with me were so many, their positions so various, and they were really serious. Among them were a number of Christians with whom we are very satisfied and who conduct themselves admirably, as do their wives. They consider these errors to be momentary failings [48] due to passion, which permit love to remain. Indeed, often these men and women are models in the performance of their other duties. This misbehaviour is without doubt considered very serious -- their anger shows clearly that they do not consider it trivial -- but it does not exclude love and thus, as far as everything else is concerned, the spouses continue giving proof of it to each other.

Let us not forget that many elements may lead to a fall and that consciences may go far astray. On the other hand, the fact that a husband is tolerant, even to the point of exploiting his wife, does not exclude a certain love for her; a husband may be extremely indulgent and at the same time jealous to the point of crime. All that may be found among the Whites, after all. Love without the feeling of duty will not suffice to sustain a union.

Moreover, there is no dogma, no moral teaching based on religion, to restrain the instincts. And we should add that among these [562] primitive people, the woman's natural tendency to please, to submit to a man's desires, is highly developed. In Europe these feelings are channeled by the Christian religion and its influence on society. Here they encounter no direct obstacle except for sanctions. Before marriage [836] sexual passion and all sensations connected with it and adjunct to it can be pursued without physical, moral, or social obstacles, at least at the present time. The surroundings in which a girl grows up and the example and conversations of her companions will tend even to push her in that direction.

837
548 Finally, let us not forget the spirit of gain and greed. Except in a few instances, a woman expects remuneration from a man to whom she has surrendered her body. Many infidelities may be explained by this practice, at least at the present time. But on the other hand, it should be noted that the woman's demand for a "wage" from her lover may be explained by an amorous concern; by giving the woman a gift or an amount of money the man shows [49] his regard for her; it is a demonstration of his affection for her, and the woman wants to be paid in order to be sure of her lover's love. That is not to say that such instances are common or frequent, but such a feeling is natural and actually exists in more than one case. (1)

1. See Chapter VI, Article VII, 2.

It is not surprising that the woman who lives in circumstances which are always unfavorable to chastity and marital fidelity is easily led to adultery and often falls. That is the basis of the proverb: [599] bǒmoto ndé lofolókó, nkó ngonda ěfá'nd'ósengámé, "the woman is a chrysalis; there is no forest where she does not hang" -- a clear condemnation of the frivolity of the daughters of Eve in the land of the Nkundó. Nevertheless, these moral criticisms in the form of proverbs can be accepted only in a general way and must be understood cum grano salis; they leave the door wide open for exceptions.

595x
152 In his Blancs et Noirs au Congo Belge [Whites and Blacks in the Belgian Congo], (p. 38), Jadot has written: "The Bantu is capable of love . . . and that is all, and his wife -- no matter what has been said -- of a certain amount of marital fidelity. In general, neither the one nor the other go too far. Platonism, Petrarchism, and Romanticism are foreign to the love of the natives . . . I know . . . of cases of fierce jealousy and of beautiful faithfulness." (2)

2. See also ibid., p. 208 ff.

152 We conclude that love exists among the Nkundó. This feeling is subjected to harsh attacks and is affected by many unfavorable circumstances, which may account for its imperfection and for certain

152 anomalies in its manifestations. The objections raised against the idea of its existence among the Nkundó do not prove its absence; rather they indicate the adverse conditions under which it is found, conditions which prevent its development and bring about its shortcomings or destruction. The Sexual Life of the Nkundó

In this section we will examine successively:

I. The feeling of sexual modesty.
II. Preparation for sexual life.
III. Prostitution.
IV. Premarital sexuality.
V. Sexual practice.
VI. Unnatural vices.
VII. Incest
VIII. Love philtres.

Article I. Sexual Modesty

Sexual modesty is defined, at least by modern psychologists, more or less as a "a sensitive dynamism (or principle of action) of fear which is quasi-instinctive and directly related to sexual processes." (1)

1. J. De La Vaissière, S.J., La Pudeur instinctive [Instinctive Modesty], p. 13.

It is a good instinct rather than a virtue, and facilitates the practice of chastity. Understood in this sense, modesty tends to hide the sex act and anything that is closely or remotely connected with it.

Sensual excesses do not exclude the existence of modesty and, conversely, a modest person may allow himself to be led into a violation of morals. Nevertheless, the greater the development and 000 delicacy of a person's sexual modesty, the better that person is armed -- all other things [51] being equal -- against the excesses of passion. The habits of lust, on the other hand, dull and weaken the sense of modesty.

On the basis of these psychological and moral considerations as well as the facts of experience, it is impossible to say that a people is lacking in modesty simply because of the fact that they clearly have sensual tendencies and show a good deal of lasciviousness.

834 Among the Nkundó one should not expect the delicate sentiments found among some other peoples, especially those strongly influenced by Christian morality. But modesty is not unknown to them.

In the lines to follow we will say nothing more about the instinct of sexual modesty, which I think has been to a great extent blunted among the Nkundó, but of modesty in manner, which is an indication of inner modesty. The comparatively strict rules by which the Nkundó community tries to protect modesty shows that these people are fully aware of the value of that instinct as a safeguard against human weakness.

In general they hide the manifestations of sexual passion. In addition, certain practices which they favor show their attitude toward this matter; we will examine them in greater detail. It should be noted that, as we will see below, modesty among the Nkundó extends to situations where we would not consider it applicable, and vice versa, because of differences in the attitude toward certain questions.

Ethnologists in general consider the following among the chief effects (or indications) of modesty: the wearing of clothing (1) and the existence of regulations concerning the decency and [52] discretion which in word or deed should be observed between persons of the same sex and, more especially, toward persons of the opposite sex.

1. Although the wearing of clothing is a precaution arising from modesty, it has been asserted that the lack of garments is no proof of the lack of this sentiment.

1. Clothing. Nudity.

291 Until he has reached the age of discretion and even a little 855 later, the Nkundó child wears nothing more around his loins than a belt of beads or a plain string usually adorned with some amulet. Nobody is shocked by this rudimentary attire. Parents take great interest in the adornment of their children; from a very early age [301] they are seen wearing belts of trading beads, bracelets, rings around the ankles made of iron, copper, or brass, and in addition, at the present time, glass beads above the knees.

291 As the child grows older the clothing increases. From the outset there are differences on the basis of sex.

The boy acquires a thin strip of cloth which is attached to his string or belt simply by folding back the two ends. The cloth falls between his legs without being tight, allowing for great freedom of movement and the circulation of air; this is an excellent precaution against perspiration due to extreme heat, but it is not very effective protection against indiscreet looks, at least in certain positions. The fabric made of raffia may be decorated to a greater or a lesser extent. In former times there existed different kinds, which we need not describe here. The length of the hanging borders is dictated by vanity. The string was often replaced by a raffia belt or -- among prominent men -- by a leather thong.

The woman's garment consists of a broad raffia belt whose two ends are gradually narrowed, ending in cords which are tied on the [53] stomach. In the center of this belt (nkásá (1) a ball of raffia fibers is attached (bonkoko). A piece of cloth (efufa or lofufa) whose width may vary from 3 centimeters to 20 centimeters or more, depending on the age and the wearer's intensity of the feeling of modesty, is attached to the cords and falls more or less low on the body. For a [292] feast or display the efufa is replaced with a more valuable and longer [184] piece of cloth (intóló or, among the Elángá of Losanganya, ifika).

1. Or bokangá, bokangá wá nkásá. Among the Bombwanja it is called likóngâ.

291 184 The nkásá is unknown beyond the Jwalé and the Luilaka. In that region the women tie a string (or a belt of beads) around themselves and attach a second piece of cloth to it.

291 Thus the male garment is a rudimentary sort of shorts, open on the sides, while female dress is much more open. In general the efufa is an appropriate protection of one's modesty, but it is inadequate in certain positions. (2)

[611] [196] 2. It may be interesting to note that etóo nsamányá, or just plain etóo, which is the term for a man's garment, also indicates the male line of descent, while the female line is often designated by the term nkásá (sometimes by the word jwǒmoto derived from bǒmoto, "woman"). Let us add that lonkundó jwǎ nkásá means "pure, flawless Lonkundo, not corrupted by foreign influences." This expression should be compared with the following phrases: langue maternel, moedertaal, "mother tongue," etc.

291 177 At present the nkásá is no longer worn except by a few elderly inhabitants of villages far from the main communication lines. Everywhere else the ancient mode of dress has been replaced by materials imported from Europe. The women wear at least a sangatúmbo, a kind of short skirt which falls from their loins at least to the middle of their thighs if not further. Middle-aged men in the interior have simply changed the material of their garment but not its form. The younger ones, on the contrary, have frankly adopted the European mode of dress.

291 581 [illegible] [897] A married woman is not allowed to enter the village of her relatives by marriage (bakiló) or appear before them [54] without supplementing her usual attire with one or more beleleke (banana leaves cut into fringes). The term bakiló must be understood as it is meant by the Nkundó; it excludes those with whom the wife may sometimes perform the sexual act and who are called "husbands" broadly speaking.

291 581 speaking. (1) Is this custom in some way related to modesty? The

1. See Chapter VI, Article VI.

[606] same question may be raised with respect to another strict rule of decorum which forbids a man to look his mother-in-law in the face. (2)

2. For details concerning this custom, see Chapter VI, Article V, 1.

It can readily be answered in the affirmative. (3)

3. Nevertheless, see Chapter X, Article II, 3.

784 516 The rule of decorum which forbids a man to sit down on a seat where a woman is seated who is not his wife seems to me also to be dictated by sexual modesty. On the other hand, stepping over the seat under such circumstances has nothing whatever to do with this feeling. The purpose of this practice is to enable the person seated (regardless of sex) to avoid the evil repercussions of a charm or magic spell in his or her possession. (4)

4. Contrary to the explanation given by Jadot in Blancs et Noirs au Congo Belge (Whites and Blacks in the Belgian Congo], p. 90.

291 834 Is the native ashamed to show his nakedness? Let us beware of answering this question in general terms. In order to have an idea of the situation which is sufficiently clear and precise, various cases and circumstances must be taken into account.

1) First of all it can be stated that in the normal course of daily living the Nkundó, men as well as women, do all they can to hide their genital organs. That is to say that basically they are 291 embarrassed by the glances of others. This feeling extends even to 834 other parts of the body which, irrespective of the degree of culture they have reached, most peoples try to cover. [55]

2) Between persons of the same sex and age a certain freedom
834 514 is permitted. This may be observed especially among young boys when they have to urinate. In our countries of Europe the situation is no different. I must say, however, that I have only noticed this freedom in the schools and never in the villages of the interior. Is there a gap in my observations, or should this laxity in the schools be attributed to the influence of the law of least effort (the suitable places in the schools are at some distance) and to the lack of leisure available to the pupils given the shortness of recreation periods on the one hand and their love of play on the other? It is also possible that among these boys modesty has barely made its appearance, since this feeling is strongly linked to the sexual instinct and awakens only with the latter. It would also seem that living in a group tends to reduce the power of modesty.

3) It is obvious that sexual excitement runs counter to modesty
834 832 and that sometimes -- especially among young people -- immodest acts may be used to arouse another person, especially in situations, such as bathing, which lend themselves easily to such actions.

4) Bathers, whether washing or swimming, are very careless,
515 834 especially when they are in a group of their own sex and age. In former times no doubt they did not indulge in the luxury of even a rudimentary bathing costume. But at the present time it is not at all difficult for them to obtain the small piece of cloth needed for that purpose. Nevertheless, nude bathing in rivers and streams is a common practice. It is far more frequent among women than among men. The natives with whom I have discussed the subject attribute this fact to levity and a lack of concern; but they see nothing very wrong in it. Whether or not [56] the bathers are in a group also seems to make a difference. If you surprise one or two people under such circumstances, they will hide in haste. If, on the other hand, you find a dozen, they will not move; on the contrary, they will interrupt their toilette to watch you pass. Perhaps they are simply unconcerned about their nakedness. But it is also possible that they

575 834 are reassured by the fact that they are in a group, so that no one feels singled out by the gaze of the passer-by. Washing away from major streams is always surrounded by more propriety. For this purpose a [343] small enclosure (ikomba) is built behind the hut or among the banana trees, or a small thicket is allowed to grow there. By this means the native is sheltered from indiscreet glances if he wants to take a [757] bath or give himself an enema. As a matter of fact these things are done preferably after dark.

834 152 5) Violent anger or sorrow drown out modesty, just as they momentarily destroy the use of reason and suppress all feelings which are contradictory or simply different. In this situation, too, the man shows himself superior to the woman. He is less impulsive, calmer, less prone to lose control of his actions, to be carried away by his anger. Thus he almost never strips himself bare. The woman, on the other hand, readily strips off all her clothing. This behavior is extremely common; a woman undresses completely whenever she experiences great sorrow or intense anger. Luckily for propriety's sake some friend or relative always hastens to cover at least the essential parts. For a woman who throws off her clothing exposes herself to the mockery and jeers of spectators. (1)

[593]x [578] 1. An angry woman may also undress to shame her husband; it is a way of insulting and mocking him.

833 6) The Nkundó practice sexual intercourse only at night. I believe that this custom is due to their sense of propriety, [57] supplemented by a superstitious explanation which will be described in detail in Article V.

593x 834 7) The sense of modesty has its fullest expression in relation to parents, brothers, sisters, etc. Thus it is unheard of that a son should see his mother naked: bǒ̱na áté̱náká ěsunví nvangó. If an adult daughter is ill and requires personal care (such as an enema, for example), the father has to take care of her himself if no other female relative is near by. But their sense of modesty is such that they both shed tears over the event. As a matter of fact this situation

834 arises but rarely. Furthermore, if a daughter is required to perform similar duties for her father, she will undertake this obligation only [539] with the lament: njôy'ɔ́ɛna ɛ̌kɛ 'm wimɔ́kɔ́, "I have come to see where I had my origin." Any woman who has been in that position will later know no oath more sacred than this one: la botakɔ wǎ fafɔ bǒkɛ 'm wɛ̌nɔ́kɔ la mpaka, "by my father's nakedness which I saw when he was old."

834
291 Thus we can draw the conclusion that the Nkundó are offended by nakedness and as a rule do not tolerate it. The exceptions do not invalidate this generalization; on the contrary, they tend to support it.

2. Speech. Obscenities and propriety.

831 In general the Nkundó see nothing wrong with using obscene expressions. They only describe them as "bad" if they become indecent.

195 If a conversation touches on matters of sex, they may wonder whether a particular topic is necessary, interesting, or entertaining; they will not ask themselves whether it is moral. For it will be apparent throughout this study they have no concept of morality strictly speaking.

The Nkundó possesses a varied and extensive list of obscene words -- nor is he alone in this respect. [58] We are not compiling a dictionary, and therefore we will not list them. What interests us are the circumstances that make these words indecent and under which a proper use of them impossible. The circumstances provide us with a criterion of the degree of obscenity of a word or expression. Let us say at once that we include in this category not only terms applied to organs and phenomena which are of a sexual nature strictly speaking, but also words pertaining to certain anatomical parts or physiological functions such as, for example, excretion, hair and tattooing found on private parts, and the female garment called efufa.
[194] We should also point out that some tribes will consider expressions obscene which do not shock others at all.

195 which do not shock others at all. (1)

1. These comments are applicable also to peoples in other parts of the world.

[554] The general rule of decorum among the Nkundó permits the use of such terms only among equals. Their use when speaking to inferiors is tolerated but not approved of. The use of obscenities when speaking to any strangers meets with definite disapproval. Among persons of different sexes the prohibition is particularly strict.

Nevertheless, the use of these expressions is judged less severely if they are uttered in a moment of anger or as a reprimand, even in the presence of a member of the opposite sex.

Exclamations of anger, vexation, and sorrow are often nothing but obscenities (2). No one is shocked by them in such situations.

2. See "Les Coutumes Funéraires" [Funeral Customs], No. 1, to be published in Anthropos.

Some elderly or more modest persons do not make use of them, however; if the habit of using a particular expression is thoroughly ingrained, they may make a slight change in its pronounciation (as is common for some of our "swear words").

514
576
To circumvent the difficulties caused by the need to use certain words frequently, [59] euphemisms are coined to take their place. Thus the Nkundó say: ńtswɛ bokako w'ákusa, "I am going behind the house," to indicate that they are going to urinate, and ńtsw'ɛsendɔ́, "I am going for small pieces of firewood," or ńtsw'otɛ́na lokáfa, "I am going to pick a leaf," meaning that they are going to the toilet. On the way they say: ńjeta felɛ́, "I am leaving the path" or "I am going to the forest." A husband is permitted to use accurate terminology when speaking to his wife, but it is considered very improper for her to do so in speaking to him.

When someone is satisfying a natural need, others keep a distance away from him; they will not even speak to him. Moreover, the person would not reply even if he were called. A woman will not 574 576 even answer her husband, but he may indicate his presence by coughing lightly.

574 576 578 831 Any infraction of these rules is considered a grave insult. A person offended in this manner may seek revenge by violent means, either personally or through the medium of his son, brother, etc. According to native justice he will always be in the right, even if the quarrel becomes bloody. The simple act of uttering obscenities while passing in front of a house in which there is someone who is entitled to the speaker's respect may result in reprisals by the latter. (1)

1. See Jadot, Blancs et Noirs au Congo belge [Whites and Blacks in the Belgian Congo], p. 90.

578 834 Crude language is especially reprehensible and wounding if it contains allusions to incest or other reflections on a relative whom the speaker wants to insult. And it must be admitted that such expressions may go beyond the limits (for example: coi cum patre, matre, fratre, sorore, etc.). In connection with this topic it should be noted that reference is always made to a relative of the opposite sex to that of the person who is directly or indirectly being addressed. Furthermore, licentious talk and the use of indecorous language are more severely condemned when they take place in the presence of [554] women and old people [60] or are said by a slave in front of his master, by a Botswa in front of a Bootó (1).

1. See Introduction, footnote 2, p. 4.

578 684 834 If a man catches anyone uttering obscenities in front of his wife, especially if they are addressed to her personally, he can start action in adultery proceedings. If the woman refuses to listen to the seducer, she will not answer him, or sometimes, annoyed at the insult, she may retort by insulting his mother. She can complain, but generally she does not do so. Is she ashamed, or is she afraid that the tempter might make public some excess in her conduct which he has discovered? In any case a woman is more sensitive than a man to the 578 shame of obscenities. They say: b̌lekɛ́ mɔ̌nvi ɛ̌à bitɔ̌li ń'kɔ̌moto.

684 Bɔ̌moto ndɛ́ ndota (itɛ́lɛ̌) "A woman is a ndota snake. Just as that 834 reptile twists through the grass and rolls up as soon as it sees a man approaching, so a woman finds it difficult to endure any obscenity."

The ideal way to be sure whether an expression is actually considered indecent is to check whether it may be used in the presence of a close relative, for a Nkundɔ́ never utters an obscenity in front of such a person.

834 Among the Nkundɔ́, as in Europe, certain indelicate exclamations are so deeply rooted that they seem to have lost their original meaning, that is, most of the population no longer thinks of it at all. That a few more serious and modest individuals are still aware of it is apparent from the way they change the pronounciation of the terms in question.

Licentious expressions are never considered indecent and shock no one when they are uttered in a group or during group activities. [571] Such activities include communal fishing and hunting expeditions, [61] drinking parties, dances, funerals, and -- at the present time -- communal work on a road, a resthouse, etc.

Thus we see that in these matters there is a remarkable discretion side by side with a certain degree of tolerance, which may be carried quite far. Licentious remarks are not condemned in themselves, but only because of fortuitous circumstances, so we see that the Nkundɔ́ do not consider them from a moral point of view, as we do, but from a social one. But the fact that those are precisely the words which can become indecent and socially bad shows that the native sees in their content something shocking, shameful, some quality likely to give offense. The freedom exercised in certain cases does not alter this general conclusion but simply gives evidence of he inclinations of a passionate nature.

3. Dances

Nkundɔ́ dances change periodically, as is the fashion in Europe. Old dances are given up after a time and are replaced by others which are newly invented or recently introduced. The dances fashionable at the present time came from the Besongɔ́, who are by 535 far the most inventive tribe. All the dances have two distinguishable parts: the dance strictly speaking and the finale or ikɔ́eyo. The latter consists of acrobatic exhibitions or a theatrical performance. It varies with each performance and sometimes goes beyond the limits of decency, especially in certain scenes of the women's dances. Here everything depends on the attitude of the actors and spectators.

535 786 [553] The words sung are usually proper. Passages that may be less so occur only exceptionally. The exclamations of some of the male or female dancers, but mostly those of the audience when the intensity of the performance reaches a climax, are somewhat less innocent. Thus this climax [62] is the weak spot morally speaking. This is true especially of the dances performed by the women who, led on by their passion and encouraged by the cheering and applause of the spectators, make provocative movements (bitɛ́kɔ́, bembɔ́njo). A European will see nothing wrong, but the native knows the gestures and their meaning. The spectators then applaud with even greater enthusiasm, either because of sexual feelings or out of aesthetic enjoyment, for to them these movements are beautiful. All the artistic dances for women which are the fashion at the present time contain a similar phase of exaggerated excitement. It is therefore understandable that in the past the elders strictly forbade children and adolescents to attend these dances.

[586] After what has just been said, no one will be astonished to hear that these great dances are often the cause of adultery and divorce. And to a limited extent the same can be said for the men's dances, for masculine beauty is exhibited in an enticing manner.

573 535 The rhythmic motions which sometimes accompany singing during drinking parties cannot really be called dances; nothing shocking is implied by them and the words of the songs are seldom improper. Salacious songs are rarely sung in the course of daily living, but they are never omitted from funeral ceremonies.

535 [illegible] Up to now we have spoken of artistic dances, which are always very popular. They were -- and are -- reserved for certain special occasions. For ordinary circumstances the Nkundɔ́ have a few little entertaining dances which have nothing at all in common with the dance as such. They are more like games. The lyrics of the songs

535 may be ribald, but this occurs rather rarely. However, at the present 177 time, they are often actually obscene -- especially since "European-831 style" dancing has been introduced, and more particularly in the centers, small and large, and among those who have come under [63] its influence. This kind of dancing for amusement is chiefly practiced by young people.

To the credit of morality it should be noted that mixed dancing is unknown to strictly native ways. It occurs in the centers (in the form of the mixed bofenya or the baliñga, grotesque imitations of European dances) but is spreading -- and rapidly -- to the villages of the interior. The second variety especially raises havoc, for it has a deleterious influence on morality. It has been the cause of a number of cases of adultery, divorce, palavers, and quarrels, and has been forbidden by certain chiefs and headmen, who would like to be able to severely punish anyone who dances it.

Conclusion

834 The data presented in the foregoing section forces us to conclude that sexual modesty does exist among the Nkundó. The wearing of clothing, the various prohibitions, the attitude of the older and wiser members of the community show that they experience this feeling. It is the same here as elsewhere. In certain areas it is even carried to an extreme. The exceptions should be attributed to individual deviations; and because of the reactions they provoke, they even provide conclusive evidence. The general laxity which may be observed on some special occasions does not provide material for a serious objection against the existence of modesty. Yet it is difficult to determine the reason for such an attitude which seems to contradict the rest of our data. Should it be interpreted as a yielding to human weakness, or seen as a weakening of public morality? Or is it not rather because these special circumstances make an unfavorable interpretation of such actions impossible? An allusion made in public, in a group, [64] does not have the same significance as that same allusion may have between two people, where it implies a suspicious intimacy.

178 It goes without saying that the feeling of sexual modesty and its various manifestations among these people are being transformed by two different currents. On the one hand, their moral laxity is increased by their contact with all sorts of other peoples, by a greater freedom, by the partial emancipation of women, and by the attraction of the large centers and their luxury. On the other hand, there is the preaching of Christian morality, although its effects are still very slight and certainly do not counterbalance the influences mentioned above.

Article II. Preparation for Sexual Life

1. The Woman's preparation

When a girl wishes to indulge in pleasures of the flesh, she prepares her sexual organs in advance. The preparation itself consists of "opening the way" (lifola mbɔ̌ka). This operation, which is repeated several times, is performed in hiding, preferably in the forest. The girl may or may not have companions with her who share her intentions. Each girl operates on herself. In order to gradually enlarge the organ, a girl uses progressively thicker shoots of the [824] bosɛ́ɛnga or bokaakɔ́ plant (Costus afer), making sure first to remove the tip. Later these shoots are replaced by the lombɔ́lɛ́ fruit of the boɔ̌ombɔ́ plant (Aframomum) or, more infrequently, by a young manioc tuber.

This is the general practice; exceptions are few or nonexistent. It is followed because the girls want the event to which they aspire to occur without difficulty (bɛ́lota bɛ́fɔ́v'ɔ̌keela).

515 In addition to this basic preparation, girls [65] also wash the private parts of their bodies. This is a cleanliness measure which they continue to practice save in exceptional cases for the rest of their lives. According to my informants, the native woman -- as a very general rule -- stresses this cleanliness as much for herself as for the sake of not repelling her husband or lover. When a girl begins to practice this personal hygiene, it is a sign that she wants to begin her sexual life.

856 864 During a girl's early childhood beginning when she is still nursing, a mother with foresight will work to make her organs as perfect as possible. By applying pressure repeatedly and for long periods, she molds, so to speak, the outside in order to make it narrow, as this quality is greatly valued by our people.

It is the mother, too, who trains the girl in her preparations for married life. She teaches her how to behave toward her future husband, and at the same time instructs her in the duties of a good housewife (see Chapter X, Article VIII).

836 864 Certain forms of behavior, although their relationship to our subject is only superficial and external, must nevertheless be mentioned. An adult man will often take in his arms a little girl who has not yet been weaned, or perhaps only slightly more developed. He considers this child to be his wife. He has paid no bride price for her. But since she is a sister, cousin, or other relative of one of his wives, she is a "wife" from his point of view; that is, not only will it be possible for him to marry her later on, but even without becoming her husband he will enjoy a certain liberty in relation to her. (1) Thus, when such a man takes his young "wife" in his arms, he is enjoying an anticipation of the future and speaks to her [66] in that sense, often accompanying his words with intimate caresses.

1. See Chapter VI, Article V, 2.

The same practice, mutatis mutandis, may be observed on the part of a woman toward a small boy whom she can consider as her "husband."

304 582 2. Circumcision

Circumcision is generally practiced. It is usually performed at an early age. Without going into the details at this point (1) or

1. They will be found in Chapter X, Article VII.

304 582 wishing to commit myself on the reason for this custom, it is a fact that a Nkundŏ woman will refuse to marry a man who has not been circumcised. Consequently, all the natives want to undergo this operation. That is the reply given by the natives when we asked about the reason for circumcision. When we pushed the inquiry further, they added that the women abhor the deposits that form under the foreskin. I mention this explanation for what it's worth. Nevertheless, this may really be the reason that impels them.

In any case circumcision would seem to have no religious or initiatory significance.

3. Tattooing

304 932

Two kinds of tattoos exist among the Nkundŏ: purely ornamental tattoos and sexual tattoos. (2) The latter are to be found only on women. The [67] designs are located on portions of the body surrounding the sex organs and even on the outside of the latter.

---

[619] 2. I will not discuss tribal tattoos because these do not seem to exist among the Nkundŏ. The reasons for tattooing vary from people to people and from group to group. It is for this reason that they are a distinctive mark. But that does not mean that such is their purpose. The distinctions apparent among the tattoos of various tribes are not an objective but a consequence, as are, for example, the variations among national costumes in Europe. Moreover, the contacts of our people in peace or war have extended by and large only to neighboring clans or tribes, who use the same type of ornamentation as they did. And in these encounters dialect differences serve as a much better means of identification.

832 What brings the Nkundó to practice this second form of tattooing? First of all the following considerations must be taken into account: since a woman is by nature more eager than the man to appear beautiful, it seems altogether appropriate that her tattoos should be more abundant, more elaborate than the man's And since coquetry is a form of the desire to appeal to the opposite sex and since members of the latter are susceptible to it, the tattoos attract them. Therefore, too, the women's tattoos have been most elaborated on those parts of her body which are nearest the sex organs.

The reason for the existence of these tattoos may be that they add additional pleasure to intercourse. (1) This explanation does not seem entirely implausible. I have never been able to obtain a clear-cut or direct confirmation of this point, but it is a fact that a man sometimes makes malicious remarks to his wife if she is not sufficiently tattooed to his taste ("You, your body is as smooth as a man's"). This fact lends considerable validity to the explanation given. The persistence of these tattoos in spite of modern dress also makes it convincing, although the evidence is not entirely conclusive, considering that its significance is not diminished by the psychological explanation that follows.

The figures are placed in such a way that they converge toward the sex organ. Moreover, the men see the tattooing at some time or other, either in its entirety or in part. Clothing may cover them more or less, but at some time for one reason or another the woman uncovers them, if only partially. [68] The imagination works on what is seen and quite naturally arouses sexual desire. The accuracy of this psychological explanation can be verified even in Europe; one is tempted particularly by what one has only glimpsed,

1. This is the explanation given, for example, by Dr. J. Maes in Notes sur les Populations des Bassins du Kasai, de la Lukenie et du lac Léopold II (Notes Concerning the Peoples of the Kasai and Lukenie Basins and of Lake Leopold II), p. 189 ff.

304 832 and "modern" fashions, as well as some ancient ones, take this into account. In the next paragraph, moreover, we will note ananalogous phenomenon.

Both of the explanations given can be defended, since each has its value. But it seems to me preferable not to oppose them but rather to bring them together, as they probably are in the thinking of the native.

It should also be noted that a man never performs the operation of making a sexual tattoo on a woman, although a woman may indeed operate on a man. And finally it should be mentioned that the [831] specific terms designating these tattoos are considered as obscenities.

The practice of tattooing is decreasing at the present time. [178] Many boys are already without tattoos. But very few girls lack them; among them the fad has not disappeared. Some even have themselves tattooed without the knowledge of their parents and in spite of their opposition. Among the Blacks, as everywhere in the world, fashion is deeply rooted because it is natural. But the designs of the tattoos are now becoming smaller. It seems to me that this change is due, not to a reaction against tattooing as such, but rather to a modification of the style. For tattooing is a real fashion, and like all fashions it is subject to change and development. Nowadays there is a tendency to imitate the designs of other peoples of the Congo. Elsewhere, as among the Injóló, for example, an internal evolution may be observed, although it is occurring under foreign influence. The evolution is taking place chiefly in the face motifs, while those of the body are beginning to be omitted. But the sexual tattoos do not seem to be disappearing. [69]

4. Bead Belts

291/ 901/ 832 From an early age the Nkundó child is adorned with a belt of trading beads. Before the coming of the Europeans this decoration made its appearance only towards puberty and was restricted to girls. Nowadays, many men also adorn themselves in this manner. And since it is now easier to obtain the beads, women are no longer with a single string but wear several in assorted colors. They add smaller ones below the knee.

291/301/832 According to what I have been told, this type of ornament may also have a sexual significance. Normally -- and this statement is applicable only to the present time -- the beads are entirely covered by clothing and are visible only on a few occasions. If a large number of strings (as many as six, eight, or ten) or very many beads are worn, attention may be attracted to them because there will be a bulge in the clothing worn over them. Their sound will reveal their presence during a race or a dance. And according to my informants, that is enough to awaken passion. Making an allusion to the beads and especially touching them deliberately is considered as an invitation. For her part, a woman sometimes rubs them together in her fingers so that they will make their characteristic noise and thus attract a man's attention and arouse his interest.

The preceding does not mean that simply the wearing of the beads is necessarily intended for a bad purpose. Not only must such an intention be excluded in the case of serious persons, especially if they are elderly and content themselves with wearing a single string, seldom a second one to support the first. But there is also the possi-
[152] bility that a young Black beauty may adorn herself with ten or more strands out of sheer vanity, so that the whole world may see that she has so many. [70]

Furthermore, it has been shown that attention to appearance is not necessarily directed to another person. Though that may be generally true, many people like to dress for the pleasure of being well dressed, and girls who never dream of an adventure may still enjoy wearing pretty undergarments. This desire for adornment for its own sake can, no doubt, explain the belts, as well as other embellishments on more than one Nkundó woman.

We should add that those who adhere to the theory that the tattoos have an immediate sexual influence could apply such a theory here as well.

302 831 5. Depilation

All Nkundó of both sexes practice depilation of the genital organs and even the armpits. The natives believe that the hair growing 302 under the arms is related to sexuality and give it the same name as 831 they use for their pubic hair.

A person removes his or her own hair, or it is removed by a friend of the same sex. Formerly, the hairs were simply pulled out. Nowadays, many people shave with a lotóɔ. Moreover the practice tends to be confined to the hair connected with sexuality, but in the past everything was removed: eyebrows, eyelashes, mustaches, beards.

For the Nkundó hair removal is a form of beauty care. Their 302 explanation must be accepted, though the term "beauty care" must be broadly defined so that it will include also the depilation of parts of the body that are always hidden. This last form however, might have some relation to the tattoos: it makes tattooing easier and its effect more obvious. [71]

Article III. Prostitution

The dictionary defines prostitution as follows: "a trade which 548 consists in providing one's body for the pleasures of the public in exchange for money." In addition to this limited sense, the most important aspect of which is "in exchange for money," the word also has several broader meanings.

Prostitution is found in the world in various forms: 1) the kept woman, 2) the brothel, 3) the professional streetwalker, 4) the occasional streetwalker, 5) the married woman who has a steady relationship with a lover who pays her, 6) the woman who is the concubine of a number of men in succession and who is paid by each of them. We will examine the forms under which this misconduct has occurred and occurs among the Nkundó.

The first question we should ask is whether a Nkundó woman gave herself to a man for profit before the European occupation. It is true that a woman often demanded remuneration but, as we have already said, it is very difficult to determine whether she did so for gain or simply to be reassured of her lover"s affection. Knowing the mentality of the Nkundó woman of today, we must admit that her greed sometimes brings her to acts of venal love. One or another of them has no doubt given her body in order to possess various 548 ornaments or objects for her toilette (hairpins, for example), and it is probable therefore that individual cases of this sort occurred. But it is altogether unlikely that the practice was widespread, as it does not fit in with the economic organization of this people, among whom wealth is more or less collectively owned and, moreover, (as will be shown in Chapter VI, Article II) a woman has no property rights. [72] Therefore we can assume that there were only a few occasional prostitutes.

On the other hand, there have never been any professional prostitutes; that is, Nkundɔ́ women have never made a job out of prostitution, and the same thing may be said of the other forms listed above.

The number of prostitutes was necessarily limited, however, by the fact that the great majority of women were always married young (Chapter IV, Article I), and that adultery was severely punished (Chapter VI, Article VII).

Nevertheless, there is something which superficially resembles prostitution; that is, there is a category of girls and women whom at first glance one would be tempted to call prostitutes. Therefore it would be useful to examine the situation somewhat more closely, for though in itself it is entirely different from prostitution, it could easily lend itself to it.

882
It sometimes happens that a girl, besides the bolɔ́mbɔ́ (a socio-political institution in no way related to the degeneration of female sexuality), is kept in the home of her parents beyond the customary age before she is given in marriage. Such a girl is called ɛ́fɔ́tswâàla, "the one who does not marry." She is not bolɔ́mbɔ́. Externally or -- to use philosophical terminology -- materially, the two customs resemble each other; but formally they are entirely different. Creating a bolɔ́mbɔ́ involves authority and influence and is thus a public matter. Whether a girl becomes an ɛ́fɔ́tswâàla, on the other hand, is a private matter between father and daughter. While the creation of a bolɔ́mbɔ́ is accompanied by public feasts and a decree officially proclaimed (boɛ́ko) by the father and accepted by the council of family heads [73], the establishment of a ɛ́fɔ́tswâàla involves no official act or ceremony.

548 The name éfótswâála does not mean that the girl will stay 582 single all her life. Her marriage is not permanently excluded; it is 882 only postponed.

As for her behaviour, the efótswâála conducts herself like any Nkundó girl. Nothing distinguishes her from her companions. If a good match is proposed to her, she marries like everyone else.

This custom -- if one can use the term -- therefore has no real connection with prostitution. All that can be said is that the girl who stays single longer and until adulthood, is exposed to more libertinism and a life of debauchery.

It also happens that parents who are angry because their 586x daughter has dissolved a marriage to a man they consider a good son-in-law prevent her from remarrying in an effort to make her return to her legitimate husband. If the parents and their child each hold to their viewpoint without yielding, such a situation can go on for many months until the wife is -- practically speaking -- no longer under the authority of her husband. And since the opposition of her parents prevents her from being married by another man, she easily comes to give herself to all. It should be added that at present this case is chiefly hypothetical. Parents no longer have the authority [178] to thwart the desires of an adult daughter in this way; if she is stubborn they have to yield out of fear that she will run far away. And that would be to go from the frying pan into the fire. But in the past the kind of situation I have described was not unusual.

The most fertile places for the breeding and development of 548 prostitution are to be sought in the centers. The following principal 369 causes can be given:

1) Female vanity is overexcited by the sight [74] of all the dazzling riches which have been imported by white men and which are such a temptation to Negro women. It requires a considerable income to satisfy this desire to enhance one's native beauty. Ordinary laborers and artisans do not earn enough money to satisfy their wives or daughters in this respect. Mistresses of Europeans or of foreign black men, the wives of "clerks" and other representatives of Negro high society display a degree of luxury startling and striking to the rest.

548 2) There is a considerable excess of bachelors over eligible women.

[586] 4) The difficulty of finding a suitable husband experienced by many girls born in the centers. Marriages between individuals belonging to different groups (especially certain ones) seldom last. And since inhabitants of the centers have no fixed or stable residence, they intend sooner or later to go back to their tribe of origin. Serious-minded parents therefore discourage and thwart these "mixed" marriages. (1)

1. On this subject, read Jadot's fine page in Blancs et Noirs au Congo Belge [Whites and Blacks in the Belgian Congo], p. 132, beginning: "La prostitution devait inevitablement . . . (Prostitution was inevitably . . .).

[361] In the region under discussion there are only a few lightly populated centers: plantations, government or business stations, and small commercial centers. From time to time the bachelors there satisfy their desires with the wives of their fellow workers, and especially with women who come from the interior to sell their products at market. But they do not avoid one of the consequences of prostitution, namely the spreading of venereal diseases.

It is possible to conclude that in the past prostitution existed only in a very broad sense [75] and there was very little of it. In [114] Engel's article, "Les Wangata" op. cit., he writes that among the Wangata "prostitution no longer exists." If the eminent author is using the term according to the meaning in the dictionary, we may ask on what basis he is implicitly stating that this institution existed in the past. If prostitution is broadly defined, then the facts contradict his remark, for actually it has not ceased to develop among the tribes he discussed, who are located very close to the city of Coquilhatville and its various suburbs.

548 The fact of colonization has greatly changed the situation.
178 The freedom of communication across great distances, the introduction of new and varied goods and especially of money, have had a great influence on the development of prostitution. The economic system of the people remains the same; but when the women are away from their families or their husbands, they spend their means at their own discretion. And, since the objects of adornment available to them have greatly increased, they have a personal incentive to engage in immoral conduct.

The vice has not therefore taken on European forms; modern changes have simply increased -- but in enormous proportions -- the number of occasional streetwalkers. The development of this state of affairs is encouraged by the procuring activities of certain polygamous and even monogamous men living near European centers, which give rise to the attitude of their wives. For though the husband may reap the primary financial benefit, the wife is not deprived of her little gain, and her native cupidity easily pushes her to engage without scruple in commercializing her body.

837 The women under discussion are usually married. Often they 548 have a recognized lover among the laborers in the camps, and he usually pays for their faithfulness. Thus we arrive at the married woman with a regular paying lover. [76]

This form of prostitution has developed even outside laborers' camps. It is to be found among the people on the river banks, who are more in contact with the Whites and their people and in the neighboring villages. It is especially prevalent among the Beloko, fairly near Coquilhatville, where it is spreading even among wives of monogamists. This perversion takes root all the more rapidly because it has a certain resemblance to the ancestral custom of a recognized concubinage (see Chapter VI, Article VIII, 2) and like the latter, it often does not take the form of prostitution. That is to say, the illicit relationship is not engaged in for the sake of gain. Furthermore, an arrangement is often made with the husband.

[369] As to the other forms of prostitution listed, they are still unknown in the native villages and in the small centers located in the territory studied. Some of them, however, may develop in the fairly near future.

548 In a center like Coquilhatville there are loose women who live in concubinage, first with one man and then another, a few days or weeks with this one, then the same length of time with that one; they are paid by each man but refuse to give up their freedom permanently. It is true that this city is outside the geographical limits of our study, but since it is located close to Nkundó territory and is important to them, I have touched on it briefly. No brothels are to be found there, and one does not encounter professional streetwalkers except for a few women who solicit among ship's crews. Most of the prostitutes in Coquilhatville are single girls or divorcées (legally or in fact). This disguised form of prostitution is not regulated here as it is in Leopoldville. (1) Nevertheless, the [77] government recognizes, at least in practice, the existence of a class of "free women" present in considerable numbers. Their way of life is contagious to such a degree that -- to an extent which varies greatly -- a noticeable number of girls who live with their parents but aspire to luxury have been seduced by it. (1)

1. In the capital all native women who are adult and able bodied and who theoretically are living alone are taxed 50 francs (the certificates of payment show, in addition to other information, the number, name and address of the person taxed). This tax is not the equivalent of a permit to engage in licentious behavior or libertinism. It is not called a "prostitution tax" or any equivalent name, but some Europeans call it that because it has that appearance.

In addition there is a real regulation concerning prostitution; it is the Governor General's order of November 5, 1913, which establishes cards and periodical sanitary examinations for prostitutes. It would seem to be applied in Matadi, Leopoldville, and Elisabethville.

1. According to the latest figures

549 available to me, the government recognizes the presence of 702 free women out of a population of 8,386 persons who are not permanent residents.

Article IV. Premarital Sexuality

836 Under this heading we will examine:

1. What the Nkundó think about virginity.
2. Relations between single people.
3. The Nkundó's attitude toward births outside of wedlock.

1. Virginity

The word "virginity" has a double meaning. It may signify the presence of the hymen, the wholeness of the body, or it may have the meaning given in the dictionary: "virgin, a girl who has never had intercourse with a man."

Because of the practice described in Article II, 1, Nkundó girls who remain physically virgin until adulthood are extremely rare. Even if a girl does not begin sexual life until after her body has reached maturity -- a situation which occurs rarely today but which was formerly common, (2) [78] she will not give herself up to carnal pleasures until after she has broken her hymen.

836 What is the Nkundó attitude toward virginity? This question must be divided into two parts:

1) Does the future husband attach any importance to the physical virginity of his fiancée? Evidently not from what we have seen.

2) Does he attach any importance to her moral virginity? That is, is it a matter of indifference to him whether or not he is the first to have intercourse with her?

2. See no. 2 of the present article.

585 836 To say that it makes absolutely no difference to him might be too extreme a statement. But it is certainly not very important to him, since the primary purpose of his marriage is to obtain progeny and to follow his natural instinct in an honest fashion. This does not mean that he likes to marry a woman of loose morals; quite the contrary.

171 585 836 What is the linguistic data on the subject of virginity? In an interesting paper entitled "The Principles of Bantu Marriage" (Africa Vol. 2, No. 3 (1929), p. 255), E. Torday says, "Some of the most competent philologists assure us that in most Bantu languages there is no word for 'virgin'; . . . . The Wachagga, who may be an exception, use the word 'unimpaired,' and it is perhaps in the use of similar expressions, not exclusively applied to physical virginity, that we shall find the explanation of the absence of a specific term."

585 836 192 Thus the Lonkundó have a noun: ekâté. It is derived from the root kât (the verb is -kâtema), which means "to be firmly attached, to be tenacious" (e.g., lokâtú, "tenacity"). Ekâté designates something which is difficult to open, to separate, to break up, especially fruit with a tough, hard, thick rind. It is applied to the litófé, lisénjá, and the lindongó when it is impossible to break the shell which contains the edible portion even though the fruit is ripe. [79] This term is used in a figurative sense for a woman who resists seduction, who "does not allow herself to be opened." It is not at all specific and in no way the equivalent of our word "virginity," rather it seems to signify "chastity."

Other Nkundó tribes seem to have a specific word, bokotó. I learned this term from natives living between the Ikelemba and the Tshuapa, both east and west of the Julé, as well as from some Basékâ Bǒngwalanga from the old Lulonga District. The missionaries of the Apostolic Prefecture of Basankusu use it in their publications to mean "virginity, virgin." I was not able to get an exact idea of its precise meaning, but as far as I was able to make out it is much closer to "virgin chastity" than ekâté. In any case it includes no reference to physical virginity. (1)

1. We should not be astonished that "primitive" tribes have no word in their language

000 which specifically expresses our idea of virginity, nor deduce from its absence that the thing itself is unknown to them. The Greeks and Romans were well acquainted with it, yet they had no precise word for it. Parthenos and Virgo mean simply "unmarried girl." The Germanic words such as Maagd and Jungfrau, which now signify "virgin," originally had the same meaning as the Greek and Latin terms.

585 836 The foregoing does not imply that every Nkundó girl is free to have sexual relations and that public opinion approves of libertinism among single people. We will examine this question in the following paragraphs.

896 164 2. Sexual relations between single people

In dealing with this question we must distinguish between relations between adults and the contacts between nonadults. We will therefore examine the two situations separately so that at the end we can attempt to explain the changes in native attitudes in this realm that have occurred. [80]

A. Before physical maturity. We will first relate what the natives tell about customary practices in the past, and then describe the practices of the present day.

In the past, sexual contacts between young people not yet marriageable were severely punished by their parents. The children were taught that those who were guilty would be struck down by a very serious illness which was inevitably fatal. This illness was called by the generic term ndota (1), and the more specific one, esɛ́mbɛ́ji.

1. Ndota is the name of the illness which is the punishment for an infraction of a sexual

864 prohibition under any circumstances. I have heard these same terms used also by the natives in the vicinity of Coquilhatville.

The body becomes flabby and without strength, and this weakness ends in a fatal paralysis (byongɛ nnyǎnyuka or nkatɛɛnɛ). In addition, the girls feared that their sexual organs, not yet fully formed, would be torn. They were also imbued with a very intense fear: bɔfɔlu w'aende, "the fear of males," bɔfɔlu w'ǎmato, "the fear of females." They also feared death -- bɛlotɛkɛ iwɛ. The parents added that sexual acts were free from danger only between persons of the requisite age.

838 This does not mean that children did not commit indecent acts. The game of ioto, in which little girls try to cook (and which is always one of their favorite games (2) as it probably is throughout the world), often gave rise to it. Small boys joined in the game in order to taste the meal. And quite naturally they began to play at "husband and wife," more or less. Often this game involved only innocent imitations, but other times touching and exhibitions occurred between children of the same sex or of opposite sexes. This game is far more dangerous nowadays, [81] because of a change in the attitude of young people toward sexual matters.

The game of yembankongo, in which boys, imitating monkeys, chase each other through the trees and creepers can -- and does - result in reprehensible scenes.

178 In former times most girls were married before puberty. But their husbands did not touch them until they had completed their normal development.

582
839
864 Among some individuals the fear of sexual relations was so deeply rooted that it persisted even beyond the age limit and was

582 conquered only by repeated assaults of passion. Thus it is generally 833 known among the natives that young women used to seek refuge in 864 their mother's house when the husband wanted to begin making use of his rights as a husband. The mother would try to persuade her daughter to submit to the law of life. But sometimes, if her child seemed too resistant, the mother made excuses for her and asked the husband to consider her daughter's youth. The man usually wanted to remain on good terms with his mother-in-law so he did not insist and resigned himself to waiting till nature influenced the spirit and heart of his wife.

Since young people were brought up in deep fear of dangerous relations, it should not surprise us that this feeling became a real habit and did not disappear spontaneously the moment a certain degree of liberty was permitted. As a matter of fact, could we not make similar observations in Europe?

This is the natural explanation for the praiseworthy degree of morality among adolescents in the past.

Nowadays all that has changed. The young people follow 178 where their passions lead them. Not the slightest check is placed on 836 their impulses. Parents pay only slight attention to the conduct of 864 their children. [82] It is better not to inquire into the morality of modern youth. Husbands no longer respect the bodies of their adolescent brides, who are themselves quite used to a sexual life and eagerly look forward to it; and no longer know the feeling of "the fear of men." Should we then be astonished at the frightening de-[164] crease in the birth rate (1) and the ever increasing spread of venereal diseases, which seem to have been unknown in the past?

The reasons for this change will be investigated further on, under the letter C.

836 B. Between adults. Here the Nkundó are very lenient. There is a difference, however, between the socio-legal and moral viewpoints, although as we shall see the latter is influenced by the former.

[562] A woman is entirely free, legally speaking, as long as the first payment on her bride price has not been made. No man has

1. The natives say that in the past young wives quickly became pregnant. And now ...

562 936 [539] exclusive rights over her. Hence the proverb: Mbímbo ìle nd'âns'bimbo ífa la nkɔ́lɔ́, "boimbo fruit found under the tree have no owner; they belong to the first person who gathers them." Thus a girl for whom nothing has been paid belongs to no one. A woman free in this manner does not infringe on the rights of any man in her sexual relations. There are therefore no sanctions against her licentiousness.

936 864 Furthermore, the discovery of her activities gives rise to no shame. At most more serious parents will rebuke children who go too far -- the girls because they abuse the body and reduce their value for a prospective marriage (2), the boys because they [83] run the risk of financial difficulties (the dangers of adultery, indemnity for childbirth with death as a result, etc.).

626 936 Public opinion is even more lenient than the parents. This attitude is easy to understand: strangers need fear no unpleasant consequences. Errors of this sort are generally considered natural weaknesses, provided that they do not occur too frequently. For public opinion is hard on people who run from one to another; they are stigmatized with the name ebɔ́bɔ́, "unfaithful, flighty, without intelligence or reasoning powers," or ebɔ́ngɔ́, a stronger term with the same meaning.

936 From all the foregoing should we deduce that every woman is free to indulge fully in fornication? On the basis of the above considerations we could frankly conclude the affirmative. The behavior that can be observed from day to day fully confirms this answer. Some people stray more or less accidentally, but for others the practice quickly becomes a habit. And it can be said of all of them that [585] 2. Not that a smaller bride price would be given for them. But a serious man would rather not take a woman for wife who has "run around" a great deal and therefore is more likely to commit adultery, to be unfaithful, and less likely to become the mother of a numerous progeny.

836 they succumb to any favorable opportunity. The validity of this generalization is not affected by extremely rare exceptions which may be encountered and which are due either to a constitutional abnormality or to an extraordinarily firm Christian conviction. How should 836 178 these observations be reconciled with the statement so often heard from natives that the situation was entirely different before the coming of the white men? It was not unusual to see young women not only abstaining from sexual relations but having such a "fear of men" that they drove away seducers and defended their chastity by hitting them with a stick.

When the woman did not accept the young man's proposition, she considered it a grave insult. The initiator was entitled to no indemnity "for blows and wounds." The woman replied only in violent terms, in word or act. [84] Often she went and insulted the mother of the guilty party. When the latter was told the reason for this behavior, she could only turn on her misbehaving son and usually gave him a good talking to; if he was young enough she gave him a good beating. Thus the girl had every right to defend herself.

If the provocation gave rise to no complications in family or society, the parents paid a lot less attention. [864] But they tried to teach their children discretion in these dangerous matters, though their instruction primarily took the form of a lesson after an error was committed, or sometimes apropos of an incident that had befallen someone else. Some parents were very severe. These attitudes were based on a vague sense of morality which was not deduced from philosophical reasoning or religious or superstitious ideas but which was innate and instinctive so to speak. In addition, the fear of excesses and eventual social consequences no doubt also played a considerable [577] role. Excesses were feared above all, and an isolated occurrence was regarded more or less as a momentary weakness.

To form an accurate picture of the situation that existed in the past, we must not lose sight of the fact that, because of very early marriages, the number of young single women was necessarily limited.

The attitude toward single men was more lenient than toward 562 836 girls, unless their behavior had any consequences and apart from the danger of their actions becoming habitual, leading inevitably to palavers.

174/836 C. An attempt to explain the modern changes. The facts themselves as much as a knowledge of human nature, together with the lenient attitude of parents and the lack of sanctions (the last two points are relevant only to relations between adults), are in direct contradiction to the statements of the natives. Should these not therefore be explained as exaggerations, stemming from a desire for national glory and a resentment of the situation created by colonization? The [124] natives whose strange assertions I have cited are elderly and serious; they demonstrate all the qualities of truthful witnesses. But are they not -- perhaps unconsciously -- laudatores temporis acti? I thought so for a long time and never allowed their statements to carry any weight. I have discussed this question over and over again, not with one or two natives, but with dozens of the most serious and sincere people, under various circumstances and in regions far removed from one another. Yet all supported the same argument, and I could never make my point of view prevail. I always received the same reply: "You Whites are not willing to believe us when we tell you what we know better than you, what is the pure truth. You are so involved in your own point of view!" Finally, before so much formal testimony -- uniform, unchanging, repeated ad nauseum in such varied circumstances as to individuals, times, and places -- my attachment to my own idea began, with some regret, to falter.

But how is it possible to resolve the contradiction between a rather broad liberty and the practice of chastity? And above all how can less than fifty years have sufficed to transform any attachment to virginity into licentiousness? The difficulty presents itself for relations between adults, but it is especially great with respect to reprehensible contacts between nonadults, because of the terrible sanction that we have described above.

The first objection may be partially met if we take into account the habit of "the fear of men," which is acquired and maintained through the severe prohibition against sexual relations before physical maturity and the terrible punishment with which the transgressor is threatened. [86]

The second objection on the other hand is much more serious. It is the one which above all has always kept me from accepting the

174 thesis of the natives. This is how it is refuted by those who contradict 136 me: "When the first black soldiers and their assistants, archers, and [175] spear carriers were sent by the Whites to conquer us, they committed all sorts of atrocities and permitted themselves all the licentious acts that occurred to them. Among other things they took advantage of young girls, even those who were not nubile. They required immature girls to engage in sexual intercourse. They even went so far as to force people to commit incest, uniting mother and son, father and daughter, pointing a gun at their breasts. (1)

1. The fact that the soldiers required that immature girls be delivered over to them, because they were afraid of venereal diseases, is still notorious.

These accusations are so shocking and repugnant that one refuses to admit their veracity. Yet it is possible that they correspond to reality. For one thing, the informants are entirely reliable. For another, the account is internally consistent. As a matter of fact, scenes of the sort described seemed to have occurred at the beginning of almost all colonizations. Their authors were usually the natives of other regions rather than Whites (in our area Europeans were almost entirely absent from the first contacts between the inhabitants and the new power). By the nature of things anything can be expected at such a time. For occupations are carried out under martial law. And everyone is aware that war unleashes the human beast which -- as even contemporary history abundantly shows -- is capable of worse and more repugnant excesses.

It is possible to object to all this for, if the assertions of the natives are true, the events they describe did not give rise to a practice of incest and, consequently, need not have given rise to the far-reaching changes which we have observed. [87] But the two situations are entirely different. For licentious behavior between single people is more or less consistent with the passionate tendencies of human nature, which were mostly checked by the fear of a sanction -- a terrible sanction, it is true, but it was shown in fact to be nonexistent. Incest, 174 836 on the other hand, is extremely repugnant by nature, especially for the Nkundŏ. It is a vice which comes about only as a result of special beliefs or through a fundamental degeneration of sexuality.

The breaking up of the framework of traditional organization may furnish a partial explanation in this realm as in many others. In the case of sexual relations between single adults, it might even be deemed sufficient. As much may be said about greed, vanity, the desire for ostentation and display. These are very natural sentiments in a woman, and they were greatly stimulated by the dazzling riches imported from Europe. But these facts are not sufficient in themselves to account for everything. They are especially and entirely inadequate in explaining the considerable changes in the relations between immature children, and we are thus forced to accept the explanation given by serious natives.

3. Children born out of wedlock

848 Among the Nkundŏ, giving birth to a child outside of wedlock has never from time immemorial been considered a grave misdemeanor. It is not considered criminal, as ethnographers say it is among many other African peoples.

Furthermore, this attitude logically follows from the liberty permitted to adolescents, as described above. Neither the woman nor her lover are harassed or punished as a result. On the contrary, the grandparents joyfully receive the child, who adds to the size, power, and wealth of the clan. [88] For an illegitimate child (entombŏ) (1) 598 614 does not belong to its natural father. It is incorporated into the mother's family. It is said that he is born without a father. His

(1) Such a child is also known as bona ŏa wanĕ, "child of the sunlight," or bona ŏa bomlamboka, "child of the highway" or "of a girl of the streets." Among the Bombomba the term bokelankŏlo is also heard.

848 614 posterity constitute a separate family in the clan of his maternal ancestors; it is called jwǒmoto or etóo éy'ǒnankáná (that is, the patrilineal posterity of the sister's son). Families and clans that have originated in this manner are not particularly rare in this region. One may even find an entire village born in this manner. Thus, Mbelé of the Bombwanja-Boéndé is the etóo éy'ǒnankáná of Lileko. A more striking example is that of the Injóló tribe, descended from the sister of Nsimba and Eanga, who are respectively the ancestors of the Ntómbá and the Boléngé. Since the male ancestor is unknown, it is assumed that their origin is due to an extramarital conception by the mother, and that her son, Nkólóbisé, had no father. The same is true of the Wesé subtribe, bǒnankáná of the eldest subtribe Engónjó, as well as of the Ngombe subtribe, which is bǒnankáná of the Wesé.

It would be incorrect, however, to attribute the origin of all the "jwǒmoto" clans to illegitimate children, for they may have come into existence for other reasons. Thus it is known that the ancestors of certain clans were born of a legitimate union, but the bride price payment had not yet been completed. Then, as some sort of obstacle intervened, the relationship by marriage was broken, and the child was incorporated into the mother's clan. The obstacle which interrupts the bride price payment may be a disharmony between the engaged couple or their families, as in the case of the Baséká Etáléngela of the Bakáala; but it is more likely to be war or the migrations of the tribes at certain periods of their history. The latter reason may have separated more than one husband from a wife for whom he had only made an initial payment at the time her child was born.

848 The fact then that many "female" clans exist in a [89] region does not prove that illicit relationships between single people were common in the past -- especially if one also takes into account that pregnancies were formerly much more frequent than they are nowadays. It merely shows that such relationships did occur.

An illegitimate child is considered and treated by the maternal grandfather as if it were his own. No distinction is made between him and the legitimate children. He is in no way despised. He has a voice in family councils and deliberations. And since according to Nkundó notions his relationship to his first cousins is that of father to son, he 848 has precedence over them and can become head of the family after his grandfather and uncles. In his natural father's clan, on the other hand, he has nothing to say.

596 If a man pays the bride price for a girl who has had a child by him, he asks his father-in-law to let him have his illegitimate child. This wish is almost always granted. The father-in-law well understands his son-in-law's fatherly sentiment of love and considers it quite legitimate and proper that a father should himself possess the
x
[588] fruit of his own flesh. The only condition laid down is that because of the child the son-in-law must increase the amount of the bride price valuables by an extra slave or his equivalent. (1)

1. This transaction may even take place after the mother's death.

The father is not in a position to invoke any rights strictly speaking. The child is not considered as his because of his physical paternity, but only because of his father-in-law's kindness. If the latter were to refuse the father's request, he would not be acting in violation of justice. But his behavior would be considered as inhumane toward his daughter's husband and his grandson, and it would be criticized.

When a child is adopted by his natural father in this fashion, no one despises him for his illegitimate birth [90]. This procedure may therefore be considered to establish his legitimacy.

171 Nowadays, among the Beloko and their Elinga, the practice of "buying" the child has sprung up. That is, if a man does not marry a woman who has had a child by him, he pays her parents a certain amount in order to obtain the child. There does not seem to be much opposition to the introduction of this custom, which springs from an honorable feeling for paternity and its duties. Its only disadvantage is that in such a case the child may never claim any rights in his mother's clan. (1)

1. See Chapter VIII, Article IV.

585 If a stranger marries an unwed mother, he is never given the child, which remains in the mother's family. This situation is clearly distinguished from those mentioned above.

848 614 583 What happens is that when such a woman goes to live with her husband and her child is too young to remain with his grandparents, she takes him along. Later when the boy reaches adulthood, he sometimes settles with the clan of his mother's husband and produces a posterity. But he is more or less discredited by the adopting clan (and by the others). He has no political rights there, no mpifo. His posterity is called mbɔ́solɛ́ (from mbɔ́sa, "behind" and bolɛ́, "clan of origin"). (2) Its members may marry members of the adopting clan, excepting of course the descendants of their common mother. They also have their own cemetery. They thus form a separate clan within the village.

The practice of "bringing a child in the sling" seems to be disappearing at the present time, because everyone wants to remain in his own clan. Government policy deprives natives who do not live with their own families of almost all their rights. Moreover, [91] today it is much easier than in the past to procure the means for establishing a home. This last problem was certainly an important reason why a man would settle with the clan of his mother's husband.

848 684 The preceding clearly shows that a lover by whom an unmarried girl has a child incurs no blame, penalty, or fine. He has no obligation to care either for the mother or the child. Neither justice nor propriety requires him to marry the unwed mother. No indemnity is exacted.

There is only one exception: that is, if the mother dies as a result of the pregnancy or the delivery, or if the child is stillborn or born sickly, deformed, or crippled. In such cases the lover has to pay a heavy indemnity (mbɛlaka) (1) That is why an unmarried woman who is pregnant is pressed into giving the name of her accomplice as

2. They also say "he was brought in the sling," bôyɛ́lákɛ́ ndá lombɛ̌.

1. For the child, the indemnity goes up to 50 rings; for the mother, 50 rings and a slave (or his equivalent in currency), or 75 to 100 rings.

848 684 soon as her family becomes aware of her condition. The accomplice is made officially responsible and is required to accept this responsible and is required to accept this responsibility by publicly pledging his willingness to take all consequences upon himself. This pledge like all pledges is called ndanga. It consists of a knife, a ring of copper or brass, a spear, or similar objects. (2)

2. The same custom is practiced in the case of pregnancy resulting from adultery.

Article V. Sexual Intercourse

833 Although this subject is extremely delicate and therefore difficult to investigate and describe, it does not seem pointless to note here a few details with which I have become acquainted. We will discuss in succession a few circumstances relative to the act, then rape, and finally what are called incomplete acts. [92]

1. Circumstances relative to the act

[177] The Nkundó have intercourse lying on their sides. Nowadays, natives who have had frequent contacts with Whites are beginning to abandon the old manner for that of the Europeans. The spirit of imitation probably plays some part in the transformation which is beginning, but the gradual spread of the knowledge that the European system makes conception more likely is also a factor.

Even for illicit relations our natives seldom choose the forest or near-by palm or banana groves. Usually they prefer an isolated hut, or they take advantage of the absence of witnesses who might intrude on them. At night they are generally afraid of anything that stirs in the forest.

833 753 684 The Nkundó have sexual relations only during the night. To do so in the daytime would be to risk being striken by a mortal illness called bombilé (derived from mbilé "noon," by extension, "day"), 833 753 684 which has a strong resemblance to sleeping sickness. (1) One of its symptoms is a weakness of the lower limbs. Instances are cited of individuals who were unable to resist their passions and were punished in this manner. Apparently only the woman dies. As soon as her family discovers that she is stricken, the guilty woman denounces her accomplice. The latter is held responsible and is required to pay a heavy indemnity, which may amount to several dozen copper rings.

1. It is not sleeping sickness itself, however, for that disease seems formerly to have been unknown in this area.

833 751 Here as in many other situations the Nkundó have found a way to avoid the danger. There is an antidote (nsengó), and it is water (bǎsi bale nsengó ɛ́â bombilɛ́). Thus those who are unable to control their aroused passions during the day, satisfy it in a shallow stream.

833 753 The fear of bombilɛ́ has been greatly shaken [93] by colonization. If we are to believe the natives, foreign soldiers are responsible for this change also. But the behavior of the latter could not completely destroy the ancient feeling, probably due to a natural shame which makes them seek darkness and privacy for acts of this sort.

833 [515] [842] After intercourse a native woman usually gives herself a douche. She does so for the sake of cleanliness. It often happens, however, that she does not wait long enough before doing so, and thus she neutralizes the effect of the intercourse. This is chiefly a matter of carelessness. Nevertheless, under certain circumstances she may use this means to prevent conception. (1)

1. See Chapter X, Article I, 2.

833 826 According to my informants, some women have constitutional abnormalities which repel men. As everything readily becomes public, such flaws are quickly known after marriage, though not quite as readily beforehand. Actually love can -- and often does -- cause them to be overlooked. But after the first ardor has cooled, such a situation may become a threat to the stability of a marriage. When quarrels 833 826 become somewhat violent, the women recall these flaws, to the great shame of the person who suffers from them. The same is true of the weakness of some of the men which, like an excess of sexual activity, can cause difficulties in a household.

2. Rape

839 Rape in the true sense of the word -- that is, the abuse of a woman by the use of violence -- is most unusual among the Nkundó. If a woman does not consent, the angry seducer leaves her, often insulting her to the best of his ability. I know of only one case of rape, which occurred some time ago and caused much consternation in the region. Banɛngɛ, the daughter of Iloko [94] Is Ɛ́fekele of Lofelɛ (Bongɛli), was at that time living with her mother's clan the Bonyeka (Bonkoso). She had not yet fully attained physical maturity (her breasts were still very small). One day she went into the forest and did not return in the evening. The family was alarmed, and her father and her uncle Mpɛ́nda ɛ́a Nkotonkale went to look for her. Finding traces of fresh blood, they followed them till they found Banɛngɛ's corpse buried in the nsusulu. She had died of hemorrhage; her sex organs, torn, showed the unmistakable signs of rape. People had their suspicions, but it has never been possible to prove the identity of the criminal. If there had been proof, he would not have escaped the mortal vengeance of the unfortunate victim's parents.

All the data I have been able to collect indicates that other instances must undoubtedly have occurred.

3. Incomplete acts

832 Here we are speaking of what moralists call actus impudicitiae, that is, acts whose nature physically leads to sexual pleasure.

Obscene bodily contacts between persons of opposite sex are preparatory acts which excite; even touching the breasts, the abdomen, and taking a person by the arms are included in this category.

832 Kissing between persons of opposite sex is unknown. Embraces occur on the other hand but not in public; they must be considered as preparation to approaching intercourse. (1) An extraordinarily strong passion sometimes leads lovers to engage in more intimate kissing, usually as a prelude to normal intercourse. Although some natives are not shocked by such practices, more responsible people consider them improper. [95]

Article VI. Vices "Contra Naturam"

838 1. Male homosexuality

Homosexuality has been known among the Nkundó since time immemorial, among men as well as women.

Among the former it took the form of sodomy in the past, with one particular characteristic -- for which I do not know the explanation, that is, only the younger of the two men could take the active role. Nowadays among the youth, homosexuality has begun to take on a different form; the boys who practice it lie down in the positions of husband and wife. It is reported that sometimes one of the two says from time to time to his accomplice, "This is what I do with your sister." Is this an indication that here we have homosexuality only in action but not in feeling (in effectu not in affectu, as the moralists say)?

Homosexuality among the Nkundo does not seem to be the result of a special inclination for this vice; rather it has always been a last resort open to those who could not find a natural outlet for their passions. Although we cannot approve of this depravation of instinct either on rational grounds or in adherence to the faith, we must admit that it was more excusable among these peoples whose social organization was disadvantageous to many young people. At the present time there is already much less sodomy because it has become easier to get married. As for the new form of homosexuality, it may be observed especially in places where men are kept rigidly apart from relations

1. See above, Part 1, Article III.

838 with the opposite sex for a long time, such as internment camps, prisons, etc.

2 Female homosexuality

Nkundó girls play at "husband and wife," and even adult married women engage in this vice. According [96] to my informants the causes are the following: first, an intense and very intimate love between two women, and second, and above all, the fact that wives of polygamists find it difficult to satisfy their passions in a natural way. Often they engage in this practice with co-wives of the same man. The greater liberty introduced through colonization could reduce its frequency, but up till now no great improvement has been observed. What is more, in establishments where girls are too severely kept away from the opposite sex, there has been an increase.

The verb used to designate these depraved acts is yamáma, "to each other, one against the other." The noun bomámo is derived from it. But these words are also used to designate a simple embrace. A more specific term is yaíkya bonsángo; the verb yaíkya (simple form: íkya) means "to press against each other."

Is there any need to say that a people like the Nkundó, whose beliefs are founded on nature, see nothing the least bit wrong with this vice? Consequently it would be desirable for educators and missionaries to draw their pupils' attention to the harm present in such practices.

3. Masturbation

839 This vice seems never to have been practiced by the Nkundó, but at the present time it is known in the large centers and in the camps; from there it gradually penetrates into the interior. Yet it seems to spread with difficulty in native society. It is understandable that a man who has acquired the habit in one of the centers does not rid himself of it without great effort; but as the natives do not have the will to corrupt others, he does not become an agent of its propagation. (1) [97]

1. In spite of frequent touching due to itching.

4. Onanism [coitus interruptus]

833 Onanism also seems to be unknown. No doubt many women have learned this vice through their concubinage with Europeans, but they have not spread it. The same may be said of involuntary onanism. For the native does not look for sensual refinements; rather he follows his natural impulse. (1)

1. The practice described in Chapter X, Article III, 3, may be slightly tainted with onanism; it could certainly lead to such a practice, but it is not caused by perversion.

Article VII. Incest

614 We here must distinguish between 1) sexual relations between distantly related kin and 2) between close kin.

1. Among distant relatives

Incest among distant relatives (in the Nkundó sense of the word) has existed since time immemorial. It is called lonkâna (bombaká among the Bombwanja). Lonkâna is derived from nkâna, "brother, sister." The expression liála j'ɔ̄lɔ́lɔ́, "sexual union in the village," is also used. The term lonkâna is applied to relations between members of families which are only very distantly related (not at all related, according to our notions) but between whom marriage is not permitted. Thus one hears that such and such kin groups do not marry each other (báfɔ́yakumbɔ́lɛ́) but they commit lonkâna. Two kin groups of this sort may be considered closely related clans. The groups between whom lonkâna is practiced each has its own cemetery, while those between whom it is absolutely forbidden share a common cemetery. Thus, to cite an example, the "village" [98] of Elángá l'Imomo l'Ontole (Bongíli) is composed of three kin groups, as the name indicates. The Imomo settlement is partially located in the 835 allied district of the Bombomba). The same is true of the Bo̱nto̱le̱.

614 Elángá and Imo̱mo̱, together with Ele̱ke̱ (Lokongo), comprise the posterity of the son of Ambá, who was the sister of Iloko, Eángá, and Bokungá, the latter being the ancestor of the Bo̱nto̱le. The three groups do not intermarry. Between the Elángá and the Imo̱mo̱, lonkâna relations are also not permitted, but they are practiced with the Bo̱nto̱le̱. Note that the term lonkâna is never applied to relations between truly separate clans, that is, between exogamous entities.

To define the precise limits of this practice we would have to examine each kin group separately, and this would lead us too far afield.

It should also be noted that lonkâna may be limited to an isolated act, or it can become an intermittent concubinage. The name of the practice does not change when it involves a married woman who is visiting her family. Sanctions against adultery are applicable to such a case, however, as to all others. (1) Although the relatives of the woman are more lenient than if the adulterous relations had occurred with a different lover, the husband whose rights have been infringed on makes no such distinction.

174 The custom of lonkâna seems rather strange. After all, if sexual relations between these clans are not reprehensible, why is marriage between them forbidden? This is an apparent contradiction which merits attention. Should not this practice be viewed as a relaxation of the law of exogamy? In past times all sexual relations between members of the clans under discussion would have been forbidden, a very natural phenomenon when the families originated. [99] Later the young people would have succumbed to the temptation, and little by little infractions would even have multiplied. For as the clans became increasingly extended, the temptations became more and more numerous and the rule, now detached from its natural significance because very distant kinship was involved, came to seem more or less arbitrary to the interested parties. It was supported by no sanction or fear. (1) Thus the very number of violations would have gradually made the practice customary. Powerless to stop it, the persons in authority, guardians of traditional morality, would have contented themselves with channeling the development and restricting it to a minimum by being lenient on the subject of extramarital relations in order to save the principle of exogamy. This explanatory hypothesis can find a little confirmation in the fact that at the very beginning of colonization when European influence was not felt as yet, there were isolated and very rare cases of marriage in opposition to the law of exogamy between members of groups which were only very distantly related but already practiced lonkâna. The exception then became the rule, and from then on the two groupings in question intermarried regularly and without hindrance, while other families remained under the ancient law. Thus there is the known case of Boyela village (Bakɔ́ala), which includes the Bokambɔ́, Bembakɔ́, Besɔ́lɔ́, and Bekɔ́lama (extinct), all descendants of Ngonde and one wife; his union with another spouse gave rise to the Lilekɛ́ and the Likongo, to whom Bongilɔ́, a group related through marriage (likilo), is attached. These two groups of families could not intermarry, but they did engage in lonkâna. Around the time of the first arrival of the Whites, a member of the Bembakɔ́ [100] family a certain Bonjɔ́mbɔ́ was impelled by an excessive love to violate the law of exogamy by taking Bolondɔ́ of Lilekɛ́ for his wife. As his love did not cool and the marriage proved stable, it was recognized and accepted as legitimate. Since then the two groups in question have each become exogamous.

1. Actually, no sanction is provided against marriages within an exogamous entity; everything lies in the opposition of parents and elders and in a habit which is almost innate.

2. Between close relatives

Incest between close relatives has no special name of its own. As a matter of fact, it never occurs as an outgrowth of passion. We

835 encounter it only in connection with magical practices and sorcery
154 (botɛ́, plural betɛ́), for which it is the nsimbo, that is, the condition without which the betɛ́ would lack efficacy. If the nsimbo is not observed, the botɛ́ turns against its owner and, by a reversal of its effect (bosesengano), brings death to the latter. Therefore the interested parties submit to these degrading requirements despite their natural repugnance. Depending on the case, incest with the mother, the daughter, or the sister is required. The first of these eventualities is the most repugnant to our natives. Though it goes altogether against the grain to do so, the mother submits to this ignominy to save the life of her foolhardy and greedy son.

The nsimbo of incest does not exist in all botɛ́. It even seems [184] to have been absent from the betɛ́ which are ancient and purely Nkundó. It is found primarily in the big modern betɛ́, which have been imported from other peoples or invented on the spot since colonization. (1)

Article VIII. Love Philters

832 The Nkundó are familiar with two love philters, the efóndɛ́ and the bontálá. Other modern betɛ́ may produce the same effect in part or secondarily. Here [101] we will only deal with the first two, which are "pure" and ancient love philters.

The love philters (botɛ́ w'ělangyá) serve to gain the heart of a young girl as much as to entice a married woman away from her husband.

1. Efóndɛ́

Efónde (1) is a common charm. Anyone can procure it from the maker in consideration of the appropriate payment, of course. Various kinds of efóndɛ́ exist, differing as to the ingredients used, the manner

1. Efónde is often used as a synonym of elangyá in its sexual meaning.

832 in which they are manufactured, and consequently in the way they [824] are used. The most common ingredients are certain leaves mixed with red rouge (ngɔ́la) and a sort of lichen which forms red slabs on the bark of certain species found in the forest; the whole thing is [825] carefully wrapped in a small fur (especially the skin of the small feline iyei).

The charm is hidden under a slat of the bed where the desired one takes her nightly rest. Because this is done an ardent love for the owner of the charm will grow in her heart. Or it may be placed somewhere in a hut; then the desired woman is called in, the owner of the charm takes her arm, and the efɔ́ndɛ immediately "turns her heart." Or, still without the woman's knowledge, the charm is thrown into the fire where she cooks. If she begins to sneeze when she returns home, this is a sign that the smoke charged with mysterious emanations from the philter has pepetrated through her nostrils all the way to her heart and filled it with ardent love for the Adonis in question.

The efɔ́ndɛ is considered an ikɔ́ko, that is, a subjugation. Efɔ́ndɛ ɛkɔ́ka bɛ̀mato, "the efɔ́ndɛ masters women, has power over [824] them." The substance which prevents the efɔ́ndɛ from being efficacious is the bokai, a kind of sour vegetable. [102] The owner of the philter must abstain from eating it. For the bekai cause vomiting and if he ate any the woman would in the same manner eject her love and thus make the botɛ ineffective.

2. Bontɛlɛ

Contrary to the efɔ́ndɛ, the bontɛlɛ is a love philter which is not available to everyone; it is a charm only for dancers of the iyaya. This does not mean that all the artists who perform this dance have it, but they alone are acquainted with it. The material basis of the bontɛlɛ, as of most Nkundo betɛ, are the leaves of certain plants.

The efficacy of the bontɛlɛ is infallible. It acts not only on the beloved one, but also on any woman who involuntarily or on purpose fulfills the condition necessary to its operation. That is, as soon as a woman's head touches the arm of the possessor of the bontɛlɛ, her heart is moved in his favor; should she be married, her love for her 832 husband will change to revulsion, and she will leave him to be with her charmer.

Part 3

The Search for a Wife

584 When a young man old enough to marry believes he has the means to do so, he goes out to seek a wife. Naturally, he knows a number of girls, and as a rule he has no trouble finding one who suits him. The courtship is quite simple. As everywhere there are meet- [831] ings, visits, chats, and jokes; but there is no romanticism or sentimentality, for they are absolutely unknown to these peoples. Since they are in a hurry [103] to reach the objective of their relationship, namely conjugal life, -- and their progress toward this goal is facilitated by usages and customs -- there remains little time for poetry.

There is no specific term for courtship itself. The Nkundó simply speak of "talking with a woman," sooja bǒmoto, "looking for a woman," asa bǒmoto. The girl who is its object is referred to as bombóyó (or boambá among the Injóló).

First, the young man addresses his proposals to the girl: "ńdanga ńkokolé (ńkokumbóle) la wǎlí, "I want to take you for wife." She shows her agreement by saying, "ńkolanga wě ng' ókó, "I love you also," or more frequently, "elaká ô wě, "as you wish," jǒi ô lǐkě, "it's up to you," or something of this sort. (1)

[576]

1. Note that for the Nkundó these expressions have quite a different significance than would appear from the words. They express a real agreement and an explicit and personal consent. In fact it is considered improper for a woman to use a more direct expression.

584
431 The lovers exchange gifts. The girl gives food which her mother has provided, or which she has been able to procure herself.

584 For his part, the young man gives her some small game animals
431 (especially the big rat called botɔ́mba, lemurs of the genus esɛndɛ́, etc.) or fish. These gifts have no specific name. The man's gifts are simply called mpatɔ́ "gift sent"; the woman's are called botɔ́mo, a term used for all presents given by a woman to her lover (see also Chapter VI, Article VII, 2). The verb used with this noun is tumba, "to make burn." Etymologically the two words are in no way related.

Sometimes the sweethearts give each other a secret mutual pledge of their desire to be married. This pledge is called bondengɛ́ or bonengɛ́ and consists particularly of a necklace of beads called bafomakongo (or, more rarely, bisengɛ́ or bisengɛ́la). [103]

581 In choosing their wives, the men allow themselves to be motivated by the various factors which may influence them in this realm, such as physical or moral attractions. Wealth or social rank almost never play a part in determining the choice. Youth is easily carried away by physical attraction and passionate love. Men who are already more settled as well as the more sensible young men pay more attention to moral qualities, such as general conduct, submissiveness, goodness, gentleness, and especially diligence, careful attention to work, etc. In short, we find here the full range of individual variations that are encountered elsewhere, with the exception of marriages motivated by financial or political interests or by the degree of moral elevation that can be aroused by the Christian religion, such as pure devotion.

584 After a few days of courtship the girl lets her suitor know that if he really loves her he had better settle the matter and that consequently he must obtain her parents' consent. Meanwhile they have [836] already had intimate relations several times; therefore the moment of official negotiations should not be delayed.

586x Seeking a wife who is already married is in no way different 587 from the procedure we have just described, but a great deal of circum-
584 spection must be used so that the husband's suspicions will not be aroused. The exchange of the secret pledge we have mentioned occurs especially in this situation.

Once the divorce is completed, the woman falls in the same category as a single girl since she is free.

Seeking a future wife in an as yet unborn child or one that is very young will be discussed in a special section (Chapter IV, Article I). [105]

Chapter II

The Marriage Agreement

581 The marriage agreement (1) is primarily arranged by means of the payment of certain valuables through the agency (Article II). The first stage is the engagement (Article III). After dealing with it, we will describe the various payments subsequently made to the father, namely the walo (Article IV) and the bosóngo (Article IX), and to the mother (Article V), as well as the gifts (Article VI). Nkundó law also requires that the woman's clan pay certain valuables (Article VII). Finally, we will examine various rules and customs pertaining to the bride price: its acceptance (Article VIII) and the use to which it is ultimately put (Article X). The chapter ends with some general remarks (Article XI) and a few considerations on the attitude adopted toward the bride price (Article XII).

Article I. The Beginning of Negotiations

584 As we have seen at the end of the last chapter, the period of courtship is not long.

1. These terms should be understood broadly, rather than in a strictly legal fashion. "The marriage agreement" here does not signify what is called "the marriage contract" in European law. This chapter deals with the various stages through which the condition of marriage is established among the Nkundó, and the various practices connected with this process. I have chosen this title in order to include all the multiplicity of essential and accessory elements comprised in the establishment of a marriage, as well as the various circumstances attendant upon it.

584 The young man informs his own parents of his intentions, and they make certain that this marriage merits [106] consideration and that there are no obstacles or too great difficulties that might cause trouble later on.

For the official negotiations the suitor and his father (or a substitute for the latter) go to the home of the girl's parents, who inquire as to the purpose of their visit, and when they discover that so-and-so would like to marry their daughter, they ask: "How do you want her?" (1) "I want her for my wife," he replies. Whereupon they tell him to make the necessary arrangements to make the first payment on the bride price. When the two parties have come to an agreement the parents of the intended conclude the conversation by saying: "We are not opposed; it is up to you."

[590] The formalities of the negotiations in the case of a woman who already has a husband do not differ from those for a girl who is free. Only, in the first instance the proceedings must go on with great circumspection so as not to anger the abandoned husband. In addition the woman's parents inform the suitor and his family of the amount of the bride price they must bring in order to reimburse the first husband. (2)

In cases of engagement before birth or at a very early age, the same procedures are observed, but they are adapted to the special circumstances of the situation, which will be explained in detail in Chapter IV.

After the negotiations have thus begun, the suitor's father prepares the first payment of the bride price which, accompanied by his son and the ndonga, he delivers to the future wife's family. But let us first explain the ndonga.

[836] 1. That is, do you want her as your legitimate wife, or are you only planning to live with her for a time? In this fashion the parents of the intended assure themselves that the suitor has serious intentions of contracting a real marriage

2. See Chapter VIII, Articles II and III.

Article II. The Ndonga

584 The ndonga is the guardian-keeper of the marriage; he is chosen by the parties involved and his participation as intermediary, witness, conciliator, or arbiter is required at every stage of the union. He is an official in the sense that his authority is derived from the very law which governs marriage in Nkundó society.

First of all, the ndonga is the indispensible intermediary for the payment of the bride price. Without him there is no legitimate marriage: Nkó ndonga ôbóka baémba ô lontubé, bõna ale ô bonto. "Without a ndonga you are throwing your valuables away at a total loss, and your daughter is but a slave," that is, she is not a wife. Legally, only the ndonga is qualified to act as witness.

The importance attached by the natives to the ndonga's participation is apparent in every moment of daily life. Thus if a woman has been beaten by her husband, her family can be heard to say: "Our daughter (sister) is no slave; she was paid for through the agency of a ndonga," bón'ôkiaó áfa bokwála, bowóngékí é la ndonga. Or she herself will retort in this manner, mutatis mutandis, to her husband or his family when in her opinion she is not being treated properly.

The absolute necessity for the participation of a qualified ndonga is very rarely mentioned by Europeans in the colonial administration. One would say that they are unaware of its importance though it is crucial.

602 In order to serve as ndonga for a particular marriage, a person must be related at the same time to both the future husband and wife or, as they say in Lonkundo, to be mbótswá. Nowadays, because of the migrations of the natives, the ndonga who meet this qualification are rare in the centers and often cannot be found at all. Therefore, it has been necessary to adapt the traditional law to the situation. Hence a practice has developed [108] under such critical circumstances which consists in taking as one's ndonga a man whose integrity is generally recognized and who has every reason to be impartial and interested in the stability of the marriage. Thus it often happens that chief catechists assume the functions and responsibilities of this role.

584 Formerly, and even today in the interior, when two young people love each other but cannot find anyone qualified to perform the 584 function of the ndonga, the parents of the young man oppose the marriage. They said: tófímɛ́jɛ́ liála línko, tófa l'ɔ́kɔfɛ́ndɛ́jɛ́ bafímbɛ́, "we do not want this marriage; there is no one to transmit the valuables." Under ordinary circumstances such an occurrence is almost nonexistent.

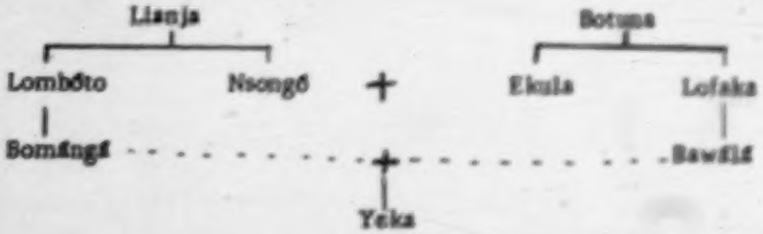
It is up to the husband to chose the ndonga, who is then accepted by the wife and her parents. If they are opposed to him, the husband replaces another in his stead. Though this situation rarely occurred in the past, it may be encountered under present conditions.

A woman may be ndonga just as well as a man.

Its functions are hereditary. If the ndonga dies, his son, daughter, brother, or even his wife, if she remains in her deceased husband's clan, inherit his duties and prerogatives.

Similarly, if the ndonga is absent or otherwise prevented from fulfilling his functions, members of his family may substitute for him. Thus, for example:



Yeka is a qualified ndonga for the marriage of Ekula and Nsongɔ́. But since he is still too young [109] to perform the functions of this position, his father Bomangɛ is entirely entitled to substitute for him for the time being.

There may be several ndonga for a single marriage. All have to fulfill the necessary conditions and have the same rights and duties. It is not necessary, however, that they all be present at each occasion required by law; one of them will suffice, and it does not matter which one. Theoretically, their presence as witnesses is of equal value. Nevertheless, the first one designated is known as ndonga éá ntsína, or the chief ndonga. If it is possible to find two mbɔ́tswɛ, both should be taken 584 as ndonga; if not, the one person that can be found will suffice.

The ndonga is entitled to remuneration for his services from each of the contracting parties.

When the ndanga is paid (see below), the wife's family gives him [the ndonga] a smoked botómba, a hen, or a bokúfa fish. This is a gift with the generic name of lionja (verb bonjela). It is always obligatory.

Similarly, when the walo is paid, the wife's family must first of all give him food of animal origin (bofambe), generally a botómba, a hen, or a bokúfa, as well as bananas. This present as a whole is called botómba l'oanda (1).

1. Boanda is a species of banana, but any kind may be given. As a result, nowadays people begin to speak also of botómba linkondo (or linko), or of nsóso la linko (hen and banana).

Finally after the walo is paid, the husband's family gives the ndonga 2 copper rings, and the wife's family does the same. If the amount of the bride price is very great, he may be given as many as 5 rings. The latter remuneration is called bompóngé. This word literally means a domestic animal (a dog or a goat) given as payment. Nowadays its value in copper rings (konga, pl. bakonga) is given, but the old name has remained. [110]

All these remunerations are given the generic term lómbela ndonga, "to prepare for the ndonga," and the noun balómbo (sing. ilómbo), as if there were food involved. This expression fits well with the botómba and the bananas, etc. but it is used also for the copper rings. Is this an extension of the meaning? Or should we conclude that in the past the remuneration in question was made only in foods?

If there are several ndonga, the remuneration is not therefore increased; it is one and the same, and they have to divide it among themselves.

In practice the heads of the clan or family are also present when the bride price is paid; they are influential men, who have the 584 power to settle disputes. They claim their share of the remuneration from the ndonga. According to the saying -- in archaic language -- botɛ wǎ ndonga nd'â dombiɛ, "the power (literally, "the medicine") of the ndonga resides in the judges." Not that the judges themselves have the right or the power to intervene in matrimonial palavers. But they are that many additional witnesses. If the day comes when there is a dispute on the subject of the bride price, especially at the time of a divorce, the ndonga can call on them to help him refresh his memory and thus avoid difficulties. For it can easily happen that after several years the official witness has only a vague and approximate recollection of what was paid. If the judges do not receive anything at the time of payment, they will refuse to give their assistance at the critical moment. It is therefore an intelligent policy to acquiesce to their desires even though strictly speaking they can invoke no real prerogatives.

622 At the present time the colonial government, having established districts and named chiefs, the latter have had attributed to them the right to officially act as ndonga in matrimonial matters, or at least they have taken advantage of the powers given them and done so. In general [111] they summon the judges of the district at the same time, and the matter is entered after a fashion in the register of settlements. The chief's presence as a witness may have some value, since he can provide additional testimony and writes down the amount of the bride price. But his presence, on the other hand, has the disadvantage of involving him in matters which all in all are none of his business. We are not speaking here of cases in which he or some relatives of his are interested parties in the palaver. If he would be content to be a passive witness and enter the transactions that take place, the situation would be perfect.

192
194 It is probable that etymologically the word ndonga is derived from the verb root long, intransitive longam, "to be in order, arranged," transitive longy, "to arrange, make as it should be." In addition to the word ndonga, which is used west of the Luilaka, we find the word bokɛlo used among the Bodngɛ and the Boŋyɛ (as well as the Elingɛ), and ntombi among the Injɔlɔ. The latter term could be the same word as its homonym which means "spy" and is derived from the verb

192 tomba, "to spy"; the former may be an extension of the meaning of 184 the word bokɛlo, "promise." (1)

[572] 1. Note in passing that a ndonga is also necessary for the boseka, or contract of friendship and mutual assistance. (See Chapter I, Part 1, Article III.)

Article III. The Engagement

585 1. The payment of the ilulɛ

The engagement begins with the first bride-price payment, which in former times was an arrow and for that reason is called likulɛ or ilulɛ. If the suitor was very rich, he sometimes gave an ingɔndɔ knife or even an empɔmɛ. A poorer one would merely give the shaft of an arrow. Nowadays 1 or 2 copper rings are given. But the original name of this payment has been retained. [554]

Arriving at the home of the father of his intended, [112] the suitor, his father (or a substitute for him), the ndonga(1) and often other relatives as well, sit down on one side of the lofɔlɛ (the court in front of a dwelling), after an exchange of the usual courtesies. The girl and the representatives of her family sit down on the opposite side. As in all matters that a Nkundɔ has to settle, the host begins by inquiring into the reason for the visit. The young man's father answers: "We have come to ask for your daughter for our son." "How do you ask for her?" "We ask for her in marriage." These preliminary negotiations are called simply ɔwana mango, "to ask each other for news."

Then the girl's father asks: "Who will bring the liloŋ (banana) or the bonyɛko (partially ripe banana), that is, the gifts?" Through this figurative expression he asks who has been proposed as ndonga. The young man's father replies: so-and-so, and so-and-so. When they have been accepted, the fiancée's father has bananas, smoked fish, and sometimes hens brought in, and the witness passes them over to the future husband's group.

585 When the presents have been accepted, the ndonga plants the arrow in the ground in front of the wife's parents. Hence the expression -tumya likulɔ or -lubya likulɔ, "to plant the arrow," which remains very much the fashion even though nowadays the ndonga deposits rings in its place.

2. Consent

584 Asked by her parents or the ndonga, or on her own initiative, -- depending on her own inclinations, -- the girl pulls up the arrow or picks up the rings and gives them to her father. That is how she expresses her consent to the proposed engagement.

Her promptness, her nonchalance, or even the recalcitrant manner in which she performs this gesture show her [113] feelings. Usually her movements are lively. As we have explained, the union will have been anticipated for some time, and a Nkundɔ girl glories in being the object of a man's love and in having a husband. Nevertheless there are cases where the girl has to be persuaded to make the decision, especially if she is still young. Within herself she is not enthusiastic about the marriage. But in the end she bows to her father's wish, preferring a union which is contrary to her desires to fairly serious trouble with her family.

Naturally we find the whole range of variations which depend on individual temperament and on circumstances. A categorical refusal must certainly be very rare. It would be the act of a very strong-willed woman. But the union would have been called off much earlier, so that such an extreme situation would not be allowed to occur.

The case of a woman who submits to the ceremonies with resistance and against her wishes is more frequent. Not only does she have to be urged and persuaded, but her frowning face expresses her discontent. She picks up the objects with an apathetic gesture, turns her back to her father, and drops the valuables behind her without even looking at him. None of the people present misunderstand the meaning of such gestures. Consequently members of the family and the notables who are present never fail to attract the father's attention to

584 the gravity of this situation. They try to make him change his mind and to dissuadé him from accepting the bride price. To that end they try to make him see the consequences of his obstinacy: at the first favorable opportunity the woman will take flight, leading to palavers (and in the past often war), imprisonment, all sorts of [578] troubles, and finally the bride price will have to be returned for the divorce. Sometimes they succeed; other times all their wisdom and eloquence are in vain. Cupidity, the need to obtain the means of a [156] [114] bride price for a wife (for oneself, a son, a brother, etc.) and the profit he reaps from the union silence all other feelings. Here again, everything depends on the character of the individual. Nowadays the greater freedom resulting from colonization has reduced the frequency of such cases. Nevertheless, because of the reasons given, they still occur. But more frequently the ceremony takes place in a normal fashion. As long as it has not taken place, no further bride-price payments are made. This fact is sufficient to show the importance of the ceremony in Nkundó law, and thus the importance of the woman's public and official consent to the marriage proposed, though this consent is not expressed in words but only implied in a special, meaningful act. Cases which seem in contradiction to this statement are clearly breaches of that law.

In normal cases the father accepts the arrow or the rings from his daughter's hands and thus establishes his consent to the engagement and consequently to the marriage.

In other forms of marriage, which we will discuss later on (Chapters III and IV), consent is expressed in an entirely different fashion.

3. Abduction

583x Even before the coming of the Europeans there were instances where lovers persisted in their desire to marry in spite of the opposition of the woman's parents. When the parents refused to accept the ijulé, the engaged pair arranged an opportunity to flee. The woman tried to win her brother over to her cause, and out of brotherly love he usually 583 accepted the arrow from the hands of the ndonga. Otherwise the latter secretly planted it in the roof of the parents of the woman who was fleeing. Later, when it was apparent that their daughter's marriage would hold good, and their son-in-law had pacified them by his good conduct towards them (giving them gifts, showing them respect, etc.), the parents no longer refused their consent. Subsequently the payments were made in the usual fashion. [115]

4. The departure of the fiancée

584 Through the payment of the ikulɛ a woman is at least partially bound to her husband (bóme). The maxim cited in the last chapter (Part 2, Article III, 2, B) is applicable here: "Boimbo fruit which is still under the tree belongs to no one." As long as a girl lives in her parents' home she is bound to no man. But as soon as someone has paid the ijulɛ, she has been "picked" and belongs to a husband.

Therefore, either immediately or within a few days, she leaves her parents and follows her husband. (1) Actually, the father may dismiss his son-in-law and promise to bring his daughter himself, or send her by someone he has delegated. Meanwhile he collects a few small provisions. When the fiancée arrives in the village of her future husband, all the inhabitants gather at the first cries of "bompɛka wä Söngölö aôvɛ, "X's fiancée has arrived," and acclaim her joyfully.

The term bompɛka is not used until that moment. (2) But does

1. As we will see suo loco (Chapters IV and VIII) this was only rarely possible in precolonial times. Nowadays it has become a common practice because of the changes that have taken place, which will be described at the places cited.

2. This word also means "engagement." The Ekonda say esengɛ or chengɛ.

584 not a woman become bompɛka through the payment of the ikulɛ? That is what I had always understood, and it seemed logical to me. But in the course of a discussion on the subject, natives contradicted me and said that I was entirely mistaken. I could not make them accept the idea that although a woman is called bompɛka when she arrives in her fiancé's clan, she actually becomes bompɛka with the official payment of the ikulɛ, so that nothing but a manner of speaking is involved. They said, "No, as long as a woman has not gone to her husband she is not bompɛka."

"But after all," said I, [116] "a very minor difference is involved; the essential thing is in any case the payment of the ikulɛ.

"It is true that a woman belongs to her husband from the time the ikulɛ is paid, but she is nevertheless not called bompɛka. She is not given that name until she leaves her parents and goes to her husband's home."

"But why?"

[621] "Because otherwise the man runs the risk of being mocked and ridiculed. Suppose that after the ikulɛ he comes back home alone. His future wife is to join him in a few days. He announces the great news to his friends. Then on the day set she does not appear. What shame for him! On the other hand, if everything is kept secret until the moment when no change is to be feared, there are only cries of joy."

On the other hand, this data should be related to the indisputable fact that the payment of the bride price alone very seldom establishes a marriage according to the laws and customs of the various peoples of the Congo. There is almost always another ceremony which in most cases is the handing over of the woman. Because of these facts we are inclined to consider the explanation of the Nkundɔ, an explanation of convenience which shows the practical aspect of the rule but does not account for it. It actually does not explain why a woman does not become bompɛka from the time of the payment which establishes the engagement. On the other hand, it is undeniable that she is not given that name until she has arrived at the home of her husband. It is possible that the fundamental reason for this phenomenon has been forgotten or lost sight of by the natives. The explanation which fits best with the facts that are certain is that the essential

584 element of the engagement is not the payment of the ikulɛ but the woman's act of leaving her family and joining the man to whom she is engaged. (1) [117]

5. The fiancée's arrival at her husband's home

As I have said, the fiancée is welcomed by her husband's clan and enthusiastically acclaimed by the population in general.

According to most cases, her husband-to-be receives her and takes her to his home or to that of his parents. The latter await her arrival, having gathered together their daughters, sisters, and various relatives and associates. The fiancé introduces the woman of his choice to them. She is greeted in the usual fashion: "w'ǒng'ôôkita; ôôyɛ; ôôɛtswa, etc.." depending on the extent of their previous intimacy.

Then gifts are given to the fiancée. First the parents-in-law give her a welcoming gift, called bosambelo, literally translated as "handclasp." It usually consists of a ring or a knife. Then they give her their hands. (1) Following them, all relatives and associates

> 1. The Nkundo clasp hands as a sign of friendship. The gesture is a sort of greeting. They don't press the hand,as do Europeans but place the hands lightly over each other and then withdraw them, rubbing gently.

must do the same. The men usually give a ring and the women a knife. These objects are considered as part of the bride price, and the 584 woman sends them to her family. Distant relatives fulfill their obligations by bringing meat or fish, and nowadays also money or some small present, which is not included in the bride price.

The husband's gifts consist of a small knife and a few (5) arrows (at the time of the Independent State a bundle of copper wires called ngelo or mitako and at the present time 5 or 10 francs, for example). These presents from the husband are not bosambelo, for he does not give his fiancée his hand; they are yěkola (greeting) and are not part of the bride price. The woman sends them to her parents.

If the husband does not yet have a house or cultivated fields of 591 his own, [138] as was formerly often the case, (1) the engaged couple live in the hut of the parents for the time being. The woman obtains food from her mother-in-law's fields and prepares it at the hearth of the latter, until the young man has built his hut and established his own fields.

Nowadays it no longer happens that a young man who wants to take a wife still lacks his own house. From the time of puberty on, young men moved by the desire for freedom leave the parental home and build huts for themselves where they can live alone or with some companion or other and enjoy their freedom.

6. The life of the engaged couple

584 The bompaka lives in the home of her husband, goes there to talk to him and to sleep with him. During the first three or four days she does not work, unless she is a very active person. Subsequently she takes care of all the household tasks and prepares meals at the hearth under the supervision of her mother-in-law. Only after a few weeks, when she has become accustomed to her new way of living, is she introduced to the customs of her new family; only

---

[734] 1. Orphans were almost the only ones who had their own houses and cultivated fields. Of course, we are not speaking of men who were previously married.

584 then does she acquire her own establishment. From that moment on she lives permanently with her husband-to-be.

She has come from her parents' home empty handed, without any utensils whatsoever. In her new dwelling she finds everything. Her mother-in-law and sisters-in-law give her what she needs: baskets, pots, gourds, mats, mortars, pestles, and even chickens.

It will be apparent from the preceding that there are no particular rites or ceremonies nor is any special attire worn.

584 585 By this time the bompɛka is already considered a wife; [119] she has all the rights and duties of that status: cohabitation, household tasks, etc. Everything she produces or earns belongs to her husband. Her own family no longer has any rights to the fruits of her work. If, after the payment of the ikulɛ and before any further payment, [586] the husband discovers that there are relations between his fiancée and another man, the latter is considered an adulterer and is liable to the sanctions designed to check such infractions. The older the woman, the greater the indemnity, which may be as high as 5 to 10 rings (see Chapter VI, Article VII).

It is logically consistent with what we have described that the fiancé has no special name. Since he is actually a husband, that is what he is called (bɔme).

During this period the engaged pair get to know each other physically and morally (sexual relations, work, temperament, virtues, faults). A figurative expression is used to describe what happens -- bɛkɛngola mpokɛ, "they are trying out the pot." The explanation [585] [252] for this saying is that before a new pot (mpokɛ) is used, it is placed on a shelf above the fire and left there for several days, so that it will harden and become heat resistant. If it cracks it is not suitable for food preparation; if not, one can cook in it without fear. This process is called bɛngola mpokɛ, and the term has been transferred to the trial period of the newlyweds. Thus it is a sort of novitiate, and the English term which can be used to approximate this situation most closely is clearly "engagement," "engaged."

This first period can last several months. Meanwhile the husband seeks the valuables needed for the ndanga payment.

7. The ndanga

583x Originally the ndanga for marriage was the payment of a 584 knife (hence it is still called [120] ifakɛ, "knife"); it was later replaced by 2 to 5 copper rings, and now by 5 to 10 or even more.

At the present time ikulɛ and ndanga tend to merge, since both have become payments of rings, and they are often given together at the same time without being distinguished one from the other.

In the main the handing over of the ndanga takes place in the same manner as the payment of the ikulɛ, but with greater solemnity. The young man and his father (or a substitute for the latter), together with the ndonga and a few close relatives, especially the mother, go to the home of the fiancée's parents. They are received with the usual marks of courtesy and affection. They sit down on one side of the loɛnjɛ, and the woman's family sits on the opposite side. First of all, the latter ask for news, that is, they inquire into the purpose of the visit. The young man's father answers: "We have come to pay the ndanga," toôy'ɔkɛkya ndanga (or ifakɛ) meaning literally, "we have come to hang the ndanga (or the knife)." Then the father-in-law gives the ndonga a gift of welcome (lionja). It is a smoked botɔ́mba, or one or two bokɔ́sa fish, or a hen; a bunch of bananas is added.

The fiancé and his family will receive, for example, a goat, a dog, and some hens, which are considered part of the nkɔmɛ (see below, Article VII), as well as meat, smoked fish, and a few bunches of bananas, which he will dispose of with his wife and family and which are not considered part of the nkɔmɛ but are simply a present.

They then proceed to the payment of the ndanga valuables. It must be done through the medium of the ndonga, who also had to hand over the presents, etc. It is not necessary that the fiancée participate nor even that she be present. [121]

Sometimes when the ndanga is paid, the woman's family ask for beɛ́ngo gifts which should theoretically be made only on the occasion of the next payment, (see below, Article VI). Sometimes the husband satisfies these requirements; other times he gives only a pledge (wɛ̌ko). He could also refuse the greedy parents. But he 584 cares too much for his wife, so he acquiesces to their desires without 585 a murmur.

What is the purpose and the significance of the ndanga? The natives reply: the ndanga is given so that the daughter would not burn herself at the fire, bŏn'ŏkñŏ ɛfŏy' ŏlongola tsɛ̆. This is a sign that the man takes responsibility for any accident (represented by the general term "burn") which might befall his fiancée. In the hands of the woman and her family, it constitutes public and official evidence against the husband. (1) Consequently, it is also a guarantee to the parents that the husband will take care of their child and treat her properly.

But what then is the ikulɛ's reason for being? The Nkundŏ reply: "The ikulɛ is evidence, a sign that the woman belongs to a particular man."

In practice, then, there is hardly any difference between the purposes of the two payments. Actually they have identical consequences, both with respect to the duties and rights of the engaged couple and to the indemnity to be paid under certain circumstances.

Thus if a woman runs away with her lover and he has not given the ikulɛ, and some accident befalls her, her family can make no claim as they have no evidence against him. In former times this would have been a purely hypothetical situation; nowadays it does occur, but it is quite unusual in the native areas.

Nevertheless, a slight difference may be noted between the explanations for the two payments given by the natives. [122] The ikulɛ is simply proof of the engagement; the ndanga, on the other hand, is the recognition of responsibilities and their acceptance. The fiancé beats his breast, as they say (ɛyakɛndela ntɔ́lɔ́).

We have said that the ikulɛ and the ndanga are in the process 178, of merging. This development is probably due to the fact that both 583
584 payments are made nowadays in the form of brass or copper rings.

1. Hence, probably, the origin of the word ndanga. The root is langa, "to love," "to desire," therefore "to accept." In Lokonda, see lolanga.

584 585 178 But if the indicated difference between them were fundamental, this fact would by no means provide a sufficient explanation. On the other hand, if it were only a slight nuance without practical consequences, it would not, it seems to me, adequately explain the existence of the two payments, especially since in the past quite a long time could elapse between them.

174 583 584 Therefore we can wonder whether the basis of a greater difference might not be found in the hypothesis of its being a primitive custom.

For instance, the ikulɛ could have been the payment accompanying a proposal of marriage comparable to our European engagement. Then, when unresolvable palavers developed out of this situation, a system may have been devised which would not prevent disputes from arising but would make possible their resolution according to proper and just legal regulations. This system would have been the payment of a ndanga.

While this is a possible explanation, it is not a very plausible one. Native law appears in all domains so reasonable, cautious, and wise, and so well adapted to circumstances, that it would hardly have left a way open to so great a source of difficulties in so important a matter. Such a possibility can hardly be admitted by any one who is even slightly familiar with the mentality of the Nkundó. Then, too, the modern blending of the ikulɛ and the ndanga suggests that one of two is duplicating the function of the other. And the consequence of this development would have been the uniting of the two payments into one, with a single purpose, or more probably, in conformity with the general practice, the transferring of the significance of a pledge, theoretically assigned to the ndanga, to the ikulɛ. [123] The existence of a single engagement payment would have been much more in accordance with the present hypothesis than the practice of making two distinct payments, which are independent and separated in time. We should add here that the acceptance of a responsibility is always and under all circumstances accompanied by the handing over of a ndanga.

We could conceive of a second hypothesis, which seems more in accordance with reality. The ikulɛ may originally have been an engagement payment, as in the first hypothesis, only the girl may 174 584 585 not have accompanied her husband to his home. She would have remained with her parents, and her fiancé would probably have had permission to visit her and to have sexual relations with her; as we have seen in the preceding chapter, native law does not oppose such relations. Since the mutual desire for cohabitation could not be put off for the period of time -- often long -- required before the bride-price payment itself could be arranged, the girl's parents would have given their child permission to follow her heart's inclinations which -- let us repeat -- could provoke only difficulties of a legal, "civil" nature. And before the fiancé could take his future wife home with him, he had first to reassure the parents and free them from their responsibility by taking it upon himself in an official manner, that is, by giving proof of his willingness to accept all the consequences of his action. In Lonkundo such a pledge is called ndanga. Later on, the time of cohabitation may have been begun earlier, by permitting it from the time of the ikulɛ. Thus in practice the reason for the existence of the ndanga would have been transferred to the ikulɛ, and the ndanga would have been retained simply as a payment imposed by custom, until the day when the overthrow of ancient customs made the Nkundɔ perceive the logical consequences of the facts, resulting in the merging of the two payments into one. This hypothesis is also confirmed by the fact that the very name ikulɛ is tending to disappear, [124] yielding to the use of the single term ndanga. Finally, to align this hypothesis with the facts pertaining to the term bompɛka presented in number 4, we must assume that in the past the fiancée moved to the home of her husband only after the ndanga and consequently became bompɛka only at that time.

8. The breaking of an engagement

584 The breaking of an engagement does not involve great legal difficulties. Both the man and the woman are free to break it if they find that they are basically incompatible, or that the prospects for happiness are not good, or for any other reason. There are certain practical stipulations, however.

584 A young man who renounces his fiancée places her in the hands of the ndonga, who sends her back to her family.

The woman who does not want to continue their life together leaves her fiancé, perhaps telling him and perhaps not, first goes to the ndonga and then returns to her parents (nowadays she sometimes does not see the ndonga, although not doing so must be considered an infraction of the rule).

In practice she may also go directly to another man. Formerly it was dangerous to do so, since a war could result, and such an action was considered against the law. At the present time the greater freedom resulting from colonization has eliminated the dangers involved. Thus this lack of proper procedure has become more frequent and is even coming to be recognized as normal.

584 585 In any case, even if the woman has neglected to go to the ndonga, the latter is sent by the fiancé to examine the situation and to claim restitution of the payments that have already been made.

Strictly speaking, the breaking of the engagement consists in the restitution of the ikulɛ-ndanga through the mediation of the ndonga. But, as we will explain more fully in the chapter on divorce, gifts given by the woman's family are deducted. [125] Complete restitution of everything must be made. The woman's family cannot even invoke the work done by their daughter for the husband's benefit.

583 177 584 Nowadays, however, the custom of dividing the amount of the bride price in excess of the nkomɛ (1) is taking hold. The woman's parents demand a certain indemnity because they consider that the husband has lost the right to his valuables; if they do not withhold them altogether, it is because of the respect and embarrassment they feel toward the ndonga, who is related to the fiancé as he is to them.

The natives try to explain this change in the ancestral law as follows:

1) An engagement is meant to develop into a regular marriage, and that is its only validity. The fiancé's right to the woman's work

(1) See below, Article VII.

584 is based solely on the nature of this state, which is a direct prepara-583 tion for married life. Therefore, if the union is not completed, the 177 fiancé is enriched at the expense of the parents-in-law.

2) When an engagement is broken, the parents lose the legitimate and normal expectation of a full bride price; they consider this loss lucrum cessans.

The natives' justification is not sufficient to explain the origin 584 of the change, however, for:
583 1) It seems likely that the Nkundó have simply imitated the 174 practice of other peoples of the Congo with whom they have become 177 acquainted since colonization, and that their explanation is but an explanation of convenience.

2) The reasons invoked in favor of the change are not new; they were equally valid in the past, and such as they are and in themselves they are therefore insufficient.

3) If we examine the reason concerning the benefit that the fiancé derives from the [126] woman's work, we find that it is based on a fallacious argument. For Nkundó law recognizes, on the one hand, the legitimacy of this gain and, on the other, the right of each party to break the engagement. Simply the breaking of the engagement cannot, therefore, result in the payment of an indemnity, since one cannot possibly be punished for having made use of a right.

4) The above objection is also applicable to the second reason given by the Nkundó: the possibility of the bride price not being paid is inherent in the essence of the engagement, since both parties are free not to go through with the union.

Thus the reasons given as such must be rejected.

Nevertheless, it is possible that modern circumstances have to some extent modified the nature of the problem. Thus:

1) The introduction of European wage labor and trade has given the Blacks a new idea of wealth. Consequently, the benefits reaped from the engagement have become much greater (through the development of trade and the availability of more varied goods and greater riches), and therefore the economic value of a woman has increased in considerable proportions.

Theoretically, these changes might justify some indemnification. In practice, however, economic development has increased the 583 amount of the engagement payment and thus counterbalances the in-584 crease of the profit brought by a woman.

174 Indemnification for economic reasons would also have one
177 good result, namely that it would prevent a possible skewing of the system into a form of exploitation which would consist of taking fiancées for a time when they are needed for some special work and sending them back when the work is finished. [127]

But it must be noted that though the precaution may be good in itself, it is not called for under present circumstances, for the Nkundó do not even think of such a corruption of engagement customs.

2. Colonization has considerably reinforced -- or perhaps even introduced -- in native thinking the idea that the favors of a woman deserve a salary. I think that these circumstances have contributed much more to the origin of the new practice than economic changes -- or rather, that the justification for it is primarily based on this idea of venal love. And in that case we have before us a pretium stupri of a sort that could foster prostitution, and which is therefore in opposition to morality and public order.

Just as we must applaud the normal developments of the custom and its adaptation to the possibilities of social and moral elevation that colonization has created, so we must react against its corruption, aberrations, deviations, and a drift toward the exploitation of faults and vices.

Another objection against the innovation may be made on the grounds of its inconsistency within Nkundó law. Since there is no indemnification in the case of divorce, how is it possible to accept it in the case of the breaking of an engagement, which is a much weaker commitment than marriage itself? It is true that a Nkundó engagement is almost a marriage, since it includes cohabitation, etc.; nevertheless, it is not as tight a bond as a permanent union, from which it is clearly distinguished. The new custom leads logically to the conclusion that it is preferable to complete the union and make it definitive by paying the entire bride price and then to break it by means of a real divorce, which does not involve this financial loss.

Finally, although an indemnity based on the increase in the fiancé's profit from the engagement cannot be [128] condemned as 585 unjust in itself, it certainly becomes so if it is considered a penalty 584 inflicted for the rupture. For the indemnity is restricted to the man, 174 whether or not he is in the wrong. Furthermore, to accept an indemnity 177 even when the engagement is broken because of the woman tends to favor frauds and real swindles on the part of the woman and her parents, in short a kind of traffic in women.

It is also evident that the rich (polygamists) suffer much less [585] from the innovation than do monogamous men, especially those who
[174] adopt monogamy as a principle and more especially the Christians, who do not condone divorce. Thus I am of the opinion that the desire to defend polygamy against the doctrine of the missionaries is not entirely unrelated to the transformation of this custom.

000 All these considerations show that the question is highly complex and that it would be better if the ancient custom were restored.

If the breaking of the engagement is due to wrongs, the new custom could perhaps be tolerated, though it is not without serious dangers, but the indemnity should be imposed exclusively on the party at fault. Furthermore, the wrongs would have to be serious, and on the other hand, the indemnity would have to be, not in the nature of a forfeit, but of a payment of damages commensurate with the extent of the damage suffered and the seriousness of the wrong. And here those cases should especially be considered where the breaking of the engagement is accompanied by proceedings of a vexatious and insulting nature. And though it is a very delicate task to evaluate all these elements, we must not forget to take them into account.

It seems to me that the ancient law must still be maintained when the engagement is broken simply because of a change of feelings for which neither party is to blame, if such a case occurs. For it is better not to innovate than to innovate too fast. [128]

Article IV. Walo -- Bomboluku

583^{x} The walo or bomboluku is the bulk of the bride price paid for a marriage. Between the payment of the ndanga and that of the walo, 585 months, even years, may elapse. In the past there was no hurry at all. Only if the father of the woman needed the bride price to obtain a wife for himself, for a son, or a cousin, etc., was the period [118] shortened. Nowadays, however, those who are entitled to the bride price urge the shortening of the interval before the _walo_ payment because of the overexcitation of their desire for riches, on the one hand, and also because it gives the young people a possibility of leaving their tribes and regions and going into the centers to find the means of earning more money, dressing more luxuriously, satisfying their vanity and their desire for freedom, not to mention libertinism or even worse. Nor has the one reason present in the past disappeared -- on the contrary. And as a result of all that, as soon as the interval becomes a little long to the girl's father's taste, he readily brings the situation to the attention of the chiefs established by the administration, who are always ready to deal with matrimonial cases as much for the financial gain involved as for the increase in their prestige resulting from their involvement in this most important realm, in which according to ancestral law they have no right whatsoever to intervene, for the simple reason that this law knows no chiefs or headmen in the European sense.

1. Terminology

585 192 The term _walo_ is used by the Bonkoso, the Bongili, the Bombwanja, and the Ionda; _bombolako_, on the other hand, is used by the Wangata, the Bakala, the Lifumba, the Injolo, and the Bofongi (as well as the Elinga and the Losangonya). The Bombomba use the term _eloombela_ in imitation of their neighbors, the Ekonda.

This last term may be related to -lómba, [120] "to prepare food." This derivation should be compared with what we have said in Article II about the remuneration of the _ndonga_. I have been unable to discover the etymology of _bombolako_. Let us try our luck with _walo_.

In accordance with the rules of Nkundó etymology, this word could be related to the root _-al_, or to _-alal_, which is an intensifier derived from the former. No example of the simple root exists at present, as far as I know. But there are derivative forms: _alaj_ and _alal_, or _-aol_ which results from the elimination of the first "l."

585* 192 -Alej means "to place in layers," as for example one would place eggs in a basket, bricks in an oven. The noun derived from this word is jwalo, "layer" and, by analogy, "shelf." By extension it is used to signify whatever is placed between layers to protect them, and also the lining of a garment. It is difficult to find a relationship with the word walo here.

-Aol may be used as an intensifier and also to reverse the meaning or a word. The latter use results in a noun ending in a final "o" as in jwaló of aola bangánjo, "to pour out the vegetables." Thus it must be excluded.

In its other meanings this verb occurs in combination with several nouns. It occurs first of all with walo when this word is used to signify the beating for small game, (1) In addition it is used to mean "to collect and gather weeds, chaff, sweepings, ashes." The action is called jwalo.

The most natural conclusion is certainly that the noun under discussion should be placed together with -aol in the meaning given last. The word would then refer to the relatively large amount of valuables demanded. As a matter of fact, the act of gathering chaff, etc., is practically and physically identical with the act of picking up rings, etc. A difficulty stands in the way of this explanation, however; [131] the expression is not -aola walo, but eola walo, or eola bošimbá not only for this particular payment but also, mutatis mutandis, for the various payments and presents connected with marriage, such as funeral payments and gifts given at the time of death. (1)

In any case the term walo has not the slightest etymological connection with the word walí, "spouse," nor with the root -bal, "to marry."

1. The expression tumba walo is also used.

1. This verb -eola indicates rather the quantity of objects picked up and is used in many other combinations. A noun njeló means "a large number of objects" (especially fish).

2. The nature of walo valuables

583x The walo primarily consists of copper and brass rings. Wrought [301] metal objects (bifeko), such as spears, knives, or axes are also added.
[326] Nowadays a part may be made up of simple brass or iron (steel) bars.
[435] Goats may be given in addition; a she-goat is worth 5 to 6 rings (nowadays 10), and a he-goat, 3 to 4 bakonga (nowadays 6 to 7). One or more elónjɛ bells are greatly prized as gifts.

583x
435 Payment in iron or copper chains (bengɛ́-nyola), in various kinds of bead necklaces, and in leopard's teeth has almost entirely disappeared. Formerly, certain kinds of beads had great value; the big, round bluish-white ones (lonyɔ́ngu, pl. nnyɔ́ngu) were worth 1 konga each, the big, oblong blackish ones, cylindrical or rectangular in shape, 2 to 3 centimeters in diameter and 5 to 10 centimeters long (called nkángɛ́) were worth one slave or, nowadays, 20 to 25 bakonga each.

583x Copper (konga) and brass (kɔ́ngo) are the most important of all. Thus paying the bride price is often referred to as ɛnga la kɔ́ngo la konga.

The statement by R.P. Kaptein (in Congo, 1922, Vol. 1, pp.
[114] 452-543) that original valuables were the benkata, the bingetele, and the mitako is based on an error. [132] The first two types of valuables, also called bendɔ́ngu by some tribes, were used exclusively by the Ntómbɛ of Lake Tumba and the adjacent Ekonda (Bosanga, Balɛ́ngó, Lonyanyanga, etc.). The mitako, known in Lonkundo as ngelo, [436] singular longelo, are not native; this monetary unit was introduced by the Independent State.

The practice of making the payment at least partially in [177] money or in objects of European origin (such as fabrics, blankets, sewing machines, trunks, household utensils, etc.) is gradually being introduced. Before the crisis it was already very popular among "white people."

3. The source of the valuables

A young man obtains the valuables for the bride price in various ways. The most usual way and the one which also conforms best to the Nkundó's familial and social regulations is the use of valuables 583 received as bride price for a sister, aunt, niece, cousin, etc.

If he has no female relatives (ofóanyí, bomona), or if no bride price to which he is entitled remains, he may receive a part or all of the needed capital from his father. The various members of his family each obtain either 2, 5, or from 10 to 20 rings for him [454] that they have been able to save from bride prices they have received or which they have acquired as belonga (see Chapter VI, Article V, 1), as any kind of remuneration (for work, for judging in a palaver, for mediation as nkonga, etc.), the sale price for animals, streams, or ponds, or as damages or settlement of some debt.

585 602 Indeed the worst mischance that may befall a man in love is not to have a bride price readily available and to have to set out in search of the necessary valuables anywhere he can find them. These trips take a good deal of time. For these things are not done with the great speed of nervous Europeans. He cannot simply send a message [133] to uncle X or to the husband of aunt Y, or even go to them and explain the purpose of the visit, and expect to be able to leave at once with a present. His hosts keep him for days and weeks. "Wait a bit, I will find some for you; stay a while longer, then we'll see; it's been so long since we've seen you, you can't leave so fast," etc. Quite often in fact it is entirely in the young man's interest not to leave in a hurry; he must sometimes perform a great many small services for them to win their good will, and it is even expected that he will perform larger tasks such as helping with clearing, building a hut, hunting, etc. A European would need the patience of an angel. But even the young natives, who are sometimes relatively nervous and excited, especially because they want to conclude the matter of the bride price, and who in any case do not as yet possess the calm of the older people to whom they go, must be capable of resignation and perseverance. Hence the proverbs: lokámo ntfúundólólá bakonga ndá [539] lifaya, "haste will not dig up rings in foreign territory" (bakonga are often buried in the ground for better safekeeping -- a useful precaution particularly in the past, when there were brawls between villages, and raids), and bomwa w'ìnkfóf ntfóingólólá bakonga ndá lokendo, "a child's mouth does not unroll rings in the course of travels" ("unroll" -- that is, from the feet of the wife of the relative being visited).

583 602 Thus there is no special family treasure upon which the various members can draw to obtain wives. But since bride prices paid out generally come from bride prices received, and all the wealth which comes to the family as such (that is, which is not the result of purely individual and personal work by one member) is to some extent owned by the members in common, it may be said in a sense that all the members of a family share rights in the wealth of the group. However, their rights exist only to the [124] extent of their kinship and as regulated by the family council.

Even members of the family who are not legally required to do so are not unwilling to give to a relative whatever portion they can save for him. Nevertheless, I know of isolated instances where assistance was refused, either out of avarice or of opposition to the proposed marriage. But such a refusal is a neglect of the duties of kinship, and its gravity depends on the relationship between the individuals involved. (1) A refusal on the part of the mother's family almost never occurs. For they have been enriched by the bride price received for the young man's mother, and consequently he is always entitled to the bride price paid for one of the daughters of his mother's nkita (a nkita is a woman obtained by means of the bride price that has been paid).

583 604 Therefore he goes to his maternal uncle (nyangō-mpámé (2) or nya-ngóbóka among the Wángatá, Bokála, and Lifumba). This uncle always helps him, whether his means are great or small. Under certain conditions the nephew may even claim rights over his uncle's harem. But here we must distinguish between different cases. (Let us

1. Remember what has already been said, namely that we must always clearly distinguish among duties imposed by law and those imposed by kinship, friendship, decorum, courtesy, and social proprieties.

2. Literally, "male mother."

585 604 not forget that we are speaking of a young man who has not yet received a wife in his own clan.)

1) The uncle has priority rights if he has only one wife, even if she is the nkita of the nephew's mother. If that wife cannot live in peace with her husband, however, and if she is always trying to break up the marriage and go to another man, the husband's family can itself intervene and assign the wife to the nephew, if the couple love each other. By this means they try to prevent her from going elsewhere; it is preferable that she remain within the kin group. For if the marriage is broken and she leaves them, the family becomes involved in a long restitution process, [125] giving rise to numerous difficulties and to an end of revenue -- if that expression can be used -- from bride-price valuables.

2) If his uncle has two wives, the nephew can claim rights only over the one acquired by means of his own mother's bride price. The exception cited under item 1) holds even more true in this case.

In the two situations cited above, however, the family tries to appease the nephew by assigning to him the expected bride price of a female cousin. They do not yield to his demands unless no other solution is available.

3) If his uncle has several wives (four, five, or more), the nephew has the right to take one of them, if none of them were acquired by means of the bride price paid for the uncle's sister, that is, the nephew's mother.

585 604 428 If any of these eventualities materialize, the nephew is required to leave his father's clan (wisé) and to enter his mother's family (bonyangó). Actually, he is not averse to doing so. For we may suppose that in his father's kin group he has neither wealth nor future, while in that of his uncle he finds all he needs. He is considered his uncle's own child, and even has seniority over his cousins. He is their father (isé) and consequently has precedence over them; and he can succeed his uncle as family patriarch. Moreover, upon his uncle's death he always inherits one of his widows and becomes the first -- and often the only -- successor after the brothers of the deceased. (1)

1. This inheritance right is valid even if he continues to live in his own clan, in which case, however, it is impossible for him to become the chief or only heir.

593 609 These rights prevail even if the nephew has wealth at home. In that case -- which is extremely rare since ordinarily he prefers to remain with his own clan -- he does not make use of them if his uncle has only two or three wives (whom, however, he can inherit), [596] or if other close relatives [136] are in need. For to do so would show a great lack of affection for the family ([illegible]), and he would be severely reprimanded.

Because of all that, the nephew ([illegible], "sister's son") sometimes abuses his rights. That is the basis for the following proverbs: [illegible], "the leopard takes the owner of the hunting enclosure" (that is to say, the hunter); [illegible], "the nephew abducts the uncle's wife even in his own domain"; [illegible], "a nephew is a stick overhead." This last proverb is the Nkundo version of the sword of Damocles.

In short, a nephew has a right to the assistance of his maternal uncle if he settles with him and is adopted by him. Upon the death of his uncles he becomes heir and head of the family. But his rights are second to those of his uncle's brothers, who are also his "mothers." If he remains in his own clan, he receives help and can even obtain the bride price of one of his female cousins born of his mother's [illegible]. He may even receive part of the inheritance, if it is large. His rights are based on the fact that his uncle was enriched by the valuables given him by the nephew's clan in payment for his sister's marriage.

593 596 Finally, if a young man does not even have any close relatives, because all are deceased, and if for some reason he has no patrimony (because of dissipation, debts, exploitation of the weak by the strong), he is forced to procure the bride price through his own labor: carving, hunting, fishing, setting elephant snares, making traps and hunting enclosures, clearing fields, or, nowadays, working in the service of the Whites. In former times there was also the possibility of war or raids by which he could obtain valuables or prisoners to sell as slaves. The wealth which someone acquires by his own work is called [illegible] ([illegible], etc.) [illegible] (literally, "by the strength of his arms"). [137]

4. The amount of the walo

583* Formerly the amount of the walo averaged 20 to 30 bakonga, or their equivalent. The value of any object included in the bride [436] price could be calculated in copper, so that the konga was, so to speak, the monetary unit of the Nkundó.

At the present time in the districts near Flandria, the minimum is from 55 to 60 rings. Among the Bolɔngɛ and the Injɔlɔ the rings [434] are noticeably bigger and their weight in copper or brass is greater; there the minimum can be 30 rings. Elsewhere the figure is a good deal higher.

The price of the walo generally exceeds the minimum, which is found rather rarely. The average is about 60 to 80 rings. The number of 200 is reached only in extremely rare cases and it is exceeded even less frequently (see cases given below).

Differences in the amount of the walo are due primarily to the relative wealth of the contracting parties, the husband's valuation of his wife, the greed of the latter's parents, and the size of the bride price demanded for the woman they want to obtain with their daughter's (sister's) bride price. The cases of women who have left their previous husbands also must not be forgotten, for the new bride price must serve to reimburse him.

The amount of the walo may also be increased to satisfy the [556] vanity of the woman, who wants to appear superior to her companions, or of the husband, who wants to be recognized as very wealthy. (1)

1. The man who pays a great deal for his wife is given the honorific epithet etɔ́kobwo, "wells and mushrooms." All can find as much water as they want at wells, and there the mushrooms multiply. Thus many can benefit from the riches brought by the son-in-law.

[578] It is not unusual to hear of a woman boasting in the course of a dispute: "I am not a slave; my husband paid so-and-so much for me. [130] But you -- your husband doesn't love you, or else he is poor, for he paid only so much."

583 The husband has a second reason for making the walo large: by this means he can bind his wife and his in-laws more closely to him. For the larger the walo, the more difficult it would be to reimburse the husband and therefore to break the marriage. Thus a man will pay a larger amount for a woman he cares for particularly. For their part, his parents-in-law will say: "We must remain on good terms with our son-in-law, for he is generous and wealthy." And if there is a palaver in the household and their daughter wants to leave -- or actually leaves -- her husband, they will be all the more inclined to do everything in their power to smooth out the differences and make her return to her husband's house. They will say, "We have collected so many valuables from him, how would we find the means of reimbursing him?"

583 587 If a daughter remarries, her parents can demand not only the amount required to reimburse her first husband, but also a supplement for themselves. It is not considered proper to ask too much, however; 10 or 15 rings are usually enough. It follows that a woman's bride price rises with the number of husbands she has had.

583 The chief reason for the amount of the walo being reduced has always been, and still is, the payment of the bosongo (see Article IX) at the same time with, or immediately after, the walo. It explains the low walo payments in cases 21, 25, 27 and 28b in the list which follows. Nowadays there may be new reasons. Among Christians, for example, a brother may want to help his widowed sister so that she will not have too long to wait before remarrying; or orphans born somewhere in a distant center may have been more or less abandoned by their families (as in case 17). To give some idea of the walo amounts, 583 [illegible] I have copies a few cases out of our bride-price records of Flandria Mission. Next to the women's names I have indicated their tribe of origin, then the amount paid for them (in bakonga), and finally the year of marriage. [120] The numbers at the left denote their order in our books. (1)

1. These records are kept because we require that at least the walo be paid before the marriage is celebrated. I should point out that, in an isolated instance, the [illegible] may have been included in the amount given for the walo.

585 In the second register only three out of sixty-eight cases show a payment of over 100 bakonga (no. 24: 121; no. 44: 120; no. 66: 120); there is one Wangata-[illegible] case of a payment of 202 (no. 10). The latter like the Bombomba have raised the amount of the bride price above 200; they imitate the Elenda, who have really misused the freedom brought by the white men (see Article XI, 2).

5. Paying the walo

585 On the day agreed upon, the young man, his father, and the ndonga go to the home of the fiancée's parents. Other close relatives make sure to attend this remarkable event if they are not detained elsewhere. After the usual greetings but before any other step is taken, the woman's family offers the ndonga a dish of bananas and some animal food (often bonfumbe, bor, or bokilo fish). Then they give the husband various foods: meat or smoked fish (a basketful, for instance), several bunches of bananas, and then, through the medium of the ndonga, a dog, a goat, and some hens which must be included in the nkomi (see Article VII).

Then they inquire for news, that is, they begin to explain and discuss the matter of the bride price. If the woman's family is not satisfied, the discussion is prolonged, and the young man adds the supplement required (usually such a possibility is foreseen in advance and some extra valuables are left with a relative or associate). Sometimes certain rings or knives are not considered suitable; then two may be counted as one, for example, or the objects that have been refused are replaced with others of better quality.

The ndonga places the valuables in front of the group of the woman's relatives.

It is not indispensable that the woman and her fiancé be present. Thus it sometimes occurs that one or the other of the pair is absent. But such cases are very rare and usually occur [142] if it is very difficult for the individual to be present because, for example, he or she is in the service of a European, or if they themselves do not want to lose a few days or weeks and are sure that their respective fathers get along very well with each other so that everything will go beautifully. Usually, the couple themselves want to be there as much as their parents want them to be, for this is a very important matter.

583* 587 If the woman has not yet publicly given her consent because -- as may happen in the case of remarriage after a divorce -- ikulɛ, ndonga, and walo are all being paid at the same time, she now performs that ceremony. We need not describe it again; it is performed as indicated in Article III, 2. But in this instance the woman hands her father one or two rings, or a ring and a knife.

579* 585 Subsequently, the ndonga conveys the valuables to the woman's parents. He asks the husband: yɛlɛ bɛfɛmba lá walo, "bring the walo valuables." The latter replies: "Here they are; hand them over to my father-in-law." The witness takes a few rings and places them in front of the latter, or rather he touches them and makes a gesture of pushing them toward the woman's parents, and they pull them toward themselves.

As soon as the walo is paid, the bompɛka becomes walɛ or "wife." As has already been said, this word has no connection with walo, or with the root bal, "to marry"; etymologically it is related to analogous terms denoting "wife" and "woman" in other Bantu languages.

Article V. Valuables for the Mother

583* 593 Directly after he has conveyed the walo valuables to the woman's father, the ndonga asks the husband to pay the valuables for her mother: yɛlɛ ntaa la nkando [142] yǎ nyang'ěy'ǒna, "bring the goat and the nkando for the child's mother." The following gifts are given:

1) At least one nanny goat and sometimes two or more according to the situation; never a billy-goat.

[301] 2) Two nkando, which are copper spirals worn on the legs. Formerly, two more for the arms were also required, and old women are still sometimes seen wearing them, but they have become much rarer than the spirals worn on the legs. Instead of nkando, the Elingɛ, the Wǎngata, the Bakɔ́la, and the Ionda use the term mongɛ. (1)

---

1. In Lokonda the term is njɛkɛ.

593x 3) In the past the mother was also entitled to a bongombwɛ 431 or bongombwɛ (depending on the dialect) (2) a heavy copper necklace.
[301]

2. The Lokonda term is lonkaɛ.

It was worth 5 bakonga. Nowadays this type of adornment has disappeared almost entirely. It is no longer demanded, for the mother prefers more interesting objects (see the following article).

Furthermore, at the present time substitutions for the goat and the nkando are being asked for in the form of shoes, suits, fabrics, etc.

The mother justifies her demands by recalling the suffering she has endured in bringing her daughter into the world and bringing her up. The valuables she receives belong exclusively to her and her family; they never pass into her husband's clan. She wears the nkando herself, or, if she already has some, she gives them to her sister or her brother, who may have need of them for his wife's bride price. The goats she similarly keeps or gives to her family, depending on her own preferences. Upon her death these valuables are inherited by her relatives, never by her husband or even her own children.

Obviously, the mother's clan has exclusive rights over this payment.

[586] The situation does not change if the mother divorces the girl's [432] father and is married to another man. The "mother's" valuables [144] still belong to her. Even if the separation occurs before her daughter's marriage, she retains her rights to nyang'ëy'ëna.

If she dies before her daughter's marriage, the valuables to which she would have been entitled are given to the representative of her clan (her father, brother, sister, uncle, etc.)

[587] In case of divorce the husband must be reimbursed for these valuables as for all the rest; but the restitution must be made by the mother's clan, who has received them.

If the husband does not have the valuables for the mother on hand, he gives her a pledge for the payment (wéko; verb, ékya), consisting of one or two knives or bakonga. He could never settle 585ˣ 431 a palaver concerning the bride price without giving at least this pledge. He will then fulfill this obligation as quickly as possible, because most mothers-in-law are so eager for this payment that if the son-in-law is too slow in giving them satisfaction, they do everything to break up the marriage. And often they succeed. They will win their case before the tribunal, unless they have been too short of patience.

Article VI. Presents, or beɛ́ngo

After the bulk of the bride price has been paid to the wife's mother and father, her parents as well as various other members of the family demand various small payments and presents called beɛ́ngo (sing. boɛ́ngo) from the husband. The noun is derived from the verb -bɛ́nga which is only used with it. An analogous reciprocal form, [92] -bɛ́ngana means "to touch one another, to collide." Was the original meaning of -bɛ́nga "to attract to oneself?" Or are the two verbs totally unconnected etymologically? Whatever the case, these terms are also used to denote the remuneration received by judges for settling a dispute. [145]

There are many varieties of beɛ́ngo; some are used by particular groups and unknown elsewhere. The various relatives claim them without following any predetermined order. But in any case it is necessary to go through the ndonga. Each relative therefore tells him what he wishes in a voice loud enough for everyone present to hear; and it is the ndonga who passes the request on to the husband. "Give this or that boɛ́ngo to so-and-so," he will say. Note also that the payment of these beɛ́ngo is not absolutely essential. Often requests are only partially fulfilled; others may be refused with some excuse, "In-law, I cannot satisfy you; I do not possess such an object." Thus the marriage arrangement is neither hindered nor delayed because everybody cannot be satisfied. The principal boɛ́ngo for the father (1) and sometimes that of the mother (2) are exceptions.

Let us go into some of the particulars concerning the various beɛ́ngo thus requested:

1) Ifaká l'ásongá b'ís'éyána, "knife and spears for the girl's father." This consists of a knife and five spears (or more, depending 583 on the husband's wealth). Theoretically, the knife should be an efambe.

431 In practice it is sometimes possible to substitute an empfite in an [412] attractive wooden sheath amply adorned with "copper-plated nails." At other times the knife and spears may be replaced by their corresponding value in bokonga. This is considered the most important [675] bofngo, and therefore no one gives up his claim to it. If the son-in-law cannot present it to his father-in-law immediately, he promises to do so later, and his father-in-law does not fail to make use of any opportunity to remind him of his promise. Some men insist on a walo as pledge. Others are satisfied with a piece of loasi or a bosongo (splinter or part of the trunk of a palm tree), which the husband gives to the ndonga as a token of acknowledgement of his debt and as evidence of his willingness to pay it as soon as he has the means. Some men, however, insist so strongly on the bofngo that they will not accept the walo [146] before they have received it. Thus, one day recently, Lomenga à'Ilonó (Bongili) refused to accept the walo for his daughter Ekofo, engaged to Bokungó w'ankóyó (of Bongili, Ndongó). He insisted that the father of the latter, Bokungó w'is'éy'ongilió first go back to get his bofngo. Since he was unable to find five spears, he substituted for them a second knife and a copper ring; these were accepted by old Lomenga. Shortly thereafter the same thing happened to Bokungó of Boonola (Bongili), who wanted to pay the walo for his fiancée Ngolé of Bofinko (Bombwanja), the sister of Bongondé, clerk of the Bombwanja. The woman's family refused to take the bride price before receiving the ilaká l'akongó b'is'éy'óne bofngo.

11 Byákó byá nyang'éy'óna, "porcupines for the mother."
[251] This present consists of two or three fresh or smoked porcupine. Bosomba, baasó birds, or bokóba fish may be substituted for them. The substitution of hens is not well regarded, because they are within the realm of the nkomí. If someone does not have the means to satisfy this requirement, he gives the mother two copper rings saying ndiká bakonga báfé yósomba byákó bíkó, "here are two copper rings; go and buy yourself some porcupines." Fabrics are sometimes substituted nowadays.

One must be careful not to confuse this bosongo with biko byǎ nyang'ëy'ŏna, an expression frequently heard. The latter includes any payment to the mother and includes the goat and the nkando as well as the bosongo discussed above and others. The word used in this case is not bikó, singular ikó, "porcupine," but rather biko, singular wiko, "price, value" and derived from the verb -ika, "to set a price."

3) Lokolé: a brother or a cousin of the wife asks for a bonga. He beats the gong (lokolé) in order to make noise and thus force the husband to satisfy him. That is how this bosongo seems to have originated. In practice people simply demand a [147] present. The racket can sometimes last for quite a while. But the elders do not allow the gathering to be disrupted if the husband does not have precisely the gift that would give satisfaction.

4) Bakolé, or bofufwé: the woman's brothers stick a piece of the trunk of a banana tree (bofufwé) into the ground, so that young relatives of the husband may shoot arrows (bakolé) at it. These are then removed by young members of the wife's family who, at the present time, are sometimes given money -- 5 francs, for instance.

5) Wamólé: prisoner's rope, that is, a rope to which war prisoners were formerly tied, two by two (a system now imitated for prisoners of the colonial law enforcement agencies and administration). In the past the patriarch, or head of the family, demanded a bonga or a knife as indemnity against the possibility that he or members of his family might be imprisoned as a result of a war caused by the woman being married. Nowadays the chiefs set up by the administration and given the rights of family heads by the European authority have also claimed rights to this bosongo whose significance, purpose, and even name have completely changed as a result. It is now called bonyolio w'ôkanji, "the chief's chain." It is clear that this payment has become something which it was not meant to be.

[illegible]
[illegible]

6) Etóka: a heavy wooden fork, fastened to the neck. This is a present claimed by the mother, by one of the father's other wives, or by a wife of the woman's brother, against the possibility that they may have to undergo torture by means of the fork because of the woman whose bride price is being paid. This could happen if she were

[585] to leave her husband and he, in revenge, were to lay hands on her [591] mother or on one of the other wives of the clan. (1) [148]

1. See Chapter VI, Article VII, 4, (1), and Chapter VIII, Article II, 1.

[524] 7) Lomeló, a wide shoulder strap made of fur or braided bekumbu reeds (Calamus sp.), though valuables of equal worth (one knife or a bonge) may be given. Nowadays this bofongo consists of 2 or 3 rings; it goes to the mother in compensation for the wearying burden of carrying and nursing her daughter. (1)

1. Note that when a mother-in-law brings a child into the world, her son-in-law sends her a shoulder strap of lienge otterskin or a bonge of equivalent value. He does not repeat this gift at each birth, however.

[583] 8) Bonfosó byâ ntod: leaves of the bonkongé bush used to remove, wipe off, and carry away (tóta) a child's excrement. This bofongo consists of a ring and goes to the mother as compensation for her performance of these tasks. In the absence of the mother, it is claimed by another of the father's wives or by a female relative of the mother.

[583] 9) The bojingá, "hunting net," is demanded in many villages for no special reason. Certain clans, however, scoffed at by others because they have few members, officially ask a man belonging to one of the latter and wishing to marry one of their daughters to bring a net, saying: "You make fun of us because we have no people; bring us a hunting net to surround and enclose us, since we are not many." Thus the village of Boyela of the Bokála, never gives one of its members in marriage without this bofongo.

[583] 10) wéngé w'ekeé: a bofongo which is not known everywhere but which is customary in certain groups, for example among the Bokála. One of the woman's relatives takes a piece of a young thorny trunk of the wéngé tree. Having scraped one end of it, he holds this 583* end in his hand and offers the other to the husband, saying, "Take it."

431 The husband naturally refuses and extricates himself by means of a knife or a piece of copper. [149]

11) Bofongo w'Éyao, or "weeds." These are demanded by some clans because the husband's clan scoffs at them on account of the number of weeds and chaff they allow to grow in their village instead of keeping it clean. One or two rings are given.

12) Engumbé: known in some groups, such as the Bakáala, where it is the last one demanded. It is a bofongo of authority. (1) [62] 1. An engumbé is a temporary hut in a newly settled village. The family patriarchs are the first who must go and live there in order to urge the others to follow and to exorcise all the evil of possible magic spells.

claimed by the patriarchs of the families belonging to the grouping from which the woman has come. Formerly, the amount went as high as 3 to 5 bakonga, depending on the number of families, groups of families, or clans related through marriage that were living in the [77] same village. Now the payment is made primarily in European currency, and the amount may be 50 francs, for example. This bofongo is later divided among the various kin groupings related to the wife's family.

Various male and female relatives of the woman ask for assorted small objects, such as a small knife (ilféka), a native razor (longé), a pin for braiding hair (bonfongé), a needle (nsongé), a necklace of blue beads (bisongóla), etc.

Nowadays many other objects are also demanded: clothing, dishes, etc. Thus, one day on the occasion of a single bride-price payment, I heard demands for the following objects:

For the father, a pair of trousers and a jacket, because when the woman was a young child she soiled his clothing without troubling herself about the matter.

For the mother, a bed, because worries about her daughter often kept her from resting.

583* For an aunt, a basin, because she had washed the child.

431 For a brother, a pair of shoes or slippers, because the girl had worn his shoes during the courtship, etc., etc. [150]

All these befongo are included in the sum total of the bride price. Should the occasion arise, they must be returned with the rest.

In addition to the befongo asked for and received by the woman's relatives, others are demanded by members of the husband's family. As in the case of the former each person voices his claims according to his desires and without any predetermined order but must always do so through the ndonga. The gifts chiefly consist of furs of the [illegible] esofo otter, the lifoka monkey, bonkofo and yonsi felines; a joint of game (monkey, antelope, etc.), a mat, a pot, a hunting net, a carrying bag (bokonole), a bead necklace, etc. Nowadays these may [illegible] also be various items introduced by the Europeans: items of clothing, fabrics, saucepans, dishes, etc. This category of befongo is included in the sum total of the nkomi (see the following article). If the nkomi is given immediately, the parties proceed with this payment. Then the ndonga(s) are remunerated as stated above; each party gives him at least 2 rings.

Finally, the woman's father says to the husband: "In any case, be on your way; we will collect the nkomi and bring it to you." Whereupon the husband leaves; if he prefers to wait for his wife he remains, and returns home when the items of the nkomi have been collected.

Article VII. Nkomi

Nkomi is the name for the objects which the wife's family gives to the husband. The term likomo is also sometimes used. The [illegible] Injolo say likoma, the Wangata, Bakala, Ioanda, and Bolongo say likomi. All these words are derived from the same verb -koma, "to wrap up, to make a package," (1) for the nkomi valuables are

1. The Bolo say lilonga from the verb -longa, which has the same meaning as -koma.

95* generally packed in baskets or [131] in bongenja (or betete), which 96 are baskets woven of palm leaves.

Some ethnologists have introduced the expression douaire, "dowry," (1) to designate the goods given by the woman's family to

1. See for example Tardy, in Africa, Vol. 2, no. 3, p. 278.

the man's family. Actually, the word dot would be a much better translation, because it corresponds more closely to the nature of these payments. But this would require changing the terminology adopted, and the introduction of another term (such as marriage payment) for what is generally understood by the word dot, whose use is in any case unfortunate. [Translator's note: Hulstaert uses dot, which would literally be translated into English as "dowry," to designate the payments mad by the husband and his family to the wife's family. However, I h employed the term "bride price" in accordance with the usage of English-speaking anthropologists.]

Furthermore, the word douaire already has a precise and accepted meaning, so that its use in this context would lead to confusion. That is why I prefer provisionally to use an entirely new term, and to translate nkomf as contre-dot [literally, counter-dowry]. (2)

2. This term was suggested to me by Attorney General A. Sohier.

[Translator's note: The term "dowry" has been used to designate this payment in the translation.]

The nkomf consists of hens, ducks (3), salt, mats, pots, gourds

[illegible] 3. Ducks have been introduced fairly recently; the Nkundo maintain that their ancestors did not have any, and that they got them from the Ekonda. In their classification they place them under the category of chickens.

593 and, if the woman's family is wealthy, a goat and formerly even a 431 slave. Nowadays, objects of European manufacture are also given.

To give the impression of being a great lord, an unusually [567] wealthy family head sometimes gave human beings as a dowry. These were preferably Batswá or, if possible, dependents (bitúmbá) who only changed masters up to a certain point. Actually it was the father's intention to glorify his daughter by turning them over to her; they had to assist her through various services, and her descendants became their "owners."

Thus Mpumu, one of the ancestors of the Bofaló (of the Bonwanja tribe) had received the slave, Bosiéfbali, as part of the nkomi from Ilefó, father of his wife, [132] Lifomi of Mbilingá (Lifoló, Ekonda). The descendants of this slave comprise the Bosiéfbasiléfé and Bonoba clan [sic], who have settled with the Bosikojo and the Bongangé. (1)

1. See also the example cited in Chapter III, Article V.

593 Even real estate can be included in the nkomi. Thus a fish-431 ing territory (such as a stream, creek, pond, fishing holes) or a sec-
425 tion of a palm grove may be given (2). Like the gift of human beings,

2. But never land or forests.

such property is given only by a very wealthy family head. If he is not sole owner (and in practice he can be only in the case of fishing territory), he must obtain in advance the consent of the co-owners, whether they be brothers or heads of other families. Since it must be assumed that he is intelligent enough not to give away a piece of property which they themselves need, he always obtains their consent. In fact, anyone who opposed the gift would be considered to have acted maliciously toward the woman, who is also his "daughter," in depriving her of this source of pride.

The objects given as nkomi are the property of the husband. The greatest part of it he gives to his wife's nkolo, that is to the 583 female relative thanks to whom he was able to obtain this wife (see 431 below, Article X). He keeps a small part for himself and, in agree-596 ment with his wife, uses it according to his needs. When husband and wife are on good terms, he consults her before giving away or selling any of it. And if she wishes to dispose of any of it, she asks his permission. Thus they work the matter out aimiably. But legally it all belongs to the husband. Should he want to use it for gifts or for any payment of his own, his wife can make no claim; she will not win her case before the law. But from a practical point of view, it is much wiser to come to an agreement in advance and thus avoid any annoyance 583 or quarrel.

431 The size of the nkomí depends on the wealth of the woman's [586] parents. Not only is a large one a point [152] of honor and esteem;
[519] it is also a means of increasing the stability of the marriage and securing harmony. The bigger the nkomí the more obliged the husband is to treat his wife well and see that she is content with him, out of fear of having to return the entire fortune if the marriage should ever be broken.

The nkomí may be very large, even as great or greater than the bride price; in these extreme cases the girl is spoken of as [192] lifaya-njoku, for like an elephant (njoku) she goes to live elsewhere (lifaya) because of all the riches she carries with her. The term njokwobwo is also used; literally, it refers to a kind of mushroom which grows in abundance all over the bonfil tree. (1)

> 1. The use of these terms is not specifically confined to the situation described above. They are also applied to any stranger who settles in, or simply passes through, the village, bringing many riches -- to the white men, for example.

576 With reference to this subject an old custom should be men-583 tioned. Because of his love for his daughter and a desire for renown, 431 a father might give his son-in-law a quantity of bakonga, in varying amounts but enough to pay for the acquisition of a wife, hence bride-price valuables, so to speak.

583[x] Although given by the father-in-law to his son-in-law and therefore 431 part of the nkomɛ, yet these valuables have neither their significance
586 nor their purpose. They are disbursed at the time of the payment of the ikulɛ. This practice was customary only among men who were unusually wealthy and influential, that is, family heads who occupied prominent positions in native society. It was never omitted for a bolɔ́mbɔ́ (see Chapter I, Part 2, Article II). The woman's father gave these valuables to his son-in-law, saying: "I am giving you my daughter in marriage. She has always occupied a high position; she is of a very good family. I want her to retain her prominent rank. Therefore here is a bride price; go and get yourself a second wife with these rings, so that my daughter will have her ukita [154] from the very first day. Then come back and pay me the bride price for her."

The woman who was honored by such preferential treatment was called yɛ̌ngaende. This word is composed of the roots ɛ́ng, "to acquire by means of a bride price," and ende, "a man (vir)." The name comes from the fact that she herself paid the price for her husband, so to speak, and did so even before he paid the bride price for her.

The Nkundɔ́ have given up this manner of ostentatiously dis-[178] playing their wealth, so that the custom we have just described now belongs to the past. Nevertheless there are still women who bear the [551] name Yɛ̌ngaende, in memory of some ancestor who had been the object of this honor which put her in a privileged position, a royal position, so to speak.

583[x] From all the foregoing it will be apparent that marriage payments are not unilateral in Nkundɔ́ law and practice. Rather, there is a mutual handing over of goods. Although the goods given by each party differ clearly from one another, they all have an economic and financial value. Therefore we can speak of a real reciprocity in these payments. And although the husband has to furnish the largest and highest amount, it would be wrong to say that he alone must "pay for his spouse," for though he does actually "pay for his wife," she must to a certain extent "pay for her husband." That is what the 583x Nkundó often express through the reciprocal form -ánga, bokiló l'okanga bé-ngana, "father-in-law and son-in-law are acquired through marriage payments." Thus many men try to come as close as possible to the amount of the bride price in the nkomí payment, so that there will be a certain balance between the two. Then to keep that balance between the assets, every payment of the bride price is equaled by new nkomí valuables. The purpose of this action is to equalize the influence of the two contracting parties lest that of one become excessive and predominant, a development which is not always conducive to the stability of the marriage and harmonious relations.

Article VIII. Acceptance of the Bride Price

583x
596 When the husband, his family, and the ndonga have departed, the valuables brought are collected and placed before the woman's father. In the family hierarchy this task falls to the father's sons and younger brothers. Then the elders deliberate on how to use them. They bend down (bósunama), as the Nkundó say in their metaphorical language. Here as in all gatherings of family councils and deliberations of any jury, the father is asked to give his opinion. But without even making a statement, he immediately yields the floor to someone to whom he owes respect -- his elder brother, his nephew (that is, his sister's son), etc. The latter does likewise, yielding to the next person, and so the process continues. Finally, the father is again asked to speak; he asks the others each to take from the heap whatever object he wants whether it be a ring, a knife, or a spear. Together with the family patriarch he decides what to do with the bride price that has been received. They have to act in accordance with the laws of justice in protecting the rights of all and of each individual (see below, Article X).

583x What happens if the parents do not accept the bride price placed before them? Such a thing can happen. The following is a recent case: Etanda, daughter of Isia of Esókolokóló (Bolénge, Bakáala) was engaged to Eanga of Bofeka l'Asumba (Wángatá), who had paid the ikulá and the ndanga for her. At the time of the walo 583 payment when all were gathered, the ndanga gave the woman's father 50 bekonga. Ilia did not accept them because he did not think that his daughter's union with Eanga promised sufficient [154] stability. Therefore he asked the ndanga to keep the valuables as deposit until the day the union became strong. Events showed that Ilia was right. Barely a few months later the pair broke up. The ndanga returned the valuables to Eanga's father, and the marriage never took place. In the native view, the walo had not been paid in this case, since the woman's father had not accepted the valuables. Therefore one could not say it was a real marriage.

583 581 Though such cases are not common, this occurrence is not unique and shows how seriously the natives take the matter of marriage. Their attitude is far removed from the one attributed to them by certain writers. It is only that the freedom resulting from colonization destroys ancestral rules and sanctions without replacing them with at least their equivalent, bringing about a state of moral and social disorder in this sphere and giving free rein to lust.

583 Up to the present we have examined the three payments known as ikulɛ, ndanga, and walo, as well as the mother's valuables. Together with the bekóngo, they are grouped under the inclusive term jéngɛ, which also covers other payments such as gifts of welcome to the fiancée, presents on the occasion of later visits, etc. In practice, therefore, the term includes all the payments except the final one, as yet to be discussed. Strictly speaking, it signifies payments made in order to obtain a wife, exclusive of subsequent payments.

Jéngɛ is derived from the verb root éng, which means to make the marriage payments, to acquire a wife by means of them. It is impossible to translate these terms into a French or English equivalent, so we are forced to use expressions which are more or less inappropriate, such as "pay," "obtain," "acquire," "buy," "payment," "purchase," etc., and which have entirely different equivalents in Lonkundo. Therefore, never maintain before a Nkundó that his people buy [157] their wives; he will express great indignation at such a monstrosity. His word for "buy," is sómb, and in his mind it has nothing in common with éng or sɔ́ng (see below).

587] The expression for being the object of a bride-price payment is kug bakonid, literally, "to make valuables fall." Hence the name Ôtwákonid, "one who is the object of a payment of valuables."

As we have said, it is possible to make all the payments described at the same time. This is done only in the case of remarriage. All the valuables are handed over at the same time, and there is no longer any distinction between the three payments.

Article IX. The bosóngo

1. The nature of the bosóngo and the relevant terminology

The bosóngo is the last portion of the bride price. It consists of the payment of a slave or the equivalent value in currency. Hence the very common term bonto, which strictly speaking means "man" but is used to mean "slave" ("He is only a man," they say; that is to say, a slave; nfíta la bonto, la linto, "I possess him as a slave"). The word which actually means "slave," bokwéla, or bontambo among the Elíngá and the Bolyá, (1) is never used in relation to the bride price.

1. Elsewhere the terms bofumbo or bifumbo are also used.

The Ekonda, however, do use the term ilongó, which is a synonym of bokwéla and means "slave" in the strict sense of the word. The neighboring Nkundó tribes also use it, probably as a result of their influence. The Bombwanja, the Bongili, the Bokuwo, and the Bombomba likewise do so. (2)

[569] 2. The Batswá never make this payment.

[592] The noun bosóngo (lisóngé among the various Elíngá groups) is derived from sóng, "to pay this part of the bride price." Thus a man will say to his son-in-law, ošólí ôfenga bíko'ôkáná, yákáká yósóngé, "You have already paid the jóngi for my daughter; now come [158] and pay the bosóngo." The definition given by Ruskin (Dictionary of the Lomongo Language, p. 67: "bosóngo: the passing over of a 579* daughter or ward in marriage without reference to her wishes, money paid for a slave wife," and p. 314, [illegible]: the same) therefore does not correspond to the sense in which these terms are used by the Nkundo tribes under discussion.

Another term for this payment is tsinola bonto (lingo'). I know of no other use of the verb tsinola.

An expression which brings out the idea of its being a last payment is bumbola bonto (ligongé). The verb bumbola means to strike the last blow in felling a tree. (1) [112]

1. Note that bumbola also means "to take in marriage."

[567] Formerly, the payment of a real slave, that is, of a human being, was absolutely obligatory. Nowadays, since slavery has been [585] abolished, the worth of a slave in bokonga has been substituted; it consists of 25 rings, or of 15 to 20 if they are especially beautiful. (2)

2. In the past, the price of a slave was from 10 to 15 rings.

To distinguish between these forms of the bosongo, the Nkundo say bont'ôw'aôwé (ligongé y'ôswé), "a slave with hair," therefore a human being, or bont'ôw'akonga (ligongé y'ôkonga), "slave in copper rings."

583* Batswá, instead of slaves, could be given as bosongo. They 565 were not reduced to slavery, however, but remained in the same position as before, except that they changed masters.

Sometimes a master who wanted to be rid of an incorrigible Botswá gave him away as a real slave in a bosongo. In that case it was as if a slave in the strict sense of the word had been given.

In other instances the master acted with the more or less explicit consent of the Botswá. Those who were thus handed over as a bride-price payment were usually women. [158] Since in matrimonial matters of the Batswá, the Boató master fulfills the role of "Father," he is entitled to the girls' bride price and has the duty of 583 obtaining wives for the boys. Therefore he can turn a Botswá girl 563 belonging to him over to his father-in-law. The father-in-law never takes this woman as his wife or as a wife for one of his relatives; but he gives her in marriage to one of his own Batswá or to a stranger of that race who pays him a bride price for her. Socially and financially the result is exactly the same as if the son-in-law had made his payment in the form of a slave.

Thus the bride price paid by Lokonda jw'ĕsano y'ĕnkanja of Ngombe (Bongili) for Bokutu of the Bosáká Elongama (Bosombé, Bombwanja) and used by the latter's cousin, Bofénda of Efékola (Bongili) to obtain for wife, Iloa of Ilóongó (Bongili), consisted of 60 rings and the woman Ómámenga (Antonia) of the Mbélanga clan of Botswá. Ómámenga was later married to Wanja (Pius), a Botswá belonging to her new masters.

[567] There may be two or more slaves, for the same reasons that determine the size of the walo. The Bombwanja are only exceptionally satisfied with a single one. But all the slaves always comprise a single bosóngo.

583 The bosóngo is not part of the jéngí. The natives say bosóngo émí ék'omóngó, "the bosóngo is entirely separate." Their statements on this subject are markedly categorical.

A characteristic expression which designates the entire bride price is bafémbá la bonto, "rings and a man" (slave). The rings are the jéngí; they are valuables of a purely material nature. The bosóngo is, on the contrary, a human being.

There is no term in Lonkundo which covers both kinds of payments. The whole cannot be expressed precisely in a single word.

583 In the vicinity of Flandria, however, the young people [160]
178 are beginning to confuse the two words jéngí and bosóngo and to use one in place of the other. (1) [Editor's note: The confusion today is

1. The young people from Injóló who are about twenty years of age and whom I have known at Flandria Mission and in their own settlements, do not confuse these terms but distinguish clearly between them.

583 178 probably due to the penetration of the Lombwanja dialect and its rather strong influence, even in relation to other words, on the dialect of the Bongili and Bokone, as well as in central Flandria.] Among the Bombwanja, -ɛ́ng and bosongo are synonyms of the Lokɔ́nɔ́ -ɛ́ng, jɛ́ngi. For the payment of a slave they use only the word ilengɛ́ and the expression -lebya ilengɛ́, "to give a slave." But the old people loudly protest against this confusion and consider it an error, a mix-up, a corruption of the language.

583 The bosongo used to be paid at the same time as the walo or shortly thereafter. Nowadays years may pass between the two payments. If the husband is too slow in meeting his obligation, the wife's family complains. Often when their daughter visits her parents, they prevent her from returning to her husband as a means of coercing him into making the payment. As in the case of the jɛ́ngi, it is up to the husband to bring the payment; the wife's family is not expected to fetch it.

We have said that copper rings may be substituted for the slave. No other objects -- such as knives, for example -- come under consideration. If the rings are to be counted as bosongo, they must be explicitly designated as such by the husband or by the ndonga. If the intention is not verbally expressed they will be considered jɛ́ngi, since they are the kind of valuables used for the latter payments.

583 431 The bosongo is the final and definitive bride-price payment. This does not mean that the husband does not thereafter have to pay in certain circumstances. On the contrary, financial transactions are terminated only by death. But [161] subsequent payments spring from other obligations which follow the final completion of the marriage agreement though they result from it. Such are, for instance, the belonga (gifts brought when visiting), valuables given at the time of a death, the nkunji (funeral payment), and assistance to members of the wife's damily (for example, in the settlement of a bride price). Or perhaps the wife's mother comes to help her daughter at childbirth; when she goes back home her son-in-law gives her a farewell present (bolingako), such as 4 bakonga. The statement of natives that the jɛ́ngi never ends -- jɛ́ngi ilifolile elakɛ ńk'iwɛ -- should be interpreted in the light of these practices.

585 * The bońngo must be handed over under any circumstances, even if divorce or death precede it. If a husband refuses to pay he loses his rights over one of the daughters in his wife's family, whose bride price would compensate with interest for the economic and social loss suffered by the woman's clan. (1)

1. See Chapter VIII, Article IV, and Chapter IX, Article IX, 2.

2. The value and consequences of the bońngo

How important is the bońngo today? In answering this question a distinction must be made between two aspects of the problem: the financial aspect and the legal aspect.

1) Financially, the bońngo, first of all, completes the payment of the bride price and thus produces the highest degree of theoretical stability possible in a Nkundó marriage. That is the meaning of the following expressions: bólό wă lißla ńk'ɔmɔ, "the strength of the marriage (its stability) is to be found in the slave,"; l'ońngo bómo to ńsóngwa wălí, "by means of the bońngo the woman completely becomes the wife"; or wălí ńsóngwa ɔ̂nǎ, "the wife becomes completely yours." Since, as I have explained, the bońngo terminates the payment of the bride price [162], the woman's parents no longer have any excuse for taking her away from her husband, and they become even more desirous of maintaining this union in which such great interests are at stake.

585 × 178 567 Apart from the value of wealth per se, there is also its social influence. In this respect we must make a distinction between the past and the present:

a) At the time when the bońngo was necessarily a flesh and blood slave rather than a slave in rings, it was naturally valued more than the walo. Twenty-five bakonga (for the walo) and two slaves were preferable to 50 bakonga and one slave even though, if the payments were reduced to the monetary unit in copper, the latter was greater. This fact is easily explained. "In the past," say the old people, "we had very little copper, and the smelting of iron was a 583 hard and lengthy task. The walo paid for our mothers was greatly in-567 ferior to what we see nowadays. In the majority of cases our fathers 178 paid no more than 15 or 20 rings and iron objects. But they gave a greater number of slaves. It was not unusual to hand over five or even ten slaves for a wife. Consequently, the bosóngo was a good deal more important than the walo. At the present time the white men have introduced a great deal of copper and brass; and the abundance of these metals is the cause of the increase in the price of the walo. On the other hand, it has become more difficult, and finally altogether impossible, to obtain slaves; that is why the bosóngo has been lowered. Finally, we have had to substitute rings for persons."

583 b) Nowadays, though the idea of the importance of the 178 bosóngo to the family is still alive, because it is the last payment and therefore a permanent settlement of the financial question, its monetary importance and therefore, in a certain perspective, its social importance for the receiving clan, has greatly diminished. This has happened because [162], like the payments that precede it, it has become a payment of copper rings. In places where the bride price is paid in money and in valuables introduced by the Europeans, the importance of the bosóngo quite naturally decreases even more rapidly.

583 2) From the legal standpoint the question is entirely different. The bosóngo results in no new relationship between the spouses. The woman's name does not change; she is called wálí, as before. The idea that she becomes a wife completely at this time is based, as we have said, only on the fact that the marriage theoretically becomes completely stable. This supposed stability is derived from the handing over of the last payment, which leaves the parents no excuse for taking their daughter away from her husband. It does not come from any new legal act.

That this is so is clearly demonstrated in the following fact: if the woman dies before the bosóngo, there is no palaver, as there is if she dies before the walo is paid. Her husband is not required to pay an indemnity (mbólaka). But he is required to complete the 583 payment of the bride price with the bonkúgo as he was committed to do through the payment of the ikulá and the ndongo. If he does not, the bond between him and his father-in-law is automatically broken, and consequently he is unable to obtain another wife to replace the deceased, and he loses the rights over one of his own daughters. Actually, we will have to come back to this question in Chapter IX, Article IX, 2.

These rules show how great a difference exists between the walo and the bonkúgo: in the one case, upon the death of the woman prior to the payment, an indemnity is imposed for a transgression in the eyes of the law; in the other, there is a transaction to stabilize the financial rights of the clans involved.

From all the above considerations we may conclude that because of the special nature of the payment, the bonkúgo is very important for the stability of the marriage and the social position of the woman's clan. But from a legal point of view it is far less important than the walo, through which a woman becomes truly [164] a wife; for the payment creates no new social relationship either between the spouses or between the husband and his in-laws.

Article X. Purpose of the Bride Price

593 Theoretically, the bride price is meant to procure a wife for 601 one of the members of the family that has received it.

The woman who is married thanks to the bride price paid for another is called the latter's nkita. It seems to me that this word is etymologically related to nkínó, "profit, benefit" (the verb is -kitola). In the final analysis, both words may be derived from the root -kit, "to become."

[184] A synonym of nkita is bongíli (bongíli). It is used primarily by the Injóló but it is also known, though seldom employed, by the other tribes.

The woman whose bride price has served to procure the nkita is the latter's nkóló (literally, "mistress"). The Injóló as well as the [596 593] Bolingí also call her by the more tactful name, nyangóngili, "mother 583 of the bongiji." (1)

[595]

1. This term also designates the wife of a polygamist who has brought along one of her relatives as co-wife; she is the nyangingili (sic) of the latter. (See Chapter VII, Article IV.)

For "to obtain a nkita" the Nkundo say -umba nkita, literally, "to fell a nkita," as one fells a tree or an adversary. Or they may say -bêta nkita, "to possess a nkita" (umba or bêta so-and-so, la nkita). "To become a nkita" would be rendered as -kwɛ nkita, "to fall into being a nkita."

583 596 The hierarchy of those entitled to the bride price is based on the general hierarchy of family members, which gives precedence to the older generations and, within each generation, to the older members. Consequently, as long as a member of the family having the title of ise (father) is unmarried (unless he is physically or mentally incompetent), no bôna (son) is entitled to a bride price, even if it is that of his own sister. Within the same generation, the older members have precedence over the [165] younger ones, but boys have priority rights to the bride price of their uterine sisters. (1)

1. For limitations and exceptions to this right, see Chapter IV, Article II.

It occurs quite often, and was even more frequent in the past, that the person entitled to the bride price is still too young to get married, either in reality or in the opinion of his "fathers." (2) The bride price is consequently used for the benefit of another member of the family. The creditor reaps the benefits later in the form of inheritance.

2. See ibid.

[602] Even if the woman or women meant for him should die or be taken in slavery, he can obtain the bride price of a cousin to which no one has direct rights (for instance, if she is an only child) or that of his mother's nkita's daughter, as we will see below. 605

In these instances there is a temporary suspension of rights or rather a change in the individual entitled to them. These adjustments are made very frequently and can affect several people. Bride prices may even fall to fairly distant relatives, even in the maternal line. The transactions are performed by the patriarchs for the greatest good of the family as a whole. New rights benefiting the person originally entitled to the bride price are being created, and the woman married by its means has become the equivalent of a nkita in relation to him -- as is the following instance: 607

Bakutu b'Olónge (Boniface) of Bombéŋga w'Ekenda (Bosombé, Bombwanja) has a sister Wánzi, whose bride price serves to provide his paternal uncle, Elongama ey'Itutu, with a wife, Ilefe of Ilóongo-Bongîli. Bakutu's rights over his niece, Bakutu, daughter of Bolófo, are transferred go Boféndo d'Ekóhola, son of his paternal great-aunt Ilfika and therefore, in Nkundó terminology, to his father. As a result he obtains the rights over the bride price of Wángi, the daughter of his uncle [166] and Ilefe. At the same time he acquires a certain authority over Boféndo, the beneficiary of the bride price that was originally intended for him, and over the latter's children.

When the bride price is meant to procure a nkita, there is nothing to prevent the remainder, should there be any, from being used to pay a debt, a fine, etc., or, more especially, from being given to a relative so that he can procure a wife for himself.

If, in an exceptional case, the bride price is not used for its original purpose, this deviation constitutes an infraction of the law, because it is a violation of the rights of the girl for whom the bride price was paid, for she is thus deprived of her nkita and consequently of certain advantages. It may happen, however, that there is a conflict between this law and some other. In such cases of circumstances beyond one's control, it is up to the legal authorities to determine which of the two has priority. [608]

Such was the case of Boléi, daughter of Ifolé y'Engámé, of the Baafiki Longwâne of Bonjoku (Bonkoso). She was married to Bombélenga 593 601 of Likoló. The bride price went to her uncle Bonfiló, because her father had been taken prisoner of war by the Bongale. The family council decided to free Ifolí before contemplating the acquisition of a wife. Bonfiló therefore paid his brother's ransom. Naturally, Bolifi was greatly annoyed to have to submit to this decision but, taking everything into consideration, she too thought that the liberation of her father had priority over her right to a nkita, of whom she was now deprived. For although the Bongale were able to obtain a wife thanks to the ransom, the wife was not Bolifi's nkita, since each family takes only its own members into consideration.

593 602 601 As we have already implied, the nkóló derives certain advantages from "possessing" a nkita. Her superior position, from the Nkundó point of view, entitles her to respect and to some assistance. An even greater advantage is her right to the dowry. As we have [167] seen, a husband keeps a small part of the dowry for household necessities; the greater part of it goes to the nkóló. Finally, the son of the nkóló has the right to his say in his mother's clan, because it has been enriched by means of valuables paid by his father's clan. He also has the right to cultivate land belonging to his mother's clan and to settle on it. Furthermore, when a member of his mother's clan is enabled to obtain a wife by means of these valuables, he has certain rights over the children of his mother's nkita, and even over the nkita herself. (1)

1. See above, Article IV, 3, and Chapter III, Article II.

In relation to the children of his mother's nkita -- whom he calls his bokwá (2) or his mother's bonkita (bonkita bákúsé bákí ngóya) --

2. Singular bokwá. The term is derived from the verb -kwá or -kwé, "to fall" (see above).

the nkóló's son has the following rights:

1) The right to respect and assistance.

2) The right to sit on the family council which decides on the division of the inheritance (so that the deceased's own son cannot have

595* a share of his father's goods without the consent of his nkóló or the 601 use of the bride prices received for the daughters.
607 3) If he cannot obtain a wife through his own clan, he is entitled to the bride price of one of his bokwé if it is not first needed by one of her own uncles or brothers. The rights of the latter have priority over that of the nkóló, unless he settles in his mother's clan. For in that case his rights have precedence over those of the brothers (though never those of an uncle), and he is next in line, after his uncles, to become head of the family. Since he is sister's son, the uncle's children call him "father" just as they call his mother, their paternal aunt, by the name of isómoto ("female father"). He himself calls his first cousins bána, "children," and thus has precedence over them. [168]

Thus the rights to authority over the daughters of the nkita on the part of the nkóló's son are limited by the rights of the uncles and, to a certain degree, of the brothers. (1) But in the inheritance of widows the rights of the nkóló's son operate fully, and he may claim the one acquired by means of his bokwé's bride price, who in a way is his nkita (when she is assigned to him they say bala ĩkó nkita, "here is your nkita").

These rules can result in multiple transactions and in a repeated transferring of rights from one of the two clans to the other as well as within the same clan.

The nkóló's grandsons call the nkita's grandsons nkwé y'ĩmbió, "the excrements of valuables" (an expression which is not at all disrespectful or shocking) because the rights derived from the relationship of nkóló and nkita are almost without force. In favorable circumstances they are limited to a little respect and assistance. And if the nkóló's grandsons have no other kinship tie with the paternal clan of their second cousins, they cannot even call them by that name.

1. In his study "Het Familiehoofd bij de Nkundo-Negers" [The Family Head among the Nkundó Negroes], Congo, 1930, Vol. 2, p. 322, Father Brepoels somewhat exaggerates the rights of the nkóló's son.

593 602 607 Thus the person who is herself the object of a bride price is the nkita. The first generation born of the nkóló calls her bonkita. In the third generation the term nkwé y'ĕfinkó is applied to the relationship.

For example:

mother	Lokóli'ó	nkita of Bolumbe
son	Imana	bonkita of Ilongó
mother	Lokóli'ó	nkita of Bolumbe
son	Imana	bonkita of Ilongó
grandson . . .	Enfika
mother	Lokóli'ó	nkita of Bolumbe
son	Imana	bonkita of Ilongó
grandson . . .	Enfika	nkwé y'ĕfinkó of Lifāko

[609] [169] The bonds between the nkóló's grandsons and the nkita's grandsons are loosened because respect and authority between grandparents and grandsons are more or less nominal; in practice they no longer exist. (1)

1. See Chapter VI, Article VI.

If the nkóló leaves no descendants, the nkita's sons are freed from any obligation. Just as the Nkundó like to be able to call someone their nkita or their bokwé so, too, they take pride in not belonging to a nkóló.

593 607 Men who bear the title of nkóló may, under given circumstances, have duties towards their bonkita, especially the obligation of taking active part in getting together the amount of a bride price. If the nkóló has provided his bonkita with a wife, the latter must treat him like his father (giving him assistance, the father's portion of the meat of a game animal, etc.).

587* 607 The mutuality of the rights of nkíé and nkita is well expressed in the saying, Osokáé fosokáé wě, "possess me so that I may possess you." It is like do ut des.

591* 601 183 (608) It is possible to judge from the preceding descriptions that the bride price has a considerable influence on family relations. Although the Nkundó system is clearly and manifestly patriarchal, the custom of the bride price and its logical consequences give it certain features which make one think of a matriarchy. This situation comes about quite naturally. Since the bride price is wealth it represents power in society. Through marriage this power is transferred from the husband's clan to the wife's, which is enriched in goods and persons by the bride price that has been received. In a sense, the husband is the provider of his wife's clan. And the child can truthfully maintain that his clan was enriched thanks to his father. As a matter of fact, for the Nkundó, this consideration above all others is the basis for their demands of whatever rights they possess in the mother's clan. [170] The relationship between a woman and her nkita and between their respective children is founded solely on the bride-price system of marriage and has nothing to do with matriarchy. (1)

1. But the above considerations may furnish one source of explanation for the origin of that family system.

Consequently, it is unnecessary to erect complicated theories or engage in tortuous speculations in order to explain the creation of this system or to justify it. It is quite simply the outcome of the payment of a bride price in valuables that are of no use except in connection with a similar purpose.

Nevertheless, although the system of the nkita is a natural and logical consequence of marriage by means of a bride price, it is not a necessary consequence. The bride price exists in all the tribes of the Congo, but it does not seem to have resulted everywhere in the institution of the nkita.

593* 174 114 607 What has given rise to this institution among the Nkundó? Father Brepoels (loc. cit., p. 3339) gives the following explanation:

174 583 184 607 "The sale (sic) of the woman and her loss of liberty must naturally have aroused her indignation. The man probably had a great deal of difficulty in persuading her to resign herself to it. It was necessary to arrange for some compensation and that is how the system of the nkita originated. That is how the woman acquired rights over her nkita and how nonexistent prerogatives were attributed to her children: they became the superiors, the "fathers" of the mothers' family . . . . The elders, the wealthy, profited from this system, which released them from any concern for their daughters; the girls could be sold while they were still very young and then if, later, they complained of the injustice that had been done them, the elders consoled them by reminding them of their rights and those of their sons over the nkita and her offspring . . . moreover, this system released the elders from their duty of obtaining wives for their sons and removed any reason for the latter to claim their father's wives."

This explanation for the origin of the nkita system is unthinkable, for it is entirely contrary to everything [171] we know about the nature of Nkundó marriage. But it seems plausible that the fact that the old father benefited from this institution helped it to flower and spread. Native greed also may have played a role.

583 174 607 Nevertheless, we must seek beyond the operation of causes which have contributed to the spread and retention of the system in Nkundó society for those that led to its origin.

Need we invent complicated hypotheses for this purpose? It seems to me that we need not; we can be satisfied with the native explanation: the nkóló's rights over the nkita spring naturally from her dominance over the latter, for the nkita's marriage was made possible by the valuables paid for the nkóló; whereas the rights of the nkóló's sons over the nkita's children are derived from the fact that in the Nkundó hierarchy the relationship of the latter to the former is that of "son" to "father."

The secondary causes mentioned above, together with the necessity of reconciling the interests of the various members of the family, subsequently amplified the system.

583 607 Exceptionally it may happen that a mother becomes her daughter's nkita. Such was the historic case of Bekombe of Belondó (Bonjolu) and her daughter, Mbélé. The daughter's bride price was 583 607 used by her father, Nkombe ěy'otsilo of Bolɛkola (Bonjoko), to pay a supplement for his wife Bekombe. On this account the latter became her daughter's nkita. The double bride price served to obtain the wife Lintamba for Iseli y'engumu, Bekombe's brother and Mbɛlɛ's uncle, and Lintamba thus belonged to both mother and daughter, but the two did not fight about the matter.

One person can have two or more nkita, especially if her bride price is so large that it can be used to obtain several wives. Such is the case of Mputɛ (Sofia) of the Bosɛlɛ Mbangɔ of Bongonde (Bombomo). Her first husband, Mpɛnda of Lofoli, paid 40 rings and a slave. With this sum Mputɛ's uncle, [172] Mbangɔ ěy'akoso (who had settled with the Elɛngɛ l'Imome, his mother's clan), paid the bride price for Bonjɛlɛ of Ilɛɛlongo. (1) In the meantime, Mpɛnda was killed in a fight with his brother, Iloko. Mputɛ married Elɔngola, Mpɛnda's nephew, but then he died after two or three years of marriage. She was then married to Lokonga of Lɔ̌ngɛ (Nkɔlɛ), whose life was not much longer, and finally to Bakutu (Boniface) of Bombɛnga w'Ekonda (Besombɔ, Bombwanja), who paid a considerable bride price. A part of this bride price was a compensation to the family of the last husband, and another portion was used by Mbangɔ to acquire as wife, Bongelɛ of Ekɛkola. By means of the bride price paid by Lokonga, Mbangɔ (Joseph), a first cousin of Mputɛ, obtained the wife Bolɛjɛ (who came from the londa). Lastly, Bakutu gave Bonjɛkyɛ (Christophe) of Losɛlinga, a distant cousin of Mputɛ, the necessary bride price to marry Embongɛmbembɛ of Lɔ̌ngɛ, who on this account also became the nkita of Mputɛ, though not in the strict sense of the term. Mputɛ thus has four nkita, although not all of them are living.

[782] [727] 1. During a war against the Ilɛɛlongo, this woman had been captured by the Elɛngɛ, who wanted to sacrifice her to the ikenɛ at a feast which terminated the mourning. But Mbangɔ begged the notables to let her live because he loved her very much and wanted to marry her.

583x
607 On the other hand, as we have seen, two women may have one nkita in common, especially if their combined bride prices have been used to obtain a single wife. In such a case the two bankóló and their descendants share their duties and prerogatives. In practice this situation arises only if the two bankóló are uterine sisters, but seldom in the case of other relatives. It does occur occasionally, however, as for instance in the case of Bolófo w'ímeka and Bolúmbú w'ikofo. Both were daughters of Bakutu b'is'éy'olónjó of Bokenda (Besombo), but they had different mothers (Mbélá and Wǎngi, respectively). Their joint bride prices were used for the marriage of Bolófo wǎ Ekákásá Bonkúfo w'ǒbé (son of Bakutu and Wǎngi) to Bokungú of Engónjó (Bonkoso). [173]

Article XI
General Remarks on the Payment of the Bride Price

583x
843 A few general comments should be added to all the foregoing ideas and rules concerning bride price.

1) During a woman's pregnancy no payment of any kind may be made. This principle is stated by the Nkundó, and they strictly adhere to it. Pregnancy, however, must be understood as a pregnancy which is clearly visible to everyone, that is, the period of bokeka, and not that of the beginning, bofoswa, (1) during which payments may still be made.

If one inquires into the reason for this prohibition, one receives the reply that if payments were made during the bokeka the woman would have great difficulties in delivery and would stand very little chance of escaping death. (Pregnancy is considered a dangerous condition. Of a pregnant woman, the Nkundó say: akékí la léfa, "she is blocked by the sun," or "the sun stands across her path," that is, she is between life and death.) That is the only explanation given for the prohibition. Is it perhaps connected in some way with the belief in the elímá? (See Chapter X, Article II, 1).

1. See Chapter X, Article II, 3 and 4.

589x 581 2) A woman's family is not permitted to keep a double bride price for her during the lifetime of her husband -- that is, for the same marriage. If she is divorced, and her new husband pays the parents a bride price, they are required to return the bride price paid by the first husband. Thus, only a single bride price remains in their hands. This stipulation is probably intended to avoid a traffic in bride prices, something which is entirely illegal. Moreover, since the bride price constitutes the marriage, a double bride price in the situation indicated would make the woman the wife of two men at the same time, a situation which would be altogether contrary to the native concept of [174] marriage, despite their leniency with respect to certain types of concubinage. (1)

1. These will be discussed below, Chapter VI, Article VIII, 2.

One instance which took place around 1878-80 came close to infringing upon this law, though strictly speaking it did not violate it; it is rather non contra sed praeter legem. By his first wife, Wětsi de Likolí, Bakutu b'ìs'ɛ́y'olɔ́ngɔ́ of the Basɛ́k Ɛ́longama (Besombɔ́) had a son, Bolɔ́njɔ́, and a daughter, Imote. The daughter married Lofalanga of Mpámá (Nkɔ́le), and with her bride price he procured a second wife, Mbɛ́lá of the Basɛ́ká Nkamba or Bofɛ́tola (Bonkoso). His son, Bolɔ́njɔ́, fell in love with her and took her away from his father who had grown fairly old and up to that time had neglected to provide him with a wife. Old Bakutu was furious and went so far as to threaten to kill his son. But the family intervened and judged the father to be in the wrong. The latter submitted to the family decision and finally quieted down. He yielded Mbɛ́lá and went even further. In order to spare his son malicious innuendoes and being shamed by comments made by other people, because he possessed a woman obtained in an abnormal fashion, he paid another bride price for Mbɛ́lá, consisting of 40 rings and 2 Batswá as bosɔ́ngo. As a result the Bofɛ́tola clan received two bride prices for the same woman, but they came from the same man and were given for a plausible reason. No grievances resulted; on the contrary, the payments had advantages. For both parties were satisfied: the Basɛ́ká 583x Nkamba were doubly enriched; their daughter was honored beyond 581 expectations and had acquired two nkita. The Basɛ́k Élongama had the expense, but their renown and glory could only increase as a result. Furthermore, Mbɛlɛ's son thus acquired a very strong position in his mother's clan where his power would be greater because of his relationship to the double progeny of two of his mother's nkita.

A true exception to this rule is permitted in the case of [175] marriage by purchase (Chapter II, Article VII) and in case a woman takes refuge from her husband with another man (Chapter VIII, Article II, 3, (2)). But the rule is not the least weakened by these exceptions, for both types of union are entirely outside the usual rules and patterns, and it can even be said that they are not real marriages.

3) Right to the bride price

583x

A. Is the right to a bride price permanent? In other words, is a bride price acquired permently?

To answer this question we must anticipate what will be said later in this work. Therefore we will limit ourselves here to noting the conclusions from data which will be presented later in extenso. (1)

---

1. See Chapter VIII, Article III, 5, and Chapter IX, Article VII.

583x In case of divorce, restitution of valuables must be made by both 586x sides. On the contrary, if a spouse dies their acquisition remains permanent.

If restitution were not made in case of divorce, the divorcée would be prevented from remarrying. This seems to be a concession to human frailty. That is the only logical explanation I can think of for the existence of these two rules which are diametrically opposed to each other: permanent acquisition and acquisition only for the duration of the marriage. My explanation is supported by all other stipulations of Nkundɔ law which are pertinent to the matter.

B. Those who are entitled to the bride price

585x 596 It is apparent from everything we have said that the bride price is placed in the possession of the father of the woman for whom it has been paid. In his absence it goes to his eldest brother or, if his bɔ̌nankɛ́nɛ́ has settled there and inherited the father's authority, he is the one to receive the bride price of his niece (cousin in our terms). Otherwise it goes to the eldest son. In short, the rights to a bride price are passed down in the order of the family hierarchy.

The mother's clan receives the copper spirals, the goat, and certain of the beɛ́ngo. [176]

There are circumstances, however, under which this order can be destroyed so that the father's clan does not get the slightest portion of the bride price. This happens if the daughter who is to be married has left her father's clan for a sufficiently good reason and has been adopted by her mother's family. The following is a historic example of such a case:

583x 596 691 The events took place at Bompɔ́ma (Injɔ́lɔ́) between 1890 and 1900. One of the inhabitants, Ilɔ́njɔ́ yǎ Nsɔmbɔla had had two children by his wife, Eale of Bokɛ́ndela (Boɛ́ngɔ́): a boy, Mpulûnɛ́ne and a girl, Ɛmbɔ́mbi. The girl was abducted by one of the black soldiers who had come to occupy the region and was taken by him to his native village, somewhere near Coq. The wife of another man from Bompɔ́ma, named Isɛ̂ntulu, was carried off and taken away by another soldier. Ilɔ́njɔ́ owed Isɛ̂ntulu a dog. The latter took advantage of the disorder caused by the beginning of the occupation to demand his due with violent threats. Ilɔ́njɔ́, having no dog and probably frightened, handed his son over to his creditor. Isɛ̂ntulu hastened to find the soldier who had taken his wife and offered to give the latter the slave boy in exchange for her. The pair came to an agreement, and the soldier took away the boy, who died in his master's hands in a manner unknown to me.

Still during the time of the Independent State, Ɛmbɔ́mbi was able to make her way back to her country. Passing her mother's village, she heard how her father had acted toward her brother Mpulûnɛ́nɛ. Indignant, she decided not to continue on her way; she 583 declared that she was breaking with her father and wished instead to 596 live at the home of her maternal uncle Isɛ́la. After a time, a cer-691 tain Belekɛ́ came to ask for her in marriage and paid the bride price to Isɛ́la.

In 1922, Ilɔ́njɔ́ went to Bokɛ́ndela and presented a complaint to Chief Efɔ́le against Isɛ́la, because the latter had taken his daughter's bride price. Efɔ́le, assisted by the messenger Bongimɛ́ and by notables, decided in favor of the accused; Since the plaintiff had gravely offended his daughter by delivering her brother into [177] slavery, which resulted in his death, he first had to be reconciled with her. If she accepted his apologies, the father would receive her bride price. They agreed on the nature of the reconciliation gift (boɔ́ndo): Ilɔ́njɔ́ would pay a goat. Since he did not have it with him he handed over his knife as a pledge (wěko). Iomɛ́, the bɔ̌nankɛ́nɛ́ of Isɛ́la (who by then had died), promised to make restitution of the bride price and in anticipation paid 12 rings and 3 knives. Ilɔ́njɔ́ went back home. They awaited him in vain; they did not see him again -- neither him nor his goat.

Act three: February, 1933. Efɔ́le, Bongimɛ́, and the rest had been removed as a result of a reorganization of districts. Bokwɛ́la had been made chief of the Boɛ́ngɛ́. The district tribunal began to function again, and our Ilɔ́njɔ́ took advantage of the situation and recommenced his attack. He brought complaint against Iomɛ́ and against Isɛ́la's brother, Engongolo, who was not there in 1922 but who now had returned home. On March 6, 1933 the palaver was settled. Naturally, the men who newly held their authority found this a good opportunity to strengthen their position and did the exact opposite of their predecessors. They condemned Iomɛ́ and Engongolo and decided in favor of Ilɔ́njɔ́.

Here we see a real abuse of power. For according to Nkundɔ́ law, only Ilɔ́njɔ́ was in the wrong. He had conducted himself badly all the way down the line. His daughter had no obligation to recognize him as father, since he had virtually disowned her in the first place. And her mother's clan could have, even should have, received the bride price (see also the case described in Chapter IX, Article IV).

Article XII. The Attitude Toward the Bride Price

583x
562 1. What is the woman's attitude toward the bride price?

Only we Europeans can ask such a question. To the Nkundó mind it is superfluous -- in fact it is really stupid. The bride-price system is the normal system [178] of marriage. The Nkundó do not conceive of marriage in any other way. Without the payment of a bride price there is no marriage; the woman is not considered to be a wife, she is simply a slave. This notion is a necessary consequence of the bride-price system. Thus it is not surprising that the woman is very much attached to this system, and that under normal conditions -- that is, when there is no European influence -- she does not want any union without a bride price, for she would then be a slave. This is obvious. All these ideas are held together like the links of a chain.

2. Our attitude toward the bride price

589x
648 At the beginning of colonization the Europeans, government agents as well as missionaries, viewed with repugnance a marriage system based on the payment of a bride price. In their eyes it was neither more nor less than the sale of women and therefore a form of slavery. They felt they should counteract it by abolishing the bride price and introducing marriage in the European manner, which seemed more consistent with man's free nature. Many Blacks employed by the Whites as soldiers, laborers, etc., were thus married without bride price. Nevertheless, no direct action was taken against the system. Later it became apparent that it would be harmful to abolish this ancestral custom before it was possible to replace it with a better system. (1) In the end it was realized that the payment

1. It is not even enough to substitute a better system; those who are to benefit from it must understand it and be convinced that it is better.

583^x 648 of a bride price was not at all a purchase. (2) [179]

> 2. One reason why Europeans were so slow in getting a realistic picture of the nature of the bride price was undoubtedly their lack of linguistic knowledge. The natives did not know the Lobangi language spoken to them first nor the Lingala used later, and so perforce in these languages they used (and still use) terms whose meaning is vague and broad. Thus they said -- and still often say -- the word sómba, "to buy," for "marriage," although their own language contains terms which are very precise.

Having gradually become informed as to the true nature of the bride price, a number of Europeans began to favor a return to the old system. Some took a radical and intransigent stand on the matters; others approached the question in a more reasonable manner, taking into account the changes that had resulted from colonization. It was perceived that the natives were not yet ready for the abolition of their ancestral laws and that marriages without a bride price rarely lasted, in part because the old sanctions had not been replaced with new measures adapted to the circumstances. Finally the government as well as the missions more or less strictly required that the matter of the bride price be settled before a "civil" or a "religious" marriage ceremony.

583^x 182 Many Europeans wish for the abolition of the bride-price system because it seems inferior to them. And actually in the present circumstances of time and place, it does constitute an obstacle to the evolution of the natives toward a better social and moral condition. (1)

> 1. This is especially true of the consequences of the nkita system.

But such an abolition is neither practicable nor expedient. This system penetrates and molds, so to speak, the whole familial and social life 583x 182 of our peoples. Its pure and simple abolition would upset their established order completely. First their mentality has to change, and that end can be accomplished only gradually, since a moral change is involved. And the present state of these peoples is not sufficiently evolved for the abolition of the bride price to be beneficial. Here, if ever, the axiom: nihil leges sine moribus is valid.

000 But what might perhaps be done in that direction now is to place a limitation on the amount of the bride price. This measure should be strictly enforced to make sure that it is carried out -- although in practice its enforcement would be very difficult, for at the beginning [180], many interested parties would try to circumvent it. If good results are to be obtained, an efficacious repression of adultery and the frequency of divorce should accompany the limitation on the bride price. It would be a first step towards the ideal. Others could follow according to the extent of the natives' evolution toward a higher level of morality.

Apropos of these considerations we should like to say a few words concerning:

583x 177 3. Traffic in bride prices

This term may be taken to mean two different things. It may be used to refer to a general increase in the amount of the bride price, which has reached enormous proportions since the European penetration of the area. Or it may refer to the increase in the bride price of a single woman for successive marriages, from which her family profits.

The first meaning of the term refers to a fact, namely that the amount of the bride price has increased considerably. The reason for this development is the increase in material wealth resulting from colonization. Riches are more easily acquired. But we should not exclude the role of the greed of many parents, which has also increased. It is the most important and can reach scandalous proportions in areas where the bride price is paid in European goods (money, fabrics, appliances, utensils); in such regions, as for example among the riverain people of the Lower Congo, it goes up to and easily exceeds 2,000 francs. Think of what this amount represents, especially in times of economic depression. (1)

177 583x 465 435

1. For the sake of comparison, here are some average figures for 1934:

589x
177
[465]
[435]

Wages	fr.	20.00 to 25.00
Copal, per kilogram . . .		0.50 to 0.70
Palmettos		0.10 to 0.20
Palm nuts		0.05 to 0.10

Inevitably the action of one man leads another to follow suit for -- need I repeat? -- everything is interdependent.

Another reason may be, and sometimes is, involved. It is the desire [181] of a husband to bind a woman more securely to him by paying a lot for her. This is certainly a praiseworthy feeling, especially considering the women's readiness to resort to divorce. Its practice, however, is full of dangers. If it is limited to an isolated case, that is, to a single monogamist who gives his entire fortune for his only wife, the danger is minimal. Such is the case of one of our catechists who paid an enormous amount, without its having the slightest repercussion on his region. But the danger is very great if a man does this to establish a harem, especially if for that purpose he entices the wives of others. Thus, for instance, a man to whom the administration gave great political powers caused a fantastic increase in the general bride price among the Ekonda of the north. (1)

1. One factor which helped increase the bride price among the Wangata and other tribes in the vicinity of Coquilhatville has been described by Father Kaptein in Congo, 1922, Vol. 1, p. 544. Since his study is written in Dutch, I think it would be useful if I translated the whole text here:

"When the first Europeans arrived at Leopoldville and Brazzaville, fabrics and other European articles soon made their appearance in Coquilhatville. The chiefs Yoma of Boyeka, Ibuka of Boyere (Boyela), Yamba of Eala; Nkake of Bokele, etc., went up the Tshuapa and Ikelemba rivers and, by means of these goods, bought slaves, women, and ivory.

583^x
177 "When they returned home, they acquired wives in their region and paid for them with the slaves and women they had purchased cheaply by means of European products. They paid three or four slave women for a wife in their region. The arrival of the Whites and of foreign Blacks taught them the number nkesi (10,000), a word which they thought meant 1,000 and which in the past they had called 10 nkoto or 10 x 100.

"The Europeans soon became involved in native palavers concerning women. This was inevitable in the Black Country. When the [182] Blacks brought their palavers before the Whites they either did not want or did not dare to say:

'I paid for this woman with 3 other women'; they would say, 'I paid for this woman with 3 nkesi of mitako,' that is, 3 x 1,000 mitako. In the meantime, the words nkoto and nkesi acquired their significance of 1,000 and 10,000 respectively. But people continued to say that a woman had been paid for with nkesi through either an error of the Whites, or the greed of polygamists, or both. Later, several women actually were paid for with nkesi, especially when the mitako became the official currency of the Congo. Actually, this development was not surprising, since the polygamists had a monopoly on women, and it was very much in their interest to increase the price.

"Formerly the price of wives was no higher in Wangata than elsewhere. Only 5 bakonga were paid for many wives, for instance, at Bokala near Bamanya, a village under the jurisdiction of Chief Yoma of Boyeka."

583x 177 It would be good to counteract that much increase in bride prices. For there is a danger that it will condemn to bachelorhood many young men who could otherwise build a home out of the fruits of their own labor. [182]

583x 586x The second meaning of the term "traffic in bride prices" has a more precise application. After a divorce all the valuables must be returned to the husband. Consequently, the new husband must pay at least as much as the first, and in general he even has to add a supplement for the family who, after all, have incurred expenses for the palaver. And so it continues. Thus the more husbands a woman has in succession, the more her bride price increases. It seems to me that this practice is in no way to be condemned. The increase is reasonable. For it not only constitutes some compensation to the woman's family for their troubles but, in addition it may exercise a good influence on the social condition of the people. If it is to have such an influence, divorce must not become a means of satisfying greed (in general, at the present time, it has not yet become such a means), and the increase must not be excessive.

000 In such cases the increase in the bride price can thus have a wholesome effect on the morality and stability of marriages by making men afraid of marrying a divorcée and, as a result, making women more cautious and less flighty. Here everything depends on caution, restraint, and supervision on the part of responsible authorities. [183]

4. The reason for the existence of the bride price

583x 174 This is a question which should not be asked of the natives; they do not know how to answer it. Nor do the facts provide any certainty. All that can be attempted is the construction of a hypothesis which fits the reality.

The following explanatory theories have been put forward: that it is a compensation to the woman's family for the loss of a member (see, for example, Seitz in Africa, Vol. 3, p. 85, and also Torday in Africa, Vol. 2, p. 275, under "Exchange"); that it is a payment for fecundity; and finally, that it is a guarantee of the 589 174 stability of the marriage and harmony in the household (see, for example, Torday, loc. cit., pp. 274 ff.).

It is apparent from the description of the payment of the bride price that the Nkundo data tends primarily to support the last of these three theses, though the first is not excluded and perhaps both can be combined in a single explanation.

The bride price includes one portion which is somewhat special, namely the bosɔ́ngo. Now what is the reason for the existence of this special payment? Although later in the text (Chapter VIII) we will note some relevant facts concerning the refunding of the bride price, which may provide a clearer understanding, we can already indicate here a few explanations that have been put forward. Various colonials have often suggested that the slave is demanded as a replacement for the woman, that the loss sustained by her family with respect to her activities (childbearing, work) (1) had to be compensated for by handing over a human being who could work for the family and give them children (the children of a slave always remained dependents of their father's master). This explanation is clearly an application of the compensation theory to the case of the bosɔ́ngo. And with reference to this special portion of the bride price, the rules of Nkundɔ́ law favor the hypothesis in question. [184] A man who has not made this last payment loses his rights over one of his daughters, whose bride price enriches the mother's clan by providing the means for procuring another wife. The explanations given by the natives, however, give the impression that this rule is a sort of sanction, though in reality it is not, as we have seen.

5. The essential component of the bride price

583x As we have seen, the bride price consists of several payments: the ikulá and the ndanga, both promissory payments; the walo, which is the first part of the actual bride price, and the bosɔ́ngo, which completes the bride price. The belonga, etc. need not be considered.

1. See Chapter VI, Article II.

583ˣ Which of these payments is the essential component of the bride price? The ikulá and the ndanga can unquestionably be excluded. The nature, purpose, and names of these payments as well as the title accorded to the woman after they have been handed over show that they are simply engagement payments. Of the other two payments, we can conclude that the walo is the essential one. For the bosóngo adds nothing legally to the marriage, and its significance lies only in secondary matters which need not be repeated here.

6. The role of the family

596 As we have seen, it is always the father or his successor, who arranges everything, who takes care of everything, who plays the leading role. A marriage cannot be arranged in the absence of the head of either the husband's or the wife's family.

As this book is being written, a young man, Ikotama of Bongíli (Liókó, Ekonda), who is in possession of the valuables necessary for the bride price of his intended, Etúli, daughter of Mpokú of Lofelí (Bongíli), has for many months been awaiting the arrival of his uncle Eḳamba, who is head of the family [185] and who has been detained by his duties, as catechist of the Protestant mission at Longa.

Although the mother receives a certain portion of the bride price, she has no right to intervene in establishing and arranging her child's marriage. Her husband informs her of everything and even pays more or less serious attention to her views, opinions, and wishes; but he does so solely out of the spirit of harmony and conjugal love, not because she has the slightest rights, legally speaking.

This would be the place to make a synthesis of what we have seen up to now and to try and deduce from it the legal concept of Nkundó marriage. But since some very important questions still remain to be studied, this synthesis must be put off till the end of Chapter III. [186]

Chapter III

The Various Forms of Marriage and Pseudo-marital Unions

581 Various forms of conjugal union exist in Nkundó law and practice, although not all of them reach the same degree of perfection, and certain ones are only known among some of the tribes under discussion.

The word "marriage" is translated into Lonkundo as liála. It is used in the broad and universal sense as well as in the narrow, as is the verb from which it is derived, bál. This verb designates a sexual union per se, even if it is illicit. Thus the Nkundó say íy'áfé bale ô liála, meaning that the relations between two people (adulterers or unmarried persons) are not isolated acts but part of a continuous relationship which takes the form of concubinage and therefore externally resembles marriage.

A man who marries, that is, the husband, is mbáli. But this is a general term, and it is not used to describe his relationship to his spouse; the word for "husband" in this specific sense is bǒme. The person who has paid the bride price is njéngi (from the root -éng). He may be someone other than the mbáli, as the examination of marriage by inheritance (Article II) will show.

583ˣ After returning briefly to the typical marriage arranged as we have described in the preceding chapter, we shall examine in detail the other forms of marital and pseudo-marital unions found among the Nkundó. As described in the articles to follow, the Nkundó forms of union are:

I. Marriage by Nkumbó
II. Marriage by inheritance
III. The marriage of a Bosóló, which is a special case of II
IV. Replacement
V. The gift of a wife, or Boóngá
VI. Exchange
VII. Purchase

Another form of union is the marriage of a slave, but we will leave its discussion for Chapter VII (Article V).

Article I. Marriage by Nkumbɔ́

583x A marriage arranged as we have already described is a standard marriage, called liála jǎ nkumbɔ́. Nkumbɔ́ means "the act of taking in marriage in the standard manner"; the verb is -kumbol and the intransitive -kumbwa, "to be taken in marriage." The transitive form is applied only to the husband, the intransitive only to the wife. That is, the woman's role of being taken in marriage must needs be expressed by the intransitive-passive form, whereas the man's act is expressed by the transitive.

A marriage by nkumbo is a marriage with a free woman by means of the payment of a bride price directly to her parents through the medium of a ndonga.

583x 586x This form of marriage is adhered to whether the wife is a girl who has not previously been married or whether she has already had a fiancé or a husband. In the latter case the union only becomes a marriage by nkumbɔ́ after the divorce. (1)

1. See Chapter VIII, Articles II and III.

The latter case differs from the former in that the persons involved must proceed with great circumspection as long as the bride price has not [188] been returned, so as to avoid provoking the abandoned husband's wrath and its consequences (fights, wars), and in that the woman's parents must reimburse him for the bride price he has paid. In the interim the woman may return to her family, or she may go directly or indirectly to her new lover. But in the past the latter was seldom done, as it could have led to very unpleasant consequences. This course of action was open only if the new husband was a rich man, who would pay the bride price without delay, or one who was feared for his courage, his fervor in battle, his power, or the great numerical superiority of his clan, his dependents, and his Batswá. For the previous husband retains his rights as long as restitution of the bride price has not been made.

589x The Nkundɔ́ consider marriage by nkumbɔ́ to be the perfect marriage. This will become more apparent through the examination of the other forms of marriage described below.

Article II. Marriage by Inheritance

587
428 This form of marriage is called liála jǎ lisangó or simply lisangó. The meaning of lisangó is "inheritance," from the verb sangol, "to inherit." The word is used in the broad sense and is applicable to any object.

The death of a husband does not in itself free his widow. She remains bound to the deceased's family.

After the celebration of the end of mourning, the widows of the deceased, required to abstain from all sexual relations until that time, go back to their respective families. During the last period of mourning they have already had the opportunity of being courted or of resuming their relationships with their former lovers, whether or not they are relatives of the deceased husband.

A person wishing to marry the widow must address himself to her own family. Therefore, except in the case of the bosóló, to be discussed in the article which follows, the distribution of wives among the heirs cannot be considered as a distribution [189] of persons as such. Rather it is a division based on the valuables which these persons represent. Theoretically, the wives are inherited by the brother of the deceased, but other relatives, especially nephews, may have partial or total rights over one or another among them. (1) These rights are based on the source of the bride prices by means of which the wives were acquired. We have already touched on this subject in the preceding chapter in relation to certain relatives. Still other situations may arise, but instead of going into a long discussion I shall explain them by giving two case histories.

Imote of Eleke (Bongíli), one of the Lokongo clans, married Iloko of Imomo (Bongíli). With valuables received from his mother's family their son, Bolófo, married three women: Wǎngi, Bosoí, his favorite, and a slave from Bolaká (Wǎngatá). When he died, his widows went to the Eleke clan which was the source of his wealth. Two claimants appeared: Eengé (first cousin of the deceased but in [601] Nkundó terminology his son) and Bakutu of Bokenda (Besombó) also a first cousin, and considered one by the Nkundó. They were to divide the widows. But both of them chose the deceased's favorite and quarreled over her. In the end she was assigned to Bakutu who was the "father" of his rival and the "elder brother" of the deceased. The slave also went to Bakutu, (2) while Eengé had to be satisfied with the first wife. But he and his clan retained a right over these women and their [190] progeny. This is rather an old case; in fact two grandsons of Bakutu and Ikándó respectively, whom I know very well personally, are now between fifty and sixty years old.

2. Who yielded her to Ikándó y'ãngamba of Eleke.

428 587 Two sisters, Osɔ́ka and Bosɔ́kankele of Ikengo, Ntɔ́mbɛ́ (Wǎngatɛ́), were married respectively to Ekɔ́bɛ́ of Likɛ́ala (Besombɔ́, Bombwanja) and Bokungɔ́ of Bombɛ́nga wǎ Ikolɛ́ (Besombɛ́. Nganja married Bolɔ́mbɔ́ of Iɛ́mbo (Bonkoso). When Bolɔ́mbɔ́ became a widow she was inherited by Likɛ́ndɛ́, the first cousin of the deceased on his mother's side, so that the patrimony would not be scattered. She gave Likɛ́ndɛ́ a daughter, Bosukankele, whose bride price he used to get himself a wife, Bombɔ́la (Teresa), daughter of Ilito of Bolɛ́ngɛ́ (Bongíli). At Likɛ́ndɛ́'s death the rights returned to Ntombɛ́ (Joseph) in the person of the widow Bombɔ́la, the nkita of his uterine sister.

587 428 585x If the legitimate heir, or some other close relative of the deceased, wants to marry a widow, he consults the head of the family and then goes to the woman's parents and gives them bekooli (1),

1. The plural of the noun derived from the verb koola, "to seek, to take for someone," hence, "objects in order to go and take someone."

which consists of 1 to 3 copper rings, added to the amount of the bride price. This gift shows the suitor's respect for the woman's family. (2) If after a time the woman no longer wants to stay with him, but loves another close relative, the latter also brings his bekooli. This is expected of him even if the woman has not gone home in between, but has gone directly from one man to the other.

[431] [191] The bekooli of the first man are then returned.

If the new husband is only distantly related to the deceased, (1)

[601]

1. In that case he is called eɔ́to ɛ̂ nsɔ́ngɛ́, literally "relative from the summit," as against eɔ́to ɛ́â ntsína, "relative of the base," therefore a close relative.

428
589x
587 against eóto éâ ntsína, "relative of the base," therefore a close relative.

431 he must not only bring bekooli to the woman's parents but also give a bompéngé called nsǎsangó or bosangójwé a goat, a dog, or 5 to 10 copper rings, depending on the circumstances) to the heir. This is not part of the bride price, which is a payment to the woman's family. It is a gift intended to assuage the feelings of the heir and to secure or strengthen his good will. It is equivalent to a request for permission to cohabit with this woman and to profit by her work.

428
587 Thus we must distinguish between two types of marriage by inheritance:

1) The new husband and heir belongs to the immediate family of the deceased; he is eóto éâ ntsína -- a son, brother, uncle, nephew, or cousin.

2) The new husband and heir is distantly related; he is eóto éâ nsóngé.

In the first instance the marriage is considered fairly stable and difficult to break, but nevertheless more easily dissolved than a marriage by nkumbó. With how much difficulty it is dissolved depends on the degree of kinship. The reason given by the Nkundó for the greater ease with which such a marriage is broken is that the heir-husband did not himself pay the bride price; he only received the woman from someone else. Thus, if he no longer wants her, he justifies sending her away by saying, "It was not I personally who paid your bride price." For her part, the woman will invoke the same reason, mutatis mutandis. In all other respects the union is like a marriage by nkumbó. Therefore, [192] when the woman leaves her husband the term kófa is used here as in the case of a marriage by nkumbó.

587
471 The second type of marriage by inheritance is clearly different from the first. The new husband is not a husband from the legal standpoint; he is only a husband in the improper sense, physically. In spite of the nsǎsangó paid by the common-law husband, the legitimate heirs, hence the close kin of the deceased, especially the relative who was entitled to the woman and to whom she was given when the 471/

587 inheritance was divided, remain her masters. This is apparent from 428 all the consequences resulting from the situation:

1) Children born of the union belong, not to their natural father, but to the owners of the woman, the bankɔ́lɔ́. They are the ones who will eventually consent to the children's marriages and receive their bride prices. They alone have the right to give the [553] children a name.

2) The man functioning as husband has only partial rights to the results of the woman's activities. Thus, if she finds a treasure buried in her field, captures a fleeing slave, or finds any valuable object that has been abandoned or lost and whose owner is not known, such as, for example, rings, objects of worked metal, elephant tusks, etc., these will not belong to her husband, as they would in a marriage by nkumbɔ́, but to the masters. The latter are also entitled to a part of the fruits of her labor: fish, caterpillars, and even food she has prepared.

3) If, on some occasion or other, the new husband wishes to make a gift or a payment to the woman's family, he has to request the intervention of the husband-owner. He therefore asks the latter to accompany him, saying: ɔ́ndakɛ́ likilɔ́, "make me acquainted with my parents-in-law; introduce me to them." They go there with the ndonga.

587 It may even happen that the bosɔ́ngɔ has not been paid yet and that the common-law husband has the slave [193] or the equivalent valuables needed for the payment. With the permission of the owner and accompanied by the ndonga he may make this payment. Nevertheless, he obtains no additional rights over the woman.

If one day the woman returns to the immediate family of the deceased, who are her "masters," the latter must make restitution to the common-law husband for these supplementary valuables and for all the payments he has made. If any stranger marries her by nkumbɔ́, the entire bride price is returned to the heirs of the deceased, who must reimburse the man who has acted as her husband for all the bride-price payments he has made.

428 This practice of ndǎlaka likilɔ́ is not without disadvantages.
587 It may be feared that the heir deny that the payments were made and refuse to reimburse the man for them. His refusal is facilitated by the fact that the ndonga involved is the same one who participated in arranging the marriage agreement. Thus, there is a tendency to omit the practice.

Note that the expression ndǎlaka likilɔ́ is not applied only to this situation; it is also used in the obvious sense -- for instance, when the man is simply to make the acquaintance of the woman's [431] family without presenting any payment (though of course it is in-[574] conceivable that such a visit would be made without bringing presents), or in the case of a man who wants to be united with a relative of the wife of one of his relatives or friends.

4) Any presents given by the woman's family to the common-[431] law husband, for instance during a visit or for a service rendered, etc., do not belong to him; by right they go to the heirs. If the latter are kindly disposed toward him, they will allow him the usufruct of a portion of these goods, but he has no right to them strictly speaking.

429 5) If the woman breaks this union the verb used is not -kɔ́fa
586 but -kumbwa, "to be taken in [194] marriage." If she returns to a 587 close relative of the deceased, that is, to one of his bankɔ́lɔ́, the Nkundɔ́ say that "she has returned to her husband," aɔ̂lut'ɛ̌ka bɔ̌m'ɔ̌kaɛ́. For his part, the man who has taken the woman in common-law marriage may repudiate her at any time. He says to her: kendá ɛka baɔ́m'ǎkɛ́, emí ntsíkwɛ̌ngáki, "go to your husbands; I did not pay your bride price." The valuables he has given as nsásangɔ́ will be refunded.

6) Lastly, if the woman dies while living with this man, he has to pay an indemnity (-foma mbálaka), usually a slave or its equivalent, to the legitimate heirs.

428 Thus the second type of marriage by inheritance has none of 587 the characteristics of a legitimate Nkundɔ́ marriage. The husband has only the enjoyment of the woman. Only the heir of the deceased may truly and legally call her his "wife." Usually a woman involved in such a union is called the heir's "thing" (yɔ̌mba). The heir is called her "owner," her "master," and the term "husband" is reserved for the man who cohabits with her.

428 Because of all these obvious differences, the Nkundɔ́ tend to 587 consider this second type of union nonmarital. It resembles actual 581 marriage only externally; in the final analysis, the difference is fundamental, since it has none of the specific properties of a marriage. Therefore such a union is not a marriage, but a continuous concubinage.

A man who cohabits in this manner with a woman for whom others have paid the bride price is often the object of humiliating allusions. He is treated as nkolasangɔ́, "inheritance taker" (that is, of inherited women). If a woman involved in the type of union described quarrels with one who has been "bought" in the regular manner, the latter will sometimes clap her hands (-foma losɛ́ka) to indicate her superiority. That is why such a woman is sometimes called wálɛ ɔ̂a fomalosɛ́ka in contrast to the other. [195]

Present-day circumstances make all this even more clearly [797] apparent. Nowadays, even pagan natives almost everywhere are aware of the intransigence of the Catholic Church on the question of the indissolubility of a marriage which has been effected through the religious ceremony. For this reason the "masters" of a woman who is legally theirs but who is actually living with another man in the manner described, will not permit her to enter into a religious marriage with this man unless he pays the bride price.

Therefore we may consider the type of union described above a concubinage which does not satisfy the moral conditions for a true marital union. As to the first type of marriage by inheritance, namely a union with a close relative of the deceased, the question is more complicated; but it is my opinion that such a marriage is valid from the moral standpoint. I hope, however, that in order to attain greater certainty on this point, others will re-examine the case in the light of the various aspects of the solution that have been presented.

The following historic case pertaining to individuals whose genealogy appears below will illustrate the preceding discussion:

Elongama (the younger) married Ikókó of Bongíli, daughter of Bolékélá wǎ Nkunja and Tómpénda. After his death, his widow was taken as inheritance [196] by Bonyongela, to whom she gave a daughter, Belóngó. Bakutu (the younger) and his first cousin Bolófo were the ones who disposed of the daughter's bride price and were responsible for the marriage palavers; her father, Bonyongela, (since deceased) and his brother, Bonkoso, were not. Out of kindness, Bonyongela was given 18 rings. Bolófo added the other 30 to his sister Wǎngi's bride price to obtain his wife Ióngó (of Likolí, now deceased). After x number of years, Ikókó left Bonyongela for Botálé, a sister's son who, being a close relative, gave no nsǎnsangó. That which had been paid by Bonyongela was returned to him by Bakutu, since the union was broken. Five years later, Ikókó left Botálé with whom she was dissatisfied because he was lazy and did not bring her enough game, clothing, etc. She went to live with Ilumbé of Ngombe Mbálanga (Bongíli), who was a distant maternal relative and therefore gave the prescribed nsǎsangó.

Another instance turned up recently (May, 1933). One of our Christians, Babolá Michel of Ianda (Bonkoso) wanted to take a wife.

428 He had set his heart on Bolúmbɔ́, daughter of Ntando ɛ́y'ilengu of 587 Bofalambɔ́ka. Upon the death of Bolúmbɔ́'s husband, Esalɛ́ ɛâ 581 Lonkongɔ́, (in 1926), she had been asked for by Bombɔ́ngo, a distant relative of Esalɛ́. Proceeding in the customary fashion, Bombɔ́ngo had made his request through the medium of his elder brother Engambí and had paid a bompɔ́ngɔ́ of 4 bakonga and 20 francs. In the meantime, Babolɛ́ reached adulthood; he left our school and returned to his native village. Being a true nephew of Esalɛ́ ɛâ Lonkongɔ́, he had a direct right over this woman, who left Bombɔ́ngo. Since the latter protested, however, the priest was faced with a moral problem; the question was whether or not there was a real marriage between Bombɔ́ngo and Bolúmbɔ́. If there were, there would be no question of a marriage between Babolɛ́ and Bolúmbɔ́, since the Church could not break a valid marriage between Christians. I have said above that a union of the sort involved in this case is not, in Nkundo eyes, a typical marriage. However, I wanted to have every assurance and to be as certain as possible. To that end, I went to Bonjoku at the time of the tax collection. I found many men gathered there. I raised the question of marriage by inheritance. The discussion ended on the unanimous expression of the opinion that in the instance involved nothing opposed the new marriage. The men gathered there added that all similar cases are rather a sort of concubinage accepted by ancestral law, but lacking all characteristics of a true marriage.

In order to avoid the many disadvantages inherent in this second form of marriage by inheritance, the husband, if he has any wealth, will do everything he can to collect the valuables needed for the bride price and pay his father-in-law. The latter will use the bride price to reimburse the heir. By making this payment, which is handed over through a new ndonga designated by him, the husband obtains complete possession of the woman. The marriage by inheritance than changes into a marriage by nkumbɔ́. The besangɔ́jwá which the husband had previously given the heir must be returned, and the heir's ties with the woman are broken by these formalities.

[579] It sometimes happens that the heir takes a very dim view of this new payment and takes offense. In the past a war, through illegal, could result -- after which, as always, the matter was settled just the same.

428 587 581 On the other hand, it also happens sometimes, and even quite often, that although the woman loves her "husband" (in the improper sense) she does not want any change. At heart she remains attached to the kin of her deceased husband, through her love for him or because of her affection for his family, who have always treated her well. It is not unusual for the common-law husband to encounter unalterable opposition to a regular marriage. The woman may [198] [578] even take such offense at the proposal that she will leave the man for a close relative of the deceased.

In this type of situation another sort of development may also occur, although it is quite rare. For example, there is the case of Lowâka, daughter of Bompókó of Bontole. After the death of her husband, Botóna of the Basɛ́ka Ilóka (Lofelí), she was taken in marriage by one of his relatives, Nsenge, who gave the prescribed besangójwá to Imomo of Bofalambóka, Botóna's bonankáná. After a certain time Imomo, who had had a slight palaver with Nsenge, did not want the situation to continue. He demanded a regular marriage so that he could make use of his rights to Lowâka's bride price. Nsenge agreed and paid 60 bakonga to the woman's parents, who reimbursed Imomo. Imomo returned the besangójwá he had received, and thus Lowâka became the true wife of Nsenge.

One can see that the gamut of individual variations comes into play here, depending on the temperament and the feelings of the persons involved. But the most common practice is for the widow to remain attached to the family of the deceased or to remarry in the prescribed fashion.

In the latter case the widow goes to a man who is not related to the deceased, either immediately after mourning or after a period of conjugal life with the heir. The latter is entitled to a reimbursement of the bride price. The new husband must make all the customary payments through the medium of his own ndonga, exactly as he would for a first marriage by nkumbó. Consequently, this union is not considered a "marriage by inheritance," with which it has nothing in common.

428 587 431 In any marriage by inheritance -- that is, where no bride price payment is involved -- the husband, whether he be the heir or 428 587 431 simply a relative of the deceased, must give the woman a present called isangó, or inheritance gift. The woman either hands this gift over to her family or keeps it for her personal needs. In any case [199] it is not considered a part of the bride price.

Finally, when a widow remarries, either by inheritance or by a new nkumbó, her husband must make her a present of one or two rings or knives of equivalent value before having conjugal relations with her. This present is given either on the same day as the isangó or on another, depending on the circumstances. It is called boángá, "couch," or, more commonly, ikondeyantangé (from -kondeya, "to make someone get on," and ntangé "bed"). It is a gift of consolation for widowhood. This gift of ikondeyantangé is probably what Engels referred to in his study on the Wǎngata we have already cited, when he spoke of "buying off mourning."

428 587 An examination of marriage by inheritance shows that the widow is free to remarry a man of her choice, whether he be the heir or another relative of the deceased or some stranger. The only exception is a woman who has been willed to someone by the deceased. (1) If the heir subsequently does not fulfill his obligations toward her, she can react the same way as in a marriage by nkumbó. As for the special case of the bosóló, we will deal with it separately.

Another law may be deduced from the facts observed: as long as no new bride price is paid, the woman continues to belong to the family of the deceased. Only a restitution of the bride price breaks the contract and destroys all its consequences. (2)

---

1. The Nkundó scrupulously observe the stipulations of a will (boango or bowâko) because they fear the vengeance of the deceased. When a person expresses his last wishes he usually adds the threat, "If you don't carry out my wishes, you will follow me in death."

2. We will come back to these points in Article IX, and in Chapters VIII and IX.

428 Lastly, these facts demonstrate collective ownership within 587 the clan or the extended family. When a close relative, such as Bosɛ́lɛ́ for instance, marries a widow, he considers her legally as his legitimate spouse, just as she was the legitimate spouse of the deceased. [200] No new bride-price agreement is necessary, since the preceding one continues to be valid. The only new element introduced is that another person in the family of the deceased enters into a marriage bond with the widow. Whether the person marrying the woman is the legitimate heir or a close relative makes no difference because of the community of interests that exists (the children belong to Bosɛ́lɛ́ as much as to the heir, for example). (1)

1. We will come back to this question further on (see Article IX).

887 Because of the superficial resemblance between different situations, it should be mentioned here that the enjoyment of a woman in a common-law relationship is not asked for exclusively in the case of a widow. Such a request may also be made in connection with the wife of a polygamist while the husband is still living, but this is done only by a close relative and even then is not well regarded. Usually the situation is as follows: a man falls in love with one of the wive's in his relative's harem, and she shares his sentiments. He takes her home with him. There is a palaver. The husband is furious, breaks of all relations with the seducer, and wants no more of his invitations or his gifts, which means the quarrel is serious. Therefore, other relatives intervene to try and reconcile the two adversaries; seeing that there is no way to prevent the cohabitation of the pair or judging that such action would not be expedient, they try to pacify the legitimate husband. Through the agency of his elder brother, the lover sends him a gift in entreaty. The husband, finding no one on his side, bows down before the fait accompli, accepts the gift (bompángá), and yields the enjoyment of the woman. Instead of going about the matter in this cavalier fashion, the lover may also make his request in the normal manner. If for one reason or another the lovers want to stop living together, they separate without further

837 ceremony. If the husband is kindly disposed toward them, he gives back to his relative the valuables the latter has paid, and the incident is closed. [201]

That is what happened some time ago to Insɛlo, of Bokenyola (Bonjoku). (1) In the harem of his maternal uncle, Efonja Is'Ôfuwa, who was originally from Bonjoku but had been integrated into the Bongale, he had noticed a certain Mbilɛ́eyenga, originally from Bosáá, and "his heart was rent asunder," as the Nkundɔ́ say. Through the agency of his older first cousins Mpetsɛ ɛâ Lingomo, ye sent Efonja a bompángá of 6 rings, asking him to be kind enough to allow him to cohabit with this woman. His request was well received. But after a certain number of years their passion cooled, and Insɛlo wished to contract a proper marriage to give himself posterity. He therefore parted from Mbilɛ́, who went back to her husband. The latter returned the 6 rings to Insɛlo, because he did not want to enrich himself at the expense of a relative.

Article III. The Bosɔ́lɔ́

428 The marriage of a bosɔ́lɔ́ is a special form of the inheritance 587 of women.
768 The term bosɔ́lɔ́ is used everywhere. The Injɔ́lɔ́ also use a synonym, njɛ́mɔ́, an incorrect term derived from the verb ɛ́mola, "to make [someone] get up." Thus they say ɛ́moja bǒna njɛ́mɔ́, "to give the child (son, daughter) a bosɔ́lɔ́. (2) Among the Beloko and their Elɛ́ngá the term bombɛ́jɛ is used as well as bosɔ́lɔ́.

On the day when the widows are "lifted from the ground" and permitted "to return to the bed," (3) all those entitled to the rights of a father -- that is, those who have precedence, whether men or women -- gather with the sister's son to proceed with the ceremony. As always, each person yields his right to speak out of mutual respect, Finally, the eldest again has the floor [202]; it may be the deceased's father, brother, or paternal aunt (isómoto). This individual who is in charge, makes a short speech appropriate to the occasion, and then gives one of the widows to the first-born of the children (nsómí). He takes the latter's preferences into account, having made sure of them in advance. The widow is given to him with the statement: "We have wrested for you the bosóló which your father has left you," tókokumela bosóló bǒkí isé okotsíkéláká. The actual meaning of kumá is "to seize by pulling toward oneself, to pull up," and includes the idea of strength. The word is primarily used in such expressions as kuma baílo, "to pull up weeds," kuma nsálá, "to pull out feathers," etc. But it is also employed whenever anything is taken or pulled forcefully toward oneself, as in kuma mbombo, "to pull a chikwangue out of a heap."

The bosóló is always given to the first-born, regardless of sex, to the exclusion of the other children. If the eldest is a girl, she passes the bosóló on to her brother, first-born among the boys. This is a real seniority right, and it must be bought, or rather paid for, by the brother by giving his sister a present which most frequently consists of hens, money, small useful objects, or often a quantity of beer. The same rule applies if the eldest yields his right to a younger brother because the latter is passionately in love with her or -- nowadays -- because he does not want to take a second wife.

---

3. See "Les Coutumes funeraires des Nkundo" [The Funeral Customs of the Nkundó] (in press, Anthropos). The Elíngá perform this ceremony only a few days after the burial; the Boangi do so even before it. The Injoló are beginning to imitate the Elíngá.

428 In addition a bɔ́solɔ́ is also given to the bɔ̌nankáná. Only the 768 eldest son of the sister whose bride price was used by the deceased may 587 claim this right. If the bride price of the nephew's mother was not involved in the establishment of the harem which is to be divided, he is only entitled to a bosɔ́lɔ́ who is not someone else's nkita, that is, who was acquired by means of riches procured through the deceased's own efforts. If the deceased obtained wives with the bride prices of two sisters, both of whom have left sons, only the eldest son of the eldest sister has this right. (1) [203]

> 1. It may happen that one of the sons of the deceased is disinherited because of the rights of the bɔ̌nankáná. If that happens and the latter at least has a wife or can obtain the necessary valuables in his father's clan, he is supposed to yield the woman to his unfortunate cousin. This is a duty imposed by the love of family (liɔ́ta), and he may not evade it.

The practice of handing over a bosɔ́lɔ́ to relatives other than the son or daughter of the deceased seems to be an extension of a right originally reserved for his child.

The desires of the person entitled to the bosɔ́lɔ́ are taken into account when she is handed over. However, the eldest son can never obtain his father's favorite; only an elder brother may inherit her.

It is thus possible for a son to receive his own mother as bosɔ́lɔ́, but only if there are no other widows and if he has no way of obtaining a wife. Naturally, he may not marry her. She is given to him so that when she remarries he will receive the amount of the bride price which will be repaid.

If the deceased leaves no harem but does leave a good deal of other wealth, the bosɔ́lɔ́ consists of some object of great value. This practice would seem to indicate that the word bosɔ́lɔ́ is applied to a woman only by an extension of its basic and original meaning, "inheritance by right of seniority."

428 768 587 As soon as the bosólό is assigned to the person entitled to her, she leaves the group of widows and goes to the home of her new husband. From then on she may cohabit with him, since from that moment the pair are absolved from the observance of the regulations and prohibitions of mourning. Because of her affection for her deceased husband and her sorrow, the woman sometimes begs her new husband to be patient and wait a while. Her wishes are respected, for a refusal to acquiesce would be a very serious offense, which could lead to an immediate rupture of the relationship.

The woman chosen as bosólό may refuse the husband for whom she is intended, though such cases are rare and in the past were even unknown. The following instance [204] goes back to 1932: Mpia of Mbanja "acquired" Bôngongo of Ilángá as wife for his eldest son, Bompelɛ́. But the young man did not want her. So as not to waste his money, the father incorporated the woman into his harem. When the old man died, Bôngongo was given to this same Bompelɛ́ as a bosólό. This time it was she who did not want him, and, to make matters worse, all the other widows also refused. Subsequently, a second cousin of Bompelɛ́ named Bosɛ́njá wanted to marry Bôngongo. But out of spite, Bompelɛ́ did not want to yield her to him except against the payment of a bride price.

Even if the woman makes no objection -- and she generally does not -- and accepts the new husband without loving him, either out of indifference, or to be able to come out of seclusion, or for any other reason, she may always find a way to leave him, if she wishes, for another close relative whom she prefers. This fact indicates that, although theoretically the union of the bosólό is supposed to be more stable than a simple marriage by inheritance, in practice it is not; and it does not attain the degree of permanence characteristic of a marriage by nkumbό. The reason is probably to be found in the fact that the union with a bosólό and the ordinary form of marriage by inheritance are fundamentally identical, and the rights of the family play a great role in both of them. The following is a recent case history: Ifungá, daughter of Esukúlu of Bongangá (Boɛ́ndɛ́) and widow [684] of Bolɛ́kɛ́lá of Bongíli was assigned as bosólό to her husband's eldest son, named Boongo. Later she claimed that she did not love Boongo but 428 that she wanted to become the wife of his brother Ekamba. Ekamba 768 did not object. But very soon she broke this union as well. This time 587 the chief decided she was going too far and to please Boongo, who 684 had settled with his mother's clan of which he also was a member, he sentenced her to several weeks in prison. All sensible people approved of the chief's attitude. In spite of the suppression of such excesses, a suppression which is necessary, the woman's freedom is protected.

We have already indicated that from a moral point of view the 428 marriage of a bosóló may be considered on the same level as the in-768 heritance of any woman if she remains among the close kin of the 587 deceased. The only difference is that such a union is somewhat more difficult to break.

Article IV. The Replacement or Substitution

586 When a marriage is broken, instead of completing the divorce
587 by restitution of the bride price, the woman's family often has recourse to the practice of replacing the divorcée by one of her relatives (such as a sister, cousin, or niece). The act of replacement, as well as the woman substituted, is called bankitsá. (1) This name is plural noun derived from kita, "to become," kitana, "to replace, to succeed." The singular would be linkitsá, but it is never applied to this situation.

The substitute usually does not object to the social obligation that falls upon her, unless she feels an unusual repugnance toward the husband. In that case an attempt is made to find someone else in the family. A family may go so far as to take one of its members away from her husband in order to substitute her for the divorcée, especially if no other substitute is to be found and if they care more about the marriage that has been broken than about her union.

The Nkundó give the following justifications for the practice of substitution:

1. The Ekonda say nkitsá.

586x 587 1) The reference for the continuation of a happy relationship by marriage as against the creation of a new one which has yet to prove itself.

2) The desire to avoid the palavers and troubles involved in the process of restoring the bride price and to hasten in providing the husband with a new wife even if there has been no undue delay in reimbursing him).

3) Concern for the children born of the union which has been broken. [206] This is a very important reason, for it is completely in the children's interest that their stepmother should be a close relative who considers them her own children and who is therefore to be preferred over an entirely strange woman.

583x 586x 587 Just as there is no restitution of the bride price in the case of a replacement, so there is no new bride price to pay. But it is inconceivable that the visits necessary for the negotiations should be made without gifts. Thus a replacement inevitably results in an increase of the bride price, since the new payments made on each occasion are added to the former bride price. The more successive replacements are made, the more the amount of the bride price is likely to increase. Thus I have known instances where a bride price which at the beginning consisted of 100 rings had in the end reached the sum of close to 300 rings.

586x 587 In the opinion of the Nkundó the handing over of a bankitsá constitutes a true and valid marriage. But it is not a new union but simply the transfer to a different person of obligations which have never ceased to exist, which derive from a marriage agreement that has never been annulled. Thus the woman for whom the bride price was paid is known as the one who began, or founded, the marriage, the second woman simply succeeding her in it: X. ámangákí liála, Y. aôsulungana (manga, "to begin," or bondola, "to found," or mámola, "to begin [at the very beginning]"; as against sulungana, "to succeed [someone]," kitana, "to replace," mumola, "to continue"). For them a true succession to a position is involved. The replacement is not simply physical and external; it is fully legal in the same way that an heir apparent succeeds his father as king (there

586* is only one royal power and dignity which continues to exist through the 587 various individuals invested with it) or as in law when, in spite of a change in the identity of the debtor, there is no novation. (1) [207]

1. We will return to this question in Article IX.

Because of the way the Nkundó view this substitution, the bankitsá occupies the same rank in the harem as the woman she is replacing, and she is handed over to the husband by the same ndonga who participated in arranging the initial agreement.

What evaluation should be placed on this union by substitution from the standpoint of natural law? Does it bear the taint of a real vice or does it not? The right of civil powers to break a marriage legitimately contracted is debated. (1) Let us assume that this right exists and, furthermore, that the woman being substituted really consents. Her view, as well as the view of everyone around her, is that this is a matter of submitting to a family duty imposed by the laws which govern her people. One may wonder whether this requirement can be defended before basic principles of the law in general and in the light of morality. In any case the unanimous opinion of the natives that this substitution constitutes the continuation of a marriage through another person is certainly false. It is undoubtedly the result of an insufficient analysis, which leads them to lose sight of the crux of the problem by focusing primarily on the involvement of the clan in the marital union (see Article IX).

1. At the present time the affirmative opinion has almost been abandoned by Catholic philosophers, jurists, and moralists.

Whatever the case may be, it is possible to say without fear that in the great majority of cases a native woman submits to this law because she considers her submission an obligation which, for the good of her family, she is not permitted to escape.

[197] Moreover, the younger generation is beginning to oppose this practice. For example, here with the Sisters there is a young daughter 586ˣ 587 197 of Bofmbo, named Ngongo, who was given to Bokungɛ́ of Bongíli as a replacement for her sister Ilumbɛ́ when she was a very small child. Since she was not yet nubile she continued to live with her parents. When they became Christians, Ngongo was also baptized. On the other hand, [208] Longála, a son of Bokungɛ́, had become a catechumen and, after coming to the school, was baptized. His father yielded Ngongo to him as his future wife. Ngongo (who was now about seventeen) wanted nothing to do with this marriage. It was not that she refused to have Longála as her husband; she did not want to be married simply as a bankitsɛ́. She insisted on a marriage by bride price, in spite of the difficulties involved in the procedure, which was doubly useless and, for the Nkundɔ́, stupid.

587 583ˣ There is a second form of substitution: replacement after death. When a man has lost his wife and both he and the parents of the deceased want to maintain their alliance, he brings them 20 to 25 rings through the medium of the ndonga for the purpose of obtaining a new wife. This payment is called ibɔ́leɔ́ko, a term derived from -bɔ́l, "to beat" (for instance the clay in the ground) and eɔ́ko, "the site of a house." The Injɔ́lɔ́ designate it by a different name which however has the same meaning. It is sangɔ́lɛ́kojɛ́, "the inheritance of a dwelling site."

The procedure is as follows: When the widower has fulfilled all his funerary obligations and, at the end of his second visit to his parents-in-law, he is about to take leave of them, they ask him:

"Well, you're leaving. What are you planning to do now?"

He answers, "I loved your daughter very much. She is dead, and I have buried her. I have fulfilled all my duties. I have always lived on good terms with you, and I would like to continue our relationship. But first I must consult my family. Then we will see." That is how he expresses his wish to continue being their son-in-law. After asking his relatives' opinion, he returns to his father-in-law with the ibɔ́leɔ́ko. "Here, I bring you the ibɔ́leɔ́ko; I come to beat the house site; give me a wife." The father-in-law will have already chosen the daughter, sister, or other relative who is to replace the deceased and has already privately mentioned her to his son-in-law.

587 583x He hands over to him the woman intended for him, saying "Here is your wife." (1)

> 1. Among the Ekonda, the ibɔ́leɔ́ko payment has no special name. Moreover, before giving the husband a substitute, the parents require 20 to 30 additional rings which are supposed to pay for the mother's mourning and are therefore called basɛ́ki ba nyangɔ́.

For a replacement after death, as for one after a divorce, the parents-in-law will sometimes take a daughter from her legitimate husband so that she may serve as substitute.

The 20 to 25 rings comprising the ibɔ́leɔ́ko are only the beginning of the payment. A complete bride price is required, as it is for a marriage by nkumbɔ́, but the subsequent installments are not as large as for ordinary marriages. Nevertheless, the replacement is thought of as the continuation of a pre-existing union, though this concept is less apparent here than in relation to a substitution due to divorce. Consequently, in a harem the substitute assumes the same rank as was held by the deceased.

The replacement after death is made for the same reason as after a divorce.

Although the two types of replacement resemble each other in that both involve the substitution of one wife for another, there are considerable differences between them.

A substitution of another wife following divorce does not result in the payment of another bride price nor, consequently, in the standard expression of the woman's consent. But on the contrary, the payment of another bride price is required for a replacement after death, and there is a public expression of consent. It occurs when the husband pays the valuables comprising the ibɔ́leɔ́ko and is done in the same way as in a direct marriage by nkumbo. These two differences, and especially the second, make the replacement for a deceased wife a standard marriage from the legal standpoint. [210]

Article V. The Offer of a Wife

583

This type of "marital" union can be more readily and clearly explained by an example than by a long description. Suppose that a man named Eale is in need of valuables to terminate some sort of palaver (pertaining to a debt, a fine, an indemnity, a bride price to be paid, etc.). Since he has none and the matter is urgent, he borrows from Ekamba and offers him his daughter Wětsi. This offer is the means of persuading Ekamba to give the valuables Eale has requested. As a result Wětsi belongs to Ekamba, who now has a husband's rights over her. She is not a slave. She could be called a security, but that is not the name used by the Nkundó. They have a term which specifically designates this status, boóngá.

The term boóngá is used by all the tribes under discussion. (1)

> 1. Also among the Ekonda, although in keeping with the general rule of dialect variation they say bowóngá.

The Injóló alone call such a woman simply wǎji óâ njélá, "a wife that was brought," and therefore taken without a bride price and without the husband's initiative. The expression used for "to give a woman in boóngá "is kúndela Ekamba boóngá. It reveals the origin of the term. Boónga actually signifies a piece of wood, a switch. In this case the reference is to a moderately thick branch which is placed across a small well and which, when attached to another stick of a different thickness, can function as a lokolé. Kúndela is a form of kúnda ("to hit," "to strike") which expresses the relationship with an indirect object. Thus the original meaning of the expression is "to strike the boóngá in order to get someone to help." The mention, not of the lokolé, but of its substitute, is intended to express the fact that a given individual is at an impasse and is asking for the means to extricate himself from it. The matter is serious and urgent; he hasn't time to look for the proper instrument, but in [122] his haste he must be satisfied with the first means he sees by which he can call someone who might save him from his distress.

426 583 Another expression used is foma losɔ́ka, fomela N. losɔ́ka, "to strike a losaka," that is, a clapping of the hands. The idea involved is the same as above: a man who sees no way out of his difficulties is represented as clapping his hands to attract the attention of someone who can help him. His action is a call for help. Therefore the term losɔ́ka is sometimes used to designate the woman, through the same type of analogy that leads to the use of the word boóngɔ́.

Although the husband has full conjugal rights over the boóngɔ́ and her activities, she is not strictly speaking his wife. It may simply be said that she belongs to him, and the fact that she belongs to him gives him the rights of a so-called husband. He has no obligations toward her, as he would have in an ordinary marriage. Thus in the example given above, if the woman dies while living with Ekamba, her father has no claim, even if no bride-price payment has been made, because he gave his daughter to Ekamba on his own initiative. If the boóngɔ́ runs away from her owner he is entitled to a normal reimbursement of the valuables lent by him and to an additional 10 to 20 rings (or more, in proportion to the size of the loan) as damages for his loss. This supplement is due him even if he has paid a bride price to the woman's father for a legitimate marriage.

For if he loves this woman there is no reason why he cannot marry her properly. He will be especially willing to do so because as long as she remains simply a security, she is viewed with contempt and mocked by her fellows. They say, "You are not a wife, you are only a boóngɔ́; there is no difference between you and a slave, for your husband has not paid a bride price for you."

Once the bride price is paid the boóngɔ́ becomes a real wife, and all the rules of law are applicable to this [212] union, which from then on is a normal marriage in every way comparable to a marriage by nkumbɔ́. As to the loan, it is then included in the total amount of the bride price.

426 583 675 The pawning of a woman is also carried out through the mediation of a ndonga who, however, bears a special name, ndonga ɛ́â ntsíkoónda, which is literally translated as "witness of I have not asked you." He is thus contrasted with a ndonga in the usual sense for the 426 following reason: a true ndonga is designated by the husband while, 583ˣ in this instance, on the contrary, the intervention is requested by 675 the girl's father. Consequently, a man who takes a boɔ́ngɛ as security against a loan is not obliged to recognize him as a proper official witness. This witness is not a ndonga of a marriage, but he must bear witness to the security agteement.

When a woman given as boɔ́ngɛ ran away from her owner, the latter attacked the ndonga and, if he found an opportunity, made him prisoner. If the matter were not settled, he could reduce the ndonga to slavery. But if he did so, he had to expect vengeance on part of the ndonga's family, although, according to the usual and legitimate norm, their vengeance should rather be directed against the man who asked for their relative's intervention. For it is he who is responsible for everything and who rightly should bear all the consequences. The exception, which sometimes really occurred, was due to the idea that "might is right" which, here as in "civilized" countries, is often true. (1)

1. This situation is not the only one in which a ndõnga ɛ̂a ntsikoońda participates. The intervention of such a person may also be required under other circumstances. For example, Esalɛ́ of Bonkoso was taken prisoner by Isia of Bongíli. Mpetsí was related to Esalɛ́ and bound by friendship to Isia. He begged the latter to give Esalɛ́ back his freedom and guaranteed the payment of the ransom; he thus became a ndonga ɛ̂a ntsikoońd. If the payment is delayed too long, Isia will take vengeance upon Mpetsí and even has the right to abduct his wife as compensation.

When a man who has received a boɔ́ngɛ wants to marry her properly he designates his own ndonga, who must fulfill [213] all the conditions required. Thus the ndonga who participates in the pawning is not the ndonga of the marriage. However, since the former has 426 participated in handing over the boóngɛ, he is usually allowed the 583 honor of being a supplementary witness to the chief ndonga.

675 Everything that has been said shows clearly that the offer of a boóngɛ may in no way be considered a marriage, even though it has some of the external characteristics of a marital union.

A very similar practice but one which now belongs to the past is that of offering a woman in begging for peace (boóndo). The following is an example from history: (1) At the time when the peoples now living in this area were still settled near the sources of the Ikelemba, there was a war between the families of Mpumo, ancestor of the Boɛ́ndɛ, and Lonyango, ancestor of the Bonkoso. The latter, defeated, called for help from the family of Bokungɔ, their bonankɛ́nɛ and one of the ancestors of the Bongíli. Bokungɔ's family inflicted a stinging defeat [illegible] Mpumo.

Mpumo was frightened and begged for peace, offering Bokungɔ his sister Mbɛlaka. Bokungɔ accepted. But since he liked this woman, he wanted to contract a regular marriage with her. Therefore he paid a high bride price. But as Mbɛlaka was of a good family, she declared that she did not want to go to her husband alone and insisted that her father send an ebísa with her. (2) Her relative Wela of Ngombe (Boímbo) was assigned to her. But the old father, wanting to show off his wealth, went even further and added a second ebísa, namely Euɗɛ, daughter of Bokelɛ of Bokɛtola, his maternal uncle. Finally, to complete this already ample dowry, Mpumo gave his daughter several men who were Mpɛmɛ (dependents) "to work the bellows in Bokungɔ's iron foundry." [214] Among them, according to the story, were Bokuka, Líkítɛ, Engota, Lofalanga, and others.

1. We are giving this story in detail because it is a living illustration of certain manifestations of Nkundó social life.

2. See Chapter VII, Article IV.

426 583 675 Similarly, Mpumo received Lifomɛ, daughter of Ikɔ́lɛ́ as a boɔ́ndo. Her brother, Ndyɛ̂ntíkala, ancestor of the Mbɔ́ngɛ (Liɔ́ko, Ekonda), offered her to Mpumo in asking for peace. Mpumo married her in the regular manner. In his fight against the Ekonda this same Mpumo in the same manner obtained Boɔ́ngɔ́, the sister of Bangɔ́ndɔ́ of Mpɛ́njwɛ (Wɛ̂yɛ).

Since the victor in war usually wanted to marry the woman in the proper fashion by paying a bride price, the handing over of a relative as boɔ́ndo may be compared to the practice common in Europe in the Middle Ages, when a prince would marry his daughter or sister off to a competitor or an adversary to seal the peace between them. In both cases, therefore, a kind of political marriage is involved.

Article VI. Exchange

583x 184 When they speak of the exchange of women (yenjɛ, from the verb enja, "to exchange" in general), the tribes under discussion do not all refer to the same thing. According to the situation, several types of exchange may be distinguished.

1) The pure Nkundɔ́ have a practice of exchanging daughters, sisters, relatives. This exchange is always carried out through the payment of bride price and the agency of a ndonga. Thus two regular marriages by nkumbɔ́ are involved, and the term "exchange" is only very inappropriately applied to them. The two men who give each other their sisters in marriage are each contracting an ordinary marriage according to the usual norms.

2) Sometimes the term "exchange" is applied to the practice of ikɛkelo, which is better explained through an example than by a long discussion. Suppose that Eale marries the woman Ámbɛ. Lokio, Eale's sister, [215] is married to Isia. Ámbɛ leaves her husband for one of Isia's relatives. At the first opportunity Eale detains his sister Lokio at his home, thus taking her from her husband, and since his wife Ámbɛ does not return to him, he hands his sister Lokio over to another [illegible] in marriage. Or suppose that Eale has married one of Isia's relatives, and Isia has married a relative of Eale. If one of the wives leaves her 583 x husband, he takes his own relative back and gives her away in mar-

184 riage elsewhere, using his right of ikɔ́kelo. (1)

> 1. This noun is derived from the verb kɔ́kela, "to guarantee," meaning in this case "to guarantee possession of one's bride-price valuables, one's capital."

As these descriptions show, the custom involves an exchange which is forced rather than voluntary and spontaneous. Nevertheless, it is sometimes called an exchange because it does not involve a divorce strictly speaking; there is no restitution of bride price by either party.

The two situations above therefore correspond only very inaccurately to the idea of an exchange of women. In the first instance, one cannot even speak of an exchange of wives.

3) Among the Bombwanja there is a practice which comes closer to the idea. The following is a historical example: Ikɛ́tɛ́ loves Eanga, a widow of Ekofo's father. Ekofo in turn loves Ilonga, widow of Ikɛ́tɛ́'s father. They exchange these two women, who are their wives by right of inheritance. It may even happen that Ikɛ́tɛ́, who is very fond of Eanga, gives Ekofo a woman from his own harem who loves this man. These exchanges are made without the payment of a bride price, but through the agency of the ndonga who previously participated at the first nkumbɔ́.

This is a real exchange of women. As we have seen, it may be made in two ways -- an exchange of widows or the exchange of a widow for a real wife. From the standpoint of law and justice the two situations are identical; the women exchanged belong to the men exchanging them, who are legally [216] their husbands. But only in the second instance is there an exchange of a woman who is a wife not only legally but actually, with all the rights and duties of a wife. But such a wife is given only by one of the parties. This is still not the exchange of wife for wife strictly and properly speaking.

The distinction we have made between a wife by law and a wife by fact is of some importance. Actual conjugal life introduces 585x 184 a new element from the legal standpoint. This is clearly apparent in the repugnance with which these same Bombwanja who practice the form of exchange just described regard an exchange pure and simple, which will be described below.

The exchange of widows is also practiced by the Elíngɛ. Like the Bombwanja, they also have the two forms of quasi-exchange described at the beginning of this article.

4) On the other hand, a true exchange of wives exists among the riverain peoples known as the Bodyɛ and the Longa (1); in their dialect it is called iengyɛ. Two men exchange wives. If the bride price of one is greater than that of the other, the difference is refunded. Such an exchange is carried out with the consent of the women involved.

583x 184 152 [837] Let us see how such an exchange usually comes about. Imagine two men, Bokulɔ and Mpolɛ, with their respective wives, Mbindo and Bafɔnɛ. Suppose that Bokulɔ falls in love with Bafɔnɛ, the wife of Mpolɛ, and the pair become involved in an adulterous relationship. There is a cooling of Bafɔnɛ's love for her husband Mpolɛ; she performs fewer and fewer services for him, etc. The same thing happens to Bokulɔ's relationship with his wife Mbindo. The latter is jealous; her patience is soon at an end. She discusses the matter with Mpolɛ, her rival's husband. "See how your wife deceives you; she no longer loves you. My husband is forsaking me [217] for her; he no longer loves me. This is a challenge to you as well as to me. If you are a man (1), pick up the challenge."

1. They live near the mouth of the Salonga (in the villages of Bonsela, Pomputɔ, Nkɔse, Bombomba, Isakɛ, etc.)

1. "Man" in the sense of vir (jwende); the meaning is: "If you have any courage, show that you are not a coward."

583x According to the native view, a man must take this woman 184 home for the sake of his honor. If he did not do so, he would be-152 come the butt of malicious comments and scorn on the part of all, both men and women. He would be considered a coward, just as in European "cultured" society a man is considered a coward if he does not pick up the glove thrown down by his adversary.

The rejected woman's hatred for her husband is transformed into a love for the man who has been similarly hurt by her rival. The joint misfortune of the pair creates a mutual feeling of affection. The woman is accepted as wife and is thus saved from dishonor. The man, on his part, feels affection for the woman who offers him her heart and preserves his good name. Harmony is at last established among all four of them, the two men arrange the matter of bride price in the way we have described, and then they live in peace without any enmity toward one another.

589x This way of handling the situation is very strange to us, be-581 cause it is indefensible from the point of view of a sound philosophy 184 and of Catholic morality. But it seems normal to the natives. The pagan conscience has no trouble coming to terms with it, since no pagan law explicitly prohibits such behavior. Everyone comes to an agreement in the end, and that is all their conscience requires.
Everything considered, there is no infraction of the rights of any individual, and since the native mentality is not concerned with morality as we conceive of it, this solution seems altogether natural to them.

Nevertheless, the ethnic groups who do not practice this true exchange in no way approve of it. Not that they fail to understand the psychology underlying this practice; on the contrary, if the situation arises they accept it. But they condemn [218] the legal procedure. They require that the two marriages be broken in the regular fashion and that two new marriages be contracted. That is, they demand the restitution and payment of the bride prices through the ndonga and through the respective parents of the women. For them therefore an exchange is not a true marriage, but a sort of sale and purchase. Also, from their point of view, the women who have been exchanged are slaves and not wives, because they live with their 583 men although their first marriage has not been broken and no new 581 marriage agreement has been concluded.

184 The data given above provides no confirmation in the [114] Nkundó tribes under study of the statement made by Engels "Les Wangata [The Wangata]," Revue congolaise, 1910, p. 35) that among the Wangata "her husband can exchange her . . . . she can make no protest." (1)

1. The Ekonda apply the term lienjɛ only to an exchange of daughters or sisters. They have a specific term: mpɛ́ngɔ́. Note, by the way, that certain Mbɔ́lɛ́ tribes who practice a true wife exchange designate it by the same name: impɛ́ngɔ́.

Article VII. Purchase

432 The purchase of women is not practiced by the Nkundó tribes 562 under discussion here nor even by the Bombwanja. The practice is to 5[illegible] be found only among the Elingɛ. What is involved is not a marriage by means of a bride price but a real purchase; that is, a man buys a woman from her husband for a certain sum. He does not go through the woman's parents, as in an ordinary marriage by bride-price payment, but addresses himself directly to the husband.

In general it is the woman who makes the proposal that a man buy her in this manner. Sometimes a man wants to take a woman and [121] first comes to an agreement with her. Before the Europeans arrived such a situation generally led to a war between clans or villages. After an armistice the palaver was settled, and the [219] purchaser paid the husband. Nowadays, since the Nkundó no longer dare to [117] fight because of the legal sanctions that inevitably follow, when a woman abandons her husband for another man who wants to buy her, the parties involved bring the palaver before the judges. As the woman wants only her new husband, and as, on the other hand, war and the punishment of women have been abolished, the first husband has no

586* alternative but to yield and settle the amount to be paid. (1)
562

> 1. This is the situation that has prevailed up to the present. The native tribunals have been given the power to punish the offenders and they are therefore obliged to decree the punishments designated. In my opinion, if the legitimate husband brings complaint, the court should decide in his favor, not only because the purchase of a woman is involved but also because there is a question of polyandry, since the marriage has not been dissolved.

432
583 The amount that the purchaser must pay the husband corresponds to the amount of the bride price. But since the valuables do not pass through the hands of the woman's family, the first marriage has not been dissolved. Thus the word used is not jɛ̌ngí but lisɔ́mbí (from the verb -sɔ́mba, "to buy"), a term applicable to any purchase. The Nkundɔ́ also say bɔsɔ́mbana endɛ́ la njɛ́ngi, "he makes a purchase from the husband" (literally, "from the payer of the bride price"). Instead of valuables equivalent to the bride price, the purchaser may give the husband a live woman to replace the woman purchased.

It is a common practice for the husband, in that case, to demand a second woman as well, who is a wife or relative of the purchaser, as an ebísa to the first. She does not have to be a real ebísa, that is, a relative of the first woman. She is an ebísa only in a very inaccurate sense. She bears a special name, inukambɛ́nga, "gatherer of pepper," to indicate her role as a helper serving the woman who has been handed over in payment or acquired by means of the purchase price.

Finally, the purchaser (bosɔ́mbi) must establish the bonds of alliance between himself and his new parents-in-law. For that purpose he makes a payment of valuables to them in addition to the original pride price. Although in practice [220] this payment

432 constitutes a bride price, it does not bear that name because its legal 562 significance is not the same. The specific name for this particular 583x payment is isongyambóka, from -songya, "to add something new" and mbóka, "path." Thus the new husband adds a new alliance. The verb songa or songya is also used under other circumstances: for a new tile or leaf that is added on to a damaged spot on a roof, for a patch on a piece of clothing, or for something that has been newly introduced. The term therefore seems to indicate that what is involved is not a new marriage but rather a modification grafted on to the old one. Furthermore, the term is often used pejoratively. One may thus suppose that this custom is not very ancient, but of course the evidence is not sufficient.

589x It is apparent from the above that the purchase of a woman is 432 a difficult and expensive operation. A kind of second bride price (isongyambóka) and a second wife (inukambénga) cost quite a fortune. In the past the purchaser also had to pay indemnities to the families of men killed in combat (he might have had to pay as much as 100 rings, for the price of one "corpse" was 15 to 20 bakonga, the monetary value [626] of a man) (1). One gets the impression that, though for reasons unknown to us the tribes in question permitted the exchange of women in their laws and customs, they did so unwillingly, and that the persons in authority increased the difficulties, so to speak, in order to frighten the amateurs and to reduce the number of cases to an inescapable minimum.

One might wonder why men do not hesitate in the face of such great financial difficulties. Psychologically, it seems entirely plausible that a man who is in love with another's wife and has the necessary wealth would in his passion throw himself into such an adventure. Probably that is how the practice originated. But this likelihood does not explain the existence of a purchase, since the breaking of the first marriage and the committment to a new one could just as well be

[727] 1. Five dead were an enormous number in this sort of "war."

432 583x carried out by the ordinary means of the payment and restitution of a bride price.

At the present time cases of purchase are becoming increasingly 432 rare. This change is probably due to a wider distribution of wealth 589x which has produced a second change, namely that the man makes the 626 initial proposal rather than the woman, who did so according to the ancient custom.

The woman's invitation is public. The man must reply for the sake of his honor. As in the case of an exchange among the Boóyɛ́, he can only escape mockery by following through. If he did not, he would be considered a coward. He would be treated as a pariah; his wife (wives) would leave him, and he would no longer be included in the company of his fellows or at their meals.

Although strictly speaking the matter is outside the limits of this study, it seems to me that it is not irrelevant to mention, for the sake of comparison, that wife purchase is also practiced among the Ntɔ́mbɛ́ (Wañgatɛ́, Ikengo) and the Bolɛ́ngɛ́ (or Bofijí) between the Congo and the Boloko. They call it by the same name -- isɔ́mba, "purchase," and the man who buys in bosɔ́mbi, "purchaser." The woman always invites the man by sending him a piece of the ribs of a banana leaf, called a bonengɛ́. She does this publicly; she hands the bonengɛ́ to a relative or friend and says to him out loud and in front of everyone, "Take this bonengɛ́ to so-and-so for me, so that he will come and buy me."

The same custom still exists in certain Ekonda settlements [184] under the jurisdiction of the Bikoro station, such as the Lonyanyanga, Bosango, Balíngo, Babonja, etc., but not in the others, which are within the territory of the Kiri (Buli) station. It is called ehɔ́mbaka or esɔ́mbaka (the root and [222] the meaning are the same as those of lisɔ́mbɛ́ and isɔ́mba). Since these peoples are neighbors of the above-mentioned Ntɔ́mbɛ́ and of other Ntɔ́mbɛ́ living near the lake which bears their name (in a distorted form) and since, on the other hand, the rest of the Ekonda do not know this custom, we may assume that it was introduced to them by their neighbors to the north and to the west.

432 If we examine the data on the geographical distribution of 583x this custom in relation to the ethnic nature of the practicing tribes,
174 we are led to assume that it is not of Nkundɔ́ origin. The tribes that do not practice it do not approve of it among their neighbors; rather they hold them in contempt because of it, since for them a purchased woman is a slave. Thus they make fun of them saying, "They sell their women like slaves or goats." Could this be evidence that the Ntɔ́mbá-Bolɛ́ngɛ́ are not pure Nkundɔ́, or that they have been subjected to foreign influences? Would the same be true of the riverain tribes who practice the purchase of women?

Article VIII. General Conclusions

581 Having analyzed in detail the various forms of marriage and pseudo-marital unions among the Nkundɔ́, we must now make a synthesis.

Certain kinds of unions are considered legitimate marriages by the Nkundɔ́ although they differ to some degree from the standard marriage because they are adapted to special circumstances. Among these are a widow's marriage with the heir of the deceased and a marriage by replacement after a divorce. As for ourselves, we can go along with native opinion, for when these unions are concluded in the normal fashion they involve nothing which is contrary to our conception of a valid marriage. (1)

> 1. This is true of a replacement after divorce only when the dissolution of the previous marriage is legitimate and valid in every respect.

Other types of union, on the other hand, are not considered by the Nkundɔ́ [223] to correspond, or only very imperfectly, to their idea of a regular marriage. The union of a widow with a distant relative of the deceased is only a sort of legitimate concubinage. The offer of a wife as security, the exchange or purchase of women, are considered as absolutely inferior forms of union. Therefore it is better to designate these by the term "pseudo-marital unions." For although they are accepted as legitimate by the tribes among 58/ which they are practiced, they seem to be tolerated rather than approved.

Thus there is room for action on the part of the native courts against these very inferior forms of union, and in fact such action is favored in the text of the Recueil à l'usage des Donctionnaires et des Agents du service territorial du Congo belge [A Collection for the Use of Officials and Agents of the Territorial Service of the Belgian Congo], (1930 edition, p. 375).

In the lines we shall devote to an examination of the nature of Nkundő marriage, we may therefore clearly exclude these pseudo-marital unions.

Article IX. The Nature of Nkundő Marriage

Having come to this point in our study, we must make a synthesis of the principal conclusions provided by our analysis thus far and try to deduce from it an idea of the essence of Nkundő marriage.

In Bantu ethnology marriage is defined more or less as "a bond between two persons of opposite sex which creates a particular social status and economic position for the spouses and gives legitimacy to their progeny." (1) This definition is quite different from the philosophical one, which is narrower in requiring a firm contract between man and wife for a mutual handing over of exclusive rights over the body in relation to the acts of procreation.

In what respects does Nkundő marriage conform to or [224] disagree with these definitions? Or rather, what definition should we 581 give of Nkundó marriage, and what is its legal nature? First let us briefly recall certain facts essential to the problem by adding some observations which will appear in the pages to follow but which are indispensable here if we are to obtain a picture of the whole. Then we will try to deduce the legal basis of Nkundó marriage.

According to Nkundó law, the indispensable conditions necessary for a legitimate marriage are the following:

1) The payment of a bride price.
2) One or more qualified witnesses who act as intermediaries in this payment.

The stability of the marriage is weakened by the recognition of divorce, which is inevitable in a society like this one. But everything is done to limit its frequency -- the payment of bride price and dowry, opposition on the part of family authorities, etc. (1)

1. See Chapter VIII, Articles I and II.

The extent to which the spouses have exclusive rights to each other's bodies will be examined in Chapter VI. Let us say only that adultery is not considered lawful, although the Nkundó conception of it is quite different from our own that they permit some departures from the principle of fidelity and tolerate certain forms of license.

581/584 A very important question for our purpose is that of consent. But it is very difficult to examine because the natives relegate it to a place of secondary importance, while they stress the factor of the bride price. This should not surprise us because the material and palpable nature of the latter holds their attention more readily. (2)

2. This same observation may be made about impious Europeans with respect to legal questions and other matters.

Note first of all that for the Nkundó [225], a lack of consent never casts doubt on the validity of a marriage. One finds many women who refuse the husband for whom they are intended as replacements by invoking the fact that the bride price was not paid for them, 581 that is, that they did not consider themselves the contracting parties.

584 But to my knowledge, their opposition is not considered to invalidate the marriage. I say "to my knowledge" because there is much confusion in the native mind on this question, and it is possible that later discoveries will show that the Nkundó attach a greater importance to consent than we perceive at the moment. As a matter of fact, the inclusion of a ceremony expressing consent in a normal marriage is an indication in that direction.

Let us now examine our data on the value of consent and its expression.

Except in an unusual case, which we are justified in leaving out of consideration in this synthesis since it does not influence our conclusions, there is always consent by the spouses in a standard marriage. Such a consent is first attained in private and then revealed to the parents, who give their approval. At the time of the first bride-price payment, the fiancée expresses her consent by a public and official act, while the husband shows his in accompanying his father in all the proceedings and in taking his intended to his home. In the eyes of the Nkundó that is entirely sufficient.

Another question arises in this connection. The consent of the couple is expressed at the time the ikulá is paid. And the real payment of the bride price occurs only later, without a renewal of consent. Can the expression of consent at the beginning, at the time of engagement, be considered sufficient, since it is virtually continuous? In my opinion there is no reason why it should not be.

In the case of a marriage by inheritance, the usual formalities 581 of the expression of consent are omitted, because [226] no new bride 584 price is paid. Nevertheless, we note that the heir must go and fetch 587 the widow from her family and make a special payment. The Nkundó explain this action as a mark of respect toward the widow's family, but we may interpret it as an expression, adapted to the particular situation, of the new husband's wish to marry this woman. The woman's willingness to accompany the heir is really a manifestation of her consent to the union. This interpretation is confirmed by the legal requirement that another bekooli payment be made by each of the

581 deceased's relatives who wishes to marry the widow, while the bride 584 price contract remains unchanged. This payment, unlike the bride-587 price agreement, does not come from the family; it is clearly a personal act of the man who wants to take the widow for his wife.

In the case of a replacement after divorce, the external expression of consent is more vague, since it is limited to the husband's overture's to his father-in-law on the one hand, and the fact that the woman goes with the husband, on the other. The same must be said of the inheritance of a bosóló (Chapter III, Article III). It would be contrary to reality, however, to conclude that because the form of the woman's consent is less prominent, such consent does not exist; with respect to these questions, their attitude is entirely different from ours. To be a replacement is considered a duty and accepted as such. Psychologically, the acceptance of this duty often involves consent; it does not exclude the presence of the will any more than the duty to submit to holy commandments, and to religious and civil laws. Even reverent fear, the fear of punishments, etc., does not prevent a free exercise of the will, although they do diminish it. Nevertheless, there are cases where fear or constraint can be so great as to remove freedom completely. [227]

581 With respect to unions before maturity (Chapter IV), the 584 question is even more difficult. Only the engagement is made in early childhood. The husband's consent is expressed in a manner which is entirely adequate. Since the union does not move from a tentative stage to a final one before the girl approaches puberty, she may be considered capable of giving her consent sufficiently to make a valid marriage, and she gives this consent in going to the home of her husband. Nevertheless, if we compare this expression of consent with those we have observed in the other types of union, it seems very much attentuated and greatly inferior to them.

We may therefore assume that in a general way and under ordinary circumstances freedom is safe and consent is expressed in an adequate fashion.

581 Having recapitulated these facts, let us try to define the legal nature of Nkundó marriage. In ecclesiastic law and in European civil law, a marriage is effected through the official exchange of 581 mutual consent. For the Nkundó a marriage is effected through the official payment of a bride price, and to this payment is added the consent of the spouses, which is manifested more or less clearly depending on the type of union but which we have recognized as sufficient.

The bride-price and dowry payments comprise a contract between the families of the couple. This agreement between the families is considered by the Nkundó to constitute a marriage. For them the consent of the couple is secondary -- an attitude which is quite natural, considering the limitations of their analysis, as we have already seen. In European civil law, in addition to the legitimate exchange of consent which constitutes the marital union, there exists an explicit or tacit marriage agreement or contract by which financial questions are settled; it is only secondary to the marriage. The attitude expressed by this law is thus the very opposite of that taken by the Nkundó. [228]

Nevertheless, although our natives consider consent as altogether secondary in constituting a marriage, we can examine this question thoroughly and make a legal analysis of it; however, we must base our conclusions solely on facts observed.

The manifestation of the spouses' consent to a marriage is essentially a real contract from the legal standpoint and may be termed a conjugal pact: they express their desire to be united in marriage and do so in the manner prescribed by law. The fact that the Nkundó attribute a secondary importance to this contract does not destroy its reality.

Therefore, whatever the relative importance attached to them by the Nkundó, we can say with certainty that their marital union includes in reality two components: the bride-price agreement and the conjugal pact or expression of consent.

In ethical natural law marriage is a contract between the spouses: their consent is what constitutes the marriage. For the Nkundó, on the contrary -- at least according to their statements, explanations, etc. -- a man and woman become husband and wife through the payment of a certain portion of the bride price. If they 58| made a thorough analysis of the question, they would find a categorical opposition between their system and the philosophical and legal nature of marriage. But a pact of consent does in fact exist -- though to our people it is secondary -- and it constitutes an integral element in the complex of acts and ceremonies which comprise their marriage agreement. Therefore their marriage conforms to the philosophical definition.

How should we picture the relationship between the conjugal pact and the bride-price agreement? I think that if we go to the legal basis of the matter, we can make the following statement: Nkundó spouses give their [229] consent to a union such as they conceive of it; they want to become husband and wife according to the practices which are prevalent in their community and the rules prescribed by their law. They express their willingness to conform to these rules and practices. In a marriage by nkumbó, the union is first tentative (the engagement) and then, after the payment of the walo, final. It is as if the spouses-to-be said, "We want to be husband and wife, and we will actually become husband and wife as soon as our respective families carry out the essential portion of the bride-price agreement." This agreement is a kind of necessary condition for the marriage contract but, in their limited analysis, the Nkundó explain it as the sole element constituting the marriage. From the legal standpoint the ultimate consent of the engaged pair depends on the subsequent fulfillment of the bride-price agreement. The situation is basically the same with respect to premature unions. For other forms of marriage we can adopt an identical interpretation, mutatis mutandis. Thus in the case of inheritance the heir and the widow add their consent to the pre-existing and continuing bride-price agreement. And the case of a replacement does not differ from the preceding instances.

It is possible to raise the objection that the Nkundó do not consider inheritance and replacement as new marriages, but rather as continuations of a union which persists in spite of a change in the spouses as individuals. The answer to that objection is implicit in the principles stated above. For, because of the obvious inadequacy of their analysis, they do not perceive the existence of a contract of 581 consent; they do not distinguish between this conjugal pact which changes and the bride-price agreement which alone persists. And since for them the bride-price agreement is essential, while the conjugal pact is secondary, they pay attention only to the former. Thus we can legitimately interpret their statements on the nature of unions by inheritance and by replacement [230] as referring to the bride-price contract. Thus the fact that each relative of the deceased who wishes to marry the widow must make an individual payment (bekooli), while the clan contract continues unchanged demonstrates the effective reality of the distinction between the familial bride-price agreement and the individual conjugal pact.

To summarize all these considerations: we think that we are justified in giving the following definition: Nkundó marriage is a conjugal contract between a man and a woman which is firm in itself and is linked to a bride-price agreement of prescribed nature and formalities between their families.

Therefore we can conclude that the essential nature of Nkundó marriage conforms to the definition of that institution in general as given in ethics and that it fulfills all the necessary conditions. (1)

(1) I am very grateful to Attorney General A. Sohier for having, in a very specific way, drawn my attention to the legal aspect of this question and having thus suggested that I make a thorough investigation of it.

[231] Chapter IV. The Age of the Bride and Groom

582 The Nkundó may marry at any age. Their law contains no stipulation on the subject. Nevertheless, it was customary in the past for a girl to be married very young, while the boys could not take a wife until they had reached a really advanced age. Nowadays the time of marriage for the ever increasing number of girls and for the boys has been pushed forward almost universally. Let us examine the situation in detail, distinguishing between the sexes.

Article I. Girls

584 According to Nkundó custom it is acceptable for an expected child, not yet born or still very young, to be promised in marriage to X or Y. This practice was formerly very common and is still quite prevalent today. It is called banda bǒna or bǒmoto, literally, "to count a child" or "to count a woman." The ikulá is paid at the time of the promise. Later the matter is carried out in the usual fashion; the other parts of the bride price are paid either while the fiancée is young or, preferably, at the time when she goes to her husband.

584 855 Until that time, if one of the girl's relatives is already a wife of a polygamist husband-to-be or of one of his relatives, the child is brought up in her husband's family from a fairly early age, depending on the circumstances. She lives with her relative. She may be barely seven or eight years old, for example. If no one in her husband's clan can take care of her, [232] she spends only one or two weeks there to become acquainted, little by little, with people and places; she repeats the visit from time to time. Her mother accompanies her, for being so young she could not get used to being there alone, without support, without her parents. Therefore it is necessary to wait till she is old enough to be somewhat independent and able to manage by herself. That time usually comes around the [145] beginning of puberty, thus sometime between the ages of twelve and fifteen.

584 833 Like an adult woman, she is already called bompáka or wǎlí, depending on the portion of the bride price that has been paid. She has all the duties and privileges of a wife: sexual relations, food preparation, care of the household, etc. There is no set date or age for the beginning of cohabitation. This matter is settled between the husband and his parents-in-law. The latter do not have the right to [606] delay the time, even if their daughter is still too young, but they can make use of their great influence over their son-in-law. The modern [178] [571] generation is not shocked by sexual relations between an adulterer [sic] and a girl who has not reached puberty. Besides, all is in order from the legal standpoint; since the man has paid the bride price, he is the 584 833 legitimate husband and is entitled to his wife. Everything depends on his personal attitude, his passion, or his respect for the body of his young wife. If he is reasonable he will be very careful during his relations with her or will abstain altogether, so as not to "damage" her body. But from the legal standpoint he may do as he chooses. Thus there are adults who have regular relations -- one way or another -- with a wife whose breasts are not in the least developed. In such cases marital relations take place before nubility. (1) The consequences with respect to the birth rate may easily be guessed. [233] It may also happen that the husband himself has not reached puberty. This fact presents no obstacle to cohabitation. As soon as he feels that he is a man, he builds his hut and the couple live there together. In all these cases the girl often goes to her parents' home, and sometimes her visits extend for weeks during which she does not see her husband.

Formerly things did not work out in this fashion. The young wife often refused to participate in the sexual act, especially if the husband was considerably older than she. Her reaction was due to her natural modesty and timidity, together with her education. A polygamous husband usually respected her feelings, till she gradually came around. When her normal physiological development was completed and her love reached a sufficient intensity, she would begin to follow her instincts. In the light of what was said in Chapter I, Part 2, Article IV, 2, A, we may readily accept our informants' statements on this score; the situation seems altogether natural.

[882] 1. Note that the immature girl is not called filingo in Nkundó, as Engels ("Les Wangata," Revue congolaise, 1910, p. 36) maintains. This word is but the Nkundó transformation of the word virgo. There is no specific term for "prepubescent." A girl who is not yet a woman but is no longer a child is called itembeleke.

584
572 When an engagement is arranged for an expected child, the events may betray the hopes of the parents; and the child for whom the ikulā has been paid may turn out to be a boy. This mischance is dealt with in the following manner: either the suitor waits for the birth of a girl, or an alliance of friendship and mutual assistance (boseka, see Chapter I, Part 1, Article III) is established between him and the newborn child. Such an alliance is called liāla jǎ jwende, "the marriage of men," (matrimonium viri). In no case is restitution made for the ikulā that has been paid. If the friendship between the two men remains unbroken later, it results in the marriage of the daughter of the man for whom the ikulā was paid before his birth, to the man who paid it or to his son or grandson. No new ikulā is paid for such a marriage; the payment of the bride price simply has to be completed in the usual fashion.

584 A man may acquire a young child for himself, or for a son, a younger brother, etc. In the past the former was more frequently the case, for the old men kept the women for themselves and wanted [234] to benefit from having them before leaving them to the youths as inheritance. But the latter situation also arose.

The purpose [of obtaining a young child as wife for a relative] was to prevent inexperienced youths who were not able to defend themselves from being deprived of the means of obtaining a wife should the father die prematurely and the heirs monopolize the harem and bride-price valuables to their own profit, which theoretically they have a right to do. This practice is thus a means of favoring a son or other relative by furnishing him with a wife earlier than is customary. Nowadays this is even a stronger reason than in the past, because boys marry earlier than formerly. [178]

Other reasons for obtaining a child as a wife are involved in the two above-mentioned instances. There is a greater certainty of getting one's money's worth; valuables can disappear for various reasons during long unproductive years.

855 But the most fundamental reason, in my opinion, is the one very often invoked by the Nkundō, namely the opportunity of personally attending to the future wife's education. There is no 584 855 question but that it is in the husband's interest to take care of it himself. He can accustom her from childhood on to special circumstances, to the laws of the clan, to the particular habits (virtues, faults, way of living, etc.) of his family, his wives, and, last but not least, himself. He can mold her according to his tastes and desires. Enormous advantages result from his success in doing so. This does not mean that he takes care of her personally, for he knows he is not a born educator. He therefore usually prefers to hand this [593] task over to his mother (or aunt or sister), who enjoys this obligation and likes to help her son and to participate directly and intimately in his household.

584 572 A childhood engagement between their respective offspring often results from an alliance between "friends." If the children later on do not want the marriage, that is all there is to it. Restitution of payments is made, or a substitution is arranged. Such a situation arose while this book was being written. [235] At least twenty years ago, Lokóta of Bolíngo and Insílo of Bonjoku made a bond of friendship (boseka). The former begot a boy (Ituwó), the latter a girl (Lokoku). The parents arranged the engagement of their children by means of the ikulá payment. When Ituwó grew old enough to marry, he had no desire to marry Lokoku, for his heart was taken by another. But he had a younger brother, Itoko, who had affectionate feelings for Lokoku. Ituwó explained the situation to his mother (since his father had died in the interim), and she resumed the relationship with Insílo. They all came to an agreement without difficulty. Itokó therefore married Lokoku in place of his elder brother, after paying the bride price for her.

584 If a little girl is not satisfied with the union that has been arranged she is free, according to the rules of law, to break it -- and not simply by failing to give her consent. Note that in such a case the husband is not entitled to any compensation for having raised this child.

In spite of the advantages involved in childhood unions, they should be rigorously held in check, since the affections often stray from bonds formed at such an early age. More should be done to 584 safeguard freedom, and the impression should not be given that childhood unions are encouraged -- as it sometimes is -- by the exemption of immature wives of polygamists from a supplementary tax.

There is no law requiring an elder sister to be married before a younger one, but such is the common practice. Exceptions are made only under certain circumstances, and particularly if the younger girl finds a suitor earlier than the older one, a reason which includes and sums up all the others (such as disadvantageous physical and psychological tendencies of the older sister).

178
584 This practice of marrying daughters off before maturity is beginning to change because of the increase in freedom which has been introduced by colonization. Nevertheless, as this change is not especially advantageous [236] its manifestations are still very slight. The Christian education of parents must of necessity delay the time of the daughter's marriage and will do so ipso facto as soon as Christian influence becomes sufficiently strong in the region.

Article II. Boys

582 Except in the rare instances of an engagement of two young children, it was formerly the common and normal practice for men to remain bachelors for many years after puberty. The old men tended first to their own wants, and the youths had to wait their turn, like their elders. This was considered entirely natural. Later on they could establish a home and "profit" from life. Meanwhile they found a little compensation with the wives of certain relatives or of others, if the opportunity arose.

592
561 To explain this state of affairs we can invoke the political organization of Nkundó society, which is based on age. It is therefore natural that those possessing authority should have its external [556] signs, and one of the foremost of these is the wealth manifested in the possession of wives. But, as we will point out later, the present situation greatly weakens this explanation.

582
585 It is more natural to consider the delay in the marriage of young men a logical consequence of the marriage of girls at an early age. Suppose that a boy is fifteen years old while his sister,

582 whose bride price will fall to him, is only three. At that age, she 583 is married. The children's father is in a hurry to use the capital he has received, small as it is, rather than to let it lie unproductive and run the risk of losing it one day for some reason or other. Therefore, he uses it to obtain a wife, often a child, for himself or his brother. Thus the boy is deprived of the means which would enable him to establish a home when he attains adulthood. He will have to wait till he can acquire new wealth, either through his own work, or thanks to the assistance of [237] various relatives, or through the death of his father or his uncles, or -- frequently -- from the bride price of a daughter to be born to his sister's nkita. In the last instance, which formerly occurred very often, he was obviously forced to wait many years. Thus in the example cited in Chapter II, Article X, had the events occurred a few decades earlier, Bakutu would have had to wait for the bride price of his cousin Wǎngi, who was a good twenty-five years younger than he. If he had then been given the first part of the bride price, he would probably still have had to wait over ten years before becoming a husband in the full sense of the word, because the ikulɛ would have been used for an engagement with a very young child. More probably he would have been considered too young; the bride price would have been used for the benefit of another, and he would have had to wait another indeterminate number of years. Once the practice of marrying girls when they are small children is accepted, there is no other way out; everything is linked, and the result is inevitable, given the mentality of this society.

585
The elders' power to act in this way to their own advantage stems from the collective nature of the people's inheritance system (Chapter II, Article X and XI, 3, B). A bride price goes to the family; the right of the individual members is not personal or exclusive but is derived from their position in the hierarchy within the group.

Nevertheless, the fact that a man may claim priority to the bride price of his uterine sister over a brother born of a different mother seems to indicate that he originally held the chief rights to these valuables. The exercise of this right is postponed, and the concomitant transfers result.

582 We have spoken of the unproductivity of the bride price.
583x This is a Nkundó notion, and it is accurate only because the old men want to satisfy themselves before their sons. Actually, they could very easily reconcile their desire that the bride price should be productive with the aspirations of the youths, at least in many instances. All they would need to do would be to use the valuables they have received for their sons' benefit by acquiring girls of the same age for them. The productivity of the valuables would not diminish [238] in the least, of course, since the goods would remain in the family. On the contrary, it would be increased because a [842] greater number of progeny would probably be born. But our natives knowledge of physiology does not seem to be sufficiently developed [181] for them to come to this conclusion. And even more probably their egoism has greatly clouded their intelligence and silenced the voice of good sense and fatherly love to make it possible for them to multiply the number of their wives and thus increase the easy satisfaction of their sensuality, augment their wealth, and reinforce their social position. It will be their sons' turn after their death.

561 This situation is aggravated by the fact that, except for the 428 bosólo, the brothers, not the sons, of the deceased inherited the 595x widows, who thus remained in the hands of the old men.

582 Because of their attitudes the old men monopolized most of the women. They established large harems for themselves, so that it was very difficult for the young men to find a woman to marry; they had to consider themselves lucky if their father provided them with a child.

Thus it was unheard of that a young man between twenty and 582 thirty years old should marry, except for a few instances where a 178 man acquired a child who was to become his wife after a number of years. Men were usually forty years old or older before they married.

Nowadays the situation has changed entirely; the attitude of the old men favors the young much more and has become almost normal. The great majority of fathers, if they have the means, procure a wife for their sons as soon as the latter are old enough to express a desire for one. This improvement is due to the fact that it has become 582 178 much easier to get married. A great number of young men who would still be bachelors had they lived under the old regime now have wives. The young people leave home to go and work for the Whites, and the parents feel sorry for their sons and do not want to see them leave without a wife [239] to take care of them and prepare their food. This feeling has dealt the old custom a severe blow. And even for the young men who stay at home, it is no longer so difficult to obtain a wife. Paternal love has here triumphed over egoism.

Furthermore, the elders have been forced to take a more humanitarian attitude because, since the European occupation has given the young women a new freedom, they have abandoned their husbands and fled to the centers where, under the protection of the Whites, they have joined lovers who are as young as they. Therefore, it was much more intelligent to obtain a wife for their sons in an honest fashion rather than to expose themselves to loud palavers by the abandoned husband.

From all the preceding description it is clear that the man was considerably older than his wife. But because of the inheritance of widows it also happened -- and still happens -- that a man acquired wives who were older than he. When young men marry at the present time, many wives are definitely younger than their husbands; many adolescents have received prepubescent little girls for wives.

As a general rule a Nkundó woman does not like her husband to be much older than she, and she likes it even less if he is younger. Nowadays unions between persons of the same age increase continually. This increase is due more to the remarriage of divorcées, who prefer husbands of their own generation to the old men who first paid for them, than to first marriages between equals. The influence of Christian couples is called upon to play a great educational role in normalizing the situation of the girls.

561 582 The boys must marry in turn, according to age, because of the seniority rule which regulates social relations. That is the rule, but it may be mitigated by the application of another rule, namely the one pertaining to the direct or indirect rights to a sister's bride

582 561 price. The rights of a polygamist's sons over their sisters' bride prices are not absolutely equal [240]. One of them can oppose the decision that one of his brothers, born of a different mother not related to his, should benefit from the bride price paid for his uterine sister. His right will incontestably prevail. But if he has other sisters, it is his duty out of brotherly love to help his less fortunate brother. If both of them have uterine sisters, there may be an exchange of bride-price rights which will hurt no one. Finally, if only the younger brother has a sister, his right to her bride price is precisely defined and personal, and it may therefore happen that he marries before his elder brother. But unless the mother is absolutely opposed to any such arrangement, an attempt is usually made to settle the matter in a friendly fashion by assigning the future bride price of a niece or cousin to the younger brother. The rules as we have explained them hold absolutely only for the present time. They also existed in the past, but the delay in the sons' marriages, as described above, resulted in a transferring of rights which could completely upset this order. Since, in practice, many men began their married lives after the death of their fathers or uncles, thus with inherited wives, the elder brothers benefited from the rules before the younger ones did. (1)

593 x 579 Lastly, the eldest son may be deprived of his rights for certain reasons, such as a serious failure in his duties of respect and submission to his father. To punish him his father may curse him publicly, declare that he has lost his position as eldest son, and forbid him to acquire a wife. This practice is no longer common today; it would have little effect, for the young man would go and seek his fortune elsewhere. But history has left us some examples like that of Ikété ya Lonkinja, the first-born son of Ikété Elongama éâ Longómbá, the ancestor of the Bombénga wĭ Bokenda family (Besombó).

Chapter V. Obstacles to Marriage

M 582 There is no specific term in Lonkundo for an "obstacle to marriage." General terms are used, as in our European languages.

Our people make no distinction between obstacles which nullify a marriage and those which are prohibitive in nature. Therefore, we will simply speak of obstacles without making any distinctions among them.

Article I. "Race"

M P 592 593 The question of a diversity of races can be considered only with reference to the Batswá. Marriages with them are strictly forbidden. Nkundó rules of behavior are very strict with respect to relations between Baotó and Batswá. It is unheard of that opposite sexes of the two races should mingle, even for a simple conversation. There would then obviously be no question of marriage.

M P 587 588 Among the Bilángi, a Batswá tribe of the Injóló of the Salonga-Luilaka (who absolutely refuse to be called Batswá or Balímbe), there have been two cases of such unions to my knowledge. Two Baotó women were involved, both, by a singular coincidence, from Lotángonda (Injóló, Engónjó). One was Njalí, daughter of Yole and sister of Lomélé, the other Nsombola, sister of Limpema.

Njalí was taken in marriage by Bakao of Ikindatói. She wanted children desperately and, not having had any by her two successive Nkundó husbands, she ran away to the Bilángi in hopes of having better luck there. [242] She was not disappointed in her expectations. She gave birth to four sons: the eldest, Bonkono, who died some years ago; Bakao (Georges), who died in 1933; two sons, Bonkoré (Louis) and Joke (Henri), who are still alive. In 1933 the descent of the four numbered thirteen sons, six daughters, four grandsons, and one granddaughter. But there was never a legitimate marriage between Bakao and Njalí since no bride price was paid. And the descent have formed a small Bilángi clan, which is dependent on the grandmother's clan (Ilongó of Lotángonda).

P
565
578 The second case is somewhat more recent. It occurred at the beginning of the European penetration of the area. During the general upheaval at that time, the natives of Bosóka village (Bilángi of Lingonja) took advantage of the absence of many adult men whom the soldiers had taken on an expedition against the Mbole. They were able to capture a woman named Nsombola and take her home with them. She loved one of the men of Bosóka, and after many years, he "purchased" her for the price of two slaves. She lived there happily until quite recently, when she was overcome with a desire to return to her own race. (She leaves no descendants.)

In this second instance, then, the Nkundó bowed to the woman's wishes and, in accepting a bride price for Nsombola, gave in to the inevitable. This example shows that they can be flexible in their customary requirements if the situation warrants it.

Nevertheless, there have been no admirers or imitators of these exceptional cases, and the opposition against unions between the two races remains firm. Mixtures are not desired. The position which the hybrid family of Bakao occupies in the village of Lotángonda is highly significant. For it is an exception to the rule applicable to such cases, namely, that a child who has no legitimate father is incorporated into his mother's clan. The descendants of Bakao and Njalí are dependents of Lotángonda and are a part of it politically, but [243] they are not included in the kin group. For they have inherited a Bilángi nature from their father, and therefore, contrary to the logic usually applied, they have not become relatives of their ancestress. Here, too, the "racial principle" has prevailed against common law.

P
[851]

P
563
588
595 Nor does one hear of temporary relationships or concubinage between them. I know only of one instance; its outcome was not happy, and it did not invite imitators. It happened around 1913. A certain polygamist, Lokóta of Bokeke (Bombwanja) fell in love with the wife of Bonkingó, who at the present time is headman of Bosáola (Batswá of Ntómbá, Bombwanja). He became the laughing stock of the entire region, but because of his love, it did not deter him. In his own household, however, the situation was more serious. One of his wives (Ambángela) soon left him. The others refused him their bodies

563
588
[595] and prepared for divorce. Consequently, Lokōta was obliged to give up his unreasonable love, and in the end everything was set to rights. (1)

1. No children were born as a result of that relationship.

Instances of mixing have occurred because of colonization, outside the usual environment, between Batswá and members of tribes which are not acquainted with this race. At the Bokūma Mission there lives a Botswa woman of the Ekonda who was taken away by foreign soldiers and had two children by a Mbole man. These children are held in contempt by both the Baoto and the Batswá in the vicinity, and they will only be able to marry if they settle in their mother's clan. . . .

In the veterans' village of Ingende there lives a Botswa of Boūlama (Bombwanja) who married an Urundi woman while he was a soldier in the war. She probably did not know her husband's race. They came to this region, and the marriage has proved to be excellent, and the wife has always remained deeply attached to her husband. Their five children are not treated with the slightest contempt. Their situation would undoubtedly [244] be different if they lived in truly native surroundings, where they would certainly be incorporated into the Batswá.

565
598 The introduction of the Batswá into the economic life of the Europeans and their training in its may favor, and result in, a mixing of the races. The wealth thus placed within their reach may serve to seduce some of the more lascivious or greedy Baoto women, particularly those who always hang about the centers, camps, and markets and in whom vice has extinguished all feelings of propriety and honesty. The danger increases when Batswá bachelors are hired as laborers for some purpose and sent far from home to do their work, especially if the proportion of married men in the group is insufficient.

178
164
563
588 This is not a description of an existing situation -- for the barrier between the two races is still impassable -- but of a possibility that is not out of the question, as an occurrence in 1932 would indicate. The

P
178 doctor who was in charge of the dispensary at Flandria at that time 588 informed me of the case of a Botswa fruit harvester in the service of 563
164 the H.C.B. who had syphilis of unquestionably sexual origin.

M
Though a racial difference constitutes an obstacle to marriage, 582 a tribal or ethnic one does not. Where the geographic situation permits, true Nkundó, such as the Elíngá, marry members of neighboring groups such as the Ngombe, the Mbole, or the Ekonda.

Article II. Social Status

M
Among the Nkundó a difference in social status is not an 554 obstacle to marriage. They have no social classes strictly speaking.
582 They differentiate between those with authority, those who are in-[565] feriors, and the individuals or families who are not entitled to their [571] word in political matters; but these ideas do not come into play in ordinary social relations, [245] and especially not with respect to marriage. A person may belong to a clan which is inferior, subject, dependent, foreign, or descended from a slave; nevertheless he may marry even a member of the group's senior clan. These distinctions are in the realm of politics; a marriage is a matter of law, affection, and good relations based on the payment of a bride price.

M Actual slaves are an exception, but here a distinction must 567 be made between the sexes. Unions with slave women were very 582 common, but they were not marriages strictly speaking. Before a real marriage was entered into, the woman was set free. More details on this subject will be given in Chapter VII, Article V. For men the situation is altogether different. The condition of a slave was not only inferior, it was dishonorable, though a bit less so than among the Ancients. It might be overlooked if the love between the pair was unusually ardent, and there are a few clans descended from a "free" woman and a slave man, who were united in a proper and legitimate marriage for which the master paid the bride price.

There is no longer any opposition to the union of a "free" person with the descendant of a mixed marriage. The children may always claim kinship with their maternal ancestors who in these

567 matters are more important than the father's ancestry. (1)

[554] 1. Among the Nkundó no shame is attached to not knowing the family of one's father. But not to be able to name the mother's clan is a great dishonor for it proves that she was a slave.

There is less opposition to the first generation born of a couple who were both slaves than for their parents, and it progressively decreases with each succeeding generation. There is practically no opposition now to the grandsons. The reason seems to be that although receiving a wife from one's master in a regular marriage does not constitute emancipation (nsikó, nsikola) for the slave, [597] it is a kind of adoption (wěmya, -émya). [246]

Article III. Kinship

582
835 Marriage between members of the same kin group (isangano, bosangema, from the verb -sangema, "to be related") is forbidden. But how far does such a kin group extend? It is impossible to give a general rule. On the one hand, it is certain that if two groups are not descended from a common ancestor there is no bond of kinship between them, even if they live side by side. But on the other hand, it is not possible to say that all those who are descended from the same ancestor are relatives and that marriage is forbidden between the various branches of the grouping they comprise. The question therefore amounts to knowing by which ancestor the exogamous grouping is defined. A decision on this point may only be made through the examination of each case individually.

614 It is impossible to deduce anything from the meaning of the term clan, for it is usually defined as "a grouping of families united to one another by kinship." This leaves us back where we started. The characteristics usually given for a clan are: generic name, 614 totemic bond (1), collective responsibility, and exogamy, and do not provide a solution either. For the elements of this definition must be complementary to one another to provide an adequate intension, and it is impossible to determine the limits within which they operate among the Nkundó.

Thus we would have to make a list of all the groupings of these people and examine them in order to find out which ones correspond to the idea of an exogamous clan. And this is not feasible. Nevertheless, for the sake of illustration, here is the genealogy of the Bongíli:

Their ancestor Tólenjou had two sons, Iloko and Bokungá, and a daughter, Ǎmbá, by one wife. By two other wives he had Eángá, father of the Ikengya, and Efoloko, father of the [247] Bolénge. Iloko's progeny gave rise to the villages of Ifutó, Mbángé, and Lofelí; Bokungá's progeny to Boambá (and Ifoku), Ndongó, Bolongwankoi, Etoóntálé, Bontálé, Lokónola (part of Imomo), and Betoló l'Ibela (whose people live with the Boambá). Through Ǎmbá there originated the villages of Elángá, Imomo, and Eleke (the latter together with Bolongwankoi from the village of Lonkongo).

1. Totemism does not seem to exist among the Nkundó. In any case it is not apparent here as it is elsewhere.

614 Thus we have five groups which are exogamous; marriage is forbidden within each group, but not with members of the other groups. The little genealogy above gives some idea of the antiquity of the line and of the distance which separates its present members from the founding ancestor of the tribe. It should be noted that each exogamous group is subdivided into several villages, clans, and families. The same limits appear to be set with respect to the maternal line; marriage with the descendants of brothers and sisters of the ancestress, wife of the ancestor of the exogamous grouping, is forbidden. (1)

1. Note that lonkâna relations are practiced within each of the five exogamous groups, but not between the descendants of the same ancestress, wife of one of the ancestors, and of her bibísa. See Chapter I, Article VII, 1.

In investigating this subject the family of the ancestress must be taken into account as well as the paternal line.

In order to be able to define an exogamous group precisely, it is therefore necessary to study not only several villages, but also various tribes. For a single group may be composed of several families who live far from each [248] other and have sometimes become attached to groupings of people who are only very distantly related or even complete strangers. In such a case therefore a single village may include several exogamous groups.

Such is the case of the Bɔ́endɛ́, descended from the ancestor Ilumbɛ́ yǎ Mpumo. From his first wife, Eúmɛ́, arose the Etɔ́o groups, from his other wives, the Bongangá groups. They do not marry among themselves but are a good example of a complex composition.

The Etɔ́o are dispersed in four villages:

1) Etɔ́o of Lotɔ́lá
2) Etɔ́o of Bakovɔ́ or Mbúlanɛ́ne, both Basɛ́ká Bombɔ́ngo
3) Etɔ́o of Mbɛ́mbɛ́ or Basɛ́ká Bofííyolo
4) Etɔ́o of Bosánjo or Basɛ́ká Eɔ́ngo

614 621 The Bongangá are divided as follows:

1) Bongangá, in the narrow sense of the term (Basékå Inanó, B. Bolaká, B. Bongéngé, B. Bandúwá, B. Lokókómyá)

2) Bongangá of Bakoyó, or Bolíma

3) Bongangá of Mbómbé or Basékå Botúna

Thus Lotólá, Bakoyó, and Mbómbé each have an Etóo group and a Bongangá group. The Bongangá, in the narrow sense of the term, have in addition a "slave" group named Batsína, a part of which is located with the Bosánjo. A foreign clan is settled with the Etóo of Lotólá; they are the Bofalambóka, descendant of a man named Ekonda (Imbolo) and his sister who was married to Mbete, a slave from Bompángá (Wǎngatá) who was freed by his master.

Many villages have foreign groups living with them such as descendants of slaves (ekwála), or others (Ekonda, Bombwanja, groups related by marriage called likilo, mpámá or bowélé, and mbúsolá, (1) etc.). [249]

[609] 1. Mpámá or bowélé are any foreigners who were formerly invited by the group patriarch to remain with him in order to carry out certain tasks, especially metal-working. Mbúsolá is the term applied to a child born to a woman out of wedlock (Chapter I, Part 2, Article IV, 3). Such children are also called nkio y'ǎóme, "the husband's flying dogs," because they are not his own children but are attached to their mother's husband in the fashion of these animals, who attach themselves to trees when they sleep.

[848] [825]

614 582 If we add the descendants of relatives who have married into other more or less remote groupings, the prohibition against marriage on account of kinship applies to a good many people. In accordance with the law of exogamy, such a kin group may be widely dispersed geographically, and it is understandable that it is not always easy to

M
614 untangle all the threads. Thus it happens that young people form 582 relationships with the intention of marrying without knowing that they are related; they are warned only by the opposition and ensuing explanations of the elders.

We may conclude that marriage among descendants of a common ancestor is generally prohibited if they live in the same village. It is frequently permitted on the other hand, if they belong to different villages, provided that they are not, at the same time, related to one of the ancestresses.

M Clearly, it is difficult to say what precise degree of kinship 582 formed the basis for the prohibition of or permission for a marriage 835 between descendants of a common ancestor, or what are the boundaries of an exogamous grouping.

It is also apparent from the preceding observations -- as
M from the examination of affinity as an obstacle to marriage -- that [611] the descent from a common mother is a more important factor than descent from the father. This does not give proof of a form of matriarchy, though it could be the remains or the beginning of one,
M or could provide a partial explanation for one. It stems quite simply [842] from the Nkundó notions concerning procreation, in which they
M attribute the major role to the mother. There is also the fact that [602] greater shame is attached to being united with a person descended
M from the same woman, and finally the fact that they feel a stronger [593] affection for the mother than for the father (a sentiment [250] which is accentuated by polygamy). The three causes are closely related.

M Finally, it should be noted that there is a group among the 184 Nkundó we are discussing which is less strict than the others in this 582 matter. The relatives among whom marriage is prohibited is definitely more limited; that is, their exogamous groupings are more limited. The people in question are the Bongale (see Introduction), and the same phenomenon may be observed among the Elingá. (1)

P
[582] 1. The Batswá are still more liberal, and in this respect their practices differ very little from ancient European laws and customs.

684
582 There is no sanction against the infraction of the law of exogamy. There is only the opposition of the parents and patriarchs, and a quasi-innate habit.

582
614 Note also that members of certain clans frequently marry members of certain others, among whom they prefer to choose their wives. Therefore a good proportion of the women married into any given family will belong to one particular clan. The Wafé (Bakâala), for instance take a great many of their wives from among the Bongale w'ôtóló.

582
614 We may reasonably assume that the ancestors of related groups, who now marry among themselves, formerly practiced exogamy. If this assumption is correct, it must be admitted that with the progressive growth of families, this rule has been relaxed in certain respects so that the present situation has resulted. Consequently, it would not be surprising if these legal provisions became even less rigorous in the future. Actually, some young people have begun to [178] violate the rules of exogamy and their example has freed the whole family. (2) Thus the Bokâtola maintain that their two groupings,

2. See Chapter I, Article VII, 1.

Bompela and Ilóngé, who now intermarry, formerly comprised a [251] single exogamous entity. Contemporary instances appear here and there, but they remain very rare, even between persons who are very distantly related, and much rarer between close kin. (1) For the

1. A recent case was that of Elímâ and Bolófe, who both belonged to the exogamous group of Bokenyola of the Bonjoku, but one belonged to the Basékâ Bokóyó family and the other to the Basékâ Njoli.

Nkundó still feel very strongly about this law. The bulk of the people are entirely opposed to any laxity or violations and the patriarchs and notables act against them with all their power. But the strength of 582 614 their intervention is greatly reduced by the fact that much of their authority has been shifted to the chiefs named by the colonial administration, and also by all the contingencies of modern life. Since on the other hand, the young people are gradually breaking the ancient limits in order to acquire greater freedom, the elders will one day have to yield to them.

Article IV. Affinity

582 602 Affinity among the Nkundó should not be understood to have the meaning given in European civil or ecclesiastic law. Marriage is forbidden with all persons who are bakiló (Sing. bokiló). (2)

2. Contrary to the statement by Father Kaptein (Congo, 1922, Vol. 1, p. 541).

Therefore one must know what persons are called bakiló, a fairly complicated problem for us Europeans.

To make the matter more understandable, certain considerations must be developed before giving the general rules.

1. General considerations

1) Affinity is not as great an obstacle to marriage as kinship. It is possible to obtain a sort of "dispensation," and for many degrees of affinity, divorce or death removes the barrier. But there are transgressions [252], and, except for the few indicated above, these do not occur in cases of kinship.

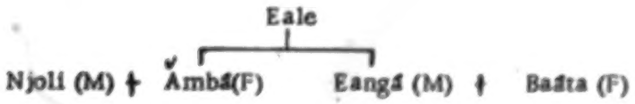
The following legitimate reasons for a "dispensation" are given: a danger that the patrimony will be scattered because of the infidelity of a wife who absolutely refuses to remain with her husband, added to the difficulties of a divorce palaver and the subsequent reimbursements, and -- a reason closely linked to the one just given -- a passionate love between the two people who are relatives by marriage.

582 602 The dispensation is given by the ndonga acting with the family council, which often yields before the fact, particularly if the second reason is involved. (1)

> 1. "To give a dispensation" is translated as kilola. A marriage contracted with a legitimate dispensation or one accorded because of the pressure of the accomplished fact is called kilókilólá, or "an affinity which is not maintained according to the regulations."

[671] 2. Contrary to European law, which recognizes only a direct affinity between husband and his wife's family, Nkundó law also recognizes an indirect affinity, so that a person is affinally related even to the spouses of his wife's relatives. That is, each person is affinally related, not only to his spouse's kin, but also to their relatives by marriage. Thus, in the example below, Njoli and Baáta are true relatives by marriage, though indirect ones. (2)

> 2. The Nkundó do not make a terminological distinction between the two types of affinity. We are using the terms "direct" and "indirect" for the sake of convenience and clarity.



There is an important difference between the two types of affinity: direct affinity is a much greater obstacle to marriage than indirect affinity, and exceptions are made only rarely and only for certain degrees of relationship.

582 602 576 3) A distinction must be made between "superior" and "inferior" relatives, that is, between those who have [253] precedence

582 and those who owe submission and respect. The "superior" relatives 602 [576] are the ascendants, uncles, aunts, etc., in short, all those bearing the title of "father" or "mother," as well as elder brothers (elder [601] sisters, elder cousins, etc.), who are batómóló (sing. botómóló).
The "inferiors" are the descendants, those who are called "children" (bǎna): sons and daughters, grandsons, nephews, nieces, younger brothers or sisters, and those who are classed with them and called bakáné (sing. bokáné).

[599] 4) Polygamy and the inheritance of widows introduce another [587] element. We will see that although persons of certain degrees of affinity may not marry, the prohibition is lifted to permit the inheritance of widows.

5) Our term "relatives by marriage" the Nkundó term and bakiló are not synonymous, even with respect to direct affinity. When we use the term "relatives by marriage" here, we are speaking in Nkundó terms. They do not consider certain persons whom we would include in that category as "relations by marriage." Such persons [601] are included in the group which as a whole is designated as likiló or bakiló, but when properly and accurately referred to they are called bóme, "husband," or wáli, "wife," because they may marry each other and therefore affinity, strictly speaking, cannot be applied to them. In other words, for the Nkundó, affinity is the relationship of a person with (only) those of his spouse's relatives whom he is forbidden to marry. It is well to bear in mind the double meaning of this term.

2. The rules

1. Direct Affinity

582 A. Marriages are prohibited in the direct line. Nevertheless, 603 in accordance with consideration number 4, a son or grandson may 606 inherit or marry the widows of his father or grandfather, but not the reverse. [254]

1. If after the death of his son Ikɛ́tɛ́, Bombembí wanted to marry his widow, the mother of the deceased would be so angry and ashamed that she would irrevocably leave him. Such conduct on the part of a father during his son's lifetime would give the son full rights to vengeance (assassination, war with the help of the mother's clan, etc.), for it would be equivalent to a real disavowal of his son. But the case is purely hypothetical.

B. Members of different generations in the collateral line: Marriage with older, "superior" relatives of the spouse is forbidden. The Injɔ̃lɔ̃ sometimes make an exception for an aunt of the spouse after the latter's death, but this practice is very much frowned upon.

Marriage with the spouse's inferior, younger relatives is permitted.

582
607 C. Equals in the collateral line: The degree of relationship is of no importance, for example, marriage with an older sister (or cousin) of the spouse is forbidden; marriage with a younger sister is permitted. The same rule applies to women, but after the husband's death an exception is sometimes made in the elder brother's favor in order to facilitate inheritance arrangements. Only the Boángé -- like [18] the Elángá of Losanganya -- make no distinction between elder and younger siblings and always permit the marriage. They are even beginning to be imitated by the Injôlô.

[Q2] Note, finally, that the more distant the relationship, the less strict the prohibition, that is, dispensations and exceptions are more easily accepted.

2. Indirect Affinity

582 606
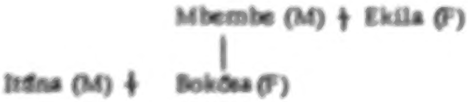
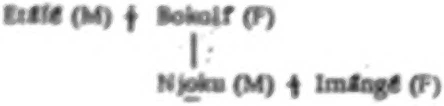
604
A. Marriage among those of lineal relationship is forbidden but certain exceptions are permitted. There are two possibilities: with the father's wife (Example 16) and with the son's wife (Example 17).

Example 16



If Bokósa dies or is divorced from Iténa, the latter may marry Ekila, but this exception is not often made because they would be very open to unkind criticism. [257]

Example 17



After Bokolí's death Etáfé is permitted to marry Imángé. Such a marriage is more leniently regarded if Etáfé himself paid the bride price for Imángé, for in that case he is preserving his capital in marrying her. This consideration may also apply during Bokolí's lifetime, if Imángé does not want to remain with Njoku. Under such circumstances, however, Njoku's mother would oppose the marriage with all her power. If Etáfé does not listen to reason, he can expect [586 a divorce or even war with Bokolí's clan, to whom he is doing a great injury by taking away his stepson's wife. After divorce Bokolí's kin may refuse to give Etáfé her new bride price and may give it directly to Njoku so that he can obtain a wife to replace the one that was taken from him.

582
604 The same rules are applicable to aunts and uncles, but they are less strict:

595
[602] B. Marriage between affines who are collaterally related through their lineal relatives:

a) Marriage between descendants [of the lineal relatives through whom the affinity is established] is strictly forbidden. Thus, the children of two spouses may not marry each other; they are considered brothers and [258] sisters. The same rule applies to two half-cousins (Example 21).

Bolɔ́njɔ́ (M)
Lokonga (F)

Marriage between Bolɔ́njɔ́ and Lokonga is strictly prohibited.

Wɛ̌yɛ́ (M)
Nɔ́ɔ́ndɔ́ (F)

Marriage between Wɛ̌yɛ́ and Nɔ́ɔ́ndɔ́ is prohibited.

592 b) Marriage between ascendants [of the lineal relatives through 602 whom affinity is established] is forbidden, but an exception is made when the affinity is broken by death.

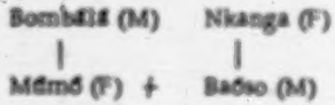
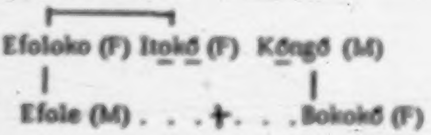
Example 22:



Bombélé (M)
Nkanga (F)
Mémó (F)
Baóso (M)

Marriage between Bombélé and Nkanga is forbidden,

Example 23



Efoloko (F)
Ito̱kó̱ (F)
Kó̱ngó̱ (M)
Efole (M)
Bokokó (F)

Marriage between Ito̱kó̱ and Kó̱ngó̱ is forbidden, but permitted upon the death of either Efole or Bokokó, Dispensations and violations of this rule do occur.

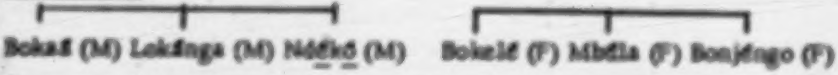
C. Affinity in collateral line arising from a marriage between relatives in collateral line: The rules are the same as for direct affinity in collateral line (see above, no. 1), C.)

Example 24

[60]



Bokaé (M)
Lokénga (M)
Ndé̱kó̱ (M)
Bokelé (F)
Mbéla (F)
Bonjéngo (F)

Bokaé is married to Bonjéngo. Neither he nor Lokénga may marry Bokelé, and Ndé̱kó̱ may not marry Mbéla [Translator's note: the table shows Ndé̱kó̱ to be female, but I have corrected the error]. If he had married Bokelé, Ndé̱kó̱ could marry Mbéla. Furthermore, if Bonjéngo were Mbéla's senior, then Lokénga could also marry Mbéla. [259]

The same rule applies to cousins:

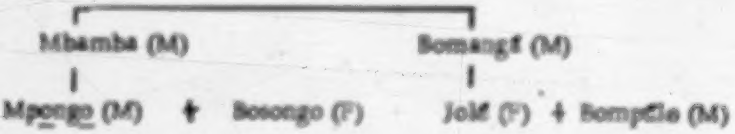
605

Example 25



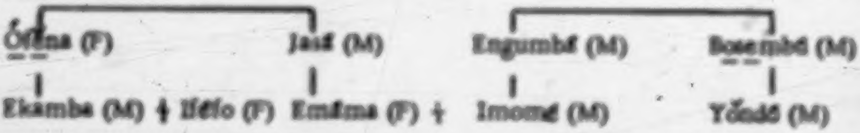
Mbamba (M)
Bomangɛ (M)
Mpongo (M)
Bosongo (F)
Jolɛ (F)
Bompɛlo (M)

Marriage between Bompɛlo and Bosongo is forbidden.

As the degrees of relationship grow more distant, the obstacles increasingly lose their force, so that exceptions are more readily accepted.

One point remains to be noted, although it has already been mentioned several times. Cousins (male or female) who are [601] bɔ̌nankɛnɛ are "fathers" to their cousins according to Nkundɔ́ law; they are therefore treated as aunts or uncles. For them the prohibition is very severe, especially if they are nyangɔ̌kilɔ́, "mother" of a relative by marriage.

Example 26



Ɔ́tɛ́na (F)
Jasɛ (M)
Engumbɛ (M)
Bosembó (M)
Ekamba (M)
Ilɛ́lo (F)
Emɛma (F)
Imomɛ (M)
Yɔ́ndɔ́ (M)

Ekamba is Jasɛ's bɔ̌nankɛnɛ and therefore Emɛma's "father." Ilɛ́lo, his wife, is therefore Emɛma's mother. Emɛma is Yɔ́ndɔ́'s bokilɔ́. Consequently, Ilɛ́lo is the mother of Yondɔ́'s bokilɔ́ and therefore Yondɔ́'s nyangɔ̌kilɔ́. Marriage between Ilɛ́lo and Yɔ́ndɔ́ is strictly prohibited, though it is not prohibited between Emɛma and Yɔ́ndɔ́ (see Example 18).

Adulterous relations among these various persons will be discussed in Chapter VI, Article VI, 2. [260]

Chapter VI

Married Life

593 As soon as an engaged pair begin to live together, as described above, they acquire all the rights and duties of married people. No special ceremony marks the consummation of the marriage.

To translate "married life" the Nkundó use the noun ibanelo, from the verb bálana, which is the reciprocal form of the root -bal, "to get married." The noun, like the verb, is used in the physical as well as the moral and social sense. Our terms "household" and "family" have no exact equivalents in their language. The only term they have is ilongo, denoting the family in the broad sense that includes all related persons; but it could easily be adopted to translate our European terms. (1)

> 1. From the absence of a specific name, we cannot conclude that the thing itself is lacking. The Nkundó have a family in the sense of a household, though their idea of it and their organization is different from that of many peoples. But the word familia had a very different meaning among the Romans than that given to the French word, which also has a double meaning.

In this chapter we will examine the position of the spouses in relation to each other: the division of labor, property, various rights and duties, the relationship of the spouses with their families or relatives by marriage, and, finally, extramarital sexual relations.

Article I. The Division of labor

462
593 The care of the household falls to the woman. It includes the preserving and preparation of food, the cleaning of the hut and the court, the planting and care of the fields and various crops, and the care of the [261] children. She also fishes with scoops and does

462 basketwork (mats, baskets, scoops). Among the Elinga women mold
913* and fire the pots. It is also the woman who gathers the small pieces of firewood for which a knife and a machete are adequate; the large pieces of wood which must be cut with an axe are brought by the husband. She, too, is the one who gathers the vegetables, mushrooms, and caterpillars. She tends to the extraction of oil, makes the salt, and goes to the markets. And she also takes care of the farmyard.

A man, for his part, gives his attention not only to various political and social pursuits, but also to those tasks which are more difficult, more dangerous, more in conformity with his nature and constitution, such as hunting, fishing, cutting clusters of palm nuts, working in wood and metal, building the hut and annexes, weaving the nets and screens for fishing, felling the forest for cultivation (the woman burns the growth, then plants and cares for the crops).

Thus the division of labor is well regulated. Each one takes care of the task that suits his nature. We are not too astonished at the fact that a man never helps his wife, or vice versa; each limits himself to his own sphere. The Nkundó would consider it shameful to participate in the work of the opposite sex. Neither one nor the other complains about the matter. Besides, the fact that a woman has most of the trouble in the household, especially if there are several children, is in conformity with the nature of things. Consequently, we would be mistaken in considering the Nkundó woman a beast of burden and her husband a lazy profiteer. (1) [262]

1. Compare what I have said with what was written by Father Dubernet in Missions Catholiques, 65th year, no. 3185, August, 1933, p. 387: "Except for the rare few who are in a position of wealth, the woman, among the Blacks we have known, tends to her household tasks more or less like a good peasant back home. She has seldom seemed to us the beast of burden that others have been pleased to describe."

Article II. Property

573 x 614 Through marriage, a woman does not become a member of her husband's clan. If for example she is born into the Bofɛ́tola clan, she remains all her life bosɛ Bofɛ́tola, "member of the Bofɛ́tola [764] clan," and her corpse has to be buried in her native soil. In case of divorce and remarriage, the new husband does not refund the bride price to the former one; he pays the woman's parents, and they reimburse the forsaken husband.

573 x 421 All the wife's activity, however, is directed toward the good of her husband and his family, and this is so from the time of the ikulɛ payment. Her parents have no further rights over their daughter. All the fruits of her labor are her husband's property.

If she finds objects that have no owner, such as, for example, elephant tusks or buried copper rings of which no one claims ownership, they do not belong to her nor to her family, but exclusively to her husband. If he shares with his parents-in-law, he does so out of affection and respect for them. He has no legal obligation to do so, but propriety and cordial relations impose a certain duty on him.

Profits from the sale of the products of her industry (such as foods for market, mats, salt, pots, baskets) belong not to her but to her husband.

Even whatever she acquires during a visit to her parents, everything she finds while she is with her family, the fish she catches, the caterpillars she gathers in the forest there, all that belong exclusively to her husband.

It sometimes happens that a woman infringes on the husband's rights in this respect. If he is kind he will generally let her do as she [577] pleases. Severity on his part would be attributed to a lack of affection toward his wife or a lack of delicacy toward his parents-in-law, and he would even be criticized for being stingy (never unjust!), a more serious criticism than the others from the Nkundó point of view. [263] Dishonest conduct on the part of a wife, however, may give rise to incidents, and even to serious ones. That is what happened in the historic case of Efoloko of Ikengya (Bongɛli), who was married to [578] Mpokú of Imomo. She had gone fishing at home and had given all her fish 593^{x} to her brother Bolómaóngá. Her husband did not press the point. But 421 at a meeting where much beer was consumed, his companions teased 518 him for his excessive leniency, which they explained as a weakness on his part. Mpokú hereupon went into a rage, and the result was a bloody war between the two clans.

593^{x} A husband is expected to provide for his wife and to set aside 421 a fair portion of profits gained for her clothes, her utensils, etc., or quite simply to give her the means to take care of her own needs and those of the house.

Thus, although the husband is the sole legitimate owner of the fruits of his wife's labor, another law requires him to give her the amount she reasonably requires for her maintenance. If the wife appropriates the profits without informing her husband in advance, her action is an infraction of the law. If the husband does not give his wife what is necessary and useful to her to the extent that he is able, his action, too, is an infraction of the law.

Fish caught by the wife are cooked, and those that remain are smoked and thus preserved for the use of the household as a whole. If a husband is not too badly disposed toward his wife, he will let her have a portion for her family.

The fields set up jointly by the couple (the man cuts the forest, the woman burns and clears the field, plants and cares for the crops) are the husband's property. The fruits of the field are used for their joint maintenance and that of their children. Profits from the sale of a portion of them are for their common use. They settle these matters between themselves as do most European families. Naturally, there are infractions in this respect also, and one spouse or the other sometimes enlarges his share for his own benefit or that of his parents, or disposes of goods without communicating his intention do so to the other in advance. [264] But all decent people disapprove of such behavior. (1)

1. There is a fable which teaches the right attitude to adopt in such situations.

421
[586] If one day the marriage is dissolved, the wife may no longer claim any right to the fields, utensils, clothing, etc. She does not inherit from her husband. When she herself dies, her family has no right to anything she may have left except, of course, to valuables she has received on the occasion of the marriage of one of her daughters. (2)

2. See Chapter II, Article V. For fuller details, see Chapter VIII, Article V, and Chapter IX, Articles IV and VII.

672
421 The woman's position with respect to property has yet another consequence; a husband is responsible for damage caused by his wife. He is the one who must pay the indemnity. The same is true for any debts she may have contracted. If she has borrowed, her creditor claims his due not from the woman nor her family, but from her husband. He alone is recognized as legally responsible, since he alone has the rights to his wife's economic activity, and profits as well as losses from it. Afterward he has the right to scold and even beat his wife for causing him this financial injury. However, an exception is made in cases where the woman's family officially acknowledges, by publicly paying a ndanga before witnesses, that she is at fault and thus frees the husband of any responsibility.

We may thus draw the following conclusions:

1) A woman is not an owner.

2) However she has the right to a reasonable amount for her various needs. This right is not a true property right (jus in re); it is a right to what is necessary for subsistence (jus ad rem).

3) Thus it is not possible for a woman's parents to inherit the goods which her husband has placed at her disposal [265].

4) A wife never acts in her own name but as her husband's agent; therefore he is legally responsible.

Article III. Relations between Spouses; Their Various Rights and Duties

593x Spouses are obliged to fulfill the duties and perform the tasks 833 incumbent upon them .

It is difficult to say just how far the sense of duty to fulfill the debitum conjugale extends among the Nkundó. Normally, they very frequently fulfill this obligation toward each other. But after a good quarrel they abstain, either through mutual consent or because one of them refuses. If one of the parties fails seriously and repeatedly [586] in this respect, the question is resolved by a divorce. The response to temporary lapses is limited to reprimands, disputes, blows, and other common reactions. It should be added that continence is required [834] during the ekelé period after the birth of a child and after setting up a new hunting enclosure (lokombo) or a new fishing weir (bosaka), before the third piece of a game or fish is caught.

1. Meals

593x A couple never take their meals together. The husband eats 264 the food prepared for him and served to him by his wife alone, with his grown sons, or with friends or relatives. The wife herself eats with her small children, her daughters, or her female relatives. The two sexes never mingle at meals.

593x The same rule applies to talks, but it is much less strictly 521 maintained; it is not rare to find that, for one reason or another, women participate in the conversation of men.

It will not be long before, through the influence of Christianity, [266] women will generally be admitted in the conversations of the opposite sex. Developments with respect to mixed meals will come with much more difficulty; in practice the question has not even been broached.

593x Thus one finds a kitchen next to the bedroom or separated from 343 the hut; in addition to being the place where food is prepared, it is where the woman spends her day. The kitchen is sometimes a [354] structure separated from the dwelling itself, sometimes a part of the house separated from the bedroom by a partition containing a door.

593ˣ 343 Polygamists as well as some monogamists have a kind of shed where they receive their friends, take care of their affairs, eat their meals, etc. (1)

> 1. Such a shed is called esamba by the Bombwanja, ingɔ́mba by the other tribes. The Beloko, like the Ntɔ́mbá and Bolɛ́ngɛ́ located between the Congo and the Boloko, say bongɔ́mbo. The Ekonda say ewánga.

[626] A man who is frequently found in the kitchen or who likes to rest there is the butt of ridicule by both men and women. He is called ikɔ́mbelinga (derived from bolinga, "smoke," and kɔ́mba, "to dodge; to turn the head away in order to protect the eyes against smoke").

2. Illness

593ˣ 758 A wife is required to nurse her husband if he is ill, together with his other wives if he is polygamous and, in case of serious illness, with the aid of his female relatives (mother, sisters). Even if they are married and living at a distance, they come to take care of a brother or son; it behooves their husbands to be reasonable and not to try and forbid their absence or prevent this exercise of their duty, for otherwise a man runs a great risk of seeing his wife leave him for good, outraged by this demonstration of his lack of affection for her family.

Together the wives and relatives seek medications and prepare the appropriate potions.

When a wife is ill the husband's female relatives usually come to see her, console her, and administer what care they are capable of giving; as a rule they are well disposed toward the wife of their son, brother, etc. The husband, for his part, must seek medications and help his sick wife. I recall a great palaver apropos of this question. During the illness of his wife Efetsɛ́, a certain Bokangá continuously had relations in his hut with another woman. The matter became public. The guilty husband was 593 required to re-establish peace and harmony by means of a considerable 758 boɔ́ndo, for having failed to take care of his wife and for having shown complete thoughtlessness and indifference.

If the illness becomes prolonged or serious, neither the hus-593 band nor his relatives have the leisure to nurse or take care of her.
758 To remedy this situation and at the same time give the woman's 672 parents the satisfaction of being able to help their daughter themselves, the husband sends her to them. He takes her there himself or calls them to come and get her. He communicates the news by sending his ndonga who bears a token payment (ndanga, loákako) such as a knife, a copper ring, etc. This ndanga is a pledge, evidence for the family that their daughter was ill on arrival and did not acquire her infirmity while with them. Without this pledge they would not want to take her; they would prefer to treat her in her husband's home. Or if the husband were to send her home without a ndanga, they would call the ndonga to witness this infraction of the rules. Or the fact that the husband has done this might be considered as a repudiation of his wife, pure and simple. In any case the husband would be in the wrong, and under these conditions the legal responsibility for his wife's death would fall entirely on him (see Chapter IX, Article X).

593 When the wife is cured, her parents send a message to their 758 son-in-law to urge him to come and take his wife back.

Even if they have not been invited by the husband, the wife's parents come to see their daughter when they hear of her illness [268] in order to take her away with them and care for her. She usually follows them, but she is not required to do so since she belongs to her husband. People even cite the names of women who despite the insistence of their families did not want to be cared for at home, but have preferred to die in their husband's arms, so to speak. Among them were Bolɔ́mbɔ́ w'îkofo of Bombɛ́nga w'ɔ̂kenda (Besombɔ́) married to lembe y'ilongo of Engɔ́njɔ́; Baleko of Nsekɛ́ married to Eanga ɛ́â Jatɛ́ of Nkɛ́lengo; Iombe of Bosáá married to Bokɔ́lɔ́mbwá of Iálá; Balengola of Ntɔ́mbá (Bombwanja) married to Lompoko of Mbelɛ́; Mpɛ́mbɛ́ of Bonganda (Bonkoso) married to Imbamba of Bonjoku;

593* 158 Efala of Longa married to Ìfolí of Bokɛ́nyola (Bo̱njo̱ku); Basɔ́sɛ́ of Mbelɛ́ married to Nke̱ngo̱ of Litɔ́li.

If the woman went to her family in good health and contracted an infirmity there, her parents are responsible for it. They are obliged to nurse her and to assume all the expenses due to her treatment. After she is cured they send her back with a quantity of nkomɛ for her husband. Usually the matter ends there. If relations between the two families are not very good, however, the husband will claim an indemnity, which varies with the situation and to which he is entitled even if he does not claim it.

This stipulation of the law holds even if the woman has gone to see her mother, father, etc., at the time of an illness or for any other reason.

It does not hold, on the other hand, if the wife has been ordered to go to her parents by her husband, or if she has fled the home shared with her husband because of ill treatment or of serious failings on his part; this point will be explained below in number 3. In such cases the husband is legally responsible for the illness.

Certain situations may arise which are intermediate to the ones discussed. Thus, for example, a wife may make a visit on her own initiative [269] but for her husband's good. Theoretically, he should win the case. Note, finally, that a stay of only twenty-four hours is not considered sufficient to make responsibility for an illness fall on the wife's family.

178 595* 758 672 797 Colonization has produced an entirely new situation. Colonial law has given the extra wives of polygamists the freedom to go to a mission in order to be instructed in the Christian religion and to contract a monogamous marriage (provided the customary rules governing the dissolution of marriages are observed). Such a woman may fall ill at the mission. If her illness has no troublesome consequences, it does not result in a dispute. But if the illness becomes chronic and in some way detrimental to the abandoned spouse, it may do so.

The polygamists declare that they are free of any responsibility, which they place on the woman's family. But the family has 178 nothing to do with it; it is unjust to bring them into the matter.

595x Since this legislation is intended to combat polygamy, it is natural 758 that the polygamous husband be the one who suffers from it.

672 The following is a recent example of this situation: Mbóyó 797 Julienne, sister of Botúna Jean of Balondó, married to a polygamist by the name of Insílo of Bokenyola (Bonjoku), went to Bokuma Mission, where she contracted an incurable illness. (1) Because of her illness she found it impossible to remarry. She therefore left the mission but was no longer accepted by the husband she had lived with so that she had to live in her brother's home. Insílo insisted that her brother reimburse him for the bride price, maintaining that in going to the mission, the woman had divorced him; his real reason, however, [270] was that she had become unfit to fulfill the duties of a wife. Since Mbóyó did not fall ill in his home, he held her family responsible.

593x 3. Abandonment of the home shared by the couple

586x In the case of serious failings on the part of a husband, a woman's usual weapon is to leave their common home and return to her father's house. If the reason for her flight is serious, it is up to the husband to go and bring her back. She will not return on her own initiative. If he refuses to make the first step, he will be accused as much by public opinion as by his parents-in-law of not loving his wife, and a rupture will become inevitable. It is therefore his duty to go to his wife's parents. They will ask him to explain the situation. The wife, too, will say what she thinks. The parents will settle their difference. Whether or not the ndonga is present will depend on the

1. It was a sort of illness with nervous symptoms. From a scientific viewpoint, it is more than likely that she had this illness before her arrival at the mission, although it was only manifested there. But the natives do not make this distinction, so it is not relevant to our topic.

593x gravity of the situation. In general, the wife's parents judge im- 586x partially, because they value the stability of the marriage. If the husband feels that he has been wronged, he can always appeal to the ndonga, but ordinarily there is no need to do so and the matter is settled in a friendly fashion and in private. If the woman is found to be in the wrong, her parents scold her and take her to task. Pro- [431] vided with some gift (two or three bakonga, for example), they return her to her husband, advising her to behave in a more suitable fashion in the future. Should she resist, her parents will not hesitate to use threats and curses, and these seldom fail to have their effect. Nowadays women have become more emancipated, and it does sometimes happen that such a woman will scorn her parents' decision, especially if she has a lover somewhere beyond the reach of family justice. If it is the husband who is in the wrong, his wife will not go back with him until he has begged her to do so by paying a few copper rings or other valuables, the amount depending on the seriousness of the situation. This act on the husband's part is ex- [576] pressed by the verb bǫ́nda [271] and the noun bǫǫ́ndǫ, terms which do not apply specifically to this case only but are used whenever pardon is asked for a serious offense. This payment is not a fine or indemnity; it is more closely equivalent to the apologies and retractions customary among Europeans.

593 At the present time some women go back to their families for very slight reasons. Freedom and a greater ease of communica- 577 tion, together with a desire for emancipation, which is no longer 578 held back by the rein of ancestral sanctions, are the cause for this state of affairs. They are still held back somewhat by the risk of a rupture of the marriage, a possibility which they generally would rather not see realized, especially if the bride price is quite large.

In the past, if a woman was married a short distance away from her parents, she could always run away to them when there were domestic disputes. Even if the route led through other villages, it [487] was always possible to take a direct path through the forest, for such paths exist everywhere; they go around the villages in between so that, in case of conflict or danger of assassination, a traveler can go his way without being seen. When a woman was married into a

593 distant village, the situation was different. Not only did she run 574 many grave risks on the way, but it was not easy for her clan to 578 intervene on her behalf and to obtain respect for her rights by means of force. It can be readily understood that if a wife found herself alone and isolated, without effective support from her family, her husband and parents-in-law could feel free to do her many injustices if they were unkindly disposed toward her, unless the ndonga was sufficiently influential to keep them within limits. Hence the proverb [589] bol'ôsíkɛ́, mbila ñgɛ́ likwɛ́la, "If the native village is far away, peace (in the household) is like slavery." [272]

In the course of domestic quarrels an exasperated husband may shout at his wife: "Go away, go home." Usually she simply goes to the home of some female relative to wait till calm returns. But sometimes she may take his words literally and go home. When her parents are informed of what has happened, they tell their daughter that she is in the wrong. Such a thing cannot be taken tragically. The husband has acted in a moment of bad humor and extreme indignation. He did not really send her away or repudiate her. There is no question of hate or indifference. Thus the matter is not taken seriously, and when the wife calms down, her parents persuade her to go back to her husband. If he likes her enough the matter ends there; it is forgiven and forgotten. Even if, having gone to her family under these circumstances, the woman becomes ill or dies there, she herself is responsible. Thus sending her away in that manner is not in any way taken seriously; it has nothing in common with a repudiation and cannot even be compared with a wife's flight because of bad treatment.

To summarize, if a wife leaves the house in which she lives with her husband, he is obliged to go and fetch her whether she is in the right or in the wrong. On the other hand, parents will send a daughter back to her husband if she is too easily angered and runs away over trifles. The following are generally acknowledged as serious and justifiable reasons for flight: serious failures in fulfilling marital duties, punishments or repressions without just cause, excesses in just punishments.

593x 606 578 We should add that in some households, difficulties arise rather easily during the visits of parents or parents-in-law, because of the sensibilities, incompatibility of character, or discontent of one party who may consider the other guilty of discourtesy, lack of delicacy, disrespect, or stinginess toward the visiting parents. The same is true for the rearing of children. [273]

4. Punishments

593x 578 Nkundó law permits a husband to inflict corporeal punishment (bikɔ́njwɛ́, sing. ekɔ́njwɛ́) on his wife, its nature varying with the seriousness of the case. Obviously these sanctions, expressly permitted by law, [576] cannot give rise to claims on the woman's part or result in the obligation to pay a boɔ́ndo. [Editor's note: Unless, of course, the husband -- acting in excess of his rights -- is more violent than the occasion warrants for under such conditions, the wife, supported by her family, attacks the husband, who is then [619] forced to acknowledge the harm he has done and make reparation by means of a boɔ́ndo.] If she is hurt she may claim a supplementary payment called liombo (from the verb bomba) or "bandage" (for the wound); it consists of 5 rings or more, depending on the situation. [626] The loss or breaking of a tooth is considered a serious injury. For this is a real injury to the woman and, in the case of front teeth, to her beauty. (1) Of course, as explained above, the wife will first have run home, and it is there that the dispute is examined.

593x 578 667 For the sake of a clearer understanding, let us go into a few details concerning the penal stipulations of Nkundó law in relation to the life of a married couple.

Usually, in a simple domestic quarrel, the couple does no more than tell each other some home truths, seasoning their speeches [304] 1. Because they are filed, the incisors are much less resistant than normal teeth. Teeth filing is practiced for reasons of b[illegible]y.

578 593 684 with a few vulgarities. If the woman goes beyond that, her husband gives her a good slap, but he cannot allow himself to exercise his muscles further upon her.

If a woman's tongue is too voluble and she permits herself to deliver gross insults without a suitable reason, her lack of respect is considered punishable. It is not considered proper [578] to right this wrong by means of blows, however, although in practice impetuous young men do not always restrain themselves. The sanction preached by tribal wisdom is the man's abstention from food prepared by the guilty wife, and his refusal to perform the conjugal act. A Nkundó woman is very sensitive to such measures. If she is really recognized to be in the wrong and peace is not promptly re-established, the wife's [524] family will beg the husband to calm down and offer him a bofiodo, which may be as great as the value of a dog.

593 578 In the course of a quarrel a Nkundó woman may resort to a roundabout way of expressing her feelings; instead of cursing her husband directly she will address herself to a domestic animal which passes in front of her. The man is naturally not deceived, and the effect is identical.

What we have said applies to ordinary insults such as to wish a person's death, which may be expressed in the following ways: owɛ "drop dead," nkoi ɛkokumbɛ, "may a leopard get you"; njwɛ ɛkokɔtɛ, "may a snake bite you"; ólówɛ ɛ? "aren't you dying?"; okona, "why don't you get sick"; bákotómbɛ ndá ngɛlo, "may you be carried to the cemetery"; bákokundɛ, "may you be buried." Invectives based on physical defects or designed to humiliate a man fall in the same category. For instance a woman may call her husband bololɛ or etula, "a nobody," or imemelo, "idiot," or inyanyama, "beast," etc.

If, on the other hand, the woman in her volubility attacks her husband's parents, the matter becomes more serious. The Nkundó react very badly to verbal excesses directed toward them. Whether he is subject to teasing on their account or to insults such as "eat your mother (or father)," or to obscenities in relation to them, or whether the speaker "disinters" deceased parents in evoking their memory. (1)

---

[195] 1. For the sake of documentation on Nkundó psychology and morals, here is the Latin text

> 593x of a few fashionable expressions: vulva
> 578 matris tuae, comede matrem in clitoride,
> 195 coi cum matre. The same expressions, mutatis mutandis, are used with reference to a person's father, brother, or sister. The expressions used for "disinterring" are okundola ilongo, isé, nyangó, etc., that is, "exhume your family, father, mother, etc., or bejwó békí, "your corpses," that is, your deceased parents (this last expression especially excites a strong reaction).

578 the effect does not vary greatly. [275] The only difference is in 593x the intensity of rage and of the reactions, which depends on the individual temperaments of the interested parties.

578 A Nkundó is greatly outraged by obscenities hurled at him by 593 his wife, especially if she attacks him in public. His reaction is al-
627 ways violent. Usually it comes to blows, a thrashing, and sometimes the knife. But if the husband wants to remain within the limits of the law, he cannot injure or, more especially, kill his wife on his own authority. Before going any further, he must bring his case before the ndonga. His family is invited to the meeting and, if possible, so is the wife's father. The outraged husband presents his case and warns the persons assembled that one day his exasperation will lead him to take up the knife. Having taken his case before qualified persons, the husband can from then on go ahead and avenge himself for the disgraces his wife may inflict on him; it is lawful for him to do so. If the guilty woman starts again, no one can accuse her husband of wronging her, for she herself is at fault and he has warned her in accordance with all the rules of the law.

593x Modern young people do not always follow this procedure.
578 But their revolutionary spirit often brings them reprimands and often [578] gets them into great difficulties. The elders jealously guard their authority, and no one may reproach them for doing so. Therefore in a palaver of this sort, a father will sometimes foresake his son.

593
578 Since the impetuous youth did not want to observe the ancestral custom and considered his strength superior to the law, his action is not justifiable. We must admire among many of the old natives the innate feeling of justice and impartiality that makes them disapprove of and condemn their own children. Furthermore, if the passionate avenger of his honor does not change his ways and endeavor to combat the thoughtless violence of his temperament by replacing it with a sense of measure, his marriage will not last. And he will be the one [276] accused of having caused the break. The matter is clear; it is quite true that the woman started it. The husband therefore had all the trumps in his hand. Why, then, did he not use them? If he had followed the procedure required by law he would have gained his case all the way down the line.

The fact that a husband must first inform the ndonga and the family authorities does not mean that he has not the right to punish his wife in a violent fashion. This practice is observed to avoid excesses and abuses. The husband is not given the freedom to do as he pleases. Recourse to the representatives of family authority may be considered as a kind of delegation of their power.

These legal provisions of the Nkundó are truly wise. While they give an outraged husband the right to punish his wife and, therefore, to hold her in check, the law imposes a rein on the impetuousness of unthinking anger. Furthermore, by requiring that these matters be made public, they avoid interminable discussions and palavers on the subjects of fines to be paid, etc.

M
[682] In the past certain men were capable of becoming exasperated by the disgrace to the point where they were no longer able to master their rage. Women were killed for this reason. The Nkundó say that a man would not let himself be carried to this extreme unless driven to it by the great love he bore his wife. This comment has a psychological validity. Nevertheless, such an action was not praised and could even produce a war.

P
636 It sometimes happened that an enraged man who wanted to kill his wife under such circumstances was prevented from doing so because he had to abstain from assassination to maintain the efficacy (nsimbo) of a practice (bote) in his possession. He therefore had

M
593 recourse to the assistance of a third party who -- for remuneration, 578 of course -- undertook to carry out his project. This task was usually [579] confided to Batswa, who did not disdain this type of work, which was quite suited to their taste.

The fact that the law gives the husband the right to punish his wife [277] for the type of oratory under discussion meant that a wife had to exercise some discretion in her choice of expressions. Fearing violent reactions, she often spoke the more serious insults softly.

M
178 Since the European penetration women are more daring. For 578 their husbands fear European justice, which follows principles entirely 593 different from their ancestral law. Thus they complain bitterly of 562 the insolence of their wives: "We have become slaves; the women are now all-powerful. They may do as they please, for we can no longer do anything to them." But as soon as native courts are sufficiently educated and are freed from what an eminent colonial jurist has called "the jurisdiction of palavers" (1), they will no doubt effect a salutary change in this situation.

M
562 The emancipation of women is one of the factors that have 586 increased the frequency of divorce. For a man who cannot avenge continuous outrages remains dominated by shame, and the presence of the one who is the cause of it must become unbearable in the long run; whence the indifference, antipathy, hate, and the inevitable results of that permanent confusion in the household.

M
593 Men among whom the feeling of modesty was highly developed 762 hanged themselves out of shame instead of attacking the guilty wife.
577 That is what many natives have maintained in talking with me.
[681] Nevertheless, I have no knowledge of a present-day example. When this happened, the wife's family no longer took action against their daughter. Nor were they obliged to pay an indemnity, although their child had brought about the death. They simply had to acquit

593a 577 762 themselves of the usual and ordinary obligations incumbent upon them on the death of a son-in-law. Should this be taken as a kind of implied condemnation of suicide? [278]

593a 578 627 626 The wisdom of the elders recommends to youth that they not let anger lead them to brutal acts even where, legally, it is permissible to use force. They do not act in such a way through a policy of adaptation to the present regime. Even before the arrival of the white men, they gave lessons in calm and self-mastery. For serious blows, wounds, and especially homicide could have deplorable consequences legally and even politically (war). They preferred recourse to punishments, such as abstention from food and the refusal of debitum conjugale, which although less violent, are not without efficacity. In that way they were also spared the vexation of in-laws, whose pity would be aroused by the wounds and bodily suffering of their child or sister.

576 593b One thing that deserves blows or a good whipping because it is considered a serious failure in the fulfillment of the duties of married life is indifference and negligence in housework. A husband may safely deal forcefully with the situation, although he must first inform the qualified authorities. The following are some examples of such faults: the wife does not give the necessary attention to the kitchen, her children, the cleaning of the hut and court; she neglects her crops, does not go fishing, makes no attempt to obtain salt, etc.; in short, she does not give the required time and care to the tasks incumbent upon her. She herself, her children, and her house remain disgustingly filthy, her fields and banana groves are invaded by weeds and her pantry is devoid of utensils and food, while she wastes her time doing nothing or rather spends it running about the village, going to one woman's house, chatting with another, spending the better part of her day gossiping. The Nkundó does not put up with this sort of behavior, and no one can reproach him. Even other men and the woman's companions condemn [279] such conduct. Often the woman is ridiculed, and on occasion she may hear unflattering comments such as bɔ̃mot'ɔ̃w'asolɔ́, efufa etɔ́ngamaka, [521]
"a gossip, her cloth is to the side," that is, the interminable chatting

593 to which she devotes her time, sitting on a couch or a log, so oc-578 cupies her attention that she is no longer aware that her narrow 834 garment is no longer in its proper modest position, and the gossip is therefore exposed to shame and ridicule.

592 In addition to giving his wife a good whipping, the husband
578 also brings out his vocabulary of invective and sarcasm. The woman does not run the risk of complaining, for she knows in advance that she will be placed in the wrong. Nevertheless, the discreet husband will not go too far. The elders suggest that the young people moderate the violence of their expressions. For, they say, "a woman is more sensitive to it than a man; she might go and hang herself [825] in the forest," lĭkinya ayakóma lóí la nsónyi. "lĭkinya (the ant) will hang herself one day out of an excess of shame" (this is a reference to the way this insect bites into a blade of grass or some other object and dies rather than let go). "And above all," they say, "do not extend your insults to your wives' parents, for they could urge their daughters to leave you."

With respect to adultery, the punishments prescribed in Nkundó law will be examined below in Article VIII.

It is apparent from the preceding description that the Nkundó attach relatively little importance to the outpourings of loquacious eloquence characteristic of the weaker sex as long as they do not go beyond limits or degenerate into outrageous and ignominious insults. The elders teach youth to be calm in the face of these demonstrations of the declamatory art at which most Negresses are as adept as our fishwives at home.

They say that a woman is like an elephant: bŏmoto ale [562] ó njoku. There is nothing to be done about her. It is futile [286] to try and speak gently to her; she does not even listen. To impose silence on her is impossible. To try and calm her, make her listen to reason, is a waste of effort. It is the same with an elephant: He [825] can perhaps be chased away with cries and noise, but he will destroy the crops nonetheless.

The fact that a woman readily opens her mouth is not considered a sign that she does not love her husband. The Nkundó even [illegible] dare to maintain that a woman's speaking out about her husband is a [illegible] sign of affection. On the other hand, a woman who instead bewails her lot softly and quietly saying, ngóya fikeke lóí l'ômi'ond aa?, ("mother, what shall I do with this husband?"), will not be with him long. Her complaint is chiefly egoistic, while the other seeks the good of her spouse and her household.

As we have already mentioned, the perfect punishment, and one frequently employed in ordinary cases, is a husband's refusal to eat food prepared by his wife or to wash with water she has drawn or boiled. It is a type of reprimand to which she is sensitive. The husband's aversion must not last too long, however, for it could lead to [illegible] a breaking up of the marriage, more especially since in the end the woman would begin to suspect infidelities -- which do occur.

The fact that Nkundó law does not allow the husband complete freedom and clearly limits his rights does not in any way exclude the occurrence of infractions. The mass of human beings is always inferior to the moral ideal imposed by legislation. But these provisions of Nkundó law do protect a woman against her husband's excesses. We have already cited the expedients available to her: abandonment of the home shared with her husband; legal apologies (bofondo), indemnity for injuries (liomba). In addition, a wife who has been wronged will abstain from foods (such as meat or palm nuts) given her by her husband and, even more important, will refuse to have sexual relations with him. And for our people this is a great affront. In order to re-establish a normal and peaceful situation, a husband often has to pacify [281] his spouse by means of a bofondo. In addition to the measures mentioned, a wife may of course use insults, of which every native has a rich and varied collection.

No one can condemn or reprimand a woman for abusing a lazy husband. If he does not go to the hunt and bring back game, if he neglects the building or repair of the house, if he is too much of a laggard, if he does not fell the forest to set up food crops, it is clearly he who is in the wrong, and he will find no one who will approve of his conduct and condemn his wife. If he turns out to be incorrigible, it will not be long before the marriage is broken, according to the axiom [illegible] ing to the axiom elóng'ey'ômoto ńk'olófo, "the woman's victory is divorce."

594 If a woman injures her husband during a quarrel he may not 593 retaliate, for she is recognized as inferior and weaker than he. The 577 husband's weapon is abstention from any food, drink, baths, etc., that she offers him. To re-establish peace she must pay a bofɔndo. Nevertheless, nowadays some impetuous men no longer like to observe these rules; they want to act with violence come what may. But they are strongly reprimanded by the old men, who maintain that it is unworthy of a man to retaliate against a weaker being. This traditional attitude of the Nkundɔ́ seems to me to indicate a sort of chivalrous nobility based on two feelings, justice and pride. It becomes more understandable when we know that similar conduct is [565] expected with regard to Batswa, inferiors, and subjugated clans (baulɔ́, sing. julɔ́) in their respective spheres. (1) Thus a Boɔto may not apply the law of retaliation to a Botswa. Under certain circumstances, a julɔ́ clan may, with impunity, take what they please from the banana groves of the master's clan, etc.

1. See below, Articles V, VI, and VII, 4, B.

Note also that it is very much out of place for a man [282] to strike his wife or punish her in any way in the presence of her parents, [602] brothers, etc. In fact, this is a very grave offense. And, according to the code of honor, the brother (cousin, etc.) must pick up the glove and fight his brother-in-law to avenge the insult. In many cases the matter ends in a divorce. For such conduct takes away the combined feeling of modesty and embarrassment (nsɔ́nyi) that the two parties normally feel toward one another.

Finally, we must note that the various payments made as bofɔndo are included in the total amount of [illegible] or nkɔmí, respectively.

In order to more clearly illustrate the Nkundɔ́ attitude con-593 cerning the relationship of husband and wife, it might be of interest to 591 cite a few proverbs pertaining to the subjects discussed above:

1) Bacingɔ bakɔ́ndaka wăjɔ̌ ntaka; Lombɔ́molɔ́ afɔ́ndaka Ntsilɔ la nganja. "All the others slap their wives (but) Lombɔ́molɔ́ beats Ntsilɔ with a stick." (This is a reference to a historical fact.)

593[x] 2) Ofɔ́ɔ́n'ilólɔ́, wɛ̃ ɛ́k'onjembe, "If you do not put up with 597 excesses of speech (on the part of your wife) you (will remain) a bachelor." (Because this is an innate fault of all women, and it is not a major one.)

3) Otámb'ɔ̂mwa al'ɛ̃ mbɔ́ka, "Do not answer the mouth, it is a road" (it has no end).

4) Bolɛ́ 'á wǎlɛ́, ófɔ́ɔ́n'ompɛ́lo, "A mean woman, you (nevertheless) do not refuse the warm bath (she has prepared for you)." (Do not attach much importance to her unpleasant statements. What are they in comparison to the services she performs for you?)

5) Ɛ̌kí'm'ólámbɛ́lɛ́ la wɛ̃li w'ótámɛ́yɛ́, jɔ́ɔ́ ɔ́ wílima ɔ́ɔ́n'anto ólangɛ́ ńdambe bitɔ́kɔ́ botɔ́ɔ́?, "When I prepared (the food) by moonlight, you were not satisfied; nevertheless (now that it is) dark and [282] you don't see anyone, you would like me to prepare six baskets?" (It is implied that the wife addresses her husband, who is dissatisfied with the food but nevertheless wants her to prepare more of it.)

6) Itɔ́kɔ́ lokɛ́mo ɛ́k'ɔ̂m'ankolanga, "A little (food) basket is highly praised if your husband but love you." (Love appreciates even the slightest thing. Discontent springs from a lack of affection.)

7) Etuka iɔ́fɔ́ŋɔ, wǎj'ɔ́ky'ɔ̂wɛ́i, "A flashy widow, (but she is that way because she is) the wife of (another, who is) dead." (You criticize her; but don't you treat her like someone else's wife? Then what are you complaining about?)

8) Ɛ̂nkɔ́ɔ́mbɛ́lɛ́ wɛ̃ jwende, baíso ng'ɔ̂hɔ́ŋɔ: ɔ́kita nd'ɛ̂ŋombe, baíso ng'inkɔ́ɔ́i, "When a man takes you in marriage, (his) eyes (are) like (those of a) bɔ́ŋkɔ́ŋɔ (a wild cat); you arrive in his house, (his) eyes (are) like (those of a) inkɔ́ɔ́i (a kind of frog with protruding eyes). (At the beginning of a marriage a husband is extremely obliging and kind; but after a while he puts on a sullen face and gets angry at the least provocation.)

9) Emangɛ́ lilɛ́la, mpɔ́ɛ́ ɛ́kɔ́ngola, "The beginnings of marriage are honeymoons." (But afterwards . . . .)

10) Wǎli nd'ɛ̌tɔ́ɔ, wokɛ́nda wokɛ́ka, "A wife is a kind of material; strike her, cover her." (She is a delicate object; strike her when she deserves it, but do so with calm and a sense of proportion; hold the stick with one hand and cover her body with the other.)

Article IV

Relations Between the Wife and Her Family

585* 614 Through marriage, a woman does not enter into her husband's family. She continues to belong to her own clan of origin and continues to submit to the special regulations [204] of her family (_bokumo_) (1) The _bokumo_ pertaining to parturition is excepted, for

> 1. The _bokumo_ are special regulations governing a given clan, particularly prohibitions against partaking of certain foods (animal or vegetable) always or only at certain times. The punishment for a transgression is a kind of itching which covers the whole body. One might think this is totemism, but the idea of kinship to the forbidden being is entirely absent.

because of the child she must observe the _bokumo_ of her husband's clan in this realm.

593^A 594 Although the wife is completely dependent on her husband for everything else -- work, property, etc. -- she remains bound to her own parents by obligations of respect, love, and assistance. She has to visit them from time to time, but too great a frequency in these visits meets with disapproval. It is impossible to give a rule defining the proper number. The answer must be provided by good sense. Sensible people prefer that the wife not make too many of these trips. Even her own parents want this to be so. For repeated attentions of this sort are considered evidence of a lack of love and attachment for her husband.

[626] Women who very faithfully stay in their homes and only rarely visit their parents, sometimes yield in face of the teasing of their companions. For the Nkundó is very sensitive to spiteful comments of that kind. Among current expressions there is one that has become a popular saying and is sometimes sung during dances:

593^x 574 ötswékë liéla otswëk'olé, béfôkolaka mbók'éy'olé la ngom'a nkolé. "If you are married go back to your parents, or you will be taught the way with drums and gongs," that is, "when you are dead." (2)

[764] [765] 534 2. A woman is buried in her own native clan. Her corpse is transported there to the accompaniment of drums and horns. The lokolé gong announces her death.

593^x 602 A married woman may not evade the duty of helping her relatives under special circumstances (pregnancy, illness, serious accidents, death). This obligation [285] is not limited to her mother and father, but extends to all her relatives; the closer the degree of kinship, the stricter the obligation.

[626] Besides, love of family is sufficiently developed so that there is no danger of the woman forgetting herself too much in this realm. And a husband who would like to prevent her from fulfilling these elementary duties would be much criticized by all and should expect a dissolution of the marriage.

593^x 574 342 592 It was said above that a husband builds a hut for his wife. His relatives often assist him in this task. But it also happened -- in the past, for colonization has removed the possibility of it -- that the woman's father wanted to build his daughter's house himself or at least to make the pavement out of clay brought from her native land. This act was a demonstration of wealth and politico-social importance as well as proof of fatherly affection. The husband, for his part, was honored to have married the daughter of such an important man and loved her all the more. Thus a number of women say that "they only cooked on ancestral soil." This soil was brought in baskets across distances up to 50 kilometers by Batswa and by men of the woman's clan or village. Her father could do it because of his great influence and regal rewards (bokóndo, verb kónda) were distributed during a feast (ntóko) given for the workers and their relatives after the task was completed. This was done for Bompeli, daughter of Bokombe of Liféli (Bombwanja) married to Bonyeme w'enyuka of the Baséké Mbangó (Bonkoso); for Beluka, daughter of

573 longo of Bokɛ́kyɛ́ (Boselo, Bombwanja), married to Bokaa is 'Ifonda 574 of Bowɛ́lɛ́; for Mbalaka, daughter of Bolekela wa Imangaiso of the 342 Baɛ́kɛ́ Lokuli (Bongíli), married to Mbuli is'ea Wela of Bombóngo
556 w'Etefa (Bongale) (1) [286]

[551] 1. She bore the name of Mbɛ́laka (meaning indemnity), because her father had solemnly proclaimed (-bɛ́kya) and publicly promised that he intended, one day, to place himself in the position of having to pay an indemnity because of his daughter, as proof of his love. Indeed [782] when Mbɛ́laka was married, he killed one of his wives, cut her into pieces, and sent the "meat" to his son-in-law as "the first hen" that his wife would prepare for him. But he did not have to pay [682] [684] the indemnity because the victim's clan was too weak to attempt a war; they did not dare to make a claim and, in order to avoid even greater misfortunes, they resigned themselves to this revolting ignominy.

Article V

Relations Between the Husband and His Wife's Family

606 As has already been said, kinship by marriage is called likiló, 607 and relatives by marriage are called bokiló, bakiló. Mbótsoló is a term of respect for very close relatives by marriage (father-in-law, mother-in-law, sometimes brother-in-law or sister-in-law). When there is a considerable age difference between two affinal relatives, the elder one sometimes calls the younger bokilówalɛ́. This happens most frequently when the son-in-law is so young that he can still be considered a child. This term can even be used by an elder brother with reference to the young wife of his junior. (1)

> 1. The second component of this term is used by some Elinga as a synonym of bokiló. It should be related to walé, a term which among the Mbole and the Bakutu denotes a girl who is bolómbé or a woman who has just given birth (the same is true among the Ekonda).

The present practice is to exclude from among the bakiló these persons with whom marriage is permitted. They are more frequently called "husband" or "wife."

The opposite of bokiló is bokanga. The bakanga are members of the family that has received the bride price, while the bakiló are those who have paid it. In common practice the word bokiló is often used in place of bokanga, but never the reverse. Bokiló l'okanga is the expression denoting the whole group.

1. Father-in-law and mother-in-law

A husband owes respect, love, and assistance to his parents-in-law. This point is vital to harmony in the home. In this sphere a wife is very intolerant [287] of forgetfulness and even more of ill will. Offensive comments, insults pointed at parents-in-law even in their absence result in serious difficulties. Sometimes a husband expresses his bad humor or anger against his spouse in that way. This kind of behavior never wins approval, unless his in-laws first insulted him. The law of retaliation applies fully in this situation. The Nkundó say: ôsawá mbóngó l'ǒndamba olóngaka nk'ǒndamba, "He who replies to evil comments is in the right, not the one who began." For a fuller discussion of this topic, see above (Article III).

93
To remain on good terms with his parents-in-law, the husband must visit them from time to time. By the very nature of things, his visits are less frequent than those of his wife. One reason why they cannot be too frequent is that the husband must bring gifts at each visit (belanga). One does not go to one's parents-in-law empty handed.

431 The extent of the riches brought depends on circumstances. Some greedy persons hope for large gifts if their daughter's marriage proves stable. Others prefer not to receive too much, lest they be required to give back an equal amount and -- if they are not especially wealthy -- thus find themselves one day in great financial difficulties. For the [585] belonga are added to the sum total of the bride price and must therefore be restored, should the occasion arise.

The parents-in-law do not allow their son-in-law to depart without giving him countergifts as a farewell (belingako). These take the form of hens and ducks, and their value is added to the total amount of nkomí.

Neither son-in-law nor parents-in-law like to see the generosity of the other party exceed their own, except in a few unusual cases. As a matter of fact, this is a very intelligent policy; equality is maintained on both sides, so that there can be no reproaches on the grounds of greed or stinginess [288], and if the marriage should be dissolved, it would be easy to re-establish equilibrium.

A son-in-law is expected to help his father-in-law to an extent which varies with the situation and with his means. He may fell the trees of the forest for him or set up a field, he may build him a house or make a hunting enclosure (lokombo), etc. A good son-in-law never fails to fulfill these obligations, and the father-in-law does not let him leave without having given him some present.

It is very important to a wife that her husband acquit himself conscientiously of these duties of visiting and assisting her parents. His failure to do so would lead to serious palavers and their usual consequences.

The father-in-law, for his part, does not fail to help his son-in-law in his various tasks. When the work is completed, the latter gives him a bolingako of a few copper rings, which are included in belonga.

The visits of a woman's parents to their son-in-law are more frequent. It is their way of showing their love for him and their daughter and their interest in the household. The visits can last weeks and months, whether only one or both of the parents come. If they stay too long, they are accepted with less enthusiasm. Gifts (bolingako) must always be brought out when the farewells are said.

606 574 586 593 Even if the parents' union has been dissolved and the mother has remarried, she does not cease to visit her daughter and son-in-law. If her new husband seems not to agree to her going, difficulties result. And if he does not change his attitude, his behavior may cause his wife to leave him in order to return to her first husband, the girl's father.

606 574 431 583 Thus, visits are accompanied by an exchange of gifts which are belonga if given by the son-in-law, and part of the nkɔmɔ valuables if given by the father-in-law. Farewell gifts are belonga [289] and part of the bride price if given by the son-in-law, part of the nkɔmɔ if given by the father-in-law.

These same rules apply, mutatis mutandis, to various relatives on each side with respect to visits made, services rendered, and presents given on these occasions.

606 One very strict law regarding relations between son-in-law and parents-in-law should be noted: a man is forbidden to see the face of his wife's mother. This prohibition is scrupulously observed by all. He is allowed to see her face only once, at the beginning of the marriage, "to learn to know her so that they can avoid each other." If, for example, they meet while traveling in the forest, they must turn their backs to each other. Usually the woman turns her face toward the edge of the path to let her son-in-law pass. They greet each other by word of mouth, ask for each other's news, but do not shake hands or look at each other. It is funny for us to see a woman visiting her son-in-law. The two place themselves on each side of a partition or in two corners, and they talk in that way, asking for news, carrying on a discussion, etc., without seeing each other. Sometimes mother-in-law and son-in-law find themselves in each other's presence unexpectedly, in the forest or in the fields, without having seen each other approach or having been warned by anyone. They immediately turn their backs on each other; the man excuses himself and quickly disappears, even if to do so he has to plunge into a dense forest full of prickly and tangled creepers.

This law extends also to the husband's very close relatives, such as his younger brothers (who are also "husbands"), and to all 606 women called "mother," such as the mother's sisters and the father's wives. The law does not seem strictly applicable to these persons, but seems to cover them by extension. On the other hand, there is no comparable law with regard to a woman and her father-in-law.

606 578 A violation of this prohibition results in a great palaver, for it is considered a serious lack of respect. It may produce a serious domestic quarrel. [290] A wife will refuse to perform the conjugal act with her husband because he has looked at his mother-in-law. That is why people help each other by warning each other of the "danger" when their respective mothers-in-law arrive.

Compensation for the offense may be made by the payment of a boóndo of several bakonga to the mother-in-law. As long as the payment has not been made, the wife will not fulfill her conjugal duties. After it has been made, everything goes back in order. If it is proved that the situation came about involuntarily, there is no palaver and no payment is required. Nowadays the best Christians tend to give a boóndo once and for all to definitively settle any palaver that may occur in the future and to avoid the obligation of having to submit to this prohibition, since they are beginning to vaguely perceive its uselessness.

[551] A man is even forbidden to pronounce the name of his mother-in-law in her presence, even to address or call another person of the same name. In such a situation he must resort to a surname or paraphrase. Usually he addresses her as mbómoló. An infraction of this rule results in the same punishment as if a man were to look at his mother-in-law.

606 If we ask the Nkundó to give us the reason for this custom, as it is so strange to our point of view, they reply that they are ashamed or embarrassed to see the women who begot their wives, and that to do so would be a grave offense to her. The custom is a means of expressing the respect a son-in-law owes his mother-in-law, and of avoiding unceremonious behavior or too great a familiarity toward her. That is all the explanation they give. For our philosophical turn of mind, it does not exhaust the subject. We are tempted to look for a connection between the intimate relations of the married couple and

606 the act of procreation on the part of one of them. Perhaps this idea is latent in the native mind, or at least is at the basis of this rule. The fact that this hypothesis applies only to the wife's mother-in-law [mother?] does not weaken it; for in native eyes [291] the other instances are entirely without importance. (1)

1. See, for example, Chapter II, Article X, and Chapter V, Articles II and III.

606
292 Another regulation pertaining to the mother-in-law requires that she -- and all the women who are given the same title in current usage -- may appear in her son-in-law's village only when dressed in a bolelekɛ. A bolelekɛ is a banana leaf, either green or dried, which has been torn in several places perpendicularly to the large central rib, and constitutes the first and principal sign of mourning. [765] Moreover, Batswa women must also dress in this manner before entering a Baotó settlement. The following reason is given for the rule in the second instance: a Botswá woman's dress consists of a lolímba, a belt of small braided ropes about 10 centimeters long. Although in ordinary positions the lolímba provides fairly good protection, it is not considered adequate to really stop all indiscreet looks. And it is popularly believed that if a Bootó sees a Botswá woman's genital organs, she will die. Might we conclude from this last explanation that there is a fundamental connection between the reasons that necessitate the wearing of a bolelekɛ in these three instances? Or is the mother-in-law to imitate a Botswá woman and thus show a certain subordination to her son-in-law?

2. Female relatives

837 As long as they are free, that is, as long as no bride-price payment has been made for them, a woman's sisters or cousins are considered by her husband as his wives, and he calls them so (baálí). This term is applied only to relatives of a generation below that of the true wife or to members of the same generation who are younger than she and with whom marriage [292] is permitted. It is therefore never

607 extended to relatives with whom marriage prohibited, such as nieces
837 who are banankɛ́nɛ́, who are his wife's "mothers." (1)

1. See Chapter V, Article IV and the examples cited there (for instance, examples 25, 26, 17).

When such relatives of the wife marry, the situation changes. They belong to another man, and a continuation of the same practice as when they are single produces very serious cases of adultery. There are differences depending on the degree of affinity, however. In addition to the usual sanctions against adultery, other measures may be taken, especially the dissolution of the marriage. An especially serious case, but one which is more or less hypothetical, would be adultery between a man and his father-in-law's wife; a special feeling of shame is connected with it, and our Nkundó say that the two persons are like a Botswá and his master. Misconduct with the wife of a brother-in-law (or cousin-in-law) is also a very serious matter. The latter may take his sister (or cousin) away from the guilty husband and thus break the marriage. The same applies to adultery with a nyangôndiló.(1)

1. See Chapter V, Article IV and the examples given there (for instance, examples 25, 26, 17).

3. Legal matters

606
685 Here we must examine the manner in which breaches of the law are settled between parents-in-law and son-in-law. It is known that among these peoples justice, in the strict sense of the word, is one of the most prominent aspects of social legislation. Theft is one of the principal causes for shame and was formerly severely punished. The thief, especially if he continued to repeat his offence, could be sold as a slave.

606
If one of the wife's relatives were found guilty of stealing from his (or her) relative by marriage, or even from one of the latter's relatives, the family tribunal was assembled. Out of consideration for the ties of kinship between the thief and the wife and in order not to sadden her and her family, the guilty person was not sold as a slave. He was simply turned over to the woman [293] and her family, and they were told: "Here he is; he has been found guilty of theft and should have been reduced to slavery. Out of respect for you, however, we are not selling him; we are rolling (-kilimola) him toward you. Take him as bride price and add him to the sum of the bosango." Thus the matter was settled in a friendly fashion. If subsequently there was a divorce, the wife's family had to restore not only the bride price that had been paid but also an additional slave for the member of their group that the husband had yielded in this fashion. Thus, the transaction was not at all a fictional one.

Conversely, the same procedure was adopted in relation to a relative of the husband who had violated the rules of justice to the detriment of a member of the family related by marriage. But in that case the extradition of the guilty party was considered as the addition of a slave to the amount of the nkomf.

[579] Hence the saying: bokiló ntɛ́wɛ́kɛ́ ndá ngond'ëy'okanga, "a parent-in-law cannot die in the forest of his relatives by marriage."

The situation is no different nowadays. The only change is that, instead of giving back a slave if a dissolution of the marriage occurs, the equivalent value is paid in copper rings, etc.

62
The same customs governed conduct toward prisoners of war. For instance, in the course of a war Eale became the master of Bombolo, whose cousin is married to Iloko, a close relative of Eale. Iloko interceded with Eale in order to obtain Bombolo's freedom, and Bombolo was sent home but was to be considered as bosango. The liberated prisoner thus was classed as a slave given as part of the bride price, as in the preceding case, and all the appropriate rules were followed.

4. Treason

628
602 Treachery and treason between relatives by marriage were not unusual. The proverb says bomɔ́ng'ɛ́kulu nd'ɔ́kilɔ́, "treason exists [294] chiefly on the part of relative by marriage." Not that this happened through any fundamental maliciousness apart from perhaps some rare exception. But in case of a war or particularly of a vendetta, relative by marriage did not hesitate to betray his in-law and thus send him to his death.

We shall limit ourselves to giving two case histories which are well known to the current generation. (1)

1. I do not know exactly when these events occurred. In any case they date back to the time of the Independent State and to the beginning of the occupation.

At the time when the Ingende post was occupied by the white "Itumbambíle" and that of Ilɔ́ngɛ by "Bosɔ́njɛ," some men from [266] Bofílɛ (Ikɔ́kema y'ɛ́kelo, Bombwanja) surprised an inhabitant of Bokukɛ (wĺngatɛ), killed him, and ate him. Shortly thereafter Lokwa jw'ɔ̀yelɛ́, a man from Bofílɛ, went to visit his sister Efɔ́mɛ, who was married to Imbilɛ́ is'ɛ́y'ɛ́mola of Ikonjɛ. It happened that the latter was a maternal uncle of the victim of the Bofílɛ men. Was Lokwa unaware of this relationship? Or did he trust his brother-in-law? Whatever the case he was well received. Nevertheless, Imbilɛ́ had not forgotten his nephew's assassination and went to inform his close kin of this good opportunity to avenge the murder. One evening they broke into the hut that had been placed at the visitor's disposal and found him there with his sister Efɔ́mɛ and his wife Lompoko. The [266] two women managed to escape, but Lokwa was taken, killed, and eaten. Naturally, his sister Efɔ́mɛ did not return to her husband, and there was no question of a restitution of the bride price.

The second case dates from the same period. Two Batswa of [266] Mbɛ́langa (Ekɔ́ombɛ́le, Bongili), Bokɔ́ngo and Bolɔ́yengɛ, surprised Mboko Ilombɛ of Bofílɛ in the forest, killed him, and ate him.

621 602 Some time thereafter, a man named Bengóngó from the Ndóngó village of the Bengili went to Bofílɛ to visit his sister Bosáka, who was married to Eale éé Bofekɛ. The latter told him that the village was enraged because of the assassination of one of their people by the Batswa of the Bengili. He advised him to go [295] and hide in the fallow ground lest excited men come upon him and revenge themselves on him. He led his brother-in-law there himself. Therefore he knew the exact location of his hiding place and ran to betray him to the others. They encircled the fallow ground and easily found [664] poor Bengóngó, who was pitilessly massacred and eaten. His sister Bosáka never knew of her husband's treachery; she thought that despite all his precautions, the other inhabitants had discovered her brother's hiding place. (1)

[649] 1. We should not be too astonished that during that period the Europeans did not intervene in these wars, vendettas, massacres, and acts of cannibalism. They let the natives do as they pleased among themselves and demanded only that they leave them alone and render them services and tribute. They had other things to do in those times. The white men Ãmbɛ and Bainãkɛ, of whom the natives still speak with respectful fear, were the first to begin punishing acts of barbarism in this region.

602 This hypocrisy on the part of the husband toward his wife and brother-in-law is due to the presence of two opposing feelings within him -- on the one hand, the love of his family and the feeling of solidarity which engenders hate and the desire for vengeance; on the other, love for his spouse. As these feelings are in complete contradiction with each other, he cannot reconcile them. But at least he can preserve appearances.

[534] This situation is referred to in the following proverb: bokílɔ ékwɛ́ndɛ́, wɛ́ngɔyɛ eyalo, "If your bokílɔ has hidden you, change 602 shelters." There is another, which is cruder: bokiló tótowe nkálá:

559 bafumba bálóka mbá, emi ńkoláka wě, "relative by marriage, let us go to the palm grove; the bafumba ants (Dorylus wilverthii) eat palm nuts; I will eat you." The following saying, applied to someone who is always trying to clear himself, is a more or less involuntary accusation: mpɔ̂lí ôkiló, ńdíla é mpóngo; mpóngo y'ôkiló nsako ngá mbwá, "I do not eat my relative by marriage; on the contrary, I dip (food) in his fat; an in-law's fat is as tasty as a dog's." [296]

Nevertheless, a man never goes so far as to cause the death 602 of his sister's daughter's or other relative's husband. Or, as the 621 Nkundó say, one does not kill a person by whom one has been enriched. What is the reason for this distinction? According to our people it is the affection they feel toward their sister, daughter, etc.; they love them too much to pain them by taking away their husbands.

This treacherous and barbarous conduct is therefore directed by the bokiló toward the bokanga, that is, by those who have paid the bride price to those who have received it, but never the reverse.

Appendix

000 This appendix pertains to each of the three preceding articles. Therefore it may reasonably be placed here. It does not deal with any special law nor with a custom that is legal, universal, or common. It is concerned with isolated cases. But it seems to me that the few lines to follow are not without interest, since they give a good indication of the mentality that may be found among these people.

[illegible] It may happen that a woman has a complaint or feels she has cause to be dissatisfied with one of her relatives, for example her brother. In her opinion he may not be sufficiently kind and generous toward her, or he may treat her in a manner she considers unfair. In a moment of anger she reveals her feelings to her husband and incites him to avenge her by injuring or even killing the one who has offended her.

That is what happened several decades ago to Bosele w'Ompowangé of Boléngo (Bongili) (who died in 1932, a very old man). His wife Dumbé was very dissatisfied in that her brother did not give 62 her gnough gifts. She addressed her husband as follows: bejwó bɛ́kɛ́

578 ómomɛ́lɛ́ nkɔ́na, alekɛ ompímaka tɔ́ma. "Your corpses (deceased parents), kill my brother for me, he always refuses to give me [297] presents. (1) Whereupon Bosela took his weapons and went off.

> 1. This is one of the most serious insults. But a person to whom it is addressed considers it a duty to take up the order or invitation made in those terms. It is a sort of forced oath, and it is called tɛ́na ndaɛ, afeya (tɛ́nela) X ndaɛ. These terms may apply to many other situations: a call for help during a war, assistance in inflicting an ordeal, assistance in the iloá (society of those who do not observe funerary abstinence), etc. A person may address himself in this manner, and in that case the expression corresponds to our word "oath," "to take an oath."

Being a good psychologist, he made no mistake about his wife's personal feelings. He knew that he was involved in a dangerous impasse: if he disappointed his wife's expectations, she would be furious; on the other hand, if he took his brother-in-law's life, she would be even angrier. The thing to do was to resort to a trick. When he entered the forest he had the good fortune to come upon a bɔende antelope, which he slaughtered. He removed the liver and went home carrying this organ, still fresh and warm, in his hand. He presented it to his wife, saying, "Here is the liver of your brother whom you asked me to kill." There followed a violent scene. The woman, beside herself, began to weep for her dead brother, and in her anger she ran off, shouting at her husband: "Oh! You no longer love me, since you have assassinated my brother; you will not see me again." When she arrived at the home of her family, she found everyone going about their usual occupations; there was no sign of death or, more especially, of murder. Her astonishment increased 602 578 when she found her brother in good health and full of life. She could not believe her eyes. In an instant the whole family was alerted and gathered together. She explained what had happened. They quieted and consoled her; they praised her husband for having behaved so intelligently. She was congratulated. For he could have done what she had told him, so she had reason to rejoice that he loved her so well and wisely. Thus, a few days later, she quietly returned to her husband.

An entirely different course of events, and a fatal one, occurred in the case of [280] Bok'Éfea of Bompelo (Bokátola) who was married to Elíngé of Bofílá (both are still alive). The woman continuously went back to her family. Her husband, exasperated, threatened one day to kill her brother Eale; when he was gone she would be more inclined to stay home. He actually fulfilled his threat. His wife went into a terrible rage, but she nevertheless remained faithful to her husband. The bow used to shoot the murderous arrow has been preserved by its owner as a souvenir.

Article VI

Relations Between the Wife and Her Husband's Family

602 Naturally, a wife must be on the best of terms with her husband's family, with whom she is in continual contact. She owes respect to his parents and elders. If she does not manage to live in peace with them as well as with her husband's sisters, etc., the marriage will not last. Misunderstandings, disputes, squabbles, and, above all, insults and spiteful comments will force her to leave. Therefore, such contingencies can be put into the category of motives which lead the man's family to interfere in his marriage. There is a constant concern among the Nkundó to avoid the dissolution of the union due to extreme incompatibilities, because any break-up causes enormous difficulties, as we will see suo loco.

It is very hard to discern whether the small services the wife is expected to render her husband's family are legal obligations or simply requirements of social decorum. A momentary omission

602 brings forth reprimands on the part of the husband and his parents which obviously can easily degenerate into quarrels. If the omissions are so frequent and of such a nature that they can no longer be explained as simply forgetting, a whim, or a fit of peevishness, but [299] are taken to indicate spitefulness or vulgarity, the matter is [627] brought before the nkonga (who is often assisted by the family tribunal) or brought before the authority constituted by the woman's kin. If in spite of everything the expected improvement does not take place the break-up is inevitable.

The husband's father and mother extend the same affection to 606 their son's wife as they feel toward him. They consider her their own child, and it is not unusual to find that their love for the wife equals their feeling for their own son. She is only a relative by marriage, but out of affection for her they call her their child. She, for her part, does not use toward them the term bokonga (or bokilo) but [609] out of filial respect calls them "father" and "mother." Exceptions to this practice may be found, however.

606 If the father (and those who fall in the same category such as 224 uncles, elder brothers, etc.) kills a large game animal, he is expected to give his son's (or brother's, etc.) wife a piece of meat, whose size depends on the number of daughters-in-law he has and which consists of one or several chops (bohalaho) (1) and the piece at the nape of the neck (bonimbya).

Illicit relations between the husband's father and his daughter-606 in-law would be an unheard of crime. The same would be true with 835 respect to any of the "superior" relatives. (2) The laws regulating

1. Called liemo among the Bolongo and the tribes of the Losangonya.

[178] 2. Only the Boangi -- like the Elanga [104] of the Losangonya -- allow relations between a brother and the wife of his junior, and they are already beginning to find imitators among their neighbors to the southeast, the Ingelo.

[illegible] the relations between a wife and her husband's parents are closely connected with the rules pertaining to the prohibition related to affinity and seems to spring from the same source. Therefore it will be useful to have in mind what we have said in the preceding chapter, Article IV.

607 The husband's elder brothers treat his wife as their sister. The wife calls her husband's sisters [300] bakilɔ, but out of respect she often gives them the title of "mother." (1)

[601] 1. Among the Elɔngɔ the wife also calls her husband's sisters bongíli (pl. bangíli); they call her bǒnongíli (pl. bǎnangíli). A wife often calls her husband's mother nyangôngíli. Bǎnangíli l'ǎnangíli means "the brother's wives and their sisters-in-law."

587 After the husband's death, as has been said suo loco, his father or his brother may marry his widow. But this practice is not well regarded and is permitted only rarely, chiefly when the scattering of the family patrimony is feared or if the two interested parties have an unusual love for each other.

697 642 With respect to children or younger brothers and all those who fall into that category, the situation is altogether different. Illicit relations with wives of their father, grandfather, uncle, elder brother, or elder cousin, are judged much less severely. Generally, misconduct does not give rise to claims for payment, or the payment is demanded "for form's sake" and consists of a hen and a bunch of bananas. By means of this payment the guilty one recognizes his error and renders homage to the right of his elder.

[illegible] In general public opinion condemns these relations and often with great severity. The question of degree of kinship as well as other considerations result in a great diversity among the cases, so we will examine each situation separately and distinguish each time between the husband's reaction and that of public opinion.

579
593 A. A woman's misconduct with her husband's son does not result in the payment of an indemnity. Nevertheless, the husband who has been wronged takes action; he defends his rights and is enraged, whether the situation is very serious or not, and especially if he is monogamous. If he has several wives, he is more apt to pass over the matter, unless it involves his favorite. Sometimes he takes revenge by striking the guilty son's mother, taking her hens away from her, etc. But such action may lead to complications: [301] the brother of the woman so treated might intervene, and if the reaction of the husband who has been wronged is too violent or recurs too often, a divorce may result. In any case the father never hurts his heedless son's wife, since he loves her like his own daughter.

The father may apply a direct sanction against the offender by delaying the acquisition of a wife for him and refusing his blessings for his son's travels and undertakings -- still a serious thing in purely native society.

Such relations are always greatly criticized by public opinion, even if relatives intervene on the culprit's behalf. The latter is disgraced as a result; he is mocked with the epithet etɔ́onjɔ́lɔ́, to which [578] often is added the explicative phrase l'ɔ́ála banyangɔ́ b'áningɔ́. Etɔ́onjɔ́lɔ́ is derived from etɔ́ɔ, "masculine clothing" and, figuratively, "virility in the physical sense," and from bɔ́lɔ́, "strength." Thus the epithet implies that the culprit is so virile that he goes so far as to unite even with his brothers' mothers.

626 Marriage with the father's widow after his death is legitimate. Nevertheless, if the widow has left children, public opinion does not entirely refrain from judgment and though the severity of the criticism cited above will be attenuated, it may still be heard. Such was the case of Yokɛ́ of Bokenyola (Bonjoko), which is well known in this region. He married Lokokɛ́, widow of his father Isɛ́lo y'Okɛ́tola and mother of Isɛ́lo Antoine, present chief of the Boshoso. (1).

1. With reference to the above-mentioned attitude, an exception must be made with regard to the inheritance of a widow by right of seniority (she is then called bosílê -- see Chapter III, Article III). The giving of a widow who is in the position described is preferably avoided.

587
626 Illicit relations between a son and his father's wife are judged with especially great severity if the young man's own mother is still alive. He is reproached for his behavior in terms which are clear and crude: Oŭy'ôsangenya mbindo ìkǎ la mbindo y'ìsǒ ǒ nyangô, "you unite your stains (impurities) with those of your father and [360] mother"; Ouě ôk'oki wǎ wimâkôlê, "you are returning from whence you came." To these expressions is often added ôwa lôi ɛl olokí lilóka, "you will die because of your too great wickedness." To the [361] Nkundô this last statement is a kind of curse, and if it is repeated by several persons it will not fail to have its effect. Or, to speak as our people do, if everyone greatly wails over and against this man, he will really die. (1)

1. This attitude of the Nkundô may be one of the reasons why widows are assigned not to the son of the deceased, but to his brother.

If the son in question is not married, especially if he has already reached a relatively advanced age, and if he approaches the wives of his polygamous father, the matter is considered less serious. The latter cannot be too angry, especially when only isolated instances are involved; for other relatives will allow their affection for this young man to speak, since they are aware of his passion and therefore understand his temptations and follies. They would intervene to pacify the father and urge him to prevent the repetition of such occurrences by obtaining a wife for his son. In exceptional cases the family council may even judge the father to be in the wrong because of his hardness toward his son and may allow the latter to take his father's wife away from him (never, however, the first wife, the favorite, or the bolômbu); such was the case we described in

587
626 Chapter II, Article XI, 2. But such a situation is far from ideal in Nkundó eyes and is permitted only if, on the one hand, the son ardently loves the woman and, on the other, if the father is too slow in obtaining a wife for him.

587
602 Here then we observe a conflict between two feelings: a husband's jealousy and the affection of a father and various relatives. That is why it is difficult -- as in many situations -- to draw the line between what is permitted and what is forbidden. From what has preceded and from the general explanations given by natives, we can conclude, however, that: [303] 1) relations between a woman and her husband's son are forbidden and severely judged, but with much more leniency than in the case of "superior" relatives; 2) the [577] father may not go to extremes in repressing misconduct nor ask his own son to pay an indemnity, since to do so would be to enrich himself through his child's misbehaviour, and the latter would have no means of paying him except through him or his mother's clan -- and it would be very unjust and inappropriate to force him to have recourse to the latter.

595
607 9. A younger brother calls his older brother's wife wālī, or wife, and she calls him bóme, or husband, because they may marry one another. Therefore adulterous relations may also be found among them. But in practice some distinctions must be made.

If the younger brother is not married and the elder one has a harem, -- a state of affairs which was very common in the past but today is very rare -- the situation is analogous to the one described above in relation to a father's wife except that there is greater indulgence toward the culprit.

If the elder brother is monogamous and the younger brother a bachelor, relations of the latter with the former's wife when the husband is present are forbidden. If the younger brother nevertheless yields to the temptation, he is condemnable. The husband may not claim an indemnity. But in revenge he may procure for himself a "make-believe indemnity" (nyongo éá bolikande) by felling one of the culprit's banana trees, taking away his chickens, moving his hut, taking some other similar action. The purpose of these acts, according to our people, is to inspire the young man with a little more respect for his elder. The latter may not go to extremes, however, (as for example by fighting his younger brother), for fear of being censured for a lack of brotherly love. (1) Besides, the valuables with which he obtained his wife [304] belong in one sense to both brothers. If the two brothers have different mothers, the elder has many more trumps in his hand. And if in addition his mother's clan has provided the entire bride price or a major part of it, he would win his case entirely as regards the indemnity, although the duty of brotherly love, and therefore of leniency, would still remain. In the case of isolated misdeeds there must always be this leniency. But if the misconduct is frequently repeated, the culprit's excuses no longer carry much weight.

If the younger brother, too, is married, the matter takes on a totally different aspect. Since he has a wife of his own, he no longer has any excuse for satisfying his passions by adulterous means. It is true that the injured husband is still obliged to moderate his anger and its manifestations, but he can obtain more financial satisfaction. The indemnity he claims, however, must be added to the guilty wife's bride price; for it is inconceivable that he enrich himself at his brother's expense. If he himself obtained his brother's wife for him, he may take her away and give her to another brother, cousin, etc., or even take her for himself, in spite of the impediment of affinity. However this is an exceptional case and only applied if the misconduct has been serious and repeated and the culprit has taken an insolent attitude.

If the husband is not present, because he is on a trip or the younger brother has met his sister-in-law while she is staying with her family or traveling elsewhere, the younger brother is entirely free to have relations with her. If the woman refuses to have relations with her brother-in-law, the latter often reports her ill will to her husband, who will reprimand her or even strike her because she does not love his own brother, and will accuse her of having lovers: [illegible]. Since there is more affection between brothers born of the same mother, the husband's anger would then be even greater. A lack of affection on the part of his wife arouses her husband's suspicions on the question of her fidelity because Nkundo women are extremely ready to yield to temptation. [301] Therefore if she refuses her own brother-in-law-husband, she must be obtaining satisfaction elsewhere. This reasoning may be false, but it is based on a frequency of cases. The husband's attitude does not show a lack of jealousy; on the contrary, it proves its existence.

1. A slight brotherly punishment is not taken seriously, particularly if the younger brother is considerably his junior; it is permitted, especially where the younger brother has erred repeatedly.

If the younger brother meets his sister-in-law in the home of her family, they will intervene on his behalf. They will tell her to receive "her husband" well, to prepare food for him, to clean the hut set aside for him. They will even force her to cohabit with him for the entire duration of his stay in their village. By this means they seek to avoid palavers with their son-in-law. If the woman's antipathy toward her brother-in-law is so great that she cannot be made to submit to him, they sometimes give their visitor another of their daughters (or cousins, etc.), younger than his brother's wife, to perform wifely duties for him.

All those designated as [illegible] in Nkundo terminology fall into the same category as a younger brother (thus younger male cousins are also included). The seriousness of the conflict that may arise on this question and of its consequences vary in proportion to the degree of kinship between the individuals involved.

C. The position of a nephew ([illegible]) in relation to his maternal uncle's wives is to a great extent comparable to that of a son in relation to his father's wives. The fact that marriage is effected through the payment of a bride price gives the nephew greater freedom; for the uncle was enriched through the marriage of his 604 nephew's mother. There is no question of indemnity, except that of 587 "respects," to show the nephew's submission, and it consists of a hen and 576 a bunch of bananas. If the nephew refuses to make this gesture of 593 deference and submission, he is considered in the wrong and the entire family gangs up on him in order to save the authority and hierarchy of the family. "You are offending your uncle," they say, "no doubt you want him to die so that you can take his place and profit from the inheritance." And the offended uncle, after being patient for a few days, may demand a real indemnity. [306] But then other considerations become involved, and a new situation is created.

Actually, the young man's mother often -- though not always -- takes his side and turns on her brother. Two situations may arise:

1) The nephew's mother may not be born of the same mother as the uncle. In that case she seldom refrains from intervening on her son's behalf. She reproaches her brother for his hardness and his lack of affection for her, especially if the adulterous wife is her nkita, that is, if she were acquired by means of the bride price paid for her. She will say, "To whom do you owe this wife? And yet you demand riches from my son. Give me back my bride price, so that I may get him a wife." The uncle also gets angry, and sometimes accedes to his indignant sister's request and returns her bride price. If he does so all relationship between brother and sister is broken. But this is an unusual outcome; matters are almost always settled before this extremity is reached.

2) If brother and sister have the same mother, peace is always re-established before this aggravation, and the interchange is limited to a few reproaches and a little momentary anger. For the proverb says, [illegible], "hatred between children of the same mother is but feigned, illusory: it is not true or real."

603 837 D. In the case of the relationship of a grandson (bonkána) to his grandfather's wives, his freedom is, in practice, complete. Actually, among the Nkundó the affection of a grandfather (nkóko) for his own grandson often exceeds his love for his own son and completely degenerates into weakness. (1) The grandfather puts up with all his grandson's carryings-on, his whims, all his teasing, his insults, etc.

After illicit relations the grandson sometimes carries his insolence so far as to spontaneously send his grandfather a "mock" indemnity in the form of a basket filled with stones in the place of copper rings.

606 603 837 Although the grandfather treats his grandson with good humor, public opinion does not favor the latter's conduct, though it is more lenient than in the cases described above. The public reaction, as well as the sending of the "mock" fine, shows that in principle these relations are censurable and condemned. Because of present circum- [78] stances, particularly marriage at an earlier age than in the past, the age difference between a grandson and his grandfather's wives has increased considerably in the constantly growing number of cases, and their relations have proportionately decreased. (2) [308]

---

1. As happens very often also in Europe.
See Chapter I, Part 1, Article I, 3.

[116] 2. We have seen above that other Nkundó tribes are even less strict in these matters. On the other hand, the Ekonda, a Nkundó group living on Lake Leopold II, have a 609 837 636 184 higher morality -- in our terms. Among them the question of relations between a woman and her husband's son, younger brother, etc., does not even arise. Have they been influenced by some neighboring tribe? Or must we attribute the inferior morality of some of the tribes in this respect to decadence.

837 682 The following conclusions emerge from this long description:

1) Relations between a man and the wife of his son, younger brother, etc., in short of anyone inferior to him in the family hierarchy, are always strictly prohibited and never occur.

2) They do occur on the other hand between an inferior and the wife of his senior and superior. The degree of kinship between the husband and the culprit plays a considerable role in determining the seriousness or triviality of an infraction, the sanctions applied, and the various consequences. Some relations are accepted, others are censured with varying degrees of leniency, still others are pitilessly criticized.

3) In these matters a distinction may be made between two aspects:

a) the husband's reaction and the repression of the illicit relations;

b) the judgment of public opinion;

or:

a) the financial aspect;

b) the moral aspect -- to use that term for want of a better one.

Sometimes a third element comes into play, namely the intervention of the family on the side of the culprit against the injured husband who, for one reason or another, is in the wrong himself.

682 837 684 a) The usual sanction for adultery is, for the man, an indemnity to pay. But such a payment cannot be made since no financial transaction -- strictly speaking at least -- may be made

602 837 591 within a group of close kin; seeing that, from a certain standpoint, property belongs to all the members, each sooner or later receiving or inheriting from the other. But in cases where other sanctions can be imposed, they are considered legitimate. [309]

b) Except in the case of relations between brother and sister-in-law -- within the limits described above -- public opinion is 626 837 682 severe in its judgment, even more severe than for ordinary cases of adultery, although because of the more tangible nature of the sanctions imposed against the latter, these seem on the surface to be considered more serious; many natives even have that impression. Or at least that is the first impression that spontaneously comes from their explanations; currently, they stress the indemnity, and in their accounts of ancient proceedings and violent sanctions, they forget the other aspect. Others do not distinguish between the two sides of the problem, or distinguish between them only very poorly. Only in going to the bottom of things do they -- like ourselves -- become aware of the two aspects and the importance of not confusing them.

The leniency we observe in certain cases on the part of the interested parties who have been wronged, and sometimes on the part of public opinion, does not seem to us to have been explained as a leniency based on principle nor as a legitimation of these relations (except in the case of brothers within the limits indicated). They seem rather to spring from the affection they have for the culprit, their sympathy for his condition as a bachelor, a certain community of interests, and finally from an evaluation of certain other elements that may be involved (such as a fundamental jealousy in the case of brothers).

622 181 The great distinction made by the Nkundó in this realm as in others between inferior and superior relations is based on their conception of authority, which is patriarchal, therefore paternal. What is involved is not so much a fear of power as a reverent awe -- although the first should not be excluded. In their eyes an inferior does not exist for the benefit and advantage of the superior, but the reverse; authority exists for the good of the inferior, who to preserve hierarchy and order must submit to the [310] superior. The superior's duty to help his inferior (in his difficulties, his palavers, his poverty),

[illegible] to be liberal and generous toward him and therefore to make goods available to him, to be lenient in matters concerning justice and property and obliging in conjugal matters -- as long as the principle of authority remains secure is based on the same idea. The exploitation of an inferior by his superior is entirely contrary to the basic nature of Nkundó authority, while the reverse is entirely in conformity with it. (1)

1. This attitude may account -- at least to some extent -- for the liberties that the natives readily take with the European, their superior or master, such as domestic thefts, inappropriate requests, the kind of begging and lack of respect for authority that we are accustomed to seeing, etc.

Article VII. Adultery

[illegible] For the Nkundó, adultery is an illicit union between a man and a married woman. From the moment the [illegible] is paid for a woman, any relations with her by a man other than the husband-to-be are considered adulterous.

1. Terminology

There is no exclusive or specific term in Lonkundo by which our word "adultery" may be translated. There are a number of words in the language which are only partially equivalent to it.

1) First of all, the Nkundó speak of [illegible], a term denoting steady and continuous relations with a woman who is a complete stranger, that is, who is not related in any way. The word designates the relationship as well as the persons involved. This type of adultery is also called a [illegible] or [illegible] (from the verb [illegible]) -- that is, a secret, as against a true [illegible] (which will be 837 discussed in the next article). The Bombwanja, the londa, and the Injɔlɔ call it lɔ́ngola, "(any) act performed in hiding" (from the verb ɔngola). The londa also use [311] the term ekundɛ (from the verb kunda, "to bury), which refers to "something that is buried or hidden under a heap."

Nowadays there is a tendency to apply the term lisɛ́mbɛ, without any qualification, to adultery of this sort, at least if it is not limited to a single act. The woman and her lover are both called bosɛ́mbɛ (pl. basɛ́mbɛ).

2) If only an isolated act takes place, it is called yɛ́tɔ́ (from the verb ɛta, "to call"). But this term may also be applied to unmarried persons. Strictly speaking, it denotes a single union and not continuous relations. Certain tribes (the Injɔlɔ, the Elíngá) also have the word efongo (for instance in the expression nyang'ɛ'efongo, "indemnity for a single instance").

3) The term lonkâna (bonkakɛ among the Bombwanja) designates adultery between persons belonging to a single exogamous entity and, by extension, between persons belonging to different families but comprising a single settlement.

As the word itself indicates, the relations involved take place between "cousins" in the broadest sense of the term.

192 The natives gave me an account of the etymology of the terms bongombe and lonkâna, which it may be useful to repeat here. They are believed to have been invented by fickle wives and their lovers in order to hide their illicit love affairs. Even of old there were relations between the Nkundɔ and the Ngombe. A Ngombe who appeared in a Nkundɔ village was the object of the curiosity of all the young people. A man going to his paramour (or vice versa) or coming back at a very late hour could reply, if suspicions were aroused, that he had been to see the Ngombe. The same trick could be used in a case of lonkâna. I am passing on this explanation for whatever it's worth -- (for lonkâna, for instance, the etymology I cited at the beginning seems a good deal more natural), [312] it may be of interest at some time to have it noted and preserved in writing.

837 [196] 4) To indicate a tendency toward adultery (especially on the part of women) the Nkundɔ use the verb fâloka which literally denotes clothing that is too big and that flies in the wind. The noun loyɔ́ or boyɔ́ is also used.

The verb used for discovering a case of adultery is tɛ́mbola, the noun is ntɛmbɔ.

Occasional or permanent adultery has always been very common. This fact is undoubtedly due to the relative ease with which it is possible to escape discovery and consequent sanctions. A woman [578] going to visit her family cannot possibly be followed or watched by her husband; the distances make such surveillance difficult and, furthermore, it would have disastrous consequences for the stability of the marriage, since neither the woman nor her family would put up with it. Other partial causes are lasciviousness, polygamy, etc., as we will see later in the text.

2. Gifts

837 431 [462] An adulterous man and woman send each other presents; his consist of meat, arrows, etc., hers of food and various small objects. A woman's gifts to her lover are called lotémo (the noun used with the verb tumba, "to make burn" (1). Very young relatives generally serve as intermediaries. Note that a woman rarely sends her son, for she has reason to fear that the gift would not reach its destination; the boy would give himself a treat with it. She can have more confidence in a daughter.

A man's gift is called by the generic term ntomɔ́, "a gift that is sent, a dispatch." [312]

In isolated cases (yɛ́mi) a man sends an arrow, some small object, beads, meat, etc. Nowadays money or cloth have been

---

1. Note that the noun and the verb are not etymologically related. Perhaps lotémo might be related to téma, "to show, to designate." The Ekonda call this gift elika. See Chapter II, Article I.

837 substituted for all these items. As a rule the woman demands some 437 remuneration although there are exceptions, which may be frequent or rare, depending on the region and on the nature of the persons involved. They are due to extraordinary passion or to the woman's love for her lover. (1)

1. See Chapter I, Part I, Article IV.

3. Evidence of adultery

837 The strength of the evidence may vary.
684 1) The strongest evidence is finding the couple _in flagrante delicto_. No objection will hold up against it, and it constitutes for the application of the severest sanctions. The act must be observed by the husband. The testimony of a third party is never introduced. If another person discovers the adultery and favors the husband, that person will inform the latter so that he can take precautions in order to catch the culprits personally. If it is discovered by the woman's father or other close relative who favors the husband, [686] he informs the latter and, if possible, calls him to witness the infraction himself. If he does so, the husband must give the indemnity to his father-in-law. This is not a legal obligation but one imposed by good relations and decorum, since the father-in-law has shown good will and affection toward his son-in-law.

2) A wife's admission is almost as important and always decisive. Such a confession mitigates her husband's anger toward her and directs it chiefly toward her accomplice. Therefore most women do not hesitate to denounce their paramours if they feel somewhat cornered. (On the other hand, women never denounce each other.) [214]

3) A third form of evidence can be obtained by surprising the lovers while they are planning a meeting. The husband can accuse them on the spot and try to extract a complete confession from his wife on the subject of the past or the future. If possible he assures himself of the co-operation of witnesses. If he foresees a denial on his wife's part, he lets the occasion pass and looks for a good opportunity to surprise the culprits in the act. Regardless of the

537 wife's inclinations, a husband often will not intervene at once; he 649 will give no sign of what he has observed but will skillfully seek an opportunity to observe the pair in flagrante delicto, so that he can take more violent action. This approach is absolutely necessary if he has nothing but suspicions, even if they are well founded. To act otherwise would not have great results and would show a lack of judgment -- often true of young, inexperienced husbands or ones with too irascible a temperament. An intercepted message bearing an invitation or an acceptance has the same practical value.

This form of evidence is weaker than the two preceding ones -- unless these are added -- and justifies only certain sanctions.

4) The sight of lovers giving gifts, either from hand to hand or through an intermediary (" with so-and-so's compliments") also has its value as evidence. But here again the best approach is to use this evidence as a means of obtaining the wife's confession. That is the only practical value of discovering gifts in the wife's possession. If a wife finds no explanations that will pacify the husband, she is forced to admit the act and denounce her accomplice.

4. Sanctions

649 Nkundo law includes several sanctions against adultery some of which are applicable to the spouse, some to the accomplice, and some to an intermediary (ekund). There are differences [315] in the application of these sanctions depending on the gravity of the case (for instance, repetition of an offence or a habitual offence), the inclinations or temperaments of the persons involved, and the value of the evidence. Although the sanctions are legitimated by law, most of them are applied at the spouse's initiative; but in some instances the authority of the family as well as that of the nkanga have to be involved. Therefore the following varied situations should be pointed out:

A. A husband's sanctions against an adulterous wife.

a) In the case of a delicto flagrante, the husband may beat his wife, wound her, and even kill her. Neither she nor her family have the right to complain. If he kills her he is no longer entitled 684 [illegible] to a reimbursement of the bride price, any more than if she had died of natural causes. In past times death under these circumstances usually resulted in a war between clans. But this extreme situation actually arose only very rarely; if the man was excessively jealous and had other wives or the means to obtain them, or was embittered by persistent and incorrigible infidelity. Most frequently a husband's foresight of the loss he would sustain, in the last analysis keeps him from such drastic action. He limits himself to beating or injuring the culprit or to applying other forms of chastisement or punishment (see below under b); see above, Article III, 2.

If the husband has sufficient evidence, of the sort described above, but has not caught the culprits in the act, the wife can expect a good whipping, accompanied by a whole string of vulgar expressions and assorted insults (femina foetidissima, tempore menstruationis putor tuus venit in nares omnium hominum, etc.) as well as [578] [illegible] a heap of obscenities pertaining to the female genital organs. The husband who acts in this manner is not reprimanded. On the contrary, he acts thus out of jealousy; our Nkundó say that his anger is an anger of love.

In these punishments the Nkundó above all recognize the exasperation that springs from legitimate jealousy. That is why the husband acts on his own initiative. Besides, when he [314] finds himself confronted with the fact it would be psychologically difficult for him to calm himself first in order to go and inform the [illegible].

It was extremely unusual for a man to kill his wife calmly and deliberately. Such a thing happened only if her infidelities were continuous and she had erred in many other ways as well. And even then this conduct was found only in certain extremely cruel families. It was known that [illegible] Ōkungū and [illegible] [illegible] had acted in this fashion; both were members of the Bongili ([illegible]), a family which, in its songs, boasted of eating their own wives.

b) Tortures. The husband may also have recourse to several types of torture. Most important among them are the following:

1) The [illegible], which is the standard torture so to speak. It is a heavy wooden fork which is attached to the neck. It prevents

[i.e., a husband's killing his wife for adultery [illegible]]

[illegible] movement and therefore serves as the Nkundó prison. But in addition, if it is applied for a long time, it becomes a real torture; the skin becomes painful and comes off, inflammations readily appear, and bugs sometimes lodge there.

As soon as the woman's family hears (through the ndonga) that she is being so tortured, they often come and beg her husband to [576] free her. To pacify and propitiate him, they offer him an ad hoc payment, that is, a bofinja of a few copper rings. Generally, he yields to their entreaties. A good relationship and his respect toward them require that he not remain indifferent to their supplications, especially as he needs them for the stability of the marriage and the good functioning of the household.

2) Bokongwanyi, or handcuffs, which consist of sticks attached either to the wrists or to the ankles (to prevent walking), or to both arms and feet. Two sticks were used, one above and one below, with the limb placed in between, and they were tied with ropes that were attached and fastened in notches made at [217] each end of the sticks. In rare instances the wrists were bound. To increase the pain and immobility, the ropes were shrunk and hardened by pouring water on them. These handcuffs were generally added to the etoko and were never applied alone.

3) Exposure to the bites of nkonghó ants. In the region under [illegible] discussion, I have never heard the people speak of exposure to bafomba (Dorylus), or even to the venomous bosálfoláfone. This fact contrasts with the practice of other Mongo tribes and with the content of certain legends (evolution?).

4) The pouring of water containing pepper into the vagina. Sometimes the genital organs were rubbed with crushed pepper.

5) Exposure of the sex organs to fire. A burning log was held near them.

The last two types of torture were the most dreadful.

We can add one last form of punishment which is derived from the same legal rules, although it is not a torture:

[illegible] 6) Nudity. The husband tears off the guilty woman's garments and thus exposes her to public shame. Even if she resorts to using leaves, no one mistakes the situation, and her shame is only partly reduced.

591
Any of the types of evidence listed above is sufficient to legitimize the application of one or another of these penalties. Nevertheless, the husband is required first to notify the older members of his family and the nkonga, who do not permit him to act unless the misdeeds have occurred repeatedly. The readiness to accord the husband permission depends on the temperament of the interested parties and on a great many circumstances, the most important of which is the respective social prominence of the parties involved.

The need to ask permission of the "fathers" and the nkonga, which we have already encountered in reference to other situations (above, Article III, 4), does not weaken the husband's rights [318], but it limits their use. It is not a legal obligation but one that is imposed for family reasons, which are as follows:

1) The respect due to the "fathers" in this as in all important matters;

2) The respect due to the nkonga, who in marital matters is the husband's superior and whose intervention must be called upon in any serious situation;

3) The repercussions of any inconsiderate or rash action on the entire family (enmities, wars, etc.).

If forbearance and patience are fruitless, no one can blame the husband any longer. And when the woman's family compares the censurable conduct of their daughter with the generosity of their son-in-law, they will naturally be inclined to find that he is in the right and so usually will not intervene against him.

Note also that the Nkundó invoke the need to maintain their honor as justification for the obligation to notify the authorities. They must be able to inform the unfaithful woman's clan and thus safeguard their good reputation as defenders of order and public peace.

A woman whose husband loved her very much was subjected to the enfka only. He would reprimand her and strike her, and would try to correct her behavior by means of gentleness and leniency.

As we will see suo loco, a husband who is exasperated by the incorrigible infidelity of a wife whose [illegible] of other widely 684 586 duties is also unsatisfactory, may sometimes resort to divorce or to selling her into slavery, but rarely to killing.

Colonization has abolished torture, slavery, killing, and the 684 legitimacy of assassination. A husband has no other sanction against 178 an unfaithful wife than to insult and beat her. And even there European law forces him to restrain himself lest he commit excesses which [318] involve him in a trial before the white man's court. Fortunately for marital fidelity, a reaction in favor of the repression of adultery has recently begun, following the official establishment of native jurisdiction. In the not too distant future, this reaction will culminate in a return to ancestral law in a form adapted to present circumstances.

B. Against the accomplice, the injured husband has the right 684 to make use of two sanctions: violence and the payment of an 576 "indemnity."

1) If the husband catches the accomplice in the act, he always has the right to wound him, or even to kill him, or reduce him to slavery. The last two forms of vengeance were not practiced unless the respective villages of the husband and the culprit were fairly distant from each other and not bound to each other by any special ties (friendship, mutual assistance, or affinity). This reservation existed because of consideration for the offender's relatives, the desire not to bring them excessive sorrow. Another cause for caution and calm is the economic or military inferiority of the husband's clan, or the fearlessness, the valor in battle, in a word, the strength of the culprit's family. A special case which makes all other considerations disappear is adultery with a favorite, whose husband's love for her is especially passionate and jealous.

If the offender's adultery was not limited to a few isolated acts but was becoming a real habit, or if he had already seduced many women, resulting in many palavers for his family, the husband could be bolder. For the rake's clan too would finally be exasperated with his incorrigible and disastrous misconduct and would rather be rid of him. (1) [319]

1. See also Chapter VIII, Article II, 2, A.

465 The risk of being wounded, reduced to slavery, or killed, often cools the adulterer's passion. Therefore, the more the husband showed that he was fearless, violent, physically powerful, or of a high social position, the more his wives and their lovers were on their guard. Certain men were so jealous of one of their wives and so determined to take vengeance with extreme severity that the tempters did not even dare to think of approaching her.

2) The payment of an indemnity seems to be the standard sanction. It is the only one that remains legal at the present time; consequently it is coming more and more to the fore.

Any of the types of evidence examined above justify the claim for an indemnity.

The indemnity may be minimal, consisting of 2 to 5 copper rings, or heavy, going up to 20 to 30 rings or a slave. The maximum is always demanded for adultery with a favorite. The size of the payment depends on the persons involved, the relationships that bind them, the frequency of misconduct, and the nature of the action observed. For instance, if the husband catches the couple when arranging a meeting or exchanging gifts, the indemnity will be small; if, on the other hand, he has caught them in flagrante delicto, it will be high.

[432] A man who demands a high indemnity must expect to be treated the same way should the occasion arise. The application of the law of retaliation in that case is fully approved by Nkundo opinion.

466 [illegible] [433] In addition to the situations examined in the preceding article, there exists another which does not result in an indemnity claim. It arises if the culprit belongs to a class of slaves or is in some other way subject or inferior ([illegible] or [illegible]). (1) Even if the husband catches the culprit in the act, he politely asks him to go away and leave his house [301] and his wife: [illegible] Here is true Nkundo courtesy in practice. It might certainly happen that a husband who was too jealous or impetuous would wound, kill, or sell his rival. But this was an exception and was always condemned since it was absolutely lacking in chivalry. In any case there can never be any question of demanding an indemnity; such an act would be absolutely shameful.

1. Strangers who are settled with a tribe or group but are in no way related to them.

The culprit is notified of the demand for an indemnity by the nkonga, who in difficult cases is accompanied by various notables. If the husband foresees strong opposition on the debtor's part, he gives the nkonga a special present of a bunch of bananas and two fish (or a hen) "so that he would not be forced to eat the rival's food."

A persistent and categorical refusal to pay the indemnity is unusual. For it can have serious consequences: the taking in custody followed by enslavement because of debt, or [the taking of] compensation in the person of his wife or of a relative, or the retention [by her relatives] of a relative of the creditor who is married into the debtor's clan (ilifaka). Since these practices of taking hostages and of bodily constraint have been abolished, there remains the intervention of the courts, seconded by the police.

What is the Nkundó idea of this payment which we have called an indemnity in order to facilitate its description? The question is difficult to answer. Here are the linguistic facts which may provide elements of the solution:

The payment for adultery is called nyongo, and the word is used together with the verb ka, "to give." The expression is equivalent to the verb lingola fifa (from which the noun bofifo is derived). It signifies "payment" in the broadest sense and thus also covers our words "pay," "salary," "remuneration." In addition to its application in the case of adultery, it is also used in many other situations, such as remuneration for work, payment for a service, etc. Nyongo does not mean "compensation," which is called bowifila, nor "a payment making amends [272] and apologizing for an offense," which is bibolo, nor "indemnification" (nsiflaka). What the expression has in common with the last term is the concept of a [illegible] payment rightly owed, and in the absence of an adequate translation, "indemnity" is still the least inaccurate. (1)

[illegible]

One point remains to be noted. The two forms of punishment, violence and indemnity, may not be combined, and this principle is applied in all situations (2). Should this prohibition be construed as an implicit condemnation of violent measures? Or have we here the use of a system of settlement? It is difficult to settle this question, and actually the two explanations overlap at least in part.

[illegible] It is not without interest to note that, in order to justify sanctions against the accomplice, the Nkundó invoke his frequently dominant role in adultery. Actually they reason that a woman is weak by nature; her emotions predominate, she is easily led and resists enticement only with difficulty. A man on the other hand is more reasonable, better able to control himself. Sanctions enacted and applied against the wife alone would not only leave out the punishment of one of the two culprits,but they would also be inadequate for the preservation of social order, since the woman remains exposed to succumbing out of weakness in spite of the penalties. The severity of Nkundó law with regard to the corporal punishment of the wife, which exists in spite of these considerations, are explained in terms of the woman's sensitive nature and of the power her husband has over her which he lacks in relation to her accomplice.

1. The words used for "reward" are bokondo, which is a reward for an unusual service, like the capture of a leopard or another "royal" animal (nyam'ě'ekofo, such as a python, an eagle, etc.) or a beautiful dance, and mbuteji, which is a reward for small services.

2. For example, see also Chapter VIII, Article III, 1.

C. Against a husband and his accomplice. There is no
684 specific sanction in Nkundó law against a husband's adultery, [323] but an outraged wife may take revenge on him, as on her rival. Her weapons against her husband include invective, the refusal of food, drink, baths, and finally of debitum conjugale. These are appreciable punishments about which the husband can in no way complain, for he would be found entirely in the wrong. The woman's actions stem from a legitimate jealousy. Sometimes her feeling
[834] becomes so intense that she tears off her clothing and stands before her husband completely naked; this shames him greatly and constitutes a stinging reproach. Invectives flow out of the wife's mouth in torrents: ilolé ing, itutula ing, inyanyama iné, owé lói ô ndé
[578] nyongo, ndé ntémbó, "that imbecile, that good for nothing, that beast, one day you'll die of penalties, of being caught in flagrante delicto . . . ." Then there is a whole string of the usual in-[562] sults. Our Nkundó say that the more abundant the insults, the greater is the woman's love. She may carry on like this for days, even for weeks. Her responses to her husband's adultery are thus of the same sort as those she makes use of under other circumstances.

If a jealous wife sets fire to the hut in which her husband yielded to his passion, no one can reproach her. The damage was caused on her husband's account.

Against the woman accomplice, the wife may use more violent means. She may fight her, strike her, even injure her. The rival's husband will demand a liombo, or payment "for blows and wounds," which has to be paid not by the wife's family, but by the guilty husband. Thus in the final analysis it is again he who is punished. If the offending woman is killed, it is again the unfaithful husband who is obliged to pay an indemnity to the widower. (See Article II.)

One form of punishment to which a wife likes to have recourse to take revenge on her adulterous husband and his accomplice if she catches them in the act is to pour a pot of hot or boiling water on their bodies. [324]

684 [571] D. Against the go-between (1) Nkundó law permits all sorts

1. The Nkundó generally use go-betweens to tender invitations to women; these are frequently children between the ages of six and fourteen. The disastrous effect of such a practice on the bringing up of young people is easily understood. In some groups it has inflicted a real moral evil.

of invective, blows, and a good whipping. Formerly the most serious situation arose if a woman was called directly. In the past, if favored by circumstances (especially the social position of the families involved), certain of the more jealous and bold men caught the go-between and sold him as a slave. This punishment was entirely legitimate, even though the person for whom the go-between acted was the one primarily guilty and therefore the prisoner's family could attack him on that account. People cite the rather recent historic case of Bonkéké is Iloko of Ikengo (Ntómbé, Wéngaté), who sold a Botswa named Bompéte into slavery because the latter had brought a lover's gift to Wáfya, his favorite.

684 582 581 E. Conclusion. In examining the various sanctions that Nkundó law provides against adulterers and their accomplices, we are struck by a noticeable difference among the cases. Although a wife has certain means to check her husband's misconduct, she is unquestionably less well armed than he. This is a logical consequence of the nature of Nkundó marriage. A husband defends his "property," whereas a wife is not an "owner." Furthermore, in this realm the requirements are stricter for a woman than for a man. Even in Europe the misconduct of a man is judged very differently than a woman's weakness, the latter being considered much more serious and shameful, even though -- in an absolute sense -- the two are equal. Finally, the system of polygamy plays a role, for it tends to weaken a wife's love and consequently her jealousy, so 681 591 592 that she becomes accustomed to her husband's relations with various other women. Consequently, the reaction of the women in general [316] against adultery is much weaker than that of the men. Moreover, because of this same system, a woman is much more exposed to weakness, and stronger sanctions are therefore necessary to insure her fidelity.

Finally, there is one last reason for considering a woman's misconduct as more serious. It is the danger of conception through adultery, with all the attendant consequences: risks for the pregnant woman, forced continence for the husband, etc. (1)

1. See no. 6 below as well as Chapter I,
Part 2, Article IV, 3, and Chapter X,
Article II, 3.

562 684 From the description of sanctions it is apparent that in spite of the woman's inferior position, Nkundó law does not leave husbands the full and complete freedom which, according to certain writers, they are accorded among other peoples. Even if the means of repression available to the wife do not incontestably prove that the husband has an obligation of conjugal fidelity -- and the wife's legal status explains a great deal -- the fact remains that the ndonga as well as public opinion approve of even her violent reaction, proving that she is right and the husband wrong.

5. Public opinion

626 637 Public opinion is fairly lenient in relation to isolated instances (yětsi, efongo). It clearly recognizes the error involved in infringing on the conjugal rights of another, but the error is attributed to human weakness. In the case of habit the situation is different; it is criticized frequently and severely. Habitual sinners [317] are called efãfókã (from the verb fafoka, literally "to flutter" and figuratively "to flirt"), ebóngã or ebãbóngã (from the verb bãbonga) or ebãbóã (from bâboa) "to flutter, to be flighty and fickle." These epithets are applied primarily to women, who are more subject to this failing than men.

626 The shame attached to the discovery of this sort of misconduct in the better circles in Europe is unknown among the Nkundó. This is natural since isolated instances are readily excused. As to the habitual offenders, they are sensitive [326] to the above-mentioned epithets but will not correct their ways on this account any more than people in other parts of the world.
[152]

837 An adulterous husband is criticized as much as an adulterous wife in spite of the difference in the means of repression which Nkundó law provides for their respective misconduct.
626

Public opinion therefore corroborates the conclusion toward which our examination of sanctions has pointed, namely that adultery is condemned by the Nkundó. Opinion is not based on the existence of the sanction but seems to spring from their innate mentality, which makes them perceive adultery as a disorder.

6. Aggravating circumstances

837 If a case of adultery is followed by conception, it becomes especially serious, and for the husband as much as for the natural father. Indeed the latter must assume all the consequences. When circumstances permit the husband makes his wife denounce her accomplice, and she does not refuse to do so. The husband then calls a meeting and demands a pledge (ndanga) from the culprit, who in that way acknowledges that he is at fault and shows his willingness to assume all responsibility. If there is a miscarriage or the child dies during delivery, the natural father must pay the legal father an indemnity of "a slave" or more (sometimes 50 rings); a smaller indemnity is required for a child who is only deformed or sickly. If the mother dies the indemnity consists of a slave and 50 rings, and it may go as high as 100 rings.
682
672

In the interim the husband no longer goes near his wife. He leaves her to her lover, who must "preserve the foetus" and observe all the rites and practices associated with pregnancy and childbirth, since, physically, he is the father. (1) [327]

---

1. For fuller details see Chapter X, Article II, 3. For analogous practices

673
597
[845] in the case of an unmarried mother, see Chapter I, Part 1, Article III, 3.

[843] Adultery also becomes especially serious during the period preceding childbirth when there is a special prohibition against it, as endangering the lives of both mother and child, as we will explain in Chapter X, Article III.

7. Remarks and general conclusions

571
[726] 1) In former times the offense of adultery, even in its mildest form, that is, an isolated act, was one of the chief causes of "wars" between villages. Sometimes both sides called on their relatives by marriage to assist them, and the result was a general upheaval.

577
595 2) As a rule a husband wants his wife to be faithful. Doubtless there are exceptions. Most if not all of them were formerly found among the old polygamists. At their age they were disgusted with continual palavers, and their experience as men had taught them that they often became angry and uselessly complicated their little lives. They preferred to close their eyes, like good old Bonsofe w'Ilolongi of Isako (the Bombwanja clan of the Bolyā). He came to see me in the Christian village of Bombomba through which I was passing at the beginning of March, 1933. I asked him why he was adorned with so many bells, and he answered naively, "I always wear them. That way my wives know of my coming already from a distance. It gives them time to stop slandering me and to send their lovers away." When I expressed my surprise that he did not want to catch them in the act in order to punish them and end their infidelities, he answered me with a smile, "No, Father, jealousy . . . is for the young. As for me, I have seen so much of it that I no longer have any desire to get angry and make palavers for these trivialities."

558
577
595 Since the coming of the Europeans some unscrupulous men -- especially polygamists -- have been engaging in [328] a kind of procuring. They send their wives to commit adultery in order to be able to catch them in the act and thus enrich themselves. Or else they lend their wives for one night or more to laborers or soldiers who are

[illegible]
593 bachelors in law or in fact.

Knowing their wives' weak and sensual natures, some men save the rings that come to them as indemnities -- today as in the past. When this capital has grown sufficiently, they use it to acquire a new wife. The latter is in a sense the other wife's nkita, and she is called, rather crudely, nkita é' efufa, efufa being the piece of cloth (apron) worn by the women. Such action does not mean that the husband wishes to speculate in immorality. He simply profits from what is a fact. But this attitude could easily degenerate, and at the present time the danger that it might is no longer imaginary, although for the moment things have not gone that far. Watchfulness on the part of administrative authorities can avoid all exploitation of marital infidelity by preventing the development of this evil or checking it where it already exists.

593 The attitude toward a spouse's adultery varies greatly with different situations. These variations spring not only from the temperament of the injured party -- this goes without saying -- but also from the way the one guilty of adultery fulfills other marital obligations. This is particularly true with respect to a woman's "weaknesses." If she otherwise shows herself to be a devoted wife who is attentive, respectful, hard working, and one who takes the interests of her husband and children to heart, in a word, a good housewife, her husband will regret her infidelities, but he will pay less attention to these failings, since she compensates for them by many good qualities which show that she seriously loves him and lets herself go solely out of weakness. On the other hand, if a wife becomes neglectful, [329], disagreeable, and disrespectful, the change will indicate that something other than just weakness is involved, that her love for her husband has cooled and has chosen another object.

This is the sound philosophy of conjugal life among the Nkundó, as it is proclaimed and taught by all their old men and sages.

837 3) In spite of the terrible sanctions against adultery, it would appear that this offence has always been common. Certain events, such as deaths, feasts, and dances which last long into the night, are especially conducive to laxity. But even under ordinary [837] circumstances, the dark of evening provides strong provocation. A noisy crowd of young people is often deliberately aroused for the purpose of hiding such frolics. Women especially are the ones to start the scene (called iole). They begin with "games," pinching, etc. Sometimes those who are bolder cry out, iole o! by way of a signal. These irregularities are sometimes agreed upon in advance; other times they are provoked without any advance agreement. The husbands intervene, but it is very difficult for them to catch the culprits.

[577] [837] 4) It would seem that according to Nkundó notions, adultery is not a moral fault, even in the broadest sense of the term, and not punishable by a nonearthly power of religion or superstition, which would intervene to re-establish the order that has been disrupted. Rather one has the impression that their law pertaining to it is purely social. Not that I want to say that this law and its sanctions do not, in the last analysis, spring from a moral idea; but if this moral idea exists, it is very vague and confused and is not expressed by our people. In practice all attention is focused on the sanctions because of the injury to property rights. There never seems to be the slightest reference to a moral religious idea. [320]

And this is probably the chief reason for the frequency of adultery in spite of the sanctions, for while these undoubtedly reduce the evil they are powerless to stop it. But this statement does not apply exclusively to our people. Every law is an ideal. Sanctions attempt to ensure that it is observed. But the masses never attain the intended goal. When some individuals are superior to the ideal imposed by law, it is because society falls short in performing its task, as is the case in Europe today. Among the Nkundó, law and society are superior to the morality of individuals. Besides, sanctions though necessary have never sufficed to assure perfect obedience of laws: nihil leges sine moribus. Good morals must come from considerations that are superior to particular laws and the basis for them.

Although, as we have seen, the Nkundó do not connect the subject at hand in any way with their religious understanding, how can we explain the praiseworthy conduct of many individuals? In my opinion although the Nkundó are not aware of the relationship between the law and its ultimate legislator, they are not without a certain vague, innate feeling that adultery is immoral, and this is corroborated by 837 their sense of the personal injustice involved. But they do not reason 577 out these feelings; they follow them spontaneously, blindly.

There is a greater awareness of the social evil in adultery. But it is based not on the philosophical considerations of this harm in itself, but on the consequences of individual cases for the proper functioning of society -- palavers, financial difficulties, enmities, quarrels, wars.

This it seems to me is the present state of their ideas. It does not preclude the possibility that the law and sanctions against adultery may rest on an ultimate basis of moral ideas. And more particularly it is quite possible that the moral idea [321] operates only in the form of a feeling of the great principles of fundamental natural law which is innate to all human reason.

8) No one will be astonished if we say that colonization, far from reducing the frequency of adultery, actually contributed to its considerable increase. The abolition of native penalties and punishments together with a great freedom of movement could not help but lead, naturally, to this state of affairs. Every informed colonial who is in close contact with the natives is aware of the situation. "The prohibition of corporal punishments which, according to custom, were the sanctions imposed against a woman's adultery have brought about a license whose extent can be measured by the degree to which a group is subject to our occupation. The forgetfulness if not the contempt for the promises of marriage is nowhere carried so far as in places where the customary disciplines have been completely re-
[113] moved." (Maj. Engels, Bulletin Soc. Belge, Et. Col., cited in Congo, 3rd year, Vol. 1, p. 77, April, 1922). That is why various persons have repeatedly called for sanctions against adultery to replace the ancestral means of repression that have been abolished.

But the decrees hoped for have never passed beyond the stage 692 of mere projects. Fortunately, another step, and a fundamental one, 177 has been taken in the meantime through the establishment of native
837 jurisdiction (1926). Under the guidance and control of European authorities, native courts will turn the helm halfway back to the ancient sanctions, adapting these all the while to the new conditions created by colonization and by the introduction of more humanitarian 177 ideas. Nevertheless, great care must be exercised not to go to ex-695 tremes in introducing these ideas to the point where a society only

671 just beginning to emerge from a pagan barbarism because of the presence of a civilization based on Christianity, is treated as an equal of European communities. Native society must evolve gradually and harmoniously. Rushing is often synonymous with breaking, and it is always a [300] great mistake. And in the matters under discussion, the abolition of sanctions which, in spite of their imperfection and their inadequacy for fulfilling the whole task, have been shown to have a real efficacy, has removed all the coercive power of Nkundó law. A sentimental and excessive humanitarianism must yield before the native society's right to respect for its vital institutions -- unless these are entirely to be condemned -- and therefore before the necessity for severe punishments which it cannot do without for the moment. For our natives are not yet ready for a complete abolition of their customary sanctions, since they still lack a new foundation that would replace their fear of the ancient penalties. Let us therefore take care not to take all means of punishment away from husbands and wives, even if they seem somewhat violent from our viewpoint. Finally, there is no sense in overstressing a respect for members of the weaker sex, who by their very nature sometimes need punishment for the greater good of the whole community. Moreover, as for this respect, our Nkundó do not understand it at all; the way we conceive of it is entirely opposed to their mentality and their laws. Therefore, everything will work out more easily if the native courts are given sufficient latitude to act in the spirit of their ancestral law and if their activity is guided by a constant, informed, and sympathetic control whose sole aim is the healthy evolution of native society.

600 If it is applied within these limits and under these conditions, Nkundó law can redress many wrongs and help to save native society from the abyss into which it is in danger of falling. In spite of its faults and imperfections, it is preferable not only to the system of freedom (or license) which has reigned for many years, but also to [illegible] new legislation emanating from the European power, a very slow and complex system (the law against adultery which has been requested for decades is still in the realm of studies and projects), lacking in flexibility and the ability to adapt to the very varied circumstances of the peoples of the Congo. A law is needed only for the persons who do not fall within the jurisdiction of the native courts, in order to preserve harmony and impartiality in the exercise of justice, since native society must of necessity feel its effects.

Article VIII. Relations Permitted to the Wife

837 In this article we will examine the relations a wife may have -- under certain conditions -- with various persons. According to our law, such relations would be adulterous, but Nkundó law does not consider them as such. From this arises the difference between this article and the preceding one. Such relations may be 1) transitory or 2) permanent (concubinage).

1. Transitory relations

837 561 [574] A wife is permitted to have sexual relations with her husband's age mates (baningá, sing. boningá). (1) When one comes to the home of another in the course of travel, the host lends his wives to the visitor, saying: "Here is your house; here are your wives." If he is monogamous he leaves his house and his spouse at the visitor's disposal and goes to bed elsewhere alone. If a woman who is traveling arrives in the village of one of her husband's age mates, the latter -- as soon as he learns of her presence -- invites her to stay in his home for the length of her stay. When they say good-by he gives her a present for her husband" with the boningá's compliments." When one visits another, wives are often exchanged.

571 Such is the practice among age mates who maintain good and true relationships. They have free access to each other's wives, and [306] their actions cannot give rise to claims or fines. Nor if one is more "stingy" in the native view than another, can the latter start palavers with him on that account. But such an attitude will result in a cooling of the cordiality of their relationship, and refusals will be reciprocated.

Age mates do not demand indemnities from each other because it is not fitting for one to enrich himself at the other's expense. This rule applies even to "private" relations, to a simple "call," occurring without the lending described above. But if one of them goes too far, that is if he avails himself of another's wife two or three times without the latter doing likewise, a palaver may arise. The husband will believe that he has been wronged and will demand an indemnity. If his companion refuses on the grounds of the relationship which unites them, he may receive a reply such as the following: boníngá bosángela ndé basí é? "Is the age-mate relationship a means for acquiring wives?" A regular battle may follow, and the husband is the one who will win the case before the court.

There are no relations permitted between men and women age mates. Such relations would be considered typical adultery.

The relations between a man and his age-mate's wife are therefore permitted not in themselves, but because of the husband's willingness to have them occur. Furthermore, the husband is not strictly required to yield his wife to him. That he does so is a 571 matter of good friendship, harmony, payment for services, and mutual respect and affection. From the purely matrimonial point of view, the terrain is free and neutral since, they say, the relations involved are purely private between them, and each one does what he thinks best.

837 In addition to the boníngá, the Nkundó have a relationship 572 called boseka, "friendship," "friend." (It is called bokandeko among the Bombwanja). (1) In contrast to the practices that prevail between

1. See Chapter I, Part1, Article III.

587 572 age mates, the friendship pact has no connection with the wives of the men involved. If [331] there is a very firm friendship between them, one may lend his wife to the other in some situation or other, but this is a fairly rare occurrence. The Nkundó say that the bosako relationship is for mutual assistance only.

If a case of adultery occurs, the husband has every right to demand an indemnity, but if the occurrence is not repeated, he never goes to extremes, and, because of the friendship, he may ask as little as 2 or 3 rings. If the occurrences are repeated without reciprocity, however, the husband often makes a great to-do; he demands a large indemnity and breaks the friendship pact.

Instead of demanding an indemnity some men give their [593] friend a gift (mpósí) asking him to stop the illicit relations. Often this action is but a subterfuge to relax the other's vigilance so that, feeling freer, he will be more easily apprehended.

587 557 Between persons bearing the same name (ndoí, pl. bandoí), (1) there is no free access to wives, nor are persons of opposite sexes ever considered ndoí. Such relations would be considered concubinage or pure and simple adultery.

To summarize, a certain freedom of access to each other's 587 wives exists among age mates, but it is subject to the expressed or tacit consent of the respective husbands. These relations are not considered adulterous. Such freedom does not exist with respect to other categories of persons. But these, nevertheless, had to be mentioned here because the similarity among the kinds of relationship discussed might produce errors in the reader's mind, and because in certain parts of the Congo such persons fall into the same category as Nkundó age mates.

2. Concubinage

595-x 587 Concubinage (called lisámbá among the Bokote, ingke among the Bombwanja as well as the Ekonda) is a union [335] between

1. See Chapter I, Part 1, Article III.

595 587 a man and another's wife which is legitimate, regulated, officially acknowledged, and accepted. It is not a marriage; there is no bride price nor are there witnesses other than the woman herself; the wife does not belong to the secondary husband, and in case of a rupture of relations, there is no restitution of valuables however numerous they may be. A man who in this manner purchases the right to cohabit with the wife of another does so because of poverty; he does not have the means to pay a bride price for this woman or [336] any other. Therefore he is disdained and scorned by his fellows. To a certain extent the husband and the lover share a common life; they give each other presents and food, help each other, eat together, and call each other bakalí, the same name by which wives of a polygamist address each other.

Such a concubinage can last fairly long. It is usually difficult to break, for the legitimate husband takes such a breaking up badly and considers it an injustice. If the husband is rich and influential, it is dangerous for the partner to dissolve the relationship for he will have to count on the husband's wrath. Thus in the past such a union could continue for many years (in that case it was called [illegible]) until the lover (bonsɛ́mbɛ́, pl. bansɛ́mbɛ́) was rich enough to free himself. Often it continued for an entire lifetime, and the partner settled in the lofɔnjɛ (a place occupied by a man and his wives) of the husband (linsɛ́mbɛ́ jǐ njelɛ́ngwɛ́, enjwɛ́ki); he thus became like the husband's child. Nowadays this custom has become much less common because of the freedom resulting from colonization as well as the greater possibility of acquiring wealth. This diminution shows that the practice is not ideal, even in native eyes, and is only a last resort resulting from the state of the distribution of wealth.

A man who desires to live in concubinage with another man's wife has some relations with her in secret and then makes the matter public. For that purpose he gives the woman a knife or a few bakonga to take to her [337] husband. Or he may even call a meeting of the patriarchs and pay the husband in front of them. To make a concubinage public in this way is called ója linsɛ́mbɛ́, "to make 316 the concubinage come out," (the intransitive of the verb is filo), or 317 teja (tela) lisafumbá, "to bring out into daylight, to make public."

The payment for the right of concubinage is called [illegible], although it may also be designated simply by the term lisafumbá (tego). To show his agreement the woman's husband sends the partner a dog or a few hens (2, 3, 5, or more, depending on his wealth or his satisfaction). The intermediary is not the woman involved but one of her co-wives. Nor is one of the husband's children ever charged with this office. Thereafter, the two partners [fn] regularly give each other gifts. The husband's presents are all called bofúmo (the generic term given to all presents from a woman to her lover), while those of the other man are called by the term mpendi, "package, gift sent" -- also a generic term.

Often the woman herself urges her lover to make their concubinage public because she wishes to regularize the situation as she fears its possible consequences. Sometimes she threatens to break off all relations, but usually she nevertheless succumbs to temptation.

As soon as the concubinage is made public in the manner described, that publication itself renders it legitimate. The expression used for the act of contracting such a union is teja lisafumbá.

If a woman's official lover catches her in the act of adultery, he does not denounce her to her husband but personally demands an indemnity as if he himself were the legitimate husband. If the culprit refuses to pay him, the lover breaks off relations with the woman and denounces her to her husband. Thus the adulterer is punished in any case, and from his point of view it is preferable to pay the bosafumbá, who will be satisfied with a smaller indemnity. [338]

Since the woman does not belong to her lover, he has no rights whatsoever to the fruits of her labor or to her children, who are considered her husband's. But the partner has a right to expect that the woman will prepare food for him. The husband, for his part, has the right to his partner's assistance. The social situation is therefore entirely in the husband's favor. The lover's only gain is to have access to a woman whom he could not otherwise have obtained. But the respect due to the legitimate husband prohibits him from freely availing himself of the woman while he is in the village.

[illegible] Some men are strict on this point, while others are more tolerant.
837 Clearly, the technique of such men is most subtle. The more a wife's lover is permitted his freedom, the greater is the likelihood that other women, who prefer a young man passionately enamoured of them to their husband, will ask the polygamist to marry them. A [592] man who is sufficiently wealthy and influential can in this manner build up a harem from which he does not benefit physically but which assures him of a dominant social position.

This practice exists almost exclusively in conjunction with polygamy, but cases do occur among monogamists. And among more "civilized" tribes, such as the riverain people of the Lower Congo, a tendency in that direction is developing.

A request for concubinage made by a relative of the husband cannot be considered in the same category with the situation we have just examined. Such a request is more closely related to the request for an inherited wife (see Chapter III, Article II). The difference is obvious. The only thing the two situations have in common is the fact of legitimate cohabitation with another man's wife. One perceives this immediately upon comparing the two.

Article IX. The Family's Role in Marriage

[illegible] We have found that there are situations in which a woman is to some extent considered and treated as the wife not only of her husband, but also of certain of his relatives (Article VI). Moreover, we have seen in Chapter II the big role that the families play in the arrangement and continuation of their children's marriage. In discussing the question of the inheritance of wives, we have seen that the close relatives of the deceased have rights over the widow; one of them may marry her without any obligations toward the chief heir, and the new union is not a new marriage but a continuation of the previous marriage, which is not broken in spite of the first husband's death. A similar observation was made in relation to the practice of wife replacement (Chapter III, Article IV).

All this leads us to raise a question: To what extent does the family have collective rights over the wife? The following answer is the one which seems to me to conform to reality.

A wife is acquired by means of a payment of valuables. These valuables belong chiefly and in the first instance to the one who has obtained them, either through the marriage of his daughter or sister or through his own efforts. In the last instance, the husband has more direct and personal rights over his wife. In the first instance, the closer the husband's kinship with the woman who has furnished the bride price through her marriage, the stronger are her rights over the wife. Other members of the family, however, also have secondary rights over her in proportion to their position. For they are bound to the husband by ties of kinship as descendants of the same ancestor and therefore share in varying degrees the duties and rights of the moral entity based on a community of blood. [260]

The family's participation in the husband's rights is based on the one hand on the economic nature of the marriage agreement and, on the other, on the solidarity of clan and family.

That is why a marriage continues despite death. From the personal point of view it is broken -- so that, for example, the woman may subsequently become another person's legitimate wife, which she could not have done during the first marriage, but from the financial and social point of view it continues to exist. The same is true for wife replacement. As to the relations of a younger brother with his elder brother's wife, they are permitted only under certain conditions which are clearly defined and limited. This fact proves that the younger brother may only very inaccurately be termed "husband." The woman does not have two husbands; she has only one: the elder brother. The relations with the younger brother are permitted not as a personal tie, but only because of the community of financial interests between the brothers, and the elder's pity for his unmarried junior.

Everything considered, and despite all, a woman has only one husband. Taking into account the explanations given and the description of the formalities through which certain persons may intervene in their relative's household and the extent to which they may do so, it is apparent that a husband's rights over his wife are basically personal and exclusive in spite of his recognized prerogative to yield these rights to others.

Chapter VII

Polygamy

95 The Nkundó have no polyandry except for the few instances discussed in the last chapter which vaguely resemble it. The polygamy we are dealing with here is therefore polygyny, which is the general rule. Monogamy does exist but -- apart from extremely rare exceptions -- it is not voluntary. As soon as a monogamist has the means to acquire additional wives, he does not fail to take advantage of the opportunity. In spite of all the many sayings criticizing the difficulties involved in living peacefully with several wives, the Nkundó still try to build harems for themselves (afímbola ndongé, umba ndongé, "to line up a harem," "to fell a harem").

Polygamy in the grand style, lopango, is unknown. It would be interesting if government statistics were published concerning the proportion of polygamists to women who make up their harems. To the extent that one can tell by simple observation, the bigamists appear numerous. Ten wives is already a great number.

Only certain of the wives comprising a harem are called by special terms: the first wife (bomítsa), the favorite (nkínde), and the woman of rank (bolómbé), and to them the category of the bilóa may be added. The others are simply called baálí, "wives."

Article I. The Bomítsa

The bomítsa is the first wife the polygamist married. She is mistress of the house. She is responsible for the care and [342] supervision of the lofánjí (the area including the huts and annexes). It is to her house that the husband brings the game and the fruits of the palm trees and divides them. In the husband's absence, the duty and privilege of dividing them falls to her. She also settles quarrels among the wives that arise in his absence. If he goes away alone and is a long time in returning, she sends one of the other wives to take care of him and serve as his companion. Finally, she is supposed to try and increase the size and importance of the harem.

595 The bomɛ́tsa takes her task to heart, for her husband's glory is her own as well. The bomɛ́tsa is conscious of her role in spite of the presence of a favorite, for it is less that of a wife in the sexual sense of the word than of a wife who is mother of the family. It is of a higher order than the roles of the other wives; it is more serious, more unselfish, and based on a deeper love and a more deliberate will. According to the native point of view, it is rightly the source of a legitimate pride; it is an honor, while the position of the favorite is closer to an object of vanity. Therefore the bomɛ́tsa likes to show her importance.

It may seem strange to us that the bomɛ́tsa puts her heart into working to increase the number of women in the harem. But this is altogether natural for the Nkundó. The growth of the harem is a source of glory, and she has been brought up to this attitude since her youth. After the first order, her affection becomes more serious. She becomes a perfect matron in the Roman manner. Although she continues her relations with her husband and takes care of her children, she is chiefly occupied with her duties as mistress of the whole family. Her husband loves her with a deeper and more reasoned emotion than he shows toward his other wives. Without cease he shows his consideration and attachment for her. If she is sterile it is very likely that he will give her a child belonging to his family or born of a wife who has left him, so that she can bring it up as if it were her own.

362 The bomɛ́tsa's house is located at the right end of the row of wive's huts. She deserves this location because of her function as bomɛ́ngɔ́ lofɔ́jɔ́, "owner, mistress of the polygamist's compound. The Nkundó say: ɛ́tɛ́la lofɔ́jɔ́, "she stretches, or extends, her husband's group of dwellings in order to enlarge it."

595 A polygamous husband undertakes nothing of importance without first consulting the bomɛ́tsa (be it the creation of a bolɛ́mbɔ́ or a nkɛ́ndɔ́, or the acquisition of new wives, etc.). He respects her and treats her with deference, as if she were his mother, our people say.

[729] The bomɛ́tsa is the only one of all the polygamist's wives who plays a part in the acceptance of the Nkundó offensive and defensive 595x 789 magic known as yoli. She alone participates in the ceremonies that accompany it; with her husband she eats half of the hen that has been killed for that purpose, and on that night she alone may share his bed. Finally, only with her, to the exclusion of the co-wives, may the husband eat the fish called wengɛ́, and only she may and must burn the leavings. Otherwise the magical practice would turn against its owner.

595x [724] When a piece of game is divided, the bomátsa is entitled to the lintála (the lower portion of the breast), which would go to the man's mother (or his father's or his elder brother's wife) were he a bachelor.

In the bomátsa's absence, her place is taken by her ebísa (see below, Article IV) or by the wife who follows her in seniority. At her death, the same rules govern her succession.

The name bomátsa is probably derived from the root mátsa, "to begin." She is the one who founds the family. Sometimes she is also called ikɔ́kɔ́yɔ́njemba, literally "bachelor's love." The Bombwanja say itɔ́kɔ́yɔ́njemba (the Ekondà, nkámukolo).

In addition to the bomátsa, reference is sometimes made to [344] bomátsa w'ǐáli, or "bomátsa of the left." The bomátsa in the strict sense of the term is contrasted to the latter as bomátsa w'ǐlɔ́me ("of the right"). The bomátsa of the left is a polygamist's second [592] wife. She is given this name because her house is at the left end of the loánjá. She has no special rights or duties, however, unless the actual bomátsa delegates to her the task of looking after her end of the compound. If the harem is large, the husband may set aside [224] for her a special portion of the game, called itɔ́mbantáta, or nape of the neck. In her absence it goes to the eldest daughter.

Article II. The Favorite

595x 556 All polygamists of any importance have a favorite wife, or nkɔ́ndɛ́. But only the rich and the notables have a true nkɔ́ndɛ́. The minor polygamists, of course, imitate the others (nkɔ́ndɛ́ ɛ́â weɔ́lí or ɛ́â itsiɔ́, "without great importance"), but they do so without 595 great ceremonies because they lack the necessary wealth.

596 The bomɛ́tsa is never nkɔ́ndɛ́. But before he makes one of his wives a nkɔ́ndɛ́ a husband must ask the advice and approval of the [431] bomɛ́tsa. For that purpose he presents her with a bompɛ́ngɛ́ (a dog, a goat, some rings), which expresses his recognition of her right and authority and at the same time is intended to secure a favorable response. If the bomɛ́tsa does not agree, the matter is not followed through. But that situation is only hypothetical. In practice the bomɛ́tsa yields to her husband's preferences, since he has recognized her rights in the proper fashion.

When a husband wants to create a nkɔ́ndɛ́, he first makes all the preparations, brews the sugar-cane beer and collects all the riches that are to be distributed. Then he invites the neighboring villages and calls together his relatives. On the assigned day, the assembly having gathered, the chosen wife puts on her most beautiful garments and adorns herself with her richest ornaments. She [352] seats herself on a magnificent boɛ́nga [345] (a portable couch) (1) in front of the audience. Her husband then announces to those assembled that henceforth this woman is to be his favorite; woe unto the man who has the temerity to seduce her or even show affection toward her -- he will be a dead man (or he will have to pay an [684] enormous indemnity of 25 to 50 bakonga). In the past it often happened that a seducer was killed or reduced to slavery without further ado. When the husband has paid 25 rings or more to the wife's family and gifts have been distributed to the assembled patriarchs, his words are ratified by the assembly, and henceforth the contract between them and the husband is sealed. Dances, song, and drink follow.

[292] The favorite wears no special garb. She wears the same clothing as all the other women and wears furs only for dances.

1. See the excellent drawing in Engels, Les Wangata [The Wangata], (Revue Congolaise, Vol. 1, no. 4, p. 483, 1910).

595x She does no work in the farm or kitchen. She always has an ebísa to wait on her. If her family has no member they can let her have, she will borrow an ebísa from a distant relative or a friend.

A nkɔ́ndɛ́ does not travel on foot; she is carried in a hammock [492] (hunting net). Her husband accompanies her on foot, however. But [556] this was done only for a true nkɔ́ndɛ́ of a rich man, and the custom is disappearing today.

A favorite may not leave her husband, even to go and see her parents. In the past some men were so jealous of their favorites [514] that they would not allow them to satisfy even their most private needs unless they themselves or some sentinel (usually a Botswá) stood watch. A man could not even go into the vicinity of her hut, which is built just behind the husband's shed. For although the husband is sometimes tolerant of the passions of his other wives, he always shows [152] an intransigeant jealousy [346] in relation to his favorite. He never travels without having her accompany him.

The favorite has the honor of performing small personal serv- [515] ices for her husband; she cuts his hair, helps him in the removal of body hair, scratches his pustules from ringworm or prickly heat, anoints him with oil, paints him with ngɔ́la, and, in a word, performs all the tasks connected with his appearance and hygiene.

595x 766 Out of love for his favorite, her husband can buy her corpse for the price of a slave (in kind or in money). By doing so he obtains the right to have it buried beside his own while those of the other wives must be buried with their native clans. That is why in some regions a husband calls his favorite his ikundaka (from kunda "to bury"). Nevertheless, if her husband dies before she does, his heirs may not trouble themselves about his wishes and no longer require that the favorite be buried in their cemetery. That is what happened to Bongɔ́la of Bongíli, whose husband Ikilinganya of Bongangá (Boɛ́ndɛ́) had paid the price of two slaves for this right. When the husband has [224] killed large game, the favorite, like the bomátsa, has the right to receive her personal predetermined portion (boando). Her part is the neck or a chop, which in her absence, goes to the sons or their wives. The other wives do not have the same right; each one obtains only an ordinary piece (liondo).

595x Thus a favorite is in every way the object of her husband's [431] preference. He divides with her all presents he receives, while the other wives are not included in this expression of generosity.
[853] But in the matter of sexual relations, apart from his trips, he has obligations to all of them. The most he can do is to add one night to the usual number (see below).

The co-wives adapt fairly well to this preferential system. Nevertheless, there is a good deal of backbiting on account of it. It may also happen that one or another of the wives is jealous to the point of being unable to bear it. [347] The signs of her rancor [586] multiply, and a divorce results in the end.

The nkɔ́ndɛ́ does not have to go into mourning for anyone [765] other than her husband. Even then she does not remove her clothing. But she does not have to abide by mourning regulations either for her parents or her own children.

Like the other wives, the favorite is passed on through inheri-[587] tance. But she cannot be taken as a bosɔ́lɔ́ by anyone except an elder brother of the deceased.

595x Nkɔ́ndɛ́ is the specific term by which a favorite is designated.
192 Its etymology is unknown to me. The word is used everywhere, although the Injɔ́lɔ́ often say lokílo (whose etymology is equally obscure). Another less common (older?) term known to the Bonkoso, Bongili, Wɛ́ngatɛ́, and Bakɛ́ala is bongilɛ́ or bongijí (1). In addition to the term ikundaka, already cited, there is also the word ebɛ́lɛ́kɛ́, a generic term meaning "preference, predilection" or, when applied to a child or a slave, "an object one does not want to dispose of." The favorite is also called ɛ́fɔ́kɛ́tɛ́mɛ́, "untouchable," because other men may not have relations with her.

1. The Ekonda call the favorite bokɔ́lo. The Elanga of Losanganya say bofilɛ́, a name borne by certain women among the Nkundɔ́ between Jwalɛ́ and Boloko. Might this also be an old name?

595x 192 Qualifying expressions are sometimes added to the name nkónde: eâ boánga, referring to the boánga on which the favorite is seated during the ceremony in which her position is established, and eâ konjo, "true." The two terms are used as opposed to a nkóndé eâ weólí, whose position is established without any special ceremony, in imitation of a true, officially recognized favorite.

The expression for "making a nkóndé" is ója nkóndé, "to make a nkóndé come out," because she is proclaimed as such before the public gathering. Nowadays one often hears the expression téna nkóndé, a term which is very probably transferred from the bolúmbú. (See the next article.) [348]

Article III. The Bolúmbú

595x 554 The polygamist who by birth or influence is recognized as the primus inter pares of a group of clans and who, to use the Nkundó term, is jọkọ j'ésé (1) has the exclusive right to make one of his wives a bolúmbú. Therefore, doing so was not, as with a favorite, a matter of wealth and preference, but rather a mark of influence and authority.

In relation to this subject, here is a historical incident showing how an attack on this law resulted in a mysterious punishment, interpreted by the natives as an intervention from beyond the grave for the protection of the ancestral order. The events occurred at Besombó (Bombwanja), in the Bongilá family. Bonkoso w'Ílumwa had married Eyeke of Bokúma and by her had his eldest son [614] 1. Nowadays one would call him the chief. But actually he was not a chief; he was simply the most respected and influential member of the oligarchy of clan patriarchs. This oligarchy constituted the political administration of the Nkundó, and from time to time an eminent personality gained recognition within it.

596
557 Ikunjwɛ̂kulu. (2) But before her marriage to Bonkoso, Eyeke had already given birth to another boy, Mbɛ́o, whom she brought with her "in the shoulder strap." (3) Subsequently, Mbɛ́o acquired much wealth and built a large harem for himself. He wanted to show his important position and decided to make one of his wives a bolɔ́mbɔ́. Thereupon, his uterine brother Ikunjwɛ̂kulu became furious and called together the three other family heads of Besombɔ́: Elongama éâ Longɔ́mbɔ́ of Bokenda Embombɔ́ of Ikolɛ́, and Esola of Befɔ́sola. He said to them: "Come and see the extraordinary and astonishing thing that is happening. Mbɛ́o came with my mother in the shoulder strap. How then does he dare to create belɔ́mbɔ́?" They examined the facts and were very angry [349]. They called a meeting of all the family heads of all the neighboring villages in order to explain the case to them. Seated under the tree where the deliberations were held, all the men spent a long time awaiting Mbɛ́o's arrival. As he was too long in coming, one of his wives was sent to ask him to hurry. She found him dead, already quite stiff.

A bolɔ́mbɔ́ is created much later than a favorite, for a polygamist can attain the necessary social position only at a fairly advanced age.

The choice of a bolɔ́mbɔ́ is not a matter of preferential love. It is not a question of relations within the harem, but of the statement of the husband's social importance. Usually he chooses a woman who belongs to an influential clan and is a model of conjugal life and good breeding. She is certainly the object of special affection on his part, but not of a preference in love. Note again that the bomâtsa can never become bolɔ́mbɔ́, but she must be consulted and her opinion is decisive. Thus her own ebísa is often chosen as bolɔ́mbɔ́.

2. For his genealogy see Chapter III, Article II. A great-grandson of this Ikunjwɛ̂kulu is, I should say, approximately fifty years old.

3. See Chapter I, Part 2, Article IV, 3.

595* 554 On the day set aside for establishing the position of the bolɑ́mbɑ́, there is a great feast. All the clans and neighboring villages that have been invited gather at the home of the polygamist in question. He presents the woman to them and addresses the gathering: "Here is the woman whom I want to make my bolɑ́mbɑ́, as I have already announced to you. Today I am making public the decision I already made a long time ago. Be it known to all that no man may touch her, or he will be severely punished." Then two women (in rare instances, two men) hold the woman, and the husband unfastens her belt and rips off all her clothing. Then the assistants tie a rope or a belt of mpangá (striped antelope) skin around her, and to it they attach various furs. From that day [292] until her death she may no longer wear the clothing (bitóo) of other women; she must always [350] be dressed in furs. Hence her name, bolɑ́mbɑ́ wa bɑ́kótó, "bolɑ́mbɑ́ with furs." Then her husband gives her pots of palm oil with which she will have to cover herself. Two men approach her; they are chosen among the handsomest in the village (1) (married or single) and are

[609] 1. They are then (sic) relatives of the husband. Nkundó law dictates that no stranger shall perform a function of the slightest importance -- not even that of silencing a gathering. According to their saying, bofaya áfótẹle lokáanga, "a stranger does not cut up a guinea hen."

[301] richly adorned with furs, belts of mpangá, beads, raffia fabrics with jagged edges, copper rings on their ankles, etc. Stepping in rhythm, they lead her to the house intended for her which is [351] [324] surrounded by a fence of bofẹko posts (Ricinodendron africanum) held together with palms. This hut with its fence is called ilẹke.

There the bolɑ́mbɑ́ will reside for months and years (up to three or more, they say). She is secluded there, so to speak, [514] and may not go out. If she needs to go to the banana groves for her personal needs, she covers and surrounds herself with a mat so that no one will see her.

595ˣ that no one will see her. She lives in this house in the company 554 of her ebísa, her daughters, some female relatives, or even another of her husband's wives, who must wait on her, prepare food for her, etc., and who go out and enter freely. Her husband also enters at will and spends the usual number of nights with her. No other man is permitted to enter the enclosure.

During her period of seclusion, the bolɔ́mbɔ́ may not do the slightest work. She does not wash with water, but only with palm oil. She walks only on mats. She is also exempt from mourning for her parents. (Compare with Chapter I, Part 1, Article II.)

When the period of seclusion comes to an end, the husband announces the coming-out feast. There is merrymaking, dancing, and drinking. Mats are spread from the door of [351] the hut of seclusion all the way to the middle of the street. The two men who brought the woman to the hut come again and, taking her by the arms at the entrance to the enclosure, lead her over the mats. The ceremony thus ends without further ado.

The bolɔ́mbɔ́ is henceforth free and acts like any other woman except for the wearing of furs. She may work, draw water, cook, travel, visit her parents, etc. But her husband's [563] honor and his reputation as a rich man require that he give his [567] bolɔ́mbɔ́ one or several slaves, or Batswa, or -- as is more frequently done -- one or two bibísa, who are supposed to take [357] care of her housework and thus free the princess.

595ˣ Adultery with her -- after her seclusion -- is more 554 severely punished than misconduct with an ordinary woman as 837 regards the indemnity to be paid. But as a flagrant insult, it is 614 considered very serious indeed, not so much as an infringement or marital rights as an attack on the honor of the whole clan or group of clans involved. Thus, while adultery with a nkɔ́ndé, for instance, is a private matter, arousing the husband's jealousy and anger, misconduct with a bolɔ́mbɔ́ is a public offense. The whole clan is enraged -- for they believe that their honor has been attacked, and all the members together press for vengeance for

595x
554 this outrage (nkɛlɛ eleki ɛy'olɔ́mbɔ). It is a kind of national dis-
831 honor. This observation also clearly pinpoints the great differ-614 ence between the favorite and the bolɔ́mbɔ.

The following custom should be mentioned in this con-595x nection: if any man, even a stranger or one who comes from a
721 great distance, comes and -- over the fence -- strikes the roof
554 of a bolɔ́mbɔ's ilɛkɛ of seclusion with his elefɔ́ (1) as a call to war, the whole village is obliged to take up arms to defend him. All the men [352] accompany him and unite with his family against the enemy clan, whatever the distance may be. The Nkundɔ́ say that the act of touching the bolɔ́mbɔ's hut infuriates the entire clan and makes them take up arms without hesitation. (1)

595x
554 One last indication of the social nature of this institution is the fact that the bolɔ́mbɔ has the right to sit beside her husband at public gatherings and feasts, a prerogative which she alone of all women possesses. With her is a boy or girl who serves as her "boy" and carries the seat (boánga) on which she sits.

When a bolɔ́mbɔ dies her husband may put another in her place. To do so he repeats the ceremony described above. It is called sangoja bolɔ́mbɔ, "to make succeed to the title of bolɔ́mbɔ."

As we saw in Chapter I, Part 1, Article II, a man may even make his daughter a bolɔ́mbɔ.

Nkundu

595^x 554 The name bolɛ́mbɔ́ seems to come from the fact that for an instant during the installation ceremony the woman is naked. In fact in certain dialects the word means "nudity."

[557] Nowadays this name is common among Nkundɔ́ women (rarely men), but it does not indicate that they are bolɛ́mbɔ́. The name is borne in memory of ancestresses or relatives who had that position and is transmitted in the family like any other name.

[184] All the tribes under discussion here use the same term, bolɛ́mbɔ́. The Bombomba alone say boálɛ́. (2)

> 2. Elsewhere, as in the Losanganya region, among the Bosaka, etc., the bolɛ́mbɔ́ is called ekila (interdiction, taboo).

It is clear from everything that has been said that the nkɔ́ndɛ́ and the bolɛ́mbɔ́ have nothing in common with each other. [353] The two institutions are decidedly different. Nowadays they are beginning to be confused with each other, however. [178] For the installation of a bolɛ́mbɔ́ has become extremely rare, and in some regions it has already disappeared. The colonial government has established districts and appointed chiefs in charge of them. Very frequently, they are not those who in the purely indigenous order would have been the most influential men, the masters, those who would have the biggest say in their society, who would be said to have the joko, the first place.

As far as I have been able to observe, the other tribes on the equator also have the two types of wives with special positions, who bear names which vary with the dialects.

171 595^x 554 Do the Ntɔ́mbá and the Bolɛ́ngɛ́ between the Boloko and the Congo have only the bolɛ́mbɔ́? That is the conclusion one draws from Engels' study of the Wangata (Revue congolaise, Vol. 2, no. 1, p. 33). If that were so, the frequent contacts with this people may have increased the confusion even more. Natives who are strangers to the Bolɛ́ngɛ́ tribe but who have lived many years among them as catechists, have maintained, however, that 171 they distinguish very clearly between the bolɔ́mbɔ́ and the 595x favorite. They even added that the nkúmú enjoy no privileges

534 in this realm. (1)

> 1. The institution of the nkúmú is not very widespread among the tribes treated in our study. (See "Les Coutumes funéraires des Nkundɔ́ [Funeral customs of the Nkundo]," in Anthropos) (in press).

In the course of a visit I myself made to the western Bolɛ́ngɛ́ (in September, 1933), I learned that a man who had a special position could have two belɔ́mbɔ́; the bomɛ́tsa proposed her ebísa as candidate, and the second wife did the same for hers. Thus there was a bolɔ́mbɔ́ w'ìlóme and a bolɔ́mbɔ́ w'ìáli (the latter more especially called ekila. I also observed that they made a very clear distinction between bolɔ́mbɔ́ and [354] nkɔ́ndɛ́, just like the peoples treated in this study.

As to the function of messenger, which is attributed to the bolɔ́mbɔ́ by Engels (as well as by Father Kaptein, in Congo, 1922, Vol. 1, p. 532), it is not performed more by her than by any other woman in the harem. Any of them, without distinction based on rank or date of marriage, may be charged with a mission. The only custom of this sort which involves such a distinction is found among the Bolɛ́ngɛ́-Ntɔ́mbá living between the Congo and the Boloko. It is as follows: an influential [728] man sometimes sent his belɔ́mbɔ́ (one or two) to stop a quarrel, or even a battle between two villages. When she intervened, the opposing parties made a truce, pending the arrival and the decision of her husband in person.

Article IV. The Ebísa

595x An ebísa is a woman taken as wife by the husband of one 583x of her relatives -- a sister, aunt, or older cousin. The relative

595* [585] is the one who brings her to her husband and is, at the same time, ndonga for the payment of the bride price, which is made as for any woman. The expression is: X aôlutela bokúnɛ́ Y ebísa, "X repeats her sister Y ebísa."

In case of the elder's absence or upon her death, the ebísa replaces her or inherits all her rights in the household.

The elder relative cares a great deal about having her ebísa, because as a result she rises in her husband's estimation and she herself has an assistant in her work and a confidante in her troubles. The ebísa herself has the advantage of not being alone or abandoned at the beginning of her marriage, but of being able to count on a protector and guide, and if her elder occupies a privileged rank in the harem, she has the certainty of sharing her prerogatives and the likelihood of one day succeeding her. [355]

The term ebísa is used by the Nkundɔ́ between the Jwalɛ́ and the Boloko, and by the Ionda. The Bombwanja designate such a woman by the name loambwá or loambyá. The Boángɛ and the Injɔ́lɔ́ also call her loambyá. (1)

[184] 1. The Bonyanga say mbambwá or loambwá. Out of respect they sometimes call her bongíli and the woman who has brought her nyangôngíli. (See also Chapter II, Article X, and Chapter VI, Article VI.) The Ekonda call her bombúha or bombúsa (mbúsa, "last").

Ebísa may be related to the root bís, from which is de-[192] rived the verb bisingana, "to be united." Loambwá or loambyá are derived from bamb, which means: 1) "to be united" and 2) "to follow" (in order, in rank).

These names indicate the nature of this marriage that does not arise from direct relations between husband and wife but is established through the medium of another.preceding marriage. Or to express the situation in Lonkundɔ́: áfa liála j'ɛ̌ndɛ́ mɔ́ngɔ́, ámana l'eɔ́to mbamáná, "this is not a marriage which comes 595x from her personally; she attaches herself to her relative and follows her in her marital union."

The name ebísa, as well as the functions involved, may be improperly extended to a relative who is fetched by a woman so that she may become the wife not of her husband, but of one of his relatives. Sometimes she is even intended for a man who belongs to another clan, which is related by marriage, but for whom there is prohibition on marriage with the first clan. For instance, Bolɔ́mbɔ w'ɔ̌fuwa of Eleke (Lokongo) came to fetch her sister Eengɛ́ for Bompata w'iselema, who belonged to the Befɔ́sola clan which, like her husband's clan (Bombɛ́nga), was part of the village of Besombɔ́.

Article V. Slave Women

595x
567 In times past a polygamist could have one or several slaves in his harem whom he treated as wives. They were war prisoners whom he himself had captured, or had bought from others, or received as [356] bosɔ́ngo. As a rule no bride price was paid for them, and in leaving, they retained their status of slaves. This fact did not prevent a husband from loving them like real wives. But their rivals respected them less and, especially on the occasion of quarrels and disputes, reminded them of their inferiority.

[177] Since slavery has been abolished by colonization, many former slaves have returned to their respective families. Others, on the contrary, have not wanted to take advantage of the freedom granted them and have preferred to remain faithful. In such cases the husband paid the usual bride price for them with all the appropriate formalities. Only recently (1932) Ifolɛ, a [583] Belondɔ́ man (Bonjoku) thus paid a bride price of 63 bakonga to his wife Ǎmbɔ's family. Ǎmbɔ was originally from Bokukɔ (Boɔ́ngɛ) but had been abducted at the beginning of the European occupation. Ifolɛ had inherited her from Bakɔ́nongo of the Basɛ́kɔ Mbangɔ́ (Bonkoso) thanks to the intervention of his great-uncle Mpetsɛ who had paid 7 rings on his behalf as the customary bompɔ́ngɔ called nsɔ̌sangɔ́.

585 A slave woman may be chosen as a favorite. Since this choice is a matter of preference, there is no reason why not. This is not true of the rank of bolɔ́mbɔ́, which can never be attained by a slave, as an examination of this eminent position clearly shows. The following slave women are cited among those who were made nkɔ́ndɛ́ by their husbands: Bolɔ́nge by Bakengɔ́ ba Lokolí of Nsekɛ́; Bokɛ́tu by Ekányaka ɛ́y'ondɔ́kɔ́ of Etɔ́ontálɛ́; Ntsimbo by Bombengɛ́lá of Etɔ́ontálɛ́.

When a polygamist felt a very special love for a slave, and had the means to do so, he would enfranchise her and then pay a regular bride price for her. In order for this to happen the woman's family had to intervene, either on its own initiative or by invitation of the husband. Once the ransom was paid, the woman was free. She returned home, and her husband followed her to pay the bride price; thus she became a regular wife on the same basis [357] as any other woman. The procedure was the same whether the slave had been captured personally by the husband or had been bought or acquired as part of a bride price or by some other means.

Such was the case of Bolɔ́mbɔ́, daughter of Boɛ́kwá of Boɛ́ndɛ́ (Bombwanja), who was taken by Esalɛ́ of Ekɔ́kola and bought by Efoloko of Lofelí. She was enfranchised at her father's initiative, and he subsequently married her off in a regular fashion. Another case was that of Etáka, daughter of Elongama ɛ́a Longɔ́mbá of Besombɔ́, who was married to Bonyongela of Bowɛ́lɛ́. During a war she was taken prisoner by Betɔ́kɔ́ of Ekɔ́kola, who wanted to marry her properly and therefore contacted Elongama. The latter arranged the matter of the ransom and took his daughter with him. Then Betɔ́kɔ́ went to Besombɔ́ to pay the bride price. (1)

[727] 1. Almost all slave women were reduced to their condition, directly or indirectly, because of a war. If they were already married, their marriages were considered as dissolved. Under the circumstances it

> 567 595x 727 could not be otherwise. In such

Since, at present, slavery has been abolished, ransom can no longer be paid. A master who wishes to enfranchise a slave woman who has remained faithful to him, simply gives her family the bride price and then goes with his wife to her home to receive the dowry.

Article VI. Life in a Harem

595x Wives of the same husband address each other among themselves as bakalɛ́ (sing. bokalɛ́). Their husband calls them all baálí, [358] "wives." All except for true slaves are married by means of a bride price. A woman's sons call their mother's bakalɛ́ baálí, "wives," but out of respect toward the older ones

595x at least, they use the name banyangɔ́, "mothers." Daughters use only the second term. (See Chapter VI, Article VI.)

A polygamist may have a house of his own, but he is often 592x satisfied with a shed, where he spends his days when he is not 595 called elsewhere by his pursuits; he eats his meals there, receives his guests, etc. This shed is called ingɔ́mba (or esamba), (1) exceptionally jɔjá. The last term refers to the location of this "parlor," which is by itself in front of the row of wives' huts, sometimes in the middle of the street; in rare cases it is placed on the opposite side of the street, facing the women's huts.

Each woman has her own hut, consisting of a fairly large area, open in front, which serves as a kitchen, and a smaller room with a bed. Or she may have a kitchen in the form of a shed, and a separate house a slight distance away which serves as a bedroom.

The huts are placed in a row stretching around both sides of the husband's house, if he has one. The nkɔ́nde's house is right next to the husband's or behind his shed. The bomátsa's is at the far left, and so on. The bolúmbú has no special place. The ebísa's hut is next to her relative's.

Some polygamists are beginning to build double houses. On each side of a common kitchen there are the bedrooms of two women under the same roof. This has been done by Bokwála, the present chief of the Boángɛ́ at Bokála (2). In each double hut he has placed one elderly woman and a younger one. Thus, he explained to me [359] one day, the old ones watch over the young ones, and as a result there are fewer instances of adultery.

595x A husband has obligations toward all his wives. He must bring firewood to each and take care that each one has her land to

---

1. Depending on the dialect. For other names, see Chapter VI, Article III, 3, note.

2. Since deceased.

595x cultivate. Whatever food he has been able to obtain (from hunting and fishing, the fruit of palm trees, etc.) must be impartially distributed by the bomátsa. He is required to eat food prepared by each one, either on the same day or, more frequently, each in turn.

595x 833 The same holds true for their intimate relations. He must divide his nights equally among them all and in turn (-kafa mpóngó). Usually he spends three or four nights with the same one. He is not allowed to favor one wife over another. He may add an extra night to the usual number only in favor of the bomátsa or the favorite. If he wants to have continuous relations with the favorite, he goes on a trip with her for a real or invented reason.

Partiality is sharply criticized and gives rise to violent domestic quarrels. It may result in the breaking up and dispersion of the harem. It is very badly tolerated, especially in sexual matters. The husband must therefore watch himself carefully and respect the rights of each and every one. Exceptions are made only with regard to women who occupy a special rank in the harem, and then only with respect to the privileges or duties that go with the position.

On their set nights, the women go to cohabit with their husband in his house. He seldom goes to their houses unless he has no hut of his own. Each wife knows her turn, and none of them are ashamed to let the others know when it comes. On the contrary, it is sometimes in their interest to do so.

595x There is no sharing of property among co-wives except in the case of a bibísa. Each one takes care of her own household, does her own cooking, cares for her own children, cultivates her [360] own crops. Each one has her own tools and utensils. They may help each other if they wish to, however. Especially for fishing they often go together, particularly for scooping ponds.

Article VII. Monogamy

The Nkundó do not esteem monogamy. It is polygamy 595x that they desire. If a man has only one wife, that is because he 522 is poor. Thus he is made fun of and called etula or bololé, "a nobody," or bosó, "a weak man." Songs dealing with this theme [533] can often be heard during drinking parties, especially among the Elinga. All this is a great obstacle in the struggle against polygamy. Not only is the Nkundó tempted by the material ad-[152] vantages of polygamy, but he is unable to bear teasing. He is extremely sensitive to humiliation and is the slave to other men's respect.

In spite of all this, and apart from the influence of the 595x Christian religion, monogamous marriages that were not simply imposed by necessity but were spontaneously desired, have existed in the past and still exist, although they are extremely rare. Here are the names of a few men who wished to remain united to one woman, although they had the means to establish a harem for themselves. I have chosen them at random from two villages: Bonjoku-Bonkoso (27 taxpayers in 1931) and Bongíli wǎ Ndongó together with the affinally related clan Ilekó (47 taxpayers in 1931).

Bonjoku-Bonkoso:

Esalé éâ Ekutu of Bokenyola married to Iombe of Nkélengo;
Bokató of Bokenyola married to Wanga of Likolí;
Bofanga w'ǒfónge of Bokenyola married to Baléngola;
Itéé yǐ Lokékola of Bofétola married to Nkúmú of Bongale.

All died before 1895.

Bongílí:

Nsenge (still alive) married to Toyôngwa of Elánga. Even when he was widowed, he did not want to remarry, because of his attachment to his deceased wife.
Efoloko éâ Bonkóngyá married to Bambóla of Boálá;
Bongelé married to Bakóko of Bompángá;
Bolómbe w'embengá married to Bokelé of Ekóla;
Lofalanga of Ilekó mǎrried to Imote of Besombó. After his wife's death, he remained a widower until he himself died.

515 The others remarried after the deaths of their wives, but always actually remained monogamous, like Eanga ɛâ Jatâ of Nkɛlengo, who is now married for the third time.

If you ask natives why they want to remain monogamous in spite of their wealth and in the face of the fact that all the polygamists make fun of them, they will answer, "I want only one wife."

"But, after all, why do you want only one?"

Bosísɛ wǎ Njakomba, "God has so ordained," that is, "God has made me this way."

There is no term to denote monogamy. However, a woman who is her husband's only wife is called impɔ́mbonjemba, a word the last segment of which means "bachelor." A monogamist is sometimes called yunama, a noun derived from the verb unama, "to be inclined, bent toward," because he is always leaning toward the woman, who is continually at his side. The term is used to tease him, but figuratively it very well expresses the special affection of the husband for his wife, and which deserves to be preserved and honored in this way. [362]

Article VIII. The Women's Attitude Toward Polygamy

Before the arrival of the Europeans, polygamy met with no opposition or contradictions of any kind. It was considered an entirely natural and normal condition. I imagine that the Nkundɔ́ who heard the first attacks on this deep-rooted custom must have been more than astonished. But it is difficult to tell what the women thought in those past times. Thus we will do better to examine current present-day facts in order to deduce what they now think of their position in the harem, although from the psychological standpoint this is a very delicate question.

Note first of all that it is impossible to give a general rule; all men are not made from the same pattern. There are women who like to be part of a harem. Others prefer monogamy, either because they oppose being handed over to a man who is already married, or after coming to blows with their husband, they make 595 arrangements for a regular marriage with a lover, or they leave the polygamist under the protection of the Whites to go to a center or a mission.

1. A preference for monogamy

595 797 We will not deal with daughters of Christian parents under this heading, in order not to falsify the problem, which we are discussing from the psychological, not the religious point of view.

1) Women who oppose being handed over in marriage to a man who is already married are rare. It is possible that such a refusal is due to one of the following causes: the desire to be bolɔ́mbɔ (or ɛ́fɔ́tswɛ̂ɛla), (1) a natural desire for complete freedom, an antipathy for the suitor, or an abnormal constitution. Such cases must be [363] eliminated, since they prove nothing for or against the question raised.

But there are other instances where marriage is clearly postponed for the sake of entering into a monogamous union. Yet, under present circumstances, the desire to embrace the Christian religion is almost never absent. I have known several cases of adult single women who came to the mission to be married there while preparing for baptism. Most of them did not have the courage to persevere, however.

A greater number remain with their parents even if they want to be admitted to the Church. The life of single women at the mission is not exactly the easiest, either from the material viewpoint or as regards freedom. For even a sincere desire to participate in a monogamous union does not exclude human weakness or constitute a certificate of saintliness. These girls remain subject to the impulsiveness of their passions. It is quite true that even at the mission they can find the means to satisfy it, for it is impossible to watch over them to such a point that they would be unable to escape. But precisely because of this surveillance, which is close in spite of everything, they cannot freely let themselves go. While at home no one pays any

1. See Chapter I, Part 1, Article II, and Part 2, Article III.

595x 797 attention to their deviations, at the mission the discovery of any misconduct results at least in a reprimand, which is always disagreeable, and often in a fairly long postponement of the baptism they ardently desire. Therefore these women usually prefer to circumvent the difficulty by waiting until a young man who is Christian or a catechumen asks for them in marriage.

595x 2) Most girls do not oppose polygamy. Education and traditional custom do not lose their power in a few years. Besides, the girls are often not really aware of the exact situation at the time they are asked for in marriage. Later, [364] when polygamous life no longer satisfies them, they try to arrange a marriage with a bachelor.

[797] In a number of cases the decisive reason is the desire to become Catholic. In others, religion does not enter into consideration. Only those can be examined here, for the value of the first group is greatly reduced by the presence of the religious motive.

If a woman leaves her husband because of personal antipathy to him or certain of her co-wives, and not because of any opposition to the system of polygamy, she takes the easiest and most direct way out by going to another polygamist, who has the means for repaying her bride price. This occurrence is more frequent than the preceding ones. Therefore we can make a division between the two possible situations and conclude that a preference for monogamy is present when a woman leaves a polygamist to marry a bachelor.

3) Other women take advantage of the freedom that colonization has produced by going to live with a bachelor in one of the centers. There may be a variety of motives behind such an action: a desire for luxury, a desire to be united to a man whom they love but who does not have the necessary wealth to marry them in the usual fashion, or a real desire for a monogamous union. (1) Today the last reason is rather rare.

1. At the present time the flight toward the centers has already become difficult, 595x but it is still possible. Everything depends on the degree of surveillance of the authorities. In large settlements their task is not always easy.

4) A woman who abandons her polygamous husband and asks to be admitted to a mission may be motivated either by an aversion to polygamy or by a religious reason. First of all, we must make a distinction here between Catholic and Protestant missions. For if the woman goes to a Protestant mission, it is possible that only the first motive is involved. [365] For the Protestant mission accepts wives of polygamists for baptism without requiring them to break with the custom. Only the husband is excluded. (1) Therefore, they do not leave him when they become Christian but continue participating in the life of the harem as before. Thus, if any of them go to the Protestant mission all the same, we can conclude that they do so solely out of a preference for monogamy. But I do not know whether such cases actually occur, or in what proportion. It is to be hoped that a Protestant missionary will examine this exceedingly interesting question.

With reference to the Catholic missions, one or the other of the two motives may be involved. Usually both are present in the same person, for the Catholic religion does not permit polygamy either on the part of man or woman. According to the colonial law of the Congo, a woman has the right to break a polygamous union for the sake of a monogamous one. The polygamist's wife who asks to live at the mission wants to become Catholic and at the same time to contract a monogamous marriage. She has both objectives in mind. Persons of this sort must therefore be excluded from our discussion. As a matter of

U

1. I am speaking only of the specific region with which we are dealing in this study. Therefore, generalizations should not be made from these statements.

595x [787] fact, women who do not wish to become Catholic take the paths described in 2) and 3).

5) There are even women who prevent their husbands from becoming polygamous. If he loves them a great deal, he will yield in the end, even if personally he would very much like to build a harem for himself. This was done by Mputɔ́ (recently deceased, February 3, 1933), wife of Bofɛ́nda, chief of Ekɔ́kola. Bofɛ́nda was rich and tried more than once to acquire other wives. He even took them home and paid the bride prices -- for example, for Iloa of Bongíli. But Mputɔ́ made life unbearable for them and thus forced them to leave. She absolutely wanted to keep her husband, [366] to whom she had given two boys and three girls, for herself alone.

We can therefore conclude that among a minority of Nkundɔ́ women there exists a real preference for monogamy, even if we leave out of consideration all those who may be impelled by religious reasons. But most of them are in no way opposed to polygamy.

2. A preference for polygamy

Most Nkundɔ́ women like polygamy and prefer it to monogamy. They make fun of a impɔ́mbonjemba and are proud of the large number of wives in their husbands' harems.

Their indifference or aversion to monogamy can be explained on the basis of habit or atavism. But what is the basis for their marked preference for polygamy despite all its disadvantages? I asked this question of a number of polygamists' wives. Naturally, they first invoked the custom, (1) except for those who had known me for a long time. But the serious reason they gave was the greater comfort of life in a harem.

[609] 1. This is the standard explanation a native hands out to a foreigner or to someone he does not know or by whom he thinks he is unknown.

595* Since there are many wives, they have much less work in preparing the husband's food, regardless of whether the co-wives divide the days among themselves or cook for him every day. Therefore, the fields they have to prepare and care for are less extensive, there is less firewood to fetch, less manioc to soak, fewer vegetables to grow, etc. On the other hand, if a monogamous husband has visitors, his wife's work never ends.

In addition to this reason there is another, which is not admitted but is given categorically by impartial natives; it is freedom or license. The wife of a monogamist is always bound to her husband and can absent herself [367] only with difficulty. Her husband wants to have her near him, both for food and for conjugal relations. A polygamist's wife is a good deal freer. Even her prolonged absence does not disturb her husband unless he suspects infidelity or is excessively jealous. Furthermore, [837] since the various wives have their specific nights, she has more freedom to give herself to her lovers. For many wives this is the chief reason for their preference for polygamy -- we are speaking, of course, of the situation today.

Article IX. Children of a Polygamist

The various children of a polygamist live with their respective mothers, who must provide their sustenance and bring them up. Usually the other wives are strangers to them, and their contacts with them are not much more frequent than with the other women in the village. If a special affection binds their mother to her co-wives, children also become involved, just as they are involved in the antipathies, dissensions, and rivalries of the harem. Usually they respect their father's wives, especially the elderly ones. But later a boy may allow himself to be carried away by passion and have illicit relations with one of the younger wives.

595 Since each child remains with its own mother, and the father visits her only intermittently, a child's affection for the father will be less than that for the mother. The larger the harem, the greater the distance between the children and their father. Nevertheless, they respect and love him, and some of them may become very much attached to him. But paternal authority and affection develop with much more difficulty than in a monogamous household.

Among themselves the children treat each other as brothers and sisters. But children of the same mother have a much more intimate love for one another [368] than for the rest. Each wife's children form a small separate group, more united among themselves. All their lives they make a distinction between "brothers and sisters through the father" and "brothers and sisters through the mother." But apart from this difference, they love each other truly and sincerely. Certainly, the rivalries of their respective mothers are communicated to them, but once a matter is settled the incident is closed, and they continue to feel that through their father they are of the same blood.

In the more or less distant future, their posterity will form separate and distinct families because, although they are children of the same father, they were born to different mothers. In the tribes under discussion, the rank their female ancestors occupy in the harem produces no special distinctions among their posterities, as is true among other Nkundɔ́ groups (for instance the Boyɛ́la, where a distinction is always made between ilɔ́me and iɛ́li families (that is, families of the left and right). The distinction on this subject made by Father Schebesta (in Vollblutneger und Halbzwerge, p. 234) is erroneous. The term etɔ́o and nkɛ́sɛ́ have only the first meaning he assigns to them, that is "male line" and "female line."

The children of a wife and those of her ebísa are considered uterine brothers and sisters. Therefore -- even after their mothers' death -- they continue like them to receive the same single portion in the division of game, etc.

595x 554 In little domestic quarrels, the bomátsa's children like to take advantage of the top rank occupied by their mother. Later, they will have the right to priority, before their brothers, in matters of inheritance and family authority.

595x 567 578 The children of slave women are loved by their father in the same way as their brothers and sisters. However, they are often the object of manifestations of contempt and humiliation on the part of others, especially verbal ones, but only when disputes arise. In particular, they have to submit to the insult of having it said [369] that they are without bonyangó, "a maternal clan." This is one of the most serious insults that can be inflicted by a Nkundó. Nevertheless, their father protects them as much as he can.

[428] The child of a slave woman has no right to an inheritance. Clearly, he lacks for nothing. But he has no political rights, even if he is his father's first-born.

595x 567 The posterity of a slave are not considered as such in matrimonial matters, as we have pointed out in Chapter V, Article II. If the groups descended from free women are extinct, the rights of the clan are inherited by the posterity of a slave, to the exclusion of related clans whose ancestors were entirely free.

595x What is the effect of the system of polygamy on the birth rate? There has been much debate on this question for it is very difficult to answer. Complete statistics well compiled from detailed methodical lists would be necessary. For it is a fact that in many monogamous households the woman is the former wife of a polygamist and for that reason can no longer be counted as a monogamist's wife. In addition it would be necessary to exclude from monogamous households those women who did not marry until an advanced age, after having lived freely for a fairly long time, for example in the centers.

In my opinion the birth rate is endangered above all by the need for individual love and the difference in the ages of the spouses, which is inseparable from the system of polygamy as it now exists. The polygamist's wife instinctively seeks another

595 man who corresponds better to her heart's desires. In the past, at least in small-scale polygamy, the situation was not the same as it is today. Because of the constraint of traditional laws, limited freedom, lack of good communications, a husband's respect for his young wife's body and the lack of venereal diseases, conditions must have been much more favorable to the birth rate. [370]

Article X. Causes of Polygamy

Under this title we can deal with two quite different and distinct things: 1) the motives that push the Nkundó toward polygamy; 2) the causes that led to the origin of that practice.

The first question can be answered through a methodical observation of facts. The second, on the contrary, is in the realm of history. Thus the two do not coincide in any way, and it would be a mistake to confuse them.

Only the ethnographic problem falls within the framework of this study. But our conclusions can help to explain the historical documents, if any exist, or to clarify a hypothesis concerning the origin of the practice in the past.

What are the reasons by which the Nkundó justify practicing polygamy? They are: 1) social influence, 2) fame, 3) concern over keeping the capital in the family, 4) precautions against a wife's illness, death, or divorce, and 5) the desire to increase the number of children.

595 556 1) A man's social influence grows in proportion to the number of his wives, for they and their children's marriages increase the number of his affinal relationships with other clans. These strengthen his military position. Furthermore, through the system of official concubinage -- which is impossible in a monogamous system -- he can secure dependents.

The more wives a man has, the more he is respected, listened to, and feared. This correlation is neither necessary nor infallible, however, for a polygamist of weak character may have 595x 556 less influence than a monogamist or bigamist who is intelligent and fearless. And in the present circumstances one meets monogamists who, because of either their economic situation or their social or political position, enjoy a much greater authority [371] than many polygamists. Intellectual and moral superiority on their part is beginning to make its value felt.

2) Fame and vanity. Because of the very nature of the marriage system, which is intimately bound to -- not to say based on -- financial transactions, the number of wives determines the extent of a man's wealth. And here as everywhere wealth has a fascination; it is considered a mark of superiority. Vanity seizes upon it. And since the possession of wives is the most obvious expression of wealth, the Nkundó see it as a superior means by which to acquire great renown and an illustrious name.

3) A concern over keeping the capital in the family. Personal wealth consists almost entirely of metals (especially copper) and domestic animals. Thus this is the capital involved in the financial transactions accompanying marriage, and in that way it is invested with interest (children, work, influence).

595x 556 157 Like all pagan people the Nkundó are essentially covetous and egoistic. They do not like to give but want everything for themselves. Except for persons to whom he is bound by natural ties or sincere affection, a Nkundó does not help others except through interdependence or in the hope of reciprocity in some form or other. Thus when he possesses an excess of wealth, even [431] if it is considerable and entirely superfluous, he does not yield it. The idea would never occur to him to give a few copper rings to an indigent bachelor, for example, if he is not forced to do so because of interdependence in the family. Thus, if there are more girls than boys, the excess bride price will be used by him to augment the number of his own wives. For in order that his daughter not be deprived of her nkita, the bride price received must be used again as a bride price. Note that this reasoning has but a limited validity. It is a fact that the ancient custom [372] was for the father to take all his daughters' bride prices for himself, as we have seen in Chapter IV. He did not become polygamous because of excess [bride price] ; he was polygamous before his sons married.

595x 556 Even if a fortune was acquired through a man's own efforts, he would reproach himself if he did not make productive use of it for himself. And under the circumstances the surest investment is in a harem.

Finally, since a wife represents financial value, the Nkundó likes to inherit those of his deceased relatives in order to incorporate them in his own harem or to obtain the means of enlarging it by means of them.

That is the explanation for the Nkundó statement that the wealth of the family (lokutu) cannot pass into the hands of strangers. It is not only a personal desire that impels them to act in that manner; but they feel the collective will of the family behind them. And in this will, as well as in the reprimands and the teasing which are inevitably the consequences of a more independent attitude, lies one of the chief causes of so much backsliding on the part of men who seem permanently won over to the practice of monogamy.

595x 4) A precaution against accidents, such as illness, death, or divorce. This reason is often given: "What would I do," they say, "if I had only one wife, and one day she fell ill, left me, or died? I would be alone. There would be no one to take care of me or feed me. The Whites have their "boys," but we Blacks have only our wives." This reasoning is not without validity, but it does not seem to express the whole truth for, although nothing surpasses his own home for meals, a bachelor can always count on the kind assistance of his female relatives and sisters-in-law. The chief argument is more from the sexual angle. [373] It is not unusual to find women who advise their husbands to take a second wife for that reason. In case of divorce or death the difficulty can be solved through remarriage. But this imposes a certain delay for the collection of bride-price valuables and, above all, for the negotiations. In the case of illness the difficulty is much greater.

In any case, such accidents cannot justify true polygamy, for bigamy or trigamy would be quite sufficient to avoid the inconveniences cited. And yet no one seems to be satisfied with two or three wives when he has the means to acquire more.

595* 842 5) The desire to increase the number of children is one of the reasons most frequently given; it is the chief, and sometimes the only, one cited by ethnographers. There is no question that it has a great deal of validity, for the Nkundó like to have many children. It is one of the things on which they pride themselves as well as a powerful means for reinforcing a social position (and we are thus led back to the first reason cited).

The question of knowing whether polygamy actually does favor the birth rate is irrelevant here, even if the results of a comparison were clearly against this system and were it proved that "the more wives a polygamist has, the fewer children he has." For the Nkundó never make this statistical computation. He sees only the principle: several women give more children than one. And for them, that is the gist of the matter. Furthermore, the interest of the people as a whole does not appear on the [151] horizon of the Nkundó's thoughts and feelings: they think only of themselves, and in their egoism, they consider only their own interests.

595* 831 6) To all these reasons given by the Nkundó to justify the practice of polygamy, we must add a sixth, which they never mention, sensuality. Without colonization it would have been difficult for us to make this statement. [374] But the new state of affairs shows several flaws in our people's arguments. We have already pointed out some of them. Furthermore, all the reasons mentioned up to now do not suffice to account for the existence of polygamy. They do not explain why in the past the old men wanted to keep all the women to themselves, or why a given individual becomes a polygamist. It is a fact that for more than one man none of these alleged reasons have been involved. It is also known that several natives have acquired fortunes by European work (as clerks, salesmen, traders, etc.) in order to be able to establish a harem, though there could have been no motive of vanity or gain in social influence. On the basis of my knowledge of circumstances, persons, and places, I am convinced that even for some natives living in their villages, the primary purpose was clearly sexual. I am acquainted with more than one such case.

595 831 x And it is not difficult to understand this fact. For indeed polygamy constitutes a legitimate and easy means by which a man may enjoy several women without being bothered by palavers, difficulties, etc. The mentality of many men who care little about moral laws as well as the tendency of a disordered instinct to multiply its objects only confirm this observation. Often one sees men who were monogamists at first begin by taking a second wife out of passion. Then gradually their passion becomes greater rather than appeased, and so a harem is built up progressively.

595 178 x The changes introduced by colonization in the economic life of this people have not resulted in a decrease of polygamy. In the absence of exact figures we must be satisfied with simple visual observations, but in certain regions one has the impression that the harems have become smaller but, on the other hand, that the number of polygamists has increased, and therefore [375] the desire for polygamy, that is, its affective cause, has [651] not diminished. Nor does the extra tax frighten or stop the polygamists. The great means for changing the Nkundó attitude in this realm will always be the action of the missions and the penetration of Christian ethics, seconded by a government attitude favoring monogamy. (1)

[648] 1. The favorable attitude of the colonial government toward monogamy is expressed chiefly in the permission given to a polygamist's extra wives to abandon their husband in order to contract a monogamous union, preferably in a mission, under the supervision of missionaries.

[177] Another means, undoubtedly secondary but still important, is the example of European couples. The Blacks are imitative, and native women envy the lot of the white woman, so that European households are propaganda for monogamy when they behave well.

Chapter VIII

Divorce

586 × In Nkundó law there are two ways of breaking up a marriage. divorce and death. We will discuss these in two separate chapters.

In divorce a marriage is dissolved either through a reimbursement of the bride price or the substitution of another wife.

[768] In the case of death, on the other hand, there is no bride price reimbursement; the wife's death ipso facto dissolves the marriage. The husband's death, on the contrary, does not dissolve it; it is continued with the widow until her own death or until divorce. (1)

1. This statement is to be understood in accordance with the explanation given in Chapter III, Article IX.

Article I. Reasons for Divorce

The Nkundó believe that a marriage can be dissolved. This cannot be done freely at the desire of the contracting parties but must conform to a procedure an essential component of which is the participation of the ndonga. It cannot be dissolved because of trivialities, but only for serious reasons, or at least reasons that appear serious to the natives.

The valid reasons for divorce can be reduced to the practical impossibility of the couple's continuing to live together, such as. 1) serious and repeated failures to fulfill conjugal duties, and especially any incorrigible tendency to adultery; 2) an incompatibility of temperaments which results in disputes, quarrels, and rows; 3) a grave and incurable illness. /377/

The first two causes inevitably lead to divorce. In the case of the third, a distinction must be made between a husband's illness and his wife's.

If the husband is ill and his wife abandons him for that reason, the divorce becomes complete when she remarries.

586ˣ 672 If the wife is ill she may have become ill at her husband's home or elsewhere and these two possible situations must be considered separately. In the first instance there is no cause for divorce, since responsibility for her illness rests entirely with the husband. On the other hand, if the wife contracted her illness while staying with her family, the family must shoulder the responsibility, and if her illness is incurable, the husband can have recourse to divorce. But this is not so if the wife has gone to her parents' home in response to her husband's express order, or if she ran away from the husband's for reasons which are just and reasonable. Some situations may give rise to violent disputes. Such is the case, for example, of an illness during a visit undertaken at the wife's own initiative but for the good of the husband. Theoretically, he should win the case. Also, a stay of twenty-four hours is not considered sufficient to place the responsibility for the illness on the wife's family. (1)

1. For details see Chapter VI, Article III, 3 and 4. See also Chapter IX, Article X.

586ˣ The difference between the consequences of the husband's illness and his wife's is of a practical nature. A husband who suffers from an incurable illness or one that takes too long to cure is usually (though not always) abandoned by his wife. If no other man pays a bride price for her, the marriage continues. If the woman finds a lover, he pays the bride price, which is turned over to the first husband, completing the divorce. But it is not possible to say that the man's illness per se is a cause of divorce, for the wife is under an obligation to take care of a sick husband. [378] But in practice neither of the two families involved demand the application of this law. All yield to the wishes of the woman, who will refuse to continue a union that has so little attraction for her.

Thus illness is not a legally valid reason for divorce. But in practice it is recognized as a situation that can result in the dissolution of a marriage.

[842] Although the Nkundó ardently desire children, sterility

586ˣ 842 is not invoked as a reason for divorce. Yet there are many sterile women. To obtain the fulfillment of his desires, a man will have recourse to polygamy. He will try to obtain the valuables he needs in order to acquire another wife. If he does not have the financial means, he could make life difficult for his wife through petty annoyances and meanness of the kind that are not likely to place him in the wrong. In that way he could drive her into leaving him, and thus recover the cost of the bride price. But such behavior is only hypothetical; it could happen here and there, but I know of no instance. In any case a husband never invokes sterility in order to break up a marriage. Therefore, contrary to what happens elsewhere, the question is not raised in Nkundó law.

586ˣ Included among the factors that make the continuation of marriage impossible is a husband's violations of sexual prohibitions during pregnancy or after childbirth, exposing the wife to mortal danger. For through his misconduct the husband becomes guilty of an implicit repudiation, and the wife's father will make use of his right to protect his child's life. (1)

1. See Chapter X, Article II, 3.

The remaining reasons are those given at the beginning, which can be reduced to the impossibility of continuing the marriage due to an incompatibility of temperaments, the cooling of love, serious offenses, especially if repeated, [379] serious and continual failures in the performance of duties, and faults that dishonor the culprit. (1) The habit of stealing, in particular, must be mentioned in this last category. Women who steal, even small things like manioc, fish, or meat, end in provoking most husbands' antipathy

1. For example, adultery with a relative by marriage -- see Chapter VI, Article V, 2, and Chapter V, Article IV, no. 2., ex. 17.

586x if they do not break themselves of this fault and, then, are detested. The result is endless palavers and quarrels, which inevitably lead to divorce. For this failing is considered very shameful. Note that laziness or heedlessness in a spouse may also lead to divorce.

Divorce is frequent among the Nkundó. These people do not try to correct their failings by the imposition of any restraints. As initial love gradually becomes less passionate, continual daily contact makes the less agreeable sides of a person's temperament more apparent. And when it is not tolerated or gives rise to serious wrongs, the marriage inevitably breaks up. There are more divorces in marriages by inheritance and substitution than in marriages through a direct payment of the bride price.

The preceding data show that although the legitimacy of divorce is accepted in Nkundó law, its acceptance exists only because it is necessary, so to speak. As a matter of fact, before a situation reaches that point, the difficulties have been obvious for a long time, and the parents and especially the ndonga will have had to intervene more than once in order to re-establish the troubled peace and strengthen the tottering union. They only give in when there is no possibility of settlement. [380]

Article II

Ways of Dissolving a Marriage

586x
178 The simplest and ideal manner of dissolving a marriage, so to speak, is a separation with the consent of the families involved and especially of the ndonga. At the present time it is the only procedure -- except for running far away -- that is permitted. Since the reorganization of districts, however, the chiefs and the courts have more and more monopolized, or had assigned to them, the function of official witnesses. (1)

---

1. It is not my intention to deny the right of the chief and the courts to intervene in matrimonial litigation, > for this right was recognized by the written laws which have assigned the functions formerly exercised by the "fathers" of families to them. But they are required to act in conformity with the common law, and therefore to listen to the ndonga and report to him.

586ˣ

Before colonization the Nkundó often used other means.

586ˣ Before exploring the question of bride-price reimbursement, we will examine these various actions. For greater clarity we will distinguish between the customs of the pre-European regime and actual practice. Two specific cases will be described at the end.

1. In the past

Let us again make a distinction between two situations:

A. First hypothesis: a wife left her husband. She ran away to her family, first informing the ndonga. If she did not go to him but went straight home instead, the ndonga felt that he had been disregarded, and serious consequences followed, for he inevitably found her in the wrong. That is why this situation very seldom arose. [381] The woman explained her conduct to the ndonga. It was his duty to reconcile her and her husband. A divorce never took place without many interventions on the part of the ndonga.

1) If in spite of all attempts the woman was absolutely unwilling to stay with her husband and definitely left him, the result [721] in most cases was war, unless, of course, the husband also did not care to continue the unhappy union. In such a case he was satisfied with claiming a reimbursement of the bride price. The war, like all others, ended in peace and indemnification; nothing further was discussed. The war was fought against the woman's clan if restitution of the bride price was delayed or not made. However, if the woman went to another man without first going to her family, the abandoned husband declared war on his rival and left his parents-in-law in peace.

682 2) Sometimes the abandoned husband took revenge on his rival by assassinating him. If the possibility was open to him --

586x and this was generally the case -- he did not kill him personally
682 but assigned the task to someone else -- his son, his younger
[563] brother, or nephew, etc. Preferably, he hired a Botswá. The price for this service was 20 copper rings, the sum of the bride price paid [672] for a Botswá woman. Nkundő law places the entire responsibility for an assassination and all its consequences upon the person who orders it performed. Certain of the Batswa specialized in this field. Among them (of those dependent on the Bombwanja) were Esenge of Bokengé, Mbőlókó of Bombembe, Wai w'ìtúmola of Bakoyó; Lůwá jw'îtómbengándá (died in 1933) also of Bakoyó; Botómba wá Lokio and Mpótő éy'Ilókó of Mbanja (still alive).

The scorned husband had still other means of taking revenge 586x or obtaining indemnification. He made use of them only if the occasion was favorable or if he was not in a position [382] to go into expensive adventures such as a war or an assassination. They were the following:

3) Ikákelo: (1) A relative of his who was married into the unfaithful wife's clan could be prevented from returning to her husband.

4) The seizure of one of the wives of his recalcitrant father-in-law, or of one of the latter's relatives. This action is called by the generic term lowáála, which signifies "compensation." (2)

The prisoner was usually put in an etáka (a wooden fork fastened to the neck) (3) to prevent her flight and hasten the reimbursement of [567] the bride price. If the matter was not settled she became a slave.

1. See Chapter III, Article VI.

2. The woman who was seized was called nginda and her descendants, if there were any, were known as bonginda.

3. See Chapter VI, Article VII, 4, A, b), (1).

586ˣ One way or the other, the question was thus settled for both sides.

The term universally employed to signify the breaking up of a marriage by the wife is bokófo, derived from the verb kófa. This word is not used for a wife's repudiation by her husband. Therefore, its meaning is not equivalent to "divorce"; it means rather "to break the union with the husband." The transitive causative form (kófya) means "to provoke this break." It actually does happen that the woman's family causes the dissolution of a marriage for the sake of a more advantageous union. This should be understood in the context of what we have explained concerning reasons for divorce. Serious failures in the husband's fulfillment of his duties to his parents-in-law are mainly involved here. [587] The remarriage of a divorcée is described by the generic term kumbwa, "to be married to someone."

B. Second hypothesis: a husband wanted to get rid of his wife. Old natives stated very categorically that such behavior on the husband's part was due not to the cooling of his love, but to [383] incorrigible conduct on the wife's part. He was reduced to this extremity by the impossibility of continuing conjugal life with her.

586ˣ 584 He did everything in his power to forestall the flight of his wife by making the first move. After having vainly tried to bring her around through the intervention of her parents and especially the ndonga, he had recourse to one of the following means, which he could in fact use successively. But first he was required to inform the witness and to obtain his approval as well as that of the family authorities. The measures were as follows:

[584] a) Submission to the etɔ́ka, a heavy wooden fork fastened to the neck. When the husband has placed the etɔ́ka on his wife, the ndonga informed her parents of what had happened. They could then come and free their daughter by returning the bride price. If the husband applied the etɔ́ka against the wishes of the witness, the latter could release the prisoner. But in so doing he became guarantor of the reimbursement of the bride price; he became personally responsible for it.

586ˣ The husband was authorized to keep his wife under this form of torture for months. If his parents-in-law would not or could not 586* make it possible for him to recover his claim, he had recourse to the second means:

b) Reducing his wife to slavery (bonvamó, from the verb 586* nyamola). The husband had the right to use this means immediately, 587 without having first tried the étaka. But such action was not approved of and was undertaken only if the woman's family were themselves exasperated by the endless suits and the continual shame that their unworthy daughter caused them.

The reduction of a woman to slavery usually caused a war, [721] for her clan would not put up with such an insult. In some instances they did not seek revenge, however, either out of fear, because they did not feel in a position to resist, or because they recognized that the husband had good reasons for what he did. [384]

The woman's relatives could subsequently buy her back. (1)

[181] 1. If the Nkundó sold an Elinga woman into slavery, her people never troubled them with a war. For they did not know how to attack, were not good at marching, were strangers to the forest, and were inferior in military valor. Therefore they were satisfied with buying back their kinswoman.

In some instances, not wanting to be exposed to further palavers or further shame caused by their daughter's continued misconduct after having bought her back, they left her to her fate. Their love for their child and their desire to preserve their honor and good reputation were in conflict, and which of the two sentiments triumphed depended on circumstances of men and things. In such a situation, as with respect to theft and other habits that brought dishonor, it was not rare (nor is it even today) to find that the desire to preserve honor triumphed over affection or financial interests.

Before reducing a wife to slavery, even more than before [584] confining her to the etɔ́ka, a man was required to communicate his intentions to the ndonga. Otherwise, the latter would declare war 586x on his own authority, for the offense was considered very serious.

[584 We can assume that the reason for this rule was to allow time for [567] the woman's family to intervene and keep their daughter from becoming a slave by refunding the bride price paid for her.

c) In exceptional instances an exasperated husband resorted to the immolation of his wife when someone died. People cite the case of Bengóngó of Bongilá (Besombó, Bombwanja), who had his wife, Litúli of Bontole, decapitated at the ikweſ at the death of his father, Bengóngó byá Yese.

If the woman had children old enough to intervene on her behalf, her husband could be prevented from carrying out his violent intentions. The proverb says, Mbótsi ntáwáká, "a mother [599] does not perish." The husband also abstained if the woman had [595] a co-wife (ebſsa) who was her sister or other close relative -- either out of a feeling of shame, [385] or out of fear of undesirable repercussions. Sometimes, when a husband was caught between his wish to use the etáka and his shame or his fear of the ebísa, he hid [601] the wife who was confined by this fork. Preferably, he asked a brother-in-law to give her hospitality. In that way he got around the difficulty to a great extent, because through the law of exogamy such an arrangement placed the wife in another village, sometimes a considerable distance away. This practice was called isángyá; tómba walſ isángyá.

Instead of resorting to the procedures listed, a husband could 586x also place his wife in the hands of the ndonga. However, it was a 584 very unusual thing to do. The natives maintain that such action was due to a lack of affection for the wife, together with the husband's certainty that he could recover his valuables -- either because he was assured that his father-in-law was well disposed toward him (and would reimburse him or provide a replacement), or because he knew he could use the ikákelo.

As we have said, direct repudiation was extremely rare. Here we are not speaking of repudiation caused by a wife's incorrigible misconduct -- which we have just discussed -- but of repudiation against the wife's wishes. If it did occur the husband was expected to hand her over to the ndonga, and the latter, seeing 586 584 that there were no further means for a reconciliation, returned her to her parents. No violence was used against her, nor could the husband demand an immediate and direct reimbursement of the bride price. The husband had to wait until the wife he had repudiated found a new husband and the latter had paid a bride price for her. If the parents-in-law showed ill will toward him, however, [721] they could expect a war.

586 The conclusion that can be drawn from the preceding data is that although Nkundó law is very severe against the wife who does not acquit herself of her marital obligations, it does not leave the husband entirely free to do as he pleases. Ancestral law demanded grave reasons as the basis for any measures he took against her, [386] and the application of this law was well regulated. The differences between the various situations are an eloquent demonstration of this fact.

As we have seen above, the term bokófo is not applied to repudiation by either party. In the case of the husband the Nkundó say that he atóna, "no longer wants her"; the noun is lotóno. This term does not apply specifically to this situation; it refers to any person or thing one does not want. The special manner in which the wife is sent back by being handed over to the ndonga is also called by a generic term émola, "to cause to start moving, to make go away"; the noun is njémó.

2. At the present time

586 178 Considerable changes have been introduced as a result of colonization. Wars, torture, human sacrifice, and slavery have been abolished. The possibilities are now reduced to the woman's flight, with or without notification of the ndonga, or a repudiation pure and simple. The intervention of the ndonga is only rarely omitted; it is still considered important. As a matter of fact, it would be against his financial interests to make an enemy of him. A woman who leaves her husband returns home, goes directly to another man, or lives a debauched life in some center, large or small. There is nothing left but to proceed with the refunding of the bride price. Thus everything is reduced to its simplest form.

A Nkundó woman is held back only by the fear of punishment and other consequences of her action, or by her love for her husband.

586 178 In the past, when that love began to cool or became less passionate, fear caused her to make an effort and frequently everything was put in order again. Modern freedom, on the contrary, invites her to break all fetters. As a result, a temporary annoyance which in the past would have been taken care of, or some domestic difficulty that would have been smoothed out under the old regime, nowadays is enough to break up the marriage permanently. [387]

Thus it is understandable that the substitution of the present state of affairs for the ancient customs has caused divorces to increase in scandalous proportions.

The arrival of Negro soldiers (strangers or men from the Congo) dealt the first blow to Nkundó family organization, and the blow was almost fatal. Native authority, which was familial and patriarchal, was abolished from the outset. The chiefs who were subsequently set up by the European power had more to worry about than the preservation of marital morality, even when they did not tend (as was unfortunately too offen the case) to favor easy divorces in order to appropriate the women themselves and thus build a harem. The colonial administration found itself faced with the unknown. It took them time to learn about the past and present situations. Furthermore, the administration was occupied with other problems: the pacification of tribes, the stabilization of the occupation, assistance to the colonization that was just beginning, to trade, and to missions, as well as the various organizations, roads to be opened and maintained, etc. In addition the work involved in the establishment and development of centers, the police, the various forms of transportation, the establishment of industry, and the religious misions drew away from their usual surroundings a large number of young people who needed companions, real or substitute wives to satisfy their passion. All this caused great ravages in native society. Morality suffered greatly, and consequently so did the birth rate.

In the course of recent years, however, things have become more normal and stabilized, and the colonial administration has begun to repair the wrongs it caused. This complete change must be whole-heartedly applauded. The efforts that have been made to check the chaos of family affairs and put it in order can have nothing less than full approval.

586x 692 178 In spite of the opposition of several old-fashioned chiefs, [388] the native courts that were recognized or established by the decree of 1926 have begun to make use of the powers the government has assigned to them. They are called upon to play a great role in setting matters right, especially if their work is closely supervised and regularly checked. To accomplish this end, these courts must continue to act in the spirit of the ancient laws, taking into account only the change in circumstances (1).

1. See Chapter VI, Article VII, 7.

586x 178 The chief measure for the restoration of order advocated by the natives is the imprisonment of the wife who attempts a divorce. This practice would be a continuation of the custom of applying the etɔ́ka and an adaptation of it to present circumstances. Like the former practice, it would have a double effect: it would restrain flightiness and license, on the one hand, and, on the other, it would ensure the reimbursement of the bride price in cases where no reconciliation is possible. But its execution would be taken out of the husband's hands and handed over to the chief. Europeans who are in contact with the natives and concerned about the social order also favor this evolution of the common law.

Another way of combating such a situation would be the use of pressure against the guilty woman's parents, chiefly through the imprisonment of her mother. This measure has no basis in ancient law, except for war -- which did not touch the mother and actually was only moderately useful -- and the system of compensation (lowɔ́ɔ́la) -- which depended on the availability of opportunities and was used through the husband's own initiative. This practice therefore cannot be approved as such, but it might be acceptable in cases where the parents are really at fault. For instance, they may have in one way or another incited their daughter to break her marriage although she had no acceptable reason for doing so, or, although a legitimate declaration [389] of divorce has been made, they might refuse to make restitution of the bride price. (1) And

1. A drastic and indiscreet application > of this rule, however, could trouble the religious feelings of native Christians and thus produce an effect that is the reverse of the one desired. A religious marriage is in fact indissoluble, and in such cases the obligation to make restitution would be equivalent to a recognition that a religious union could be dissolved. And not only would the native consider this an opposition between the public authorities and Christian morality, but in addition the stability of marriages in general would greatly suffer.

here it must be noted that certain parents use hypocritical circumventions rather than openly showing their refusal. This is how they go about it: if the woman has really abandoned her husband and he, for good reasons such as those given above, no longer cares for his wife with whom he can no longer live (especially if he is monogamous), the question of reimbursement arises. The woman, in connivance with her parents, who do not want to make restitution of the bride price, publicly and officially declares that she is not leaving her husband and wishes to return to the conjugal household, whereas her only intention is to help her parents avoid paying the bride-price valuables. In time she will manage to get out of it one way or another.

3. Special cases

586x There are some rather special cases in the dissolution of marriage. The first has occurred more frequently since colonization, while the last has practically disappeared.

586x 937 587 1) Njangó. This word is the noun form of the verb angola, "to seduce or lead astray" (another's wife, his laborer, his slave, etc.). Therefore, it is a generic term, but it is primarily applied to the seduction of a married woman in order to make her leave her husband. It therefore denotes a man's act. Of the woman it is

586 simply said that she has left her husband (aɔ̂kɔ́fa) and has been taken 837 in marriage by X (aɔ̂kúmbwa ɛ́ka Sóngɔ́lɔ́). Having fallen in love 587 with another man's wife [390] and desiring to marry her, a man tries to win her favor. If she consents he collects the valuables necessary for the bride price. He then asks the woman to come to him and pays the bride price as for any marriage.

Instead of going directly to her seducer, the woman may also first go to her parents, especially if they are in favor of her plan. If they are not she would not succeed, because they would prevent her from carrying it out.

Cases of njangó were formerly rare because they were risky.
[721] As a matter of fact, they constituted a casus belli. Anyone who undertook such a venture had to be in a position to take the conse-[178] quences of his act, especially with respect to the payment of an indemnity. Nowadays, on the other hand, these occurrences are much more frequent, even when the new husband does not have the means to pay the bride price at once. Nevertheless, the reversal in government policy is beginning to produce good results. The woman, or her mother, is often imprisoned; rarely the seducer. This penalty is often sufficient to restore order. But to keep from being exposed to further difficulties caused by the woman who no longer loves him, the abandoned husband sometimes refuses to take back his unfaithful wife.

The rarity of cases in former times as well as the fact that [671] they constituted a legitimate reason for war shows that the njangó did not have the approval of Nkundɔ́ law but that it was more or less considered an infraction.

2) Taking refuge. Because of the change in circumstances, 586 the practice of taking refuge is no longer common today. It used 577 to be done as follows: A woman who absolutely wanted to leave her husband and had no means of doing so, since no man had asked for her in marriage and her parents were powerless to help her, went secretly to a rich and influential man whom she would have liked as a husband. She arrived unexpectedly, stood before him, or even threw herself at him, crying, [391] Bejwɔ́ bɛ̌kɛ̌! ónjéngé, 586 577 tonjójákɛ́! (1) "Your deceased parents! Pay the bride price for me,

1. Or analogous terms.

do not chase me away!" In such circumstances, the insult of invoking a man's deceased parents is like an ultimatum; it imposes an obligation which the person thus addressed cannot escape. (2)

2. See Chapter VI, Article V, 4, Appendix.

Therefore the man in question could not send the woman away; he had to take her under his protection. He called his kin group and explained the situation to them. If his close relatives agreed -- and it was their duty and honor to -- they instructed him to pay the bride price for her. But the abandoned husband intervened to prevent this transaction. Either he declared war, or he begged his rival to return his wife to him. If he took the first course, the two [727] adversaries paid indemnities for the warriors fallen in battle on their respective sides after the hostilities were terminated; then when peace was concluded, the matter was settled all the same, and the woman succeeded in her purpose. If the husband took the second alternative, and the man who received the fugitive was disposed to yield to his request, the latter would ask the husband for a payment (nyongo) that would free him from the obligation imposed on him by the wife's "oath." This payment was a sort of indemnification for the insult and for the blemish on his honor. Therefore the amount was fairly high: 20 to 25 copper rings, equaling the price of a slave.

The woman was surrendered either because the man to whom she had addressed herself did not love her, or because he and his family did not want to get involved in any disputes.

For the husband, war was a bad expedient; he would necessarily lose. The correct and ideal procedure was to try and have his wife returned to him. This fact is an indication that recourse to arms was an infraction of the law rather than a legitimate means. [392]

It could also happen that the man kept the woman but did not immediately pay the bride price. This occurred either if a 586* continuous state of enmity existed between his clan and the husband's,

577 or if the husband owed him a substantial debt, one that clearly equaled the woman's bride price. In the first case a new war followed almost inevitably. Later on the woman's family contacted the new son-in-law. The gifts they brought were considered the dowry, and he began to pay the bride price. But there was no question of reimbursing the bride price to the first husband; relations between him and the woman's clan were completely broken. The difference between this situation and the standard procedure described above lies precisely in the fact that there is no restitution. In the case of a debt there was no restitution either. The woman's flight constituted a compensation (lowáála) and was therefore so designated (N. aôkenda ndá lowáála). If the husband lodged a complaint, the judges sent him a piece of bofofó (1) to let him know that they did not want to concern themselves with his case, which he himself knew to have very poor grounds. Even the members of his own clan prevented him from making war; they knew perfectly well that the wrong was entirely on their relative's side.

The practice of taking refuge that we have just described was simply known as bejwó, bŏmoto áótswá bejwó, because that word was the principal one in the ultimatum.

As we have said above, the custom here described disappeared
178 with colonization. Even though the scope of this study does not ex-
586* tend to the Nkundó who are settled north of the Tshuapa, it [393] 577 may be of interest to note that an evolution of this custom is taking shape in the Losanganya region. If a woman is condemned for leaving the conjugal household and imprisoned, she asks someone to marry her -- if the opportunity presents itself. If the man accepts [202] [628] 1. The bofofó is a piece of dried banana leaf which has been rolled up and tied with two knots (or more, as the case required). To indicate the end of a palaver, the bofofó is cut in two (or more) pieces, with a knot in each piece. One piece is sent to each interested party.

178 her proposal, he collects the bride price and produces it before the 586x chief. With the consent of this authority, he pays it to the woman's 577 parents, who make restitution to the husband. (1)

1. See also Chapter III, Article VI.

x 3) War. The last of the special ways in which a marriage 586 may be broken is the following: If a woman were captured in a war 727 and not freed, thus becoming a slave, by that very fact her marriage was broken. Under the circumstances it could not have been otherwise, since each group was concerned only with its own interests. As we have seen in the preceding chapter, the slave was incorporated into the harem of one of the members of the clan who took her prisoner, or she was sold to some man for this purpose. If her real husband did not have the means to free her -- and we are speaking under that assumption, for if he did the union would not be dissolved -- he was unable to oppose what was done. Nevertheless, he was entitled to indemnification by the member of the clan who was responsible for the war, and he could use force to support his claim. If the woman were freed by her family, and her owner then paid them a bride price in order to contract a regular marriage, the former husband had a right to a return of the bride price paid by him. (See Chapter VII, Article V).

x In concluding this account, we should note that a woman who 586 has left her husband to go to another man may return to the first one [394] after a fairly long time has elapsed. There may be two reasons for such a return:

Either the woman does not find what she was looking for with her new husband and finds her hopes deceived, or in comparing her present situation with the life she had previously led she regrets her action. Knowing the love her former husband always bore her, she risks returning to him, and usually she is not rejected.

Or the new husband finds that after having paid part of the bride price he is unable to fulfill the rest of his obligation. Since a woman does not wish to be a wife without bride price -- outside of modern exceptions -- she turns back.

586 x Naturally a return is not the absolute and necessary consequences of the causes given. The woman can also go to a third man. But a return to the first husband is not too unusual, though it should not be thought of as frequent. (1) Because of the reception given a woman who returns, this practice proves that in most cases it is the woman who causes the divorce.

Article III. Restitution of the Bride Price

1. The obligation to make restitution

The two basic principles are:

1) The dissolution of a marriage must take place by means of the restitution of the bride price.

2) The obligation to make restitution falls upon the wife's family.

The second principle is clear, and its application presents no difficulties. The same is not true of the first. [395]

First of all, it is the restitution of the bride price that completes the divorce. As long as the husband has not been reimbursed, the woman continues to belong to him. But as the interval between the payment of the new bride price and restitution to the abandoned husband may be fairly long, according to present practice the latter is not permitted to exercise his rights over his wife once the second payment has been made. From that moment on he has the right to be reimbursed, and it is only up to him to go and collect what is due him. In the past he could make war. But as we have already seen, the hypothetical situation presented was extremely rare and occurred only when the husband had the means to prevent a new union before the reimbursement occurred. If the woman was physically able to go to a new husband before the restitution of the bride price (by means of direct repudiation, flight without the 586x husband's knowledge, or taking refuge) and did so, her remarriage was illegal. Before the law the new husband was simply a thief, since he held a person near him over whom he had no rights. For this reason the husband could declare war on him, which he was not permitted to do in the other case, the question of his marriage being a matter between him and his wife's family.

1. Among Europeans the remarriage of divorced couples also occurs, though it is not frequent.

Another consequence of that legal ruling is the following: If the woman who has left her legitimate husband wishes to return to him, she can advise him of her intention by a secret message. She asks him to come and get her at the moment when her lover is to pay the bride price (ndanga or walo, depending on the instance). She urges the latter to meet his financial obligations. On the day set the legitimate husband, accompanied by his ndonga, goes and hides near the place where the payment is to be made. At an opportune moment he comes out of his hiding place [684] and seizes the valuables that have been set out, saying to his rival: "I have caught you in adultery with my wife; these valuables belong to me as indemnity." [396] The woman's family takes his side, and the husband who has seduced her finds himself at a disadvantage and is sent away empty handed, for he is clearly entirely in the wrong.

If the legitimate husband belonged to an influential family he might risk the assassination of his rival if he saw a possibility. But then the situation was complicated by a war.

Furthermore, if the fugitive becomes pregnant as a result of her relations with her lover before the procedure of bride-price payment and reimbursement has been carried out, the child belongs, not to the natural father, but to the abandoned husband, who remains its legal father.

586x Nowadays everything has changed. A woman who leaves her husband cannot legitimately cohabit with another man. But during the past years no sanction remained. The imprisonment of the divorcing woman (mentioned above) could revive the ancient law while adapting it to circumstances. Furthermore, since the marriage is not dissolved, the alleged second husband could be condemned by the native courts for complicity in adultery.

586 x In most cases the husband and his parents-in-law try to continue their relationship despite the breakup. If the woman persists in not wanting to go back to her husband despite the pressure, the entreaties, and even the curses of her family, the parents sub-[587] stitute a sister or relative (bankitsa) for her, unless, of course, no relative is available. For in that case they must resign themselves to the restitution of the bride price and a permanent dissolution of the relationship. No new bride-price payment is made for the substitute, as the original bride price is valid for the new union, as we have explained in Chapter III, Article IV.

Finally, there is an exception to the general principle:
there is no restitution of the bride price if for some reason there is equivalent compensation of some sort. Nowadays this exception is seldom encountered, as will be apparent from the following details: for example, such an exception occurs if the right of ikákelo has been exercised, or if the wife of one of the relatives-in-law has been seized. Even if the amount of one bride price is larger than the other, the excess is not returned. Nor is there any obligation to restore the bride price if the wife has been reduced to slavery or has been killed. There are also the cases of the dissolution of marriage cited in Chapter V, Article IV, 2, no. 2, example 17, and in Chapter VI, Article V, 4. If the breakup caused [727] a war and the number killed on each side was considerable (three, five, six corpses), the matter rests there; when the families of those killed have been indemnified, there is no more talk of reimbursement. Occasionally, an influential and rich man who at the same time was spiteful or excessively proud, would take up arms a second time. He claimed that he would not stop until he had the bride-price valuables in his hands. Such behavior met with disapproval everywhere, and even his own family tried to stop him.
If the opposing clan was sufficiently strong and stubborn in the struggle, the husband obtained nothing at all. But the desire to [555] get revenge or to be famous as a warrior sometimes caused a man to scorn financial losses. Finally, according to the notions of our natives, a case of enmity between two clans (which we have cited in relation to a woman's application for refuge) should be included in the category of compensations.

586x The obligation to make restitution of the bride price falls upon the woman's father or the one who has replaced him (father, uncle, son, brother, etc., in accordance with the family hierarchy). He is responsible not only for everything that he received personally, but also for all that was paid to any member of the family. All these payments actually comprise the same single bride price, and all these persons together are represented by him. It is up to him to call them together for the discussion and examination of the payments made. [398] And if disputes arise, it is up to them to iron them out among themselves. The father need not personally have seen or known of the payments; the testimony of the ndonga is sufficient. If one or another of the relatives has acted wrongly by neglecting to make payments known to the person who is responsible, the latter can only place the blame on that relative. In no case can he refuse to make restitution of the valuables. The new husband should not be implicated in any way.

As to the mother's part, she and her clan must make restitution of whatever they have received, and they must do so even if she has broken with her daughter's father. The father summons her and asks her to return the valuables. This arrangement seldom leads to difficulties. In no case can the mother's portion be demanded from the father.

Finally, the Nkundó require that the reimbursement is made totally and all at once. They do not permit installments or intervals between them (as they do for the bride-price payment); they probably wish to avoid further disputes and endless palavers. Exceptionally, the parties come to a friendly agreement and permit a delay needed to collect some item or small portion of the valuables to be restored.

586x
572 As we have seen above, the restitution must be made entirely between the husband and the wife's family. The new husband must not participate. His only duty is to pay a bride price to his parents-in-law. He has no obligations toward the former husband. The latter cannot turn to him to recover his valuables. He can only claim them from the woman's family. Hence the axiom: njéngi la njéngi ntákímánáká, "the two husbands cannot pursue each

586 other." (1)
[672]

1. Except, of course, if the new husband puts himself in the wrong by taking the woman home with him before the divorce is completed (see above).

The term for making restitution of the bride price is [192] úndoja (baúmbá, jěngí, etc.); [399] its intransitive form is úndola ("to recover the cost of the bride price," and the passive is únjwa, "to be restituted." The noun is njúndó or wǔndó ("restitution," "reimbursement").

2. Methods of making restitution

The woman's father can pay back the bride price in two ways:

1) By means of valuables received from the new husband. In this case the more the latter hastens his payment, the sooner the new union will be made final.

2) By means of his own wealth, lontumú or bokakata (ekakata), an intensitive derived from likata, "hand." This method of payment settles the matter more quickly and avoids complaints lodged by the former husband. Sometimes restitution is made in this manner to show wealth and generosity.

In such a case the father acts spontaneously of his own free will. But can he be required to thus make restitution with his own wealth?

Yes. If the bride price is still in the hands of the woman's family, it must be returned immediately. This rule is easily understood, for under these circumstances no practical difficulty stands in the way of reimbursement.

Although as a rule the bride-price valuables will already have been spent for the acquisition of another wife (the nkita), this is not always the case. For example, only a very short time may have elapsed between the conclusion of the marriage and the divorce. But such a case was and is rare. Instances where the bride price was still in the family's possession were even rarer in the past, for people did not want bride-price wealth to remain 586x unproductive. Nowadays, they occur somewhat more frequently. [586] A feeling of generosity has developed toward sons and younger brothers, and the valuables are often set aside for their use.

If the bride price has already been transferred, the solution [400] is less clear cut. Under the old regime the matter was fairly clear, which is no longer true at present. But let us proceed by stages.

In the past the question was as follows: Theoretically it was assumed that the woman's family was not in a position to make restitution. In practice, however, they managed to do so, either by substituting another woman, or by borrowing the needed valuables, or by giving the husband a bride price received by one of the divorcée's relatives. The husband had certain means of forcing his father-in-law to pay (see above). Other times the notables of the clan were moved by a threat of war. They unceasingly urged restitution, and unless the debtor himself was the most influential member of the group and of an unyielding nature, he gave in to their entreaties. If, on the other hand, the husband did not have recourse to the means mentioned, he simply had to wait until his father-in-law received a new bride price.

178x 586 Nowadays the ancient customs have been abolished, and the whole question has changed as a result. Nevertheless, in spite of the external changes, the colonial administration wishes to act in the spirit of ancient native laws.

By establishing regular native courts and giving them the right to judge in accordance with the laws of the tribes themselves, adapted to changed circumstances, the decree of April 15, 1926 has armed these courts with the means of working for this adaptation. But in practice it has not yet been accomplished. This fact must be attributed to the difficulties of finding a solution which would, on the one hand, perpetuate the spirit of the ancient system and, on the other, satisfy legitimate aspirations toward better regulations, aspirations which as a matter of fact are favored by the colonizing power. In this connection one must think especially of the gradual abandonment of polygamy.

The European authorities do not seem to have come to a clear decision as yet with respect to what method of restitution

178 should be adopted under present circumstances [401], and this 586x question is actually within the jurisdiction of the native courts. (1)

1. As to the imprisonment of the woman seeking a divorce -- an adaptation of the etáka, this practice was first condemned but its legality has been recognized recently (in April, 1935).

Among the natives, opinion is divided. Two plans for a solution are discernible.

A. A strong tendency is developing to maintain the distinction mentioned above between the breakup of a marriage caused by the wife and the husband's repudiation of her. In itself this distinction is good, but it is subject to a serious drawback, namely, the danger of exaggerating the importance of the latter situation. For, as we have seen, if a husband repudiates his wife, it is usually her own fault.

This tendency results in the following difference in the procedure recommended for the respective situations:

1) If it is the wife who runs away, her family should make restitution by means of its own wealth. If they try to avoid doing so or delay too long, the woman seeking divorce or her mother should be imprisoned. The latter can usually be gotten hold of more easily than the former, and even if catching the daughter presents no special difficulties, the fact remains that the imprisonment of the mother is usually more efficacious.

The criticisms that must be made against this system are as follows:

a) It advocates sanctions against the mother, who should not be implicated unless it is proved that she is at fault. (2)

2. See above, Article II, 2, last paragraph.

178 The traditional laws permitted sanctions against the wife herself.
586 As to war, it caused both sides to suffer but had little effect on the divorcing woman's mother. Furthermore, compensation through seizure of the divorcée's mother or of one of the father-in-law's wives was only a haphazard method and could be applied only under favorable circumstances. It was not decided upon by the authorities [402] but was a capture by surprise, on the purely personal initiative of the abandoned husband. Consequently, in my opinion, it should not be tolerated, unless the mother's responsibility in the breakup is proved.

b) Although the imprisonment of the wife can have two purposes and its practice have two effects -- the reduction of the frequency of divorce through punishment of the culprit, and a hastening of the restitution of the bride price -- it is important to distinguish between them in theoretical discussion. Imprisonment as a punishment has already been considered. Here we will deal with it solely as a means of obtaining restitution of the bride price or shortening the delay. Considered in this light, it is bodily constraint. It cannot be applied to the wife, who has no obligation, but to the father if he fails in the fulfillment of duties imposed on him by law -- that is, if he refuses to proceed with the reimbursement which the law requires him to make, or if he fails to take steps which will enable him to make it (or even if he is convicted of negligence in his duty to intervene in order to make his daughter respect her promises). In practice the father would really have to be in the wrong and his ill will be established. The imprisonment of the divorcing woman would avoid the prosecution of her father for a situation which he himself is powerless to prevent.

c) The tendency cited could prevent polygamists' wives from contracting monogamous marriages and, as a result, could oppose the spirit of the law. It would not be difficult to eliminate this drawback, however.

Since the written law favors monogamy, a regular and serious control of the activity of native courts would actually be sufficient.

2) If the breaking up of the marriage is caused by the 178 586 husband, the proponents of this system require a restitution of the bride price [403] only when a new bride price has been paid, or rather as soon as the woman has a new husband. Some go even further and claim to impose only a partial restitution; a portion of the bride price would be kept by the wife's family as a punishment for the husband's offense.

We must raise the following points against this rule:

a) Far from having a basis in common law, it is in flagrant opposition to it (see above and further on).

b) It also has the disadvantage of setting up a certain impediment to the development of stable monogamous marriages. Not for monogamous marriages per se, for in the case of a pagan or a Protestant there is no difficulty, and the rule does not harm them. If their marriage is not successful, they can always resort to divorce so that this rule does not apply to them. They can continue to cohabit with their wives until the latter leave them. For a Catholic the situation is entirely different. He knows that his religious marriage is indissoluble. But before contracting a marriage, the local ecclesiastic discipline at the present time requires him to pay a bride price and, consequently, to become involved in a common-law union and submit to its laws even though in his conscience he cannot consider such a union as marriage. The same thing applies -- mutatis mutandis -- to a catechumen who is to be baptized and thus to elevate his common-law and legal marriage to the level of a sacrament. Suppose that his wife wants to remain with him -- sincerely or in order to save her parents from the expense of reimbursement -- but that her temperament turns out to be unsuitable to married life or that her conduct is not at all in accordance with Catholic morality. Should this situation arise, the husband would be exposed to extremely grave consequences. For whatever the case, [404] their life together will be unbearable in the long run, and one day the wife will leave her husband, who will find himself in a very painful dilemma as a result: either he will have to remain a bachelor or find himself in flagrant opposition to his conscience. It is therefore wise for this woman to leave him while there is still a way to straighten out the situation. The solution described here presents difficulties that would dishearten many men. And this would be to the detriment of an evolution toward a higher moral level 178 and a better social order, although the normal functioning of native courts could in part prevent this difficulty by requiring the woman's father to hasten the repayment of the bride price.

B. The serious disadvantages inherent in the system we have just described have caused another part of the population to seek a solution that would avoid them. The Christians in particular are the ones who advocate it. But since they have as yet very little influence in the political domain, the chances are slim that their point of view will carry. In their opinion the reimbursement of the bride price should be required in all cases, and immediate restitution would be required only if, at the time of the breakup, the bride price had not yet been spent. They also accept imprisonment as a sanction against the divorcing woman.

This system, too, is open to criticism: it is hardly in accordance with the spirit of traditional native law, which allowed the husband to use means of his own to obtain immediate reimbursement.

It is my opinion that we must take the present state of affairs into consideration, with the sole idea of protecting the social order through the stabilization of marriages on the one hand, and on the other, the evolution toward a better order by favoring [405] monogamous unions in accordance with colonial legislation and administrative practice. (1)

It should be noted that natives in various localities maintain that the first system described is favored by the Europeans. That is their answer to the objection -- which I have made more than once -- that their solution does not conform to their traditional law. Actually at the present time, the administration does not seem to support their system. But it is difficult for me to believe that it is simply an explanation to their advantages, for I have heard it

178 from more than one native who was clearly and truly wronged
586x by the system. For these reasons, it would not seem impossible that before the native courts were organized, some government agent had spoken and acted in approval of the system in question.

This digression on the subject of the practice to be adopted with reference to the reimbursement of the bride price has become long. But special emphasis is necessary because of the crucial importance of this question in the future development of native society.

3. The formalities of restitution

586x The only formality involved in the restitution of the bride 584 price is the obligation to carry it out through the intervention of the ndonga(s). Since he is the official witness, he is the one who is qualified to say what has been paid. There is no recognized obligation to make restitution of any payment or gift that has not passed through his hands or that he has not seen. Sometimes certain payments actually have been made without his participation, and restitution for them cannot be demanded. The official witness has had no knowledge of them, and he is consequently [406] under no obligation to take them into account. But the possibility of friendly transactions always remains.

Should the ndonga all have died in the interim, the procedure would not be adversely affected, for Nkundó law recognizing the inheritance of that office. The brother, son, or other relative of the deceased can act in his name, and sometimes long before his death he will have given the latter all the necessary and useful explanations. The testimony of the successor is recognized as legal and valid.

Moreover, the ndonga may be assisted by other upright and influential men who were present when the payments were made and who can corroborate or even correct his testimony. It is clear that this practice was established by common law for the sake of obtaining the best possible results in the exercise of justice.

586x 584 The custom is all the more easily understood since there are many different payments, separated by intervals and made throughout the duration of the marriage. Therefore long arguments and contestations occur.

It is not pointless to draw special attention to the necessity of the ndonga's testimony in the reimbursement of a bride price, for this rule is not always properly observed. For example, I know of the following case: A ship's captain from Upper Ikelemba took a girl from this region as concubine. The absence of a ndonga and the omission of a real bride price showed their desire not to involve themselves in a legitimate marriage. Nevertheless, the man paid valuables (especially money and fabrics) to the woman's parents. By the end of the concubinage, which lasted many years, the sum total of these gifts had risen to a value of more than 1,000 francs. After the separation, the husband demanded the possession of the daughter born from the union. The court charged with examining the case commanded -- with the approval of the administrator and in accordance with customary rules (see the next article) that restitution of the [407] payments made should be carried out and assigned the child to its natural father. The woman's father had a sufficient sense of honesty to return the gifts -- even though, legally, he had no obligation to do so -- but he claimed his daughter's child. However the court was not willing to hear his claim, although according to Nkundó law they should have recognized his right.

Apart from the participation of witnesses, no special formality is involved in the restitution of the bride price. It is carried out in accordance with the rules prescribed by Nkundó customs and conventions, appropriate for any discussion held in a family or clan gathering. When everything is settled, the person entitled to the reimbursement collects his due and takes it with him.

586x 4. Gifts and payments subject to restitution

Restitution must be made of all payments made by both sides; the bride price in all its parts, the mother's portion, gifts, payments at the time of death, etc., made by either side, the dowry (nkomí), and various presents. All these are subject to restitution.

586 The position of the individuals who have paid or received the valuables does not matter, as long as they are really members of the kin group and the payment is attested to by the ndonga's testimony. But the father alone is indebted to his son-in-law.

At the end of the discussion on the quantity and nature of the valuables, the amount for each side is added up. Then one is subtracted from the other, and the remaining amount is given to the party entitled to it. Supposing that the bride-price valuables add up to a total of 125 copper rings (1), while the nkomɛ (dowry paid by the wife's family) comes to a sum of 60 rings. The husband is entitled only to 125 minus 60, that is to 65 rings. If the bride price and dowry are equal, no restitution payment [408] is made. If the dowry exceeds the bride price, the husband is the one who must repay the surplus. Nevertheless, in practice strictness is not carried to an extreme, and the husband may even be allowed 10 rings or so out of an obliging courtesy. But this only happens if the woman has given him no progeny. For if the husband accepted those rings and did not make the payment which is theoretically required of him, he would lose his rights over his children, all of whom would belong to their maternal clan from then on. The act of calculating the difference between the bride price and dowry is called umanya; the intransitive of the term is umana (ŋgɛ la nkomɛ bǒmana).

The dowry is generally deducted from the presents (belonga), but if the belonga are not sufficient, the valuables that are lacking are subtracted from the bride price itself.

The boséngo (1) is never included in the accounting, however,

Our natives say that it constitutes a separate payment, which is not

---

1. As was said in Chapter II, all payments can be reduced to a value in copper rings.

1. See Chapter II, Article IX.

588x to be touched. Even if the belonga and other payments total less than the bride price, nothing can be subtracted from the bosóngo. It must always be returned in its entirety.

As to slaves or domestic animals, not only are they subject [472] to the reimbursement law, but in addition restitution must be made of all their progeny, even when it includes several generations. This regulation applies to the maternal line (compare it with the ancient Roman adage: partus sequitur ventrem). Hens and ducks are excepted, however.

To indicate that each side must make restitution of absolutely everything that has been paid, the Nkundó use the expression: lá nsongi lá lotéé, "even the needle and the tiny razor."

[409] The reimbursement of the bride price in a case where the woman is returning to her first husband is governed by no special rule. The second husband simply obtains restitution of what is due him. The wife's family often appeals to the first husband's generosity in order to hasten the reimbursement.

If the woman leaves her second husband as well as her first, without the latter having been previously reimbursed, restitution is made to both.

We have seen that the first husband can seize his rival's bride-price valuables as indemnity for the damages the latter has caused him. The woman's family is not required to return those valuables, since they have not received them. This affair therefore does not concern them and involves only the two rivals. In spite of the first husband's every right, such an action often resulted in war. Because of the fear of quarrels and other unpleasant consequences, this custom is no longer practiced. Nevertheless, the idea is not dead as the following case shows. It occurred in 1932.

Engóngó de Lǒngá (Nkóle) made the acquaintance of Bosénjá, 586x daughter of Bokelá wǎ Yelemeya of Ntómbá (Wǎngatá). She was 587 married to a Lǒnga (Ekonda) laborer named Isongú, a native Boángí, but left her husband to follow her new lover. The latter paid the ikulá -ndanga (9 rings and 35 francs). After a certain number of months, the union broke up. Bosénjá was found unsuitable as a wife. Among the faults with which she was reproached was a lack of affection for her fiancé's mother and other relatives, and a 586x failure to help or respect them. After the union broke up, Bokelé, 587 the woman's father, refused to make restitution of anything whatsoever. His answer to Engóndó was, "You should have left another man's wife alone."

Yet all this was in flagrant opposition to Nkundó law. 1) Engóndó was wrong to take another man's wife home with him. 2) Isongú could have taken Engóndó's valuables away from him at the time the latter was making the payment; it was his right. But 3) Bokelé was also in the wrong. The question [410] of seduction and adultery was none of his business but Isongú's. If he did not like Engóndó's behavior, he could have handled the situation differently. Now he had valuables to which he no longer had any right; he had to return them.

Conclusion

586x The nature of the reimbursement of marriage payments and the various circumstances under which it is made might suggest the conclusion that these goods are not acquired permanently, but rather that they constitute securities. The few exceptions where there is no reimbursement could not change this view. In fact the reason for them is clear -- compensation for that which is not restituted is made in other ways. (1)

[721] 1. This observation -- like others made earlier -- might lead us to believe that in the mind of the Nkundó war and other bloody practices are only means which have little to recommend them and that basically our people disapprove of them.

Nevertheless, this conclusion does not hold up if we compare all the foregoing with what occurs when a marriage is broken through death. For in the latter case nothing at all is returned; everything that was given by each party remains permanently theirs. No payment is demanded even for the children (see below).

584x What is the reason for this fundamental difference? The reason that one is forced to accept is that -- originally and essentially -- the valuables paid at marriage become the property of the recipient party. Restitution in case of divorce is necessitated by circumstances -- without it the woman could not remarry. It is a concession to her weakness. Of these two rules which are diametrically opposed to each other, restitution and nonrestitution, the one must have been original and primary, the other secondary and additional. The latter is the rule for divorce.

[411] This conclusion is strongly supported by all the other stipulations of Nkundó law pertaining to divorce, the reasons for it and the proper procedure.

Article IV. Payment for Children

The rule that requires the restitution of the valuables paid, in their entirety, includes a limitation we are going to consider. That limitation is the payment for children.

If children are born to the union which then is dissolved, their father must leave the woman's family 10 to 15 (nowadays up to 20 and 25) copper rings for each child, whether boy or girl. If not enough valuables remain to him after the deduction of the dowry, he must make up the deficit by other means. A man who does not give the necessary valuables no longer can claim any rights over his children, who henceforth belong to their mother's family.

If the divorce occurs before the husband has paid the bosóngo, he is also required to do so in order to obtain the right to his children. If he refuses to fulfill his obligation, the wife's family can take one child away from him as compensation.

It is during the discussion concerning the restitution of the bride price that the husband must relinquish the goods required to settle the position of the children. When the total amount of valuables to which he is entitled have been made known to him by the ndonga, he must deduct the amount of the payment for the children and give it to the wife's family. The omission of this 586 act is equivalent to giving up his rights.

The wife's family makes no effort to keep the children born of a broken marriage. On the contrary, they insist that the husband pay the necessary valuables in order to retain his rights over his legitimate progeny. Nevertheless, they cannot force him to do so; the father is entirely free either to take his children or [412] to choose a given portion of the bride price in preference to them. But he is obliged to choose between the two alternatives.

855 586 All the natives care about their children. Therefore an indifference to them and preference for getting back the entire bride price is altogether unusual. Instances such as the following do occur, however.

Bumba, daughter of Loókà of Bokenyola (Losenge, Bomwanja) was married to Elímîlele of Loséli. After some years of marriage, the latter repudiated his pregnant wife for reasons unknown to me. Although attempts were made to show him the stupidity of his act, nothing would move him. Bumba returned to her brother Ifásó and there gave birth to a daughter. Ifásó asked the father to come and see his child and at the same time be reconciled with his wife. Elímîlele refused. After a time, Bumba was married to another man, but that marriage did not last. A bankitsá was substituted for her, and she was married to Bokóngo of Bokengé. The latter paid a bride price of 80 rings for her. Elímîlele was asked to come and get what was due him. This time he came. He took everything, without leaving the slightest thing as payment for his daughter. He was asked to leave 25 rings in order not to be deprived of his rights over his child. He wanted to hear nothing of this suggestion; he preferred to take back his bride price in its entirety. The daughter, Bombúla, is about to marry Bolongólokolo of Bompela (Bokátola). The bride price to be paid will be received by her mother's clan, and her father will receive nothing at all. He can never claim the slightest payment from his son-in-law. Besides, the latter is not legally his son-in-law; for from the legal standpoint Elímîlele is not his father-in-law. Bombúla, for her part, is no longer required to recognize her father, since he has disowned her. She belongs solely to her mother's clan, and her father's family can never again make any claim upon her or her descendants.

586x 598 178 Finally, note that in the "lowlands" of the region [413] under discussion, payment for a natural child is beginning to be made regardless of whether the beginning of the bride price has been paid, or whether no payment at all has been made. In the past there was no question of such a practice, for the child would have been considered a slave in his father's clan and in the neighboring villages. And actually in the villages of the interior and in practically all of the region under consideration, that attitude has not changed. It is in the European centers, under the influence of Christian ideas, that these new ideas develop. In practice, cases do not occur except when the individuals in question are natives of very distant villages and are established permanently (to the extent that this term can be used) in their extra-customary residence.

Article V

The Position of Former Spouses and Their Children

586x Once the palaver concerning the reimbursement of valuables is settled, the former spouses become strangers to each other.

Their families sometimes continue relations with each other, however. In fact we have seen that a divorced woman may be replaced by a relative in her conjugal role. In such a case relations by marriage result from the continuation of the marriage agreement. (1)

(1) See Chapter III, Article IX.

Except in cases where a substitution occurs, all ties between the former spouses and their clans are thus broken.

The divorced wife can no longer claim the slightest right to the fields she has established on the land cleared by her husband. In general, all the fruits of her various activities remain the property of the husband; she herself [414] has no further right to them. In our time, however, it is not unusual for a man and wife who are

586 separating permanently to divide between them certain gains from their joint labor such as money, clothing, fabrics, and household utensils. (1)

1. See Chapter VI, Article II.

As to the children born of such a marriage, they live either with their mother or with their father, depending on the circumstances. They go visiting from one to the other. They almost always remain with their mother while they are still very young. As soon as they begin to be able to take care of themselves (between the ages of 8 and 14, depending on the case), they go to live with their father. The girls often remain with their mothers longer than the boys, sometimes even until they marry.

The parents do not create difficulties or unhappiness for themselves over this question. It is only when a child remains more or less continuously with one of the two that the other's attachment is expressed in jealousy.

When the time comes to receive the bride price, the parents lay claim to their respective rights. When the boys wish to take a wife, the father must procure the amount needed for the bride price. If a young man does not obtain satisfaction, he can always address himself to his maternal uncles, who will not fail in the duty imposed by family love -- unless they do not find the means -- and their clan will have acquired another household.

In short, divorce separates the spouses and breaks the special alliance between the two families, but the children continue to treat their parents as if they were still united. And they do so in a completely natural fashion, without any strife. For the Nkundó this matter is quite simple, and they are perfectly accustomed to it, since divorces are not that rare. [415]

Article VI

Magic Practices Pertaining to Divorce

586x 789 It seems to me not without interest to devote a few lines to the magic practices prevalent among our peoples and used on the occasion of divorce. We are not speaking of love philters; strictly speaking they would not be appropriate here. (1) We will therefore limit ourselves to giving a general idea of the practices used to prevent a wife from leaving her husband, to avenge a divorce, or to make a fugitive return.

As we shall see, these objectives often become intertwined.

1) The trinity ikétáki-itóko-ntómbá is considered by the natives as three related practices. We see it more as three forms of a single practice.

All three originated with the Ntómbá of Lake Tumba and [177] were introduced to the Nkundó -- directly or indirectly -- by certain Ekonda tribes living between the two peoples. This introduction took place in modern times. The practices were unknown here before colonization. Even at the present time they have not spread everywhere; they have not yet crossed the Momboyo. The chronological order of their introduction is first ikétáki, second itókó, third ntómbá.

The animating spirit of these practices is the leopard. Their primary purpose is to call back an unfaithful wife and, if she obstinately refuses, to kill her or her seducer. Secondarily, they also serve to cause the death of any enemy whatever, especially in reprisal.

The three practices differ with respect to their manufacture and method of use. We cannot go into all the relevant details, for they are outside the framework of this study. [416] It is sufficient to say that the owner of the charm to whose powers he resorts first calls the woman by blowing into an antelope horn,

1. See Chapter I, Part 2, Article VIII.

586x 789 especially very early in the morning at the crowing of the cock. (1)

1. The natives also use this means to call their children who long ago left for the "lowlands" and whose return they ardently desire.

If the one who is called does not return, the charm will take revenge either on her or on her lover, depending on the desire of the person operating it. Another intervention on his part is then required, however, and it varies according to the form used. Note that according to the native view it is impossible for the wife not to hear the call, no matter how far away she may be. If she does not return, it is because she is being obstinate and deserves to be punished.

The spirit of vengeance alone is involved in:

586x 754 [237] 2) The ngondé. This charm comes from the Coquilhatville region or even further away. The word ngondé is the Lolíngá form of the Lonkundó word nkondé, which means "gavial." The teeth of this reptile actually play a part in its composition. It is used to punish any thief by death. Therefore it has been declared effective against anyone who tries to seduce the wife of another. It will cause the culprit's feet to swell and to open with pus. Like the above practices, this one has not yet crossed Momboyo.

832 177 Such usages like many others have therefore been recently introduced. Before the arrival of Europeans in these parts, only love philters were known. However, it is easily understandable that the Nkundó gladly and confidently received these new practices which are so useful -- in their opinion -- and operate in a domain of capital importance for which colonization has deprived them of their ancient sanctions and means of prevention. [417]

Chapter IX

Death

Since the subject of our study is only Nkundó marriage, we 152 will examine matters relating to death only from this limited stand-593x point. As to the general aspects of the question, the reader will 761 find them in our article on the funeral customs of the Nkundó, about to be published in Anthropos.

Article I. Sorrow and Mourning

In the study cited above, a word was said concerning the varying degrees of intensity that may be reached in the sorrow caused by the death of a cherished being.

Of course the suffering does not always exclude a mixture of egoistic elements, such as regret of the financial loss involved in the death of a wife and the obligation of continence and various other prohibitions of widowhood. This is rather natural and does not merit discussion. On the other hand, it would be unjust and contrary to the truth to attribute all the sadness to those base feelings. In general, this sorrow must also be taken as evidence of a true love which is often its primary cause. Exceptions do occur, however, for instance in the case of an old woman who has been inherited by a polygamist.

When we compare the various manifestations of sorrow at the death of a spouse with those observed at the death of a relative, we note certain practices specific to the former case. One might say that at the death of a spouse, the signs of sorrow reach a culminating point [418], as if native law wished to underline the predominance of the relationship created by marriage over the bonds of kinship and thus manifest its agreement with divine law.

Nevertheless it is clear that practice does not always correspond to theory, here any more than elsewhere. We should not be astonished in not finding among the natives a perfect and ideal love

152 free of all egoism. When even among peoples universally recog-761 nized as superior, self-pity during the pain felt on the death of 593x someone beloved is neither rare nor reprehensible, can we be shocked that our natives experience similar regrets? Do we condemn a young widow who, although sincerely and intensely regretting the husband she loved tenderly and whom death has just removed from her affection, thinks at the same time of the unhappy situation in which she and her small children find themselves as a result? And is not the reasonable hope of finding someone who will take care of her and the orphans an effective and legitimate consolation that will help her to endure the trial?

All things considered, it is therefore not at all surprising that our Blacks react that way. And it is quite natural that, in practice, they should suffer more from the death of a father and especially a mother or a child than from the loss of a husband or wife. The situation here is entirely different from that in Europe. And the system of polygamy, with all its consequences, is not exactly discouraging to egoism and favorable to an ascension toward the ideal of a more sublime love.

. Therefore we should not be surprised that a wife at the death of her husband laments: ngɔ́y'ɔ̌m'ɔ̌kámí ɔ́ye! ("Mother, my husband, ah!"); but at the death of a child or a mother or father she wails: ngɔ́ya njɔ̂lélengana ɔ́ye! ("Mother, I am bereft, ah!"), thus expressing a more intense sorrow. For a father or a mother cannot be replaced, but she will always find someone who will want to marry her. As to a child, between it and its parents there is more of a life in common [419] than between spouses under the system of polygamy. More marks of tenderness are also exchanged between mother and child than between native couples.

Immediately after his wife's death, a husband is surrounded 764 by all the women of the village who come and mistreat him. They 152 x vie with each other in smearing him with charcoal smut, soil, and 593 mud, and in rubbing him with the plant called linsǎnsǎ, which causes a stinging rash comparable to that caused by nettles in Europe. There are no relatives among the women who engage in this 152 rough behavior, only strangers married to village men (those known 593x as báajâála). This ill treatment is often extended to close rela-764 tives of the widower, that is, to those whom the women in question call báome, "potential husbands," never to fathers and higher relatives. (1) The purpose of this practice seems to be to intensify,

1. See Chapter V, Article IV, 1, no. 3, and Chapter VI, Article VI.

by physical pain, the sorrow caused by death. In addition, provocatively obscene words, gestures, and movements remind the widower that from then on he must be continent, as described in extenso in the study cited above.

765 Afterwards, relatives dress the widower in a lisáki, a banana leaf which is torn all over horizontally. For all other mourning garments, as well as for all regulations and prohibitions that apply to all cases, see the detailed study.

The ill treatment described is not inflicted on the widow. It is meted out exclusively to men.

The general rules pertaining to seclusion apply to a widower; in fact they are especially severe for a man. His kinswomen prepare his simple meals. However, if his relations with his father-[587] in-law were excellent, the latter sends a woman [420] to him who will attend to his needs. She often becomes his wife when, after the lifting of mourning, he brings the ibóleóko (Chapter III, Article IV).

During the entire first period of seclusion, he cannot go anywhere, at least ostensibly. If he needs to go out, he must go through the back. If he wants to visit a relative or friend, he must go behind the huts, in the banana grove, even if it is evening. In a[illegible] case, he may not leave the village. Such was the ancient law, though nowadays it is observed less and less.

Furthermore, he cannot have the slightest contact with any woman who is not a relative. He cannot even shake her hand, greet her out loud, or look at her even in passing.

165 Incontinence is severely punished by the deceased; she molests the culprit and even drags him or another person who is in mourning to the grave.

[352] [171] The severity of the seclusion is lessened at the time of the ceremony which marks the widower's return to a small bed raised above the ground. It is made from tree trunks or branches in the manner of the Batswá. The widower is washed by the deceased's elder sister and then is led to the bed by his elder brother's wife. He receives a knife from his father, and from then on is permitted to perform his usual tasks.

A widower (or widow) must purchase gradual dispensations from prohibitions of foods, in contrast to relatives, who are simply released (Coutumes funéraires [Funeral Customs], Vol. 2, no. 2, E). This distinction shows the fundamental difference that exists between mourning for a spouse and for a relative. In the first instance, it is a strict social obligation from which he can be absolved only by a purchase, a compensation, or commutation of sorts; in the second instance, it is a convention from which a person is freed without any ceremony or compensation. The fact that this regulation is extended to the close relatives of the widower (or widow) does not lessen the validity of this conclusion. On the contrary, it corroborates it. For [421] the persons to whom the rule applies remain clearly in the affinal line; the regulation is never extended to relatives of the deceased.

After the death of a husband, his widows and the wives of his close relatives buy dispensations from the deceased's kinswomen. After a wife's death, the husband and his close relatives buy them from their own wives. The total amount of the purchase made by all the persons involved must be divided. Half goes to the women who have married into the clan; the other half is kept for the family of the deceased.

Like all periods of mourning, that of the widower -- with all the regulations and prohibitions involved -- ends in a great feast. When the family of the deceased have performed their duties, they organize a second feast at their own home, and the widower is 765 expected to attend. It is usually at this time that the negotiations occur relative to a replacement for the deceased (Chapter III, Article IV).

Article II. Seclusion of Widows

As I have described in the article cited, widows (bituka, sing. etuka, or, among the Bombwanja, besámanyi, sing. bosámanyi) are compelled to remain in seclusion for a long time. Before the ceremony of being lifted from the ground, they are ostensibly not permitted to go out. Later they are allowed more freedom; they can go everywhere to do their work, even to the markets. But they are required to spend their nights in the communal seclusion hut.

[624] A widow who did not conform to these rules would meet with serious criticism. She would be said to have not loved her husband (and consequently suspected of having caused his death by sorcery). Moreover, she would be exposed to the avenging anger of the deceased, who would disturb her sleep, thrash her if she went to the forest alone, [422] or would even come to take her into the next world with him.

Insofar as possible all the widows are brought together in one and the same hut. To complete their separation from the world, the entrance is closed by means of a circle of palms, the same as for the seclusion hut of a nursing woman, a bolúmbú, or a woman possessed by the spirit of bongóli (yebola). This is to prevent widows from having relations with passers-by.

The name of the seclusion hut is lokásá (the same as the word for "leaf."). The Bombwanja use the word lokombí (from komba, "to shut," "to enclose"); the Injólō and the Boángí say lonkíndá. (1)

587 During the last period of seclusion, although the widows may not be visited by lovers who wish to court them with the object of

M 765 587 marriage after the end of mourning, they have the right to accept various foods and firewood from them. But a rather dim view is taken of these services rendered by strangers, that is, by persons not related to the heirs. For theoretically the widows belong to the heirs and are their wives, since the financial marriage agreement continues. (2) Nevertheless, if these men are not at enmity with the heirs, they encounter no opposition. For once the period of seclusion is terminated, the widows are free to go back to their respective families and be taken in marriage by anyone able to pay the bride price. Nevertheless, suitors are not permitted to enter the seclusion hut even in the last period. They must therefore transmit presents through the agency of the biúnanyí (sing. eúnanyí), that is, the relatives of the deceased.

M 765 This last period begins with the ceremony of being lifted off the ground. The widows are made to get up onto the beóngá --
M P [352] [513] [423] bákondeja bituka ndá beóngá. The beóngá consist of split branches of the parasol tree, placed on long branches, which are in turn attached to posts, forming a small primitive bed, which is the usual bed of the Batswá that is sometimes also used by the Baotó, if the latter have nothing better. From then on the widows can rest on these; they may "rise from the ground." The parasol tree branches are called beóngá (sing. boóngá), "dead, dry wood." The same root is also used with other prefixes: eóngá, pl. bióngá; loóngá, pl. mbóngá. The verbs used are áta, "to split, rend" or fanja, "to cut." Nowadays the severity of this custom is mitigated by the substitution of beánga, transportable wicker beds, for the beóngá.

The ceremony is accompanied by a few dances and a bit of beer. The head of the family addresses the widows as follows: "We have split beóngá for you; climb up on them." Then he presents them with a few hens, given by relatives of the deceased. The widows prepare them and eat them all.

2. See Chapter III, Article IX.

765 On that occasion the head of the family hands over to the first born of the deceased the bosóló to which he is entitled. As described in Chapter III, Article III, he thus receives one of the widows as his wife. She immediately leaves the group of widows; from then on she is no longer bound by any mourning obligation and goes to live with her new husband. If she loved the deceased very much, however, she asks the heir to leave her alone for a time; and her wishes are always respected.

The seclusion ends in a great feast that closes the period of mourning. It is during this feast that the inheritance, of which the widows also form a part, is divided. We will deal with it in Article V. [424]

Article III. The Burial

764 The husband's burial involves no ceremony or special rules differing in any way from those for any other person. However, his kinswomen must "buy the tomb," that is, they must pay a few rings to the women married into the family to obtain permission for the interment. This payment should be compared with those made to obtain dispensations from alimentary prohibitions.

The people buried simultaneously and in the same grave as the body of an influential man are never his widows, but solely his slaves. (1)

A Nkundó must be buried in the land of his ancestors in the clan cemetery. Since these people operate under a system of exogamy, the corpse of a married woman is naturally transported to the village of her birth in order to be buried there.

Before it is transported the corpse receives the usual care with the accompanying sacrifices. It must be kept in the husband's house for at least one night. And this custom is still observed at present. In the past the corpse remained there for days on end, 764 for it was necessary first to celebrate the farewell feast, and the widower's family had to gather to discuss the matter and collect the valuables needed for the funeral payment (see the article which follows). Only after all that did the young men belonging to the [482] husband's family take the mortal remains upon their shoulders -- wrapped in a mat or enclosed in a coffin, depending on the case.

If possible all the husband's relatives take part in the procession. The pallbearers walk at the head. The men are armed with bows and arrows, knives and sticks, seldom with spears. The women accompany them [425], wailing. The husband and, if necessary, a few relatives carry with them the various objects they will need for the payments. Some men have a lotótsi (an [534] ocarina) (1) or an antelope horn on which they play intermittently. (2)

1. See my "Note sur les Instruments de Musique à l'Equateur (Note on Musical Instruments at the Equator)" in Congo, 1935, Vol. 2, July, p. 187, figs. 1 and 2 (p. 199).

2. Sometimes there is also an accompaniment of drums.

[201] At the time the corpse is lifted and while passing through villages between their own and their destination, the lokolé is struck with regular and equal blows (-kémya) to announce the arrival of the funeral procession.

584 764 The chief personage among those who follow the corpse is not the husband, but the ndonga. He may never be absent at that time. Even if the husband is deceased and the procession is that of a widow who has not remarried, the ndonga must always be in the party. The duty of bringing the corpse of a married woman is above all his.

The ndonga may go ahead of the procession to inform the family of the deceased of her death, and if there is a great distance between the wife's village and the husband's, he may not be able 764 [584] to return to join the procession, or may be able to do so only with difficulty.

The act of carrying a corpse to its native clan is not designated by any specific term. The expression is simply tsíka iláka, "to go and return the corpse."

764 431 In one or more places near the entrance to the village, a barrier (bokáko, lokombí, or loálaka) made of posts and palms is set up. There the relatives of the deceased, armed, wait for the procession of the husband's relatives, who are also armed, and forbid them to continue their march. Before passing, the latter must make a payment. The valuables given are called byĕkọ by'ôkáko or simply bokáko (or loálaka). The family of the deceased calls to the procession, "Halt! You will not pass here." The latter reply, "We come to bring [426] you the corpse of your child; we want to break down the barrier. Let us pass; here are [584] the gifts." The ndonga hands over a knife, a brass or copper ring, or some equivalent object (for instance, money, nowadays). Thereupon the members of the deceased's clan move away. The bǎnambótswá (persons related to both clans) break down the barrier, and the procession passes, headed by the ndonga and the bǎnambótswá. The husband follows the coffin.

764 579 In the past it was almost always necessary to force a passage through the barrier. The wife's family did not want to open and the husband's family did not want to pay, and so they came to blows. The group bearing the corpse tried to break down the barrier, while their adversaries tried to prevent them from doing so. The arms used in that struggle were chiefly pointed sticks which the members of the two camps threw at each other; more rarely, arrows were used. The specific name for this sort of brawl is ekòkélá. Certain clans specialize in this sport. Thus between Boímbo and Lileko, there is a regular battle every time. In such serious cases the barrier is heavily fortified; the posts are thick and hard, and intertwined with thorny creepers (bokau, longolí, wanganjála, etc.) and thorny shrubs (wĕngé, etc.). A quantity [825] of venomous biting ants (bafumba, mbómbá, byŏmbo, etc.) are added. If the brawl becomes serious, the ndonga and the other bǎnambótswa intervene and impose peace by requiring the husband's clan to pay.

764 579 Nevertheless, it may happen that the husband's family, while unable to vanquish their adversaries, persist in spite of everything in their desire not to pay. They run away and return home, abandoning the corpse in the hands of the family of the deceased. But this is a very serious offense. It is therefore considered simply as a breaking of the alliance between the two families. The husband need not bring funeral payments, for they will be refused in any case. Henceforth he can no longer [427] present a bride price to obtain a substitute for the deceased. Furthermore, he loses his rights over his children, whose maternal clan he has disowned, and if the matter is not settled in one way or another, he no longer has the right to the bride prices that will be paid for his daughters. And to add to his troubles, he risks being molested by the spirit of the deceased.

When the husband's party succeeds in opening a passage, the opposing clan hastens to defend the succeeding barrier. In fact, if the procession must pass through several clans or groups related to the wife (her mother's clan, grandfather's clan, grandmother's clan, etc.), each group sets up its own barrier,

If there are no more barriers, the struggle is ended. But in any case the husband must pay the valuables demanded for passing through. When the procession arrives at the village, the question of funeral payments is settled, and these "tolls" are included in the accounting.

In the past a brawl was usually inevitable. And even now they occur more frequently than we would suspect. But the violence has been reduced to a few light wounds. Some clans arrange the matter amicably without resorting to action. But only very seldom do they neglect to put up a barrier. Nevertheless, cases do occur here and there under the pressure of chiefs who favor the penetration of European notions of public peace and tranquility. In these instances the parties involved merely pay regular indemnities at the time of the palaver concerning funeral payments. A great friendship between the two clans involved sometimes favors this more humane type of behavior.

764 When the family of the deceased bars the route to the 578 funeral procession, they are manifesting the anger provoked by the 152 death of one of their members. [428] For they feel anger and [584] resentment, in spite of the fact that the ndonga carries a spear at the head of the procession as a sign that they come as friends, without evil intentions.

This does not mean that the natives attribute the cause of death to the husband and his family. In most cases they are convinced that the latter could not prevent it. Although they express themselves in those terms: lóótoomela bǒna (nkâna, eóto), "you have killed our child (sister, relative)," they do not maintain that the husband's clan has really killed her, but only that she died among them. Under the circumstances do they feign anger to obtain valuables, for example? I do not think so. The Nkundó do not say that they simulate anger; they categorically state that they feel it and that they want to show it in the manner described. We should not be astonished at this since -- as we have noted in the study on the funeral customs of the Nkundó (Les Coutumes funéraires des Nkundó), the emotions of anger and sorrow seem to be intimately related among these peoples.

When the funeral procession passes through the last barrier, 764 that which bars the entrance to the village, the husband's clan puts down the body, and it is subsequently lifted up by the family of the deceased, who carry it into the house of the head of the family. They are followed by the ndonga, the bǎnambótswá, the husband, and his relatives. The family of the deceased wail over her. Her kinswomen (biúnanyi) show their sorrow-anger by mistreating the clan wives (baájáála), by smearing their bodies with mud, dressing them in basáki, and hitting them with stinging plants (bansǎnsá). For the deceased is the baájâála's "husband," that is, a kinswoman of their husbands. The baájâála treat the widower and his relatives in the same way, because "their husband" has died among them.

The corpse is thus deposited in the hut of the head of the family. Each time that kinswomen who are married elsewhere arrive [429] to mourn over the deceased, the baájáála forbid them 764 to enter the funeral hut. First they are required to go to the far end of the village, weeping for the deceased, to show their sorrow.

As I have said in the study cited, it often happens that after some time the lamentations slacken and the women keeping watch begin to chat. One day I was present during a quarrel on [578] this subject between the bíínanyí and the baáŋóála. The former were reproaching the latter for not weeping any longer: "After all it is your husband," they said. The others replied, "It is your kinswoman; therefore it is up to you to weep. Are your eyes so dry that they no longer contain tears?"

Sometimes the husband and his close relatives do not participate in transferring the body, because they have not yet succeeded in collecting the necessary valuables. Actually it is entirely legitimate for them to stay at home in such a case, in order not to be exposed to endless discussions and the ridicule of the entire region. In other instances the husband's family belongs only to a small clan, and therefore they do not dare to appear in the village of the deceased. They are afraid that they will not be able to defend themselves properly against the ill treatment that would be inflicted upon them by the women married into the clan to which they go. For in fact these women would mistreat them by throwing mud at them or smearing them with it, and by striking their bodies with stinging plants called benánsí. For they consider that the widower, whom, by extension, they also call their husband, and his close relatives have killed their husbands' kinswoman.

In such cases the corpse is brought by distant relatives of the husband. The ndonga apologizes for the husband to the parents-in-law and tells them that he will come later to settle everything. The clan of the deceased receives the corpse and continues to perform the last tributes to it. If the husband has remained in his own village only out of fear of ill treatment, [430] he often waits only until nightfall and then takes advantage of the darkness to follow his wife's corpse.

The corpse must remain in the head of the family's house for at least one night.

764 Before proceeding with the burial, the two families settle the question of funeral payments, which we are about to examine. A "farewell feast" is given by the clan of the deceased. The interment itself has no special features, so that it will suffice to refer the reader to the study of this subject that has been cited.

766 As we noted in Chapter VII, Article II, a husband can buy the corpse of his favorite. Unless the execution of this intention meets with some obstacle, the corpse is not transported to the favorite's native clan but is buried next to the husband's tomb in his clan cemetery. As a result, all that accompanies the transporting of the corpse is omitted, as is the funeral payment which is compensated for by the purchase of the corpse. The husband or his family only send the wife's relatives the payment that usually accompanies the news of her death.

Article IV. Funeral Payments

764 As we have just said, before the husband proceeds with the transportation of a deceased wife's corpse, he collects the valuables to pay the nkunjí. This is the term (derived from the verb kunda, "to bury") that designates the various payments a widower is required to make to the clan of the deceased.

First of all, as soon as the death is known, the ndonga goes to the parents of the deceased and brings them the nsango (news), which consists of a copper ring or a knife. He presents them with these, saying: "Know that your daughter so-and-so has just died."

At every barrier the procession must cross to reach the village of the deceased, the husband must make payment of some object [431] (usually a knife or a ring) in order to obtain free passage. [594] The ndonga always serves as intermediary. These payments are called byfẽg by'ikâko or simply bokâko, lokâlaka (barrier), or, among the Bombwanja, ifakâ yĩ ekâlaki, "knife for felling (the barrier)."

The ndonga walks at the head of the funeral procession; he (or another bonamóórwá who takes his place) carries a spear

764 to which a piece of raffia cloth is tied. When the procession has crossed the last barrier, the official witness goes ahead and plants the spear in the roof of the head of the family's hut. Hence the name applied specifically to this spear: itúwansambá (from túwa, "to pierce," and mambá "roof"). The spear signifies that the widower's family is not coming with evil intentions, but that they are moved by feelings of the greatest friendship -- wɛ̂ka te tɔ́fɔ́yɛ́ l'etumba; tɔ́fɔ́yá ndé ólotsíkela iláká y'ɔ́na.

The piece of cloth is a sign of respect for the mother of the deceased, in memory of the pain she suffered in giving birth to her daughter and the care she exercised in her upbringing, and as consolation for the terrible blow that has come to her in the death of her child. She will wear this cloth after the end of mourning. If the mother has died before her daughter, this cloth goes to one of the mother's sisters, aunts, or other relatives, who is in some sense her substitute. It is therefore a payment to the mother's clan.

The spear and the cloth are usually designated by the common name likongá l'etóo, "spear and cloth." A knife, particularly an ingóndá, can be substituted for the cloth, but the name etóo is retained. Nowadays the cloth is no longer given, but a knife which is given the name etóo is always substituted for it. (1) Nevertheless, in memory of [432] the ancient custom, a piece of European cloth is often attached to the end of the spear.

[286] 1. The reason for this substitution is, first of all, the greater value of the knife and, second, the near impossibility of obtaining raffia cloth (see Introduction).

When the corpse has been deposited in the head of the family's hut, the two clans greet each other in the usual fashion. The women continue to weep for some time. The husband's clan [262] go and sit at a little distance. Then the relatives of the deceased [431] instruct their wives to collect the presents to give the widower,

764 These consist of various foods: manioc, bananas, smoked meat
431 or fish, caterpillars, salt, hens, etc., one or several dogs
[262] (bompángɔ́) that are alive (mbwá ɛ́ɛ̂ nkunja, "dog with hair") or their value in specie (2 rings or 1 ring and an equivalent knife, which for this purpose is called mbwá ɛ́ɛ̂ baúmbá or ɛ́ɛ̂ bakonga), as well as a knife for killing and cutting up animals called loólolá. The biúnanyi and the baájɔ̂ɔla each brings his part. Note that this gift never includes vegetables (bimukɛ́lá).

When everything is collected and considered adequate, the 764 ndonga is called, together with the deceased's own sons, so that 584 they can thus give their opinion and later have a good basis for testimony. As remuneration for his services, the ndonga receives a payment (nyongo) of a bokósa fish or a botómba rat, as well as a bunch of bananas (for which a ring is sometimes substituted). With reference to this subject I should like to recount an interesting part of the negotiations at which I was present one day. The ndonga expressed his dissatisfaction with the fact that he was given only a single bokósa. "It is so little," he said, "in comparison with all the trouble I had to take. I had to settle the matter of the bride price; I had to reconcile man and wife when they quarreled; I had to intervene many times; I always had to run between the two clans; for many years I wore myself out without ever having any rest. And for all that trouble I get such small recompense." I was asked my opinion. I could only express approval of the ndonga's view. One of the relatives [433] of the deceased also considered him to be right: "He was always obliged to come and go between the two families; his voice has become hoarse from his endless interventions in palavers and quarrels; he well deserves that another bokósa be added." Everyone sided with our opinion, and the ndonga was satisfied.

After receiving his present, the ndongá detaches himself from the group. Together with the other banambósswá and any intelligent strangers who may be present and might be able to give an opinion to settle an incidental argument, he sits down between the two opposing clans, a slight distance from each.

764 584 All the payments must pass through the ndonga. He is the one who transmits the desired objects from one group to the other. He intervenes in the disputes that arise in order to settle them and re-establish peace. He explains the various points of view, elucidates some consideration whose significance the other group does not seem to fully comprehend, etc.

As has already been said many times, there can be several ndonga. Legally all of them can intervene personally or through their officially recognized representatives. Thus, several months ago (1933) at Bonjoku, Baémbe, wife of Ikomo of Besombó, was present at a nkunjí discussion. No one paid any attention to her. At one point she threw herself into the discussion by reprimanding the chief ndonga and the families involved, asking them on what basis they were excluding her from this affair. Did not her husband have the right to intervene? Was he not also a ndonga? Since he had gone fishing in the Jwalé, it was impossible for him to come. [576] She could therefore legitimately substitute for him. Then why was she being left out? She was quickly pacified, and the persons involved admitted that she was right and apologized for their forgetfulness and negligence.

764 584 431 The wives of the deceased's clan place the gifts of food at the ndonga's feet. The bokíné (the youngest) of the clan goes and explains to him what they are and for whom [434] the gifts are intended. (1) One portion goes to the bakalé of the deceased, that is, the baéjáfla of the husband's clan; another portion goes to the baóme (the husbands), that is, to the widower and his family; a third part is set aside for kinswomen of the deceased who have come from villages into which they are married in order to be present at the funeral.

764 The clan of the deceased first asks the other clan "for news" (bola mango). The latter reply that one of their members had

1. In the Nkundó hierarchy it is always the youngest who is charged with the execution of all such small tasks, at the behest of the head of the family.

764 married the daughter of the first clan, and she had lived happily with her husband, performed conjugal services for him, and had begotten children for him. Subsequently she fell ill, as they were informed at the time, and now God has taken her away and they have come to bring the corpse back to them. The wife's clan replies: "That is understood, but before we continue to ask each other for news, do accept the present (lionja) which we offer you." Thereupon the ndonga enumerates all that has been collected and passes it to the widower.

431 The foods thus given are a friendly welcoming gift, therefore they are not counted as a payment nor, furthermore, as part of the nkomɛ. Only the domestic animals are considered such. They can be eaten on the spot or kept alive. Since the prepared food is a present, it must be eaten on the spot. Theoretically, none of it may be taken home. If it is taken home for some reason or other, however, it is still forbidden to allow anyone to eat of it who was not present at the funeral gathering. As for the raw food, the recipients are free to carry it away if some is left over.

578 Disputes may arise on the subject of the dog -- such as one I witnessed one day. The presents offered included the equivalent of the value of a dog in rings rather than a living dog. [435] The head of the widower's family demanded a dog in flesh and blood. The reason he gave was that many of his bifanyɛ had come to the funeral and, as an expression of his thanks for their condolences, he wanted to give them a dog. As he would not yield, the wife's family had to replace the two rings with the animal demanded.

Then the ndonga explains to the family of the deceased that he has already brought the mango, the lilongá, and the esóo. Nowadays it happens that the spear and the cloth are not given until this time, especially if the families refrain from erecting barriers and fighting. In such cases the payments of passage are made at the same time. If the two settlements are very near each other, the people are even beginning to omit the sending of the mango; a bonambónwá goes and confirms the news of the death, which is already expected and which the lokolé will just have announced.

164 Then the members of the wife's family, one by one, demand various payments. Every request arouses discussion, for it is fashionable to prolong these palavers. One side and then the other examines the pros and cons. The widower's family acts as if they needed a little urging, for if they did not, the ceremony would no longer resemble a palaver (which it really is) but would seem like a simple payment of no importance.

When the wife's family has enumerated the presents of food that have been offered and accepted and the payments that have already been made, they begin to ask that the other nkunjí valuables be brought. The widower's clan explain their point of view, and a member of the wife's clan immediately begins to beat the gong (lokolé), which is nearby. It is no longer possible to understand a word of what the husband's spokesman is saying. Full of fortitude and an African's patience, the latter continues his discourse. But finally he realizes that he has to stop. He therefore asks that the lokolé be silenced. Naturally, he has no success. The wife's clan dryly replies: "If you want us to stop, bring us a ring." [436] Thus the husband is forced to pay, and when he does the noise of the lokolé stops at once, and the discussion can continue. For this reason that first payment is called lokolé. (1)

1. The pressure exercised to obtain it is called isesenganya yá lokolé. It should be compared with the identical practice at the time of the payment of the bride price (Chapter II, Article V, 3).

Then a young and vigorous relative of the deceased leaves his group. He acts angry, strikes his hands, and defies the widower's clan: "Send one of your men to fight me, for I am furious that you have allowed my kinswoman to die of starvation." He is answered with many protestations: "We are friends; we have no hostile feelings. It is not our fault that our wife is dead." The first speaker repeats his statement and his challenge, and continues to reproach them with the death until he is given a ring called bonkita, meaning "starvation."

Nkundo

Another young member of the clan of the deceased seats himself midway between the two groups. An etáka (a wooden fork) is placed on his neck, and he says: "This is how you would have treated me if my sister had left you. I ran the risk of having to suffer because of her and you. Compensate me for that." And he does not go away until he has received a ring, which for that reason is called etáka. (2)

> 2. This representation only approximates reality, for the young man would not have been treated thus. The wife herself is the one who would be placed under the etáka. But the young man represents the entire clan as a whole.

Subsequently, various payments each consisting of a ring or a knife are demanded with many imitative and symbolic gestures (in the manner described for the two above). They are:

ilɛmɔ (besáfoga l'ilɛmɔ), because of the potions that the deceased prepared for her husband.

bantsingɛ -- the packages of food that she cooked in ashes for him. [437]

bafonda -- the pieces of palm nut she prepared for him. (These pieces are represented by a few little lumps of earth placed on leaves.)

nkɔ́ngi -- the eyelashes she plucked out for him.

bokɛngɔ -- because she cut his hair (-kɛnga).

nsili -- the lice she removed from his head. (Note that this payment can be combined with the preceding one and can then consist of a single kɛnga for both.)

bompílo -- the hot baths she heated for him.

mouka -- baskets of fish, because she went fishing for him.

bafɔngɔ́ -- the litter on which the corpse was transported.

bakɔmbɔ -- the creepers with which the corpse was tied.

betówa (itówá) -- the banana tree trunks on which the corpse rested. (The corpse, in a mat or coffin, is set on two banana tree trunks placed crosswise.)

764 bikọfọ -- the heavy branches upon which lay the bed in which the woman died.

lǒngo -- a hoe (real or replaced by a ring) to dig the grave.

ifaká -- a knife (ditto) to dig the grave.

yǎndá -- an axe (ditto) to cut the roots that would be found at the site of the grave. (1)

[781] 1. One day I saw the iron bar given as yándá refused by the wife's family because it was the same one they themselves had given to help the husband pay the nkanga (doctor-sorcerer) for his divination (bolíngó) during the wife's illness.

bombɛ́mbé wǎ nyang'éy'ọ̌na -- a belt for the mother of the deceased, so that she can wear it during mourning.

bọtsá w'ílaká -- the head of the corpse, in honor of those who wail over the deceased while sitting near her head, that is, [438] to say, the very close relatives. This is the last and largest payment, consisting of 3 to 5 rings.

All these payments together comprise the nkunjí and, with the exception of the nsango, the likọngá l'etóo, and the byẹ̌ko by'ôkáko, they are a kind of beéngo. (1) Not all the beéngo are equally large. Therefore, all of them are not always claimed. The smallest ones -- bakẹmọ, bantsingá, baóndo, nkọ́ngi, bọkẹngọ, nsili, bompúlo, mpuka -- are often omitted.

Even some of the others may be left out. The matter depends not only on the friendliness of feeling between the two groups, but chiefly on the number of children to which the woman in question has given birth. If the woman was sterile, her family is less demanding. But if the deceased had several children, they do not yield, arguing that their daughter was a source of great profit to her husband's clan.

1. See Chapter II, Article V.

In every case at least a few beéngo in addition to the 764 bombémbé and the botsá w'îlaká are always claimed. The latter payments can never be omitted. The belt is a payment made exclusively to the mother and by rights it goes to the mother's clan.

The higher the amount of these funeral payments, the more 764 606 607 the son-in-law is welcome. The alliance is perfect. Therefore, not only will the wife's family reciprocate his fine feelings by adding a few more dogs, but in addition the son-in-law will be well received and successful in his application when, after the period of mourning, he brings the sum of the ibóleóko in order to obtain a substitute for the deceased. (2) In addition, if the relations with his in-laws have been excellent, he will easily obtain the substitute in advance, so that she can care for him during the entire mourning period.

There are severe sanctions against the omission of the 764 689 funeral payments. [439] Neglecting to send the notification gift alone is enough to set these in motion. They are: the breaking off of the affinal relationship; the loss of the children, since the father's offense is equal to a repudiation; and finally molestation of the culprit by the spirit of the deceased. Thus at Bokátola (Bompela) one can find two boys, Botétsí and Ikembá, the children of Bonyongela of Ilángá and Etáka of Bokátola. They have now been incorporated into their mother's clan, because their father did not send a nsango. On stronger grounds the same is true for the whole nkunjí.

Article V. The Social Position of a Widow

In Chapter III, Articles II and IV, we have already noted 768 587 that in the eyes of the Nkundó, the death of the husband does not dissolve a marriage. The union continues, and even after mourning it is not broken ipso facto. Even to have the woman taken and treated as a wife by another man is not enough to end it. As

2. See Chapter III, Article IV.

768 587 long as there has been no restitution of the bride price, the widow continues to "belong" to the heirs of the deceased and to be their wife in the sense described in the chapter cited above, Article IX. The various forms in which this marriage can be continued post mortem have been described in Chapter III, Article II.

There we also saw that nothing prevents the widow from remarrying outside the inheriting family and therefore from becoming involved in a really new and different union. On the other hand, nothing obliges her to do so. She is entirely free. The only exception -- if this instance can be called an exception -- is a widow who is the object of a will, and a bosóló (Chapter III, Article II, in fine, and Article III). As to the latter, it is even difficult to consider her remarriage to the eldest son of the deceased as a limitation on her freedom. For although according to law it is obligatory, in practice it is voluntary and accompanied by guarantees of freedom that are adequate for ordinary cases. Indeed, it is known that she agrees [440] to this union. And she can always resort to divorce if later the heir disappoints her or if the continuation of the union becomes morally impossible.

It would be useless and tedious to repeat all that we have said on this subject in Chapter III. Let us simply reiterate that the distribution of widows should not be understood as a distribution of persons, depriving them of the freedom to be directed by their wills and their hearts, but rather as a distribution of the bride-price claims which they represent. The legal freedom to remarry remains as complete as it is when they are unmarried. This freedom may be subject to influences and even to real attacks, whose seriousness varies with the circumstances, but these are matters of fact and not of law.

If the widow considers herself -- or is considered -- too old for remarriage, or even if she desires to remain continent in faithfulness to her deceased husband, she may continue to reside with the clan of the deceased, instead of returning to her own family. The heirs usually do not oppose such an action and respect her wishes. If she has children or grandchildren there is no question about it; they are glad to keep their aged mother or grandmother near them.

Article VI. The Economic Position of a Widow

736 As long as her seclusion lasts, a widow continues to live with the family of her deceased husband. 768 She supplies herself with food from the crops she has grown. The tools her husband has given her remain in her hands, and she makes use of them as soon as she can. As to the various utensils which must be destroyed, they are replaced by others lent her by the family of the deceased, for she may no longer use those which served her in her husband's lifetime.

In order to better express the magnitude of their mourning, the Nkundó often refrain [441] from using the products of the farms established by the deceased. Therefore, instead of continuing to cultivate the existing crops of manioc and vegetables, the widow prefers to seek provisions in the fields of the close relatives of the deceased. Or a man who has already chosen her may place his fields at her disposal. If neither of these sources is available and she wishes to observe the rule rigorously, she must purchase what she needs in this realm.

736 768 421 As we have seen in Chapter VI, Article II, a widow has no claim to the fruits of her labors. Neither the money she has earned and which is intended for the common needs of the household, nor the crops she has set up, nor the fish she has caught, nor the caterpillars she has gathered in the forest belong to her. Everything goes to the heirs. Her property is limited to objects she may have received as her personal share in her daughter's bride price, or as some other payment belonging exclusively to the mother.

If the widow remains in the family of the deceased, however, her fields, tools, etc., are left to her, for under those conditions there is no reason to take them away from her. But if she [781] remarries elsewhere, the heirs are pitiless. A Nkundó does not want the family wealth to be scattered or squandered in any way. The law says lokutu lǒkfsó lófótsw'înyamó, "our patrimony can not be alienated."

736 768 In point of fact the widow is treated more favorably, at least in the best instances. If her relations with the family have been good, they will not refuse her some small object that she 736 may wish to keep. In exemplary unions she is allowed to keep 768 the mats she has woven with her own hands, and the goods she received from her husband -- fabrics, beads, hens, even goats and dogs, and even sometimes what she has acquired through joint efforts with her husband (crops, livestock) -- are divided equally. The division is usually carried out with a generous attitude toward the widow, and if there is only one object of a kind the tendency is to let her have it. [442] Such conduct springs from pure generosity, for -- as has already been said -- the woman has absolutely no claim. In the past it followed only upon extraordinarily happy unions, and particularly in consideration of the relationship between the two families and the affection of one of the immediate heirs for the widow.

At the present time the influence of the missions is increasing 736 the number of instances of generosity toward the widow and starting 768 an inclination to make it a general rule. Thus good Christian 797 families -- if they are not thwarted by their pagan relatives -- leave the widow those objects she personally used, such as clothing, utensils, a trunk, and even a sewing machine.

Article VII. Economic Effects of Death

1. Bride price and dowry

768 The death of one of the spouses dissolves a marriage only 583x from a certain point of view and only as a union between two specific individuals. A marriage is absolutely broken only by the death of both spouses (or by divorce).

Unlike divorce death does not bring about any repayment either of the bride price or of the dowry (nkgmf). When the wife dies, all these payments remain in the hands of the respective parties. When a husband dies, the widow continues to belong to the heirs; she is part of the inheritance. The children belong to the father and his family; no new payment for them is necessary.

583x Therefore there is a very great difference between the consequences of divorce and of death. In divorce the bride price must be considered more or less like a deposit. In case of death, on the contrary, it remains permanently in the hands of those who have acquired it. This difference weakens the theory that maintains that the bride price is only a guarantee; rather, it tends to favor the theory that it is a compensation for the loss experienced by a clan when it gives one of its members in marriage. In case of divorce the clan's loss [443] is nullified, since the woman returns to her family or -- as is the usual outcome -- remarries and becomes the object of a new bride-price payment. The death of a woman, on the other hand, makes the clan's loss permanent rather than bringing an end to it. This does not mean that the bride price does not constitute a guarantee; in reality it is one. But this guarantee is an effect of the bride price, not the reason for its existence -- which is something altogether different.

2. Inheritance from the husband

428
178 Since we are not dealing with Nkundó property laws, the question of inheritance is not, strictly speaking, within the realm of our study. Nevertheless, we cannot refrain from saying a word about it, since the study of marriage must naturally contain a chapter on children. Thus we shall examine the question from that particular angle. What interests us here is knowing what rights children have over their father's inheritance. We have already dealt with the position of the widow in the preceding article.

The inheritance from the deceased includes three parts:

1) The bride-price valuables, that is, everything that is used chiefly to obtain a wife: copper and brass rings, iron objects, widows and daughters insofar as they represent bride-price valuables.

2) Domestic animals: goats, dogs, hens, ducks.

3) Real property: fruit trees, fields and crops, hunting enclosures, fishing places; and personal property: nets, hunting snares, bows and arrows, shields.

The bride-price valuables become the common property of the close relatives. Each one receives his share of the inheritance.

768 The widows are awarded to the brothers, uncles, and nephews 428 (bǎnankáná) of the deceased, in accordance with their position in 178 the group hierarchy and their respective rights, [444] which may derive from financial assistance lent to the deceased so that he could obtain one of his wives, or from the application of the nkita system. Rings (bakonga) and iron objects (bifeko) are distributed in the same manner. Similarly, unmarried daughters are assigned to various relatives -- that is, the "fathers" who preside at the division of the inheritance discuss and specify which persons have the right to receive the bride prices that will later be paid for them. Of the sons only the eldest receives a wife or a certain amount of bride-price valuables as bosólo. (1)

1. Chapter III, Article III.

That is the traditional rule. Nowadays a far-reaching change has already taken place. The sons of the deceased are no longer excluded from the distribution. They are given either a wife, or a sufficient quantity of rings, or the right to the bride price of a sister or a cousin, if it is possible. For the rest see Chapter II, Article IV, 3 and Article XI, 3, 13, and Chapter IV, Article II.

The domestic animals go to the biúnanyí, who take them home to their husbands and they are thus included in the amount of the dowry. A few goats, however, might be given to one of the men in the kin group who needs them to complete the payment of a bride price.

As to the other property (real or personal), they pass directly to the sons. The first born receives the lion's share and the most precious items, but the younger sons are not excluded in the distribution.

It should be noted that a will may affect this distribution by assigning a specific object to a given son, or by excluding one of the heirs with whom the deceased has had a serious quarrel. Such a will is always executed, because the Nkundó fear the vengeance of the deceased, who causes anyone guilty of an 768 infraction to follow him in death. It is obeyed even if [445] it is 428 manifestly unfair. They fear reprisal by the deceased, such as that 178 which is thought to have happened after the death of Iloko is Efekele of Lofelí. He had killed his own brother, Mpɛ́nda ɛ̂â nkotonkale, [682] because the latter had tasted freshly brewed beer instead of leaving that honor to him -- an action which constituted an extremely serious offense. But since the punishment was out of all proportion to the act, the whole family united against the murderer, who was obliged to flee. At his death he disinherited all his brothers in favor of his sons. This will, considered unreasonable and unfair, was not respected; Iloko's only brother, Bondélé wǎ Wǐlima, took Bonyengú, the favorite, for himself. But he soon died, and his death was attributed to Iloko's vengeance. Several years ago the family met to finally settle the matter of the inheritance. The largest portion was set aside for Iloko's sons, but one part was awarded to other relatives who were not named in the excluding clause, which referred only to the Basɛ́ká Banángá, that is, to Iloko's own brothers.

Sons are never disinherited. If one of them behaves very badly toward his father, when the latter dies he refuses him his benediction (bokako w'ɔ̃lɔ́tsi) and curses him bokako wǎ tu yo).

3. Inheritance from the wife

768
428 As we have seen in Chapter VI, Article II, a wife has no rights of ownership over the fruits of her own labors or of the couple's joint efforts. Consequently, her family can make no claims as regards inheritance; there is nothing to inherit.

Although all the fruits of the wife's activities belong to the husband, most men do not require that their rights be rigidly respected. They leave a part, or the whole, to the family of the [446] deceased, as is done in the case of a widow. (1) After the feast at the end of mourning, the two clans make an inventory of the property in question. Usually whatever products of her work the woman has left are divided equally between the two clans. Some

1. See the previous article.

768 428 men are generous enough to renounce all of it. If the deceased had an ebísa, or if the parents-in-law give their son-in-law a substitute, the possessions fall to her. She even inherits the fields [culture] that have been set up by her kinswoman, to the extent that they have not been destroyed. Under other circumstances the cultivated lands [plantations] are never left to the family of the deceased.

The only items to which a woman is entitled strictly speaking are the various portions of the bride price and similar payments awarded to her by Nkundó law: goats and spiral bands and the mother's gifts as part of the bride price; the cloth and belt given at a funeral. At a wife's death these possessions pass to her clan, if she has not previously given them to her relatives. In no case may they be appropriated by the husband.

Finally, when a wife dies she may leave a tool (knife, hoe, etc.) to her daughter. This custom is observed particularly by very active women in order to inculcate their daughters with the love [523] of work. Such an object often became an heirloom, transmitted from mother to daughter for several generations. It is called botsíkéjwá (from tsíkela, "to leave to"; see the Latin reliquiae) or, among the Bombwanja, elíli. These terms are also applied to other objects included in the inheritance when these are considered separately (altogether they are called lokutu, "patrimony," "property," or lisangó, "inheritance"). Such a botsíkéjwá can never be appropriated by a husband. [447]

Article VIII

Death of the Fiancé Before the Payment of the Bride Price

768 584 Here we shall deal with the situation resulting from the death of a husband during the engagement, after the payment of the ilíulá or the ndanga but before the walo. The procedure for dissolving an engagement may already lead us to suppose that death also breaks it without any special difficulties. And in fact, if the fiancé dies the woman is free. Therefore she may go home, and the family of the deceased is reimbursed for the payments that have been made.

768 584 She can also remain in her fiancé's family and there be taken in marriage by one of his kinsmen. If everything favors the continuation of the union, the new husband-to-be pays the bride price, but he need not repeat the engagement payments, which retain their validity. If he belongs to a distant branch of the family, however, the kin of the deceased will not want to give up their property, and the new fiancé himself will have to acquit himself of all the bride-price obligations, beginning with the ikulá.

[763] Sometimes the dying man, in making his last requests, enjoins his family to maintain the alliance. In that case one of his kinsman must marry the woman. If later on a breakup becomes inevitable, the spouses separate. For that matter, if the woman lacks the inclination to remarry in her fiancé's kin group, she will not be forced to do so.

This practice is based on the stipulation of Nkundó law that engaged persons have all the duties and privileges of married couples.

[587] There is nothing among the Nkundó that resembles a levirate. Even in the case we cited of a last will, the obligation derives solely from the sacred nature of that will. [448]

Article IX

The Death of the Woman Before the Payment of the Bride Price

Two situations must be distinguished: 1) The woman dies during the engagement; 2) she dies before the bosóngo.

1. Before the walo

As has already been said, engaged persons enjoy all the duties and privileges of a married couple. If the girl dies the fiancé must fulfill all obligations toward the deceased and her family (transporting the corpse, sacrifices, nkunjí). But his obligations do not end there.

Through the payment of the ndanga (and, in practice, already through the ikulá) he is considered responsible for any accident that might befall his fiancée in his home; and he has assumed the 168 obligation of completing the union by subsequent payments.

584 The consequence of this fact is that if the fiancée dies before he has fulfilled his obligations, he is forced to pay a large indemnity (mbálaka) to his parents-in-law, who have been disappointed and deprived of their rights. The amount of this payment varies. Usually it is about equal to what ordinarily would have been paid as the walo, whence comes the expression used in these cases: énga iláká (ikombe among the Injóló and the Boángí), "to pay the bride price for the corpse."

Sometimes the woman's family is less demanding. This is especially true if they are very fond of their son-in-law and know that he is wealthy and generous enough to considerably increase the amount of the nkunjí, the ibóleóko, and the bride price for a substitute. The principle of the indemnity is secure, but its external form is altered and made less humiliating.

In other cases the woman's family raises the amount to be paid as indemnity, either out of greed or because they are not pleased with the union or even opposed to it (this happened rarely in the past but has become more frequent nowadays). [449] Under such circumstances, up to 100 and 150 rings are demanded, as in the following instance which occurred quite recently. Ilumbé of Mpámá (Boéndé) took Lokokú of Bongíli wǎ Ndongó for his wife. He paid 10 rings as ilmlá-ndanga. When some time later he brought 40 rings for the walo, his father-in-law considered them insufficient (and he was entirely right). The small amount of valuables showed the son-in-law's poverty and foreshadowed his insolvency, so Lokokú's family was not greatly pleased with the marriage. Consequently, they refused to accept the rings, which therefore remained on deposit with the nd[illegible]. After two years of cohabitation, Lokokú died (July 16, 1933). The family of the deceased demanded 100 rings. Ilumbé could not invoke any excuse or attenuating circumstance. For if he had wanted to fulfill his obligations, he could have done so, as the interval was long enough, and if he knew he did not have the means, he should have given up the woman.

768 584 In the past the widower and his family sometimes refused to pay, with the result that the parties took up arms. The right of war was involved. For when the hostilities ended, the culprit was required to indemnify all the families on his side for any member who was killed or wounded. Therefore he ran the risk of seeing all his property confiscated and being sold as a slave if they did not suffice. He found it was wiser simply to submit to normal sanctions rather than run such serious risks.

The situation with which we are dealing in this article may involve further complications if the woman has been living with her own family, or if she belongs to another man whose bride price has not yet been refunded. But it is preferable to deal with these complications in separate articles.

768 2. Before the bọsọ́ngọ

If the woman dies before the bọsọ́ngọ is paid, the widower is not required to pay an indemnity. However, he must complete the bride price by handing over "the slave." [450]

If he does not do so: (1) the alliance is broken ipso facto, and therefore he cannot bring the ibőleóko and does not receive a substitute; 2) the family of the deceased is entitled to one of the daughters if there are any, or to one of the boys if there are none. This is a compensation for the loss of the bọsọ́ngọ.

Naturally, the woman's family can in practice refrain from claiming their rights. Thus, they may do so out of regard for their son-in-law who is influential, generous, and well disposed toward them, in anticipation of greater financial and social benefits. The similar remarks made throughout this study have already [157] familiarized us with the "broad-mindedness" of these peoples.

It might be observed that this situation is in no way different from the preceding one, since the woman's family is indemnified in either case. But, first of all, if the woman has left no children, the situation is not at all identical. Secondly, even if the financial aspect of the two situations is the same, the legal aspect is entirely different. The taking of a child and the refusal to accept the ibőleóko are not considered as compensation. The 768 Nkundó categorically state that the situation now under discussion does not result in the payment of an indemnity.

This observation again brings out the basic difference between jengí and bosóngo, which we have already discussed in Chapter II, Article IX, 2 and Article XII, 5, and suggests that the walo constitutes the marriage agreement, whereas the bosóngo is the substitution of a person for the one that is lost to the clan through the marriage of one of their members.

Article X

A Woman's Death at the Home of Her Own Family

768 We have already drawn the reader's attention several times 593 to the fact that a husband is responsible for his wife because, in 672 accordance with the clan agreement between the families, she "belongs" to him. [451] The consequence of this stipulation of Nkundó law is that the husband assumes all risks relating to the wife; hence he must take upon himself all the damages resulting from her death. There are exceptions to this general rule, however, under the following two circumstances:

1) If the wife dies while at the home of her own family.

2) If the wife dies after having left her own husband for another.

In this article we will examine the first of these two possible situations, leaving the second one for the next article.

If a wife dies while at her own family's home, an exception is made if certain conditions are fulfilled. There are several situations possible:

1) The wife returns to her family because she is exasperated with the unfair treatment she receives from her husband. He may not be fulfilling his duties toward her, may be mistreating her unjustly, etc., as we have seen in Chapter VI, Article III The situation becomes unbearable. In that case the husband is clearly in the wrong, and the wife has the right to seek a little peace in her parents' home. Under such conditions, if she dies before the

768 husband has come to take her back through arranging a palaver by 672 means of a boóndo, he has no right to complain. He himself
593 brought on such difficulties by his unfair way of behaving. He is obliged to make the funeral payments. Because of the strained relations between him and his father-in-law, the affinal relationship is broken. That is why he will ordinarily refuse to pay the nkunjɛ, at least when he has had no children by this woman. If he omits the payment even though there are progeny, the children are taken from him by their mother's family.

This situation seldom arose in the past. Young and impetuous husbands were almost nonexistent. The old men kept the women for themselves. Age and experience with life had made them more settled, calmer, more reasonable, so they did not throw themselves into adventures [432] whose outcome were necessarily to their disadvantage. Since today men marry considerably younger, such situations can arise more easily; although, on the other hand, a permanent dissolution of the marriage occurs most frequently before the possible development described.

2) The wife leaves her husband without just reason and, having returned to her family, dies there. In the past such a situation was quite rare (Chapter VIII, Article II, 1, A). If no war occurred before the death of the fugitive (a war automatically terminated the affair), the husband had every right to reimbursement or to a substitution of another wife for the deceased. The situation is therefore identical to the one that follows. But there is no longer any question of sending back the corpse, and if the husband wants to break the alliance permanently he does not even need to pay the nkunjɛ.

Nowadays this situation has become far more common. It presents no special difficulty; the ancient custom continues to be observed.

It is almost trifling to mention that the matter of total or 768 partial reimbursement of the bride price can be handled through 593 friendly transactions between the husband and his parents-in-law. The following case is typical: Bonjelɛ of Ifimbo (Bonkoso) inherited Bofɛlɛ, daughter of Lokɛlɛmbɛ is Ibele of Bongenda. After some years she left her husband, returned home, and died. Her father

368 583 sent the notification gift and even added dogs to it, because he was interested in keeping the affinal relationship. The corpse was not sent since the woman had died of an infectious disease and the body was decomposing rapidly so that contagion was feared. Lokálímbá presented the widower with his youngest daughter Mbangó as a substitute. But since she was quite young, Bonjeló did not want her. He was satisfied with an indemnity because -- after all -- he too wanted to remain on good terms with his father-in-law. The latter sent him 22 rings as an ilongó (slave), and thus the matter was closed. [453]

368 672 585 3) The wife has returned to her family on her own initiative in order to visit her parents, nurse them, or to participate in her family's communal fishing, to get her supply of edible caterpillars, or for any other reason. In such a case the responsibility passes from the husband to the parents. The family must notify the husband of the death (always, of course, through the ndonga). When the husband receives the news he accuses his parents-in-law, saying: lóómbomela walí, "You have killed my wife." He demands that the corpse be sent to him so that he can wash it, adorn it in an appropriate manner, and mourn for the deceased. Subsequently he sends the corpse back with the ndonga and demands that another wife be substituted for the deceased or, if none is available, that the bride price be returned to him. As long as his father-in-law does not fulfill his obligations, the husband will not bring the funeral payments. Moreover, if the family of the deceased is recalcitrant or too slow, he will practice ikákelo, that is, he will hold one of his kinswomen who is married into the clan of the deceased in order to obtain her bride price. In this way he will obtain the valuables to which he is entitled; the two bride prices balance one another and the matter is settled permanently. In that case he naturally retains all his rights over his children.

This solution applies on even stronger grounds if the wife's family themselves have called her home.

If the wife falls ill in her parents' home, it may happen that her husband wants to care for her himself.' He will demand

761 a pledge (ndanga) from his father-in-law to the effect that the 672 illness started in his home. If he neglects to take this precaution 593 and his wife dies, he has no legal means to claim indemnification.

4) A solution identical to the one described above is applied even if a wife goes to her parents for her husband's personal benefit in order to get him something he needs, such as beer for a [454] feast, valuables with which to settle a palaver, etc. It holds true even if the husband has sent her expressly for this purpose.

This situation easily gives rise to violent disputes, however. The wife's family tries to reject the husband's claims by objecting that it is he himself who sent his wife, or at least that she came to them solely for his sake. Nevertheless, in the end the husband is the one who is right and who wins the case. (1)

1. A stay of twenty-four hours is not considered sufficient to place the civil responsibility for an illness, nor therefore for death, on the wife's family.

5) The wife goes home ill. As we have seen in Chapter VI, Article III, 2, the parents are not willing to nurse their daughter unless their son-in-law -- always through the ndonga -- gives them a ndanga in testimony of the fact that she was ill when she left him. The husband thus recognizes his responsibility for all possible consequences of the illness. Consequently, he can make no claims in case of death.

Since the civil responsibility for the death falls to the husband, the latter is notified by the ndonga, but the family does not send him a notification ring. The ndanga for the illness takes the place of this payment. The widower asks that the corpse be brought to him so that he can perform the last rites, and this request is always granted. There is nothing special about the rest of the procedure; everything takes place as if the wife had died in her husband's home.

6) The wife is repudiated by her husband. In the past this happened only if the woman behaved very badly and showed herself to be incorrigible. As we have seen in Chapter VIII, Article II, 1, no. 2, the husband did not send her back to her family; he 768 fastened her to a fork (etɔ́ka) until he was reimbursed. Sometimes 672 the ndonga intervened to free her, but by doing so he took upon 593x himself the responsibility of making restitution of the bride price. In this last [465] instance, if the wife died in the home of her family, the husband was entitled to reimbursement just as he would be in case of a divorce. Thus we come back to the situation described under 2) and 3), the forms varying according to whether or not the widower wanted to continue the affinal relationship.

[178] Nowadays the situation has changed entirely. The colonial administration no longer permits the use of the etɔ́ka. Consequently, a man who wants to get rid of his incorrigible wife acts in such a way that she will leave him of her own free will. And the situation is again that described in 2).

If the husband has sent his wife away himself by placing her in the hands of the ndonga, his parents-in-law will refuse him an indemnity or any restitution of the bride price and often will not even accept the nkunjɛ́. They answer his demands by telling him that he should not have repudiated the wife whom he freely chose for himself. Thus most men resort to the procedure described in the next paragraph. There are circumstances, however, under which this mode of action is more difficult; this is so especially in the case of monogamists, since its execution requires several weeks, sometimes several months. In the interim the wife does as she pleases and neglects her husband, so that the latter practically finds himself a bachelor.

787 Evangelization has added a second difficulty. Catholic 768 marriage is indissoluble. Catechumens and Christians who wish to 672 marry must therefore be careful. Before admitting them to re-593 ligious marriage, we require that at least the walo be paid. But the young men know the temperament and value of their fiancées only through experience. In almost every case therefore they have this experience at home before the walo, in accordance with their ancestral custom. Then, if one of the two parties is pagan (which happens very often), the disciplinary rules of the Catholic missions in the Congo require that they spend a minimum of six months

797 preparing at a mission station or catechumenate [436]. During 761 the experimental period, the engaged pair sometimes find faults 672 in each other which lead them to foresee a married life filled with 595 difficulties and resulting in a breakup. Therefore it is preferable that they carry out the required measures before marriage. The woman is usually the source of the difficulties. The female sex has hardly been touched by evangelization, chiefly because pagan parents, who do not oppose the Christianization and education of their boys, take their revenge on the girls. What they fear particularly is the girls' opposition to premature marriages or their flight to the centers. For those people, therefore, it is almost impossible to get round the difficulty in such a way. As the situation is not provided for in traditional law and, furthermore, most of the natives who hold power are clearly indifferent, if not hostile, to evangelization and the stability of Christian marriage, these special circumstances are not taken into account in any way, to the great detriment of the young people who are thus caught between their consciences and their temporal interests (which in this instance have strong repercussions on their moral life). The attitude of almost all the chiefs and judges in this matter is not contrary to ancestral law -- since the situation was unknown -- but it is certainly opposed to the spirit of that law.

7) The couple go to the home of the wife's family together.
672 Illness and death that come unexpectedly during such a visit are 761 imputed solely to the husband, who retains all the risks except, 595 of course, if the husband returns home but his wife does not follow him, remaining with her parents. Indeed in such a case we fall back on the solution described in 2).

8) Here we come back to the possibility indicated at the end of Article IX, 1., namely that of the wife who dies in her [437] family's home before the walo is paid. If the husband is in the wrong (see under 1), 5), and 7), the solution given in the article in question retains all its validity; the husband's "responsibility" remains intact. In the other instances it is reduced but not taken away. Actually, two laws are in conflict. On the one hand, there is the "responsibility" of the husband who has not fully acquired himself of his obligations, and, on the other, the "responsibility" of the woman who did not remain with her husband. To draw a comparison from the realm of accounting, there are two sides, debit and credit. But the latter lies chiefly on the side of the woman's family, for at the time of death the woman is not yet a wife in the full sense of the word. Consequently, the husband must pay an indemnity. But the fact that his fiancée died at home with her family is for him an extenuating circumstance as a result of which the indemnity is reduced, so that he need only pay about a half, that is, around 25 to 35 rings.

595

Conclusions

The explanations given may seem a little wordy. Nevertheless, it was useful to indicate all the diversity of possible situations in order to deduce the rule and to grasp the basis of the system from actual facts. Everything considered, it would thus appear that the husband assumes all risks with regard to his wife, and that he must bear all the damages resulting from her loss. She really belongs to him and not to her family in spite of any impression one may have that on the contrary the woman belongs more to her parents than to her husband. For even in the instances where she dies in her parents' home, having gone there for a justifiable reason, her death is considered an injustice toward her husband, since a wife's place is in the conjugal home. Such is the general rule. Exceptionally, in special instances defined by law, a woman's parents reassume the risks for her, that is, they again become responsible for her. [456]

Article 33

A Wife's Death in the Home of Another Man

761
672
Here we will consider what happens if a woman who has left her husband and gone to another man dies in the home of the latter before the restitution of the bride price to the former. Two situations may arise:

Ml 672

1) The walo may have been paid by the second husband, but restitution to the first husband may not yet have been made. The latter is entitled to reimbursement of the bride price just as he would be if the woman had not died (Chapter VIII, Article III), whereas the rules given in the preceding article are applicable to the new husband.

2) The walo may not yet have been paid; in that case the second husband must conform to the rules given in Article IV, 1 and Article X, 8). The first husband must recover the valuables to which he is entitled in accordance with the rules indicated in Chapter VIII, Article III.

Here are two recent instances:

Ilomɛ́ yă Lokombe, daughter of Ilotema of Bosnole wă Yuyokonda (Bongili), was married to Baleka of Nkɔ́lenjɔ́lɔ́ (Losange, Bombwanja). One day she went to Bempumbɔ́ to be baptized by the Protestant missionary. On her way back she was delayed by Ilombɔ́ of Ilombo (Boikoto), who wanted to marry her. He gave Ilotema an ikulɛ́. Shortly thereafter Ilomɛ́ died. Ilombɔ́ was obliged to pay a large indemnity, equaling the entire bride price, to Ilomɛ́'s father, who in turn had to reimburse Baleka.

Ãmbɔ́, daughter of Nkɛ́lenge of Ifanɔ́ (Bongili) was married to Yɔ̃njwa of Boimbo. She left him for Bongɛ́ngɔ́ of Bosambɔ́, who paid the ikulɛ́. One day when Bongɛ́ngɔ́ was returning from a trip, Ãmbɔ́ ran to meet him in order to bid him welcome. But in her haste she struck the root of a shrub, stumbled, and fell. Her fall must have caused internal injuries, for she was forced to remain in bed and died shortly thereafter. Bongɛ́ngɔ́ was obliged [430] to pay an indemnity of 30 rings plus two slaves, or a total of 80 rings, to Nkɛ́lenge, who in turn reimbursed the first husband.

The case is comparable to that of a wife's death which occurs in her husband's home but is caused by another man -- who either had daily relations with her or caused a pregnancy which resulted in her death. The responsibility in either case falls upon the lover, who must indemnify the husband. The indemnity is always very large, equaling the amount of a bride price or more. (1)

1. See Chapter I, Part II, Article V, 1, and Chapter VI, Article VII, 6.

768 672 178 Colonization has given rise to a new legal situation which is not provided for in Nkundó traditional law. If a woman takes advantage of the freedom permitted her by colonial legislation and goes to a mission to obtain instruction and make a monogamous marriage, and then contracts an illness from which she dies (at the mission, in the hospital, or even in the home of her family -- a question of place which has no legal importance), we find ourselves confronted by an entirely new situation. The husband no longer considers the woman his wife since she has left him, even though theoretically she continues to retain that status. On the other hand, she has not gone back to her family or gone to live with another man.

Polygamous husbands want to throw the "responsibility" back upon the woman's parents. But actually they have no part in the events, and it is unfair to involve them in the situation.

[171] They do not bring the mission into the matter. As a matter of fact, the mission performs a service to the woman and to society as a whole in trying to elevate it morally and culturally.

What should one think of this situation? In the preceding article we have seen that the husband assumes all risks in relation to the wife. Certain exceptions to this rule [480], which we have explained, have been formulated in Nkundó law; but outside of them, the law retains its dominion, since the exceptions are narrowly defined. Thus it applies to the situation with which we are dealing, and consequently the damages must remain on the husband's account.

Moreover, this interpretation is to be encouraged for the following reason:

The purpose of the legislation involved is to protect freedom in this matter of capital importance and to favor monogamy and the gradual abandonment of polygamy. Polygamists -- as a group -- must perforce suffer from it in one way or another. It is inconceivable that a struggle against an abuse would not affect the persons guilty of it.

Such cases are still very rare, but their frequency may increase with the progress of evangelization.

768 672 682 In terminating this discussion we must make one point that is related to both of the last two articles. The cause of death has no

768 legal importance. The solutions given are the same whether the 672 cause of death be organic or criminal. If the latter is the case, 682 however, the murderer must pay an indemnity, which is given to the person who has been wronged, whether it be the woman's husband or her family; in any case he thus satisfies the requirements of justice.

A woman may be murdered while she is visiting one of her husband's kinswomen in accordance with her husband's wishes. In that case the sister-in-law's husband bears the responsibility. He must indemnify the victim's husband, and he himself is entitled to indemnification by the murderer. To simplify this procedure, the murderer can make his payment directly to the widower; justice is still safeguarded. But in no case does the indemnity go to the victim's father, for legally and economically it belongs to the husband, not to the father, who is indemnified through the funeral payments. [461]

Conclusions

1) A marital union is broken by death only for the person who 581 dies. For the one who remains alive, the dissolution is completed 768 only after other procedures. If the husband dies the widow remains the wife of the heirs and is free only after restitution of the bride price has been made. At the death of the wife the husband can marry a substitute.

A widow's remarriage without restitution of the bride price
581 (and therefore without a new bride price), or that of a widower 587 with a substitute, is considered a continuation of a pre-existing 768 union which has not been dissolved. This continuation is not absolute, however. Actually, it is perfect only in the case of the husband's death, in which case his kin group inherits all his rights and therefore also the rights to the wives he has acquired by means of his capital. On the other hand, if a widower is to continue the relationship after his wife's death, he must pay another bride price.

The difference between the two instances is due to the connection of the bride price with the "ownership" of a woman; she remains subject to it and as a result becomes legally the spouse

768 of her husband's heirs after his death. Only her own death takes 591 all power away from the bride price, which then becomes a purely 587 material value.

That is why the Nkundó expression "continuation of marriage" is ambiguous. For a widower the marriage continues from the standpoint of ties between families. But from the legal point of view there is a new marriage, since he pays a new bride price for the substitute, and there is therefore an entirely new contract. Only for a widow does the marriage really continue, as long as there is no divorce between her and the deceased husband's heirs. The agreement retains all its validity in her person, whereas the husband's obligations are transferred to the heirs. There is only a change of the persons subject to the agreement, which is therefore in no way annulled. The question here is a substitution in the role of husband. [462]

The preceding should be understood as relating to the financial agreement or bride-price contract as we have explained in Chapter III, Article IX. For the conjugal pact or consent agreement is annulled by death, since an heir as well as a widow must interpose new acts in order effectively to become man and wife. What the Nkundó call the continuation of marriage is therefore only the continuation of the bride-price agreement between the families, and not of the conjugal pact between individuals.

It would be desirable to have a moralist thoroughly examine the philosophico-theological validity of the continuation of this marriage after the death of one of the parties. Personally I think that for the widow, and on condition that nothing else opposes it, it is valid. For consent is expressed by the man through the payment of the bekooli and by the woman through the act of accompanying the man as his wife.

2) From the economic standpoint, death does not change
768 the situation that existed during life. The various bride-price valuables remain in the hands of the respective parties. The difference between the consequences of death and those of divorce are therefore very clearly delineated, as was indicated in the Conclusion of Chapter VIII, Article III.

3) These legal and financial rules confirm the conclusion

768 drawn in Chapter VI, Article II and those that follow, that a wife belongs to her husband legally as well as in fact, even though she does not leave her clan.

4) They also support the conclusion of Chapter II, Article IX, 5, that for the marriage agreement the walo is the essential element among the various bride-price payments.

5) Finally, they demonstrate the legal priority of the conjugal union above the clan and family society in spite of facts that can often be observed which would appear to contradict this statement.

Chapter X

Children

A study of marriage would be incomplete without a chapter

600 on the subject of children. Their procreation and education constitute the finis operis, the natural result of the married state, a state which for man, as a reasonable being, is the only legitimate form of carrying out the propagation of his species, the specific objective of sexual life.

This subject could be expanded more extensively than is possible here. We will pass in silence over a number of interesting facts related to it which fall outside the limits set for this work. For example, we will exclude the question of adoption, since it does not deal with children in connection with marriage, but only within the general rubric of family and society.

Even within these limits this chapter alone would comprise an entire volume were it treated with the fullness it merits. We must therefore confine ourselves to generalities and discuss only those particular situations which are most frequent and common.

As to the order of discussion to be followed in this chapter, and after a few preliminary notes (Article I), we will examine in succession:

Article II. Conception and pregnancy
Article III. Childbirth

000

Article IV. Nursing
Article V. Naming
Article VI. The question of twins
Article VII. Circumcision
Article VIII. Education
Article IX. Rights over the children [464]

Article I. Preliminaries

1. Generalities

842 The Nkundó like to have children. Not only do they like to have daughters, as some too superficial colonials sometimes maintain, but they like to have boys just as much. It is true that a daughter carries the hope of a bride price and all it represents for polygamists eager for pagan glory and carnal pleasures; yet a real preference for children of the weaker sex is seldom observed. What one does encounter, just as in Europe for that matter, is a desire to have a child of a particular sex when, for example, the other is already abundantly represented in the household. Thus a native who already has several boys but no girl or only one, will make offerings to obtain a sister for the boys. That he should do so is hardly astonishing since among these people a sister is the proper and sometimes the only means by which a man can acquire a wife. On the other hand, a father whose progeny are exclusively, or almost exclusively, members of the female sex ardently desires the birth of a son, an heir to the fruits of his labor and someone who would be able to aid and assist him in his old age by building him a hut, clearing the forest for him, and bringing him game or the products of fishing.

855 Actually one seldom hears these preferences expressed. The impression one gets is rather that the Nkundó love their children as such and also because, whatever their sex, they greatly contribute to the reinforcement of his social position; the two motives are inseparable in practice.

It is sometimes maintained that the natives do not refuse to have children because their coming does not inconvenience them in any way, nor do they impose crushing financial obligations

842 upon them; their upbringing costs them nothing, whereas among 855 Whites the maintenance, dress, food, instruction, and occupational placement involve considerable expenses. It cannot be [465] denied that while the modern European is exacting from all these viewpoints, enchained and blocked by an ever growing multitude of needs, the material life of the native is simple and his necessities are reduced to an indispensable minimum. Nevertheless, it can hardly be said that it is as easy for him to raise a large family with many children as it is to have the responsibility of a smaller number. Without speaking of clothing -- especially at the present time -- there is the food for growing children, which forces him to clear a greater expanse of forest and to work harder at the various ways of fishing and hunting; and when the time comes for the sons to find wives, he is the one who must arrange to procure the valuables needed for a bride price.

For their part, Nkundó women like to transmit life as much as the men, if not more so. Pregnancy may make them disagreeable and grumpy and sometimes cause them pain, but they put up with it and, as a very general rule, do not think of depriving themselves on that account of the happiness of giving birth to a cute little creature, of nursing it, of carrying it in their arms or on their shoulders. The difficulties and pains of maternity do not repel them. Although later, during the payment of her daughter's bride price, a Nkundó woman's greed will lead her to loudly claim the payment due her and even sometimes destroy her child's love because of delaying this financial operation, the delay does not come to their minds until the time comes.

In short, the Nkundó woman feels a perfectly natural, maternal love for her child.

There are of course exceptions to this general rule. And 842 the contrary would be astonishing for a pagan population who give 855 free rein to all their passions or, at least, restrain them only very 152 [466] slightly, and whose love is far from the perfection one may find among a people ennobled by fifteen centuries of Christianity. Moreover -- as all the preceding pages testify -- our Nkundó are not fashioned from a uniform mold notwithstanding the impression given by certain colonial and ethnological works. All the individual

592 differences can be found here, although they are less apparent to 855 a European observer since we usually approach the natives as a 152 group and our contact with them is often too impersonal.

2. Abortion

847 great enemy of maternal love is the practice of abortion, which has always been known to the Nkundó. Here we cannot describe all the prescriptions used for that purpose. It will be sufficient to enumerate the reasons for which they have recourse to this practice. They are as follows:

) A woman's lasciviousness: the procreation and subsequent care of a child to some extent prevent the indulging in carnal pleasure. Formerly this cause of abortion was nonexistent or very [178] rare. Needless to say, it has become more common, especially in the centers where it is constantly on the increase and where, in addition occasional or regular "housekeepers" learn new means of sterilization and abortion.

) A woman's antipathy or persistent anger toward her husband may encourage her to prevent conception or destroy its effect.

) An excessive weakening of the mother's organism caused by a large number of conceptions and childbirths at too short intervals.

4 The encumberance and the difficulty of watching, carrying, and taking care of many small children -- bɔ́lota bokɔkɔsano [467] [535] [illegible]. This reason is especially important for well-known dancers.

It goes without saying that several of these motives may be combined in the same person. For instance, I knew of a woman who aborted at the time of her eighth child. Her recurrent pregnancies, together with continuous work, had greatly reduced her strength. A palaver with her husband was the last straw; she decided to get rid of the fruit she carried in her body.

Outside of these exceptions the natives of this country ardently desire their own continuation through a large number of progeny. (1)

1. The same is not true elsewhere. Examples to that effect are cited from regions that are 947 [184] already more "civilized," such as the neighborhood of Coquilhatville and the Losanganya region.

847 848 Attention should be drawn to the danger of an increase in abortions for a new reason, namely the shame of giving birth outside of wedlock. As we have seen in Chapter I, Part II, Article IV, 3, premarital pregnancies have existed since time immemorial without resulting either in remorse or in palavers. Through the teaching of Christian morality, the feeling of shame must sooner or later be extended to this phenomenon. In explaining the evil of fornication, care should therefore be taken to insist on the fact that transgressing the Fifth Commandment by abortion is a far greater evil.

947 845 Voluntary abortion is not considered a moral error by the Nkundó. (2) In their eyes an imperfectly formed fetus, not viable,

2. An attitude which also exists in Europe at the present time, according to Haenecour in Kultuurleven, Vol. 6, no. 1, p. 21 (1935), and the brochure by Prof. D. Schockaert quoted there.

947 [766] [774] is not yet a man. It is only a human being in the process of formation, in potentia. Hence the custom of burying the aborted child in the [468] hut or quite near it. Thus the spirit responsible for the pregnancy will see that it is respected and repeat its benevolent action. (1)

1. Others explain this custom by saying that the fetus already has a soul which remains near the tiny body and will take the first opportunity to re-enter the mother's body.

But if it is voluntary an abortion is always a wrong against family and society, for it deprives the family of a member on whom 847] they could count. Nevertheless, if it happens to a young unmarried mother, little or no fuss is made over it because no one can feel wronged; at most the culprit is scolded. For a married woman, on the other hand, it is one of the most serious infractions. Her husband has an immediate right to the fetus that would have become his child. He cannot beat or mistreat the offender in punishment, for her condition will not permit violence, but he can abandon her to her fate by refusing her all assistance, in particular by refusing to bring her firewood, the heat of which she greatly needs under such circumstances. For she has done him an enormous wrong and has acted with real malice (aônjokel 'inkúnyɔ́, he says), since he married her chiefly so that she would give him descendants. If she dies it is her own fault. Even her family will not support her, for [482] they would be accused of being involved in the crime; inevitably they would lose the case and be condemned to indemnify the husband.

843 An abortion which is ascertained to be involuntary [i.e., a miscarriage] is treated like an accident or an illness and the appropriate legal stipulations are applied to it. Thus if it happens while the woman is at her parents' home, the responsibility for it falls on them. Usually the palaver is settled in a friendly manner; the family makes a few nkgmɛ́ payments, and the question is closed. If relations between the husband and his son-in-law are somewhat strained, the dispute may be drawn out and may result in the breaking up of the marriage. If the woman dies from the accident, the rules given in Article X of the preceding chapter come into play. [469]

Article II. Conception and Pregnancy

842
153 The Nkundó have only a partial notion of the phenomena of conception. They are well aware of which acts cause the procreation of children. They have a perfect knowledge of anatomy and a rich vocabulary pertaining to sexual life. But they know only as much about physiological processes as experience can teach them. Furthermore, they believe that the act of procreation must be repeated several times in order to produce its natural result. Now,

Note,

842 833 [843] finally, that sexual relations are strictly forbidden to them during menstruation (-kona or éna nsóngé, literally "to be ill from" or "to see the moon," and other similar expressions). The reason given is that a woman in that difficult condition should be spared all additional annoyance.

1. Elímá

842 776 The Nkundó attribute the procreation of children sometimes to God (Njakomba) and sometimes to spirits (elímá, pl. bilímá). God forms (-ánga) the children in the mother's womb, but at the same time the bilímá provide the men among the progeny. (1)

There is no point in trying to make the natives resolve this apparent contradiction; they would not succeed. They simply state the two points. I say "apparent contradiction," for as the Nkundó admit that the bilímá are subject to Njakomba, the contradiction is not real, and the two propositions can be [470] reconciled by explaining the intervention of the spirits as an operation which is dependent on divine action: they are secondary, intermediary causes, although our natives do not make this philosophical analysis.

To explain all the beliefs pertaining to spirits would be to go outside the framework of this study. Nevertheless, we cannot leave out those details which closely touch on our subject.

---

[192] 1. Contrary to what is reported by Father Lestaeghe (Congo, 1922, Vol. 1, p. 363) concerning the Ekonda, the tribes that I have known never address prayers for children to God, although they attribute the gift of children to Him. This matter does not concern God (Njakomba or Mbombiándá) directly, but rather a particular elímá.

Sterility, which is a common phenomenon here, is not imputed to sorcery but is considered an innate flaw. Natives usually claim that God refuses them children.

776 There is a large number of diverse spirits, and almost 823 every village has several in its territory Each one has its own habitat in some singular place or object which stimulates the imagination: enormous trees, oval hollows which form ponds of a sort (jɛ́mbo, pl. baɛ́mbo), steep slopes, extraordinary pieces of limonite, whirlpools in streams and rivers, etc

The Nkundó pray to the bilímá in order to obtain children.
776 For that purpose they make offerings of food and money. To test 842 someone's feelings toward it, an elímá may come to him in the evening or at night in the guise of a known person and ask for some small present. Unhappy is he who shows himself to be stingy: he will be deprived of the object of his desire, or his child will be premature or born sickly or deformed.

783 In addition to taking a generally friendly attitude toward 842 the spirit, another means of ensuring his intervention is open to a 776 woman. She can procure some kaolin (pongo) at the spirit's habitat (a jɛ́mbo, preferably). In the evening she mixes it with some plants. She smears her abdomen with this mixture, known [843] as isaá. She continues the treatment throughout her pregnancy: it has the property of removing everything in her which is of such a nature that it might oppose the spirit (ákɛ́kola lokeko jwá bilíma bíle ndá likundú).

Certain water spirits are known for their generosity, for 776 instance Ilɔ́mbɔ́lombé or Ekɔ́talombé of Mpakó, [471] who is 842 considered to be a female being. She goes on distant voyages to seek a supply of children. On her return she appears to someone and communicates the news to him so that he may spread it. But she orders all women who desire her favors to observe some form of abstinence. Sometimes she sings to amuse or calm the children On that day mothers must not use songs to pacify their little ones or to put them to sleep and can use only soft words for that purpose. Otherwise the child would die, for to do so would be to disregard the old elímá's kindness.

Sometimes the spirits give signs of their blessing. A woman
[787] who is bathing on the shore just at the time a cargo arrives there will soon see her most intimate wish fulfilled From forest spirits

776 842 [791] women receive other signs: an unexpected obstacle in the form of a stone, a stump, a root, the capture of a tree frog which comes and jumps onto the shoulder, etc

A spirit loves and protects only a child he himself has given. He abhors and hates to the death the living gifts of his fellow spirits. If there are several bilímá in the vicinity of a single village, however, the Nkundó explain the absence of the usual rivalries by considering them as related; one is the husband, another the wife, others the children; that is why they do not oppose each other.

776 843 Thus an elímá is hostile to any fetus not of his creation. Nevertheless, his spiteful action only begins at the end of several weeks, and even then the pregnancy must have gone far enough to be visible (ëmi jóhela isómbá) Does it take time for him to obtain evidence that the fruit in question is undoubtedly his own gift?

In any case the consequence of this belief is that a woman who has been pregnant for several months cannot long [472] reside in foreign parts, and one who, after conception, has accompanied a husband who has gone to work elsewhere, returns to her village to complete the last period of pregnancy and to deliver,

However, there is an antidote (nsengó) against this murder- [751] ous action of the spirits. It may be obtained from a person who knows the recipe (this person is not the nkanga or "doctor"). The protective compound is wrapped in a bit of cloth and, by means of a thread of fibers from the lokóal creeper, is tied in the middle of a rope braided with the fibers of the ikuluyafndé bush, which the threatened woman ties around her hips. (1)

[114] [115] 1. These data on the subject of the elímá is diametrically opposed to the ideas of Father Schebesta (Vollblutneger und Halbzwerge, p. 241, and W. Schmidt, Der Ursprung der Gottesidee, Vol. 4, p. 322), based on the word of his interpreter, Bern. . Bongonga of Bodiama (Bombwanja) (now deceased), who was

843 776 114 115 obliged in my presence to retract his statements under the pressure of crushing objections on the part of a considerable number of other natives See also Father Boelaert, Hooger Leven, 1935, p. 60, and Congo, 1936, Vol. 1, p. 42, as well as Hulstaert, Congo, 1936, Vol. 2, p. 670.

2. The beginnings of pregnancy

843 777 The first months following the cessation of menstruation are called bofoswa. The oral expression is -foswa jémi (jémi meaning "fetus")

A woman who has just conceived no longer has any success in looking for caterpillars or in fishing (by scooping, whether with balɛ́ngɛ́ hooks or drugs, called lisola). She is unable to catch anything while the efforts of her companions are fruitful. That is because the bofoswa is wěká, that is, a cause for a lack of success (bómoto ôa wěká éfókte) Note that this word may be derived from the verb ěka, "to place an obstacle."

The husband of a woman in this condition is no better off. His wife's wěká is communicated to him as well as to all those of his relatives who [473] live in the same village or, as the natives say, ékć mpoké emókoló, "one who eats from the same pot," and okisé ilombe ímɔkoló, "one who lives in the same house." Friends are not harmed, even if they live in the same settlement as the pregnant woman, nor are relatives living elsewhere.

The wěká brings misfortune to anyone tainted with it. Thus if he goes hunting, he will return empty handed; if he participates in a war he will be wounded. Furthermore, if there is a leopard in the vicinity he will choose to kill that man. An elephant will detect his presence and try to kill him. A snake will bite him more readily than another. At market he will be charged more for everything.

This burdensome situation continues during the entire period of pregnancy, hence until the birth of the child.

777 The Nkundó know an antidote (nsengó or losenjó), however, a means of getting rid of such annoying obstacles. Of the three known processes the last is especially common at present.

[125] 1) The husband (or any person to whom the wɛ́kɔ́ is attached and who wants to be rid of it) picks up a nkôngolí chilopod, naturally by means of a leaf, encloses it in a large leaf which he binds with a thin creeper, and makes a small package of it, as one makes a package of meat, fish, etc. He gives this package to his wife, who thinks it contains food and opens it without any suspicion. But when she sees the detested arthropod, she throws it far from her with cries of disgust, while her husband says to her, "You are the one who remains with the wɛ́kɔ́." As a result he himself is freed from it.

2) A second means is to take the pregnant woman by the nose when an opportunity presents itself and to say to her: "May the wɛ́kɔ́ remain attached to you."

[264] 3) The woman prepares some imbóndó (manioc leaves [474] salted and dipped in palm oil). The two spouses eat it together contrary to the usual practice. But the husband arranges matters in such a way that his wife gets the last mouthful and keeps the leaf which serves as a plate and represents the wɛ́kɔ́. Then the husband says to her, "Keep the wɛ́kɔ́ for yourself."

The wɛ́kɔ́ cannot be detached from the woman, for she is the bomóngo wɛ́kɔ́, "the owner of the wɛ́kɔ́," the one who is the basis for it. For her it continues until the child is on the point of being born (elakí ô jómi jéndela, literally "he has come to the end of his growth," or jótekama, "has turned to one side"), and thus, in practice, until the birth of the child.

[752] If a first wife dies at the beginning of her first pregnancy, a cesarian operation must be performed on her. The fetus is removed (it is still no more than an embryo -- ilángéla or bokelé, literally "an egg," or ilóngó, literally "blood") so that it can be buried behind the hut. An omission of this practice would result in the death through pregnancy of the deceased's husband's other wives or of the women he will subsequently marry.

3. The period of prohibitions

[843] When a pregnancy is far advanced -- about two or three months before delivery (a period which has now been reduced to one or two weeks) -- the Nkundó proceed with the "preservation of the fetus" (bákomba jémi, "they preserve the fetus," or bákaka jémi, "they fasten the fetus"). The period called bokeka or bokeko begins at that moment and does not end until after childbirth. The oral expression is lókaka bokeka, "to bind the period of sexual prohibitions." (1) This term also extends to all special prohibitions (bekila) resulting from this condition. [472]

For the first pregnancy the period begins with the following [766] ceremony: The woman's mother smears her daughter's head and [302] all of her body with a red paint called ngóla. This paint, usually used as make-up, is used here as a mark of affection and given to honor and congratulate the future mother on this happy occasion. When the ngóla is somewhat hardened, the mother smears her daughter's hair with it and rolls the hair into little balls, using an iron bosingá, which is the instrument usually used for hairdressing. Then she gives her daughter a hen and some bananas to eat. From then on the pregnant woman may no longer eat hens, for the consumption of this bird (which the Nkundó place in the same category [262] as ducks) and its eggs would stop the normal development of the fetus. The ceremony is called fla bongata (ejaka among the Bombwanja), "to smear with red paint in little balls."

The woman's father and the husband's kin feel strongly about being present at this ceremony, for it is considered very important. I know of an intense palaver which occurred because [834] 1. The expression lókaka lilonká is also used. A similar period of sexual prohibitions called by the same name still exists for, among other things, circumcision, the construction of a hunting enclosure, and the setting of elephant traps.

[illegible] a woman's mother proceeded with the ceremony in the absence of the husband and his family. The latter were furious. They revealed the matter so that if anything should happen later to the mother or the child the law would be on their side. In that way the husband could evade responsibility and place the blame on his wife and her family so that they would have to pay an indemnity.

The pregnant woman does not remove the paint for three or [illegible] four weeks after the ceremony. Nowadays the use of paint having [illegible] disappeared except for certain occasions and among older persons, it is left on for only one night. In addition the surface smeared has been reduced to a line in the middle of the head or even one single spot.

[illegible] During this ceremony the Bombwanja have a public confession [illegible] (etamo) of the lovers. But since the Boleki wait until after delivery, we will deal with it later on.

On the night following the ceremony described, the couple [illegible] [476] "fasten the fetus" through their carnal union. Were they to omit this act, the child would die before birth.

For subsequent pregnancies the fastening of the fetus is no longer preceded by the same formalities.

The couple continue to have relations during the entire [illegible] period of pregnancy "in order to open an easy passage for the child." [illegible] On the other hand, they must strictly observe marital fidelity. [illegible] Nevertheless, a polygamist may have relations with his other wives.

In addition to this essential act, the interdict also includes a secondary part: the couple may not even commit acts even very remotely related to procreation. Thus they may not:

1) Touch in any way whatsoever -- even to shaking their hands -- persons with whom they have had adulterous relations; such persons must therefore be avoided.

2) Sit next to such persons.

3) Look at them.

4) Enter a house or apartment where they are.

5) Eat "from the same pot."

6) Lie in another couple's bed.

7) Other persons may no longer sleep in the bed of the couple bound by the bokoka.

843 837 This law requiring a most strict fidelity lasts until the end of the bokeka for the husband, but until the weaning of the child for the wife. It is especially strict for the period of seclusion (see below, Article III, 3).

The violation of the essential stipulation of this interdict (-fénda bokeka) results either in the death of the woman during pregnancy and especially during seclusion or in the death of the child later on. [477]

A. If the woman dies during this period, the suspicion is placed a priori on her husband. The Nkundó say aófénda wǎlí, "he has transgressed against his wife." Unless he can prove his innocence through public actions, the judgment of a magician, or autopsy[sic].

If the woman has been the victim of a seducer, he is held responsible and must pay a large indemnity equivalent to the bride price that was paid for the deceased. If no other man is involved, the affair has no consequences.

843 763 754 845 853 In the past the combined autopsy and Caesarian section was always performed. It had a dual purpose: to remove the child and to examine the mother. If the operation revealed the existence of a "stomach" (likundú), the deceased was of a noxious (lilgka) nature or constitution and therefore caused the death of her child. If the child remained alive, it proved that he was of a magically superior nature and was able to resist the natural evil spells of his mother, which thus turned against their unwitting author. (1)

1. The Nkundó believe that only animals have a "stomach" (likundú). If a human being has one, that is, if his viscera are large, curved, in compartments, in a word, abnormal, that person is an evildoer. He commits evil acts voluntarily or, most frequently, unknowingly. Some men with a likundú can be recognized by the fact that they eat their nails, hair, etc. The Nkundó must certainly have observed relationships between this habit and a deformity of the stomach.

853 The child is given to a wet nurse (a kinswoman, a stranger, a Batswa woman, depending on who is available).

847 If the mother's body shows no signs of evil-doing or of 845 "the hatred of others," it is thought that her death was caused 843 by evil spells on the part of the child. Thereupon some kill the child to prevent it from doing harm during its whole life; others, on the contrary, spare it despite everything.

843 If the husband (for it is he above all who is involved, since he is most exposed to possible lapses) has unfortunately been guilty
837 of misconduct, his wife has only a slim chance [478] of salvation. Nevertheless, it is still possible for her to be saved, on condition that from then on her husband abstain from any sexual act and from all the accidental gestures and actions described above. The least he can do under these circumstances is to inform his wife of his indiscretion so that she can take precautions. If he wants to [672] ward off any possibility of causing his wife's certain death, he sends her home and gives his father-in-law a pledge (ndanga) through which he recognizes his guilt and shows his intention to assume the entire responsibility for his misdeed. An upright man prefers to act in this fashion, for he never knows whether one day he will not inadvertently violate one of the prohibitions.

B. The child's death is the result of the putrefaction of 853 the mother's milk, the mother being thus incapable of nursing.
837 As in the preceding case, the offense is a priori imputed to the husband -- iaé aboma bóna la ndota. (1) Since he has wronged no one but himself, no palaver ensues; the "natural" punishment is sufficient. This does not mean that he is not the object of evil tongues; people point at him and at times remind him of his misdeed. To remove the blame from himself, he can resort to [853] 1. Ndota is an illness caused by the violation of prescriptions of a sexual nature (See Chapter I, Part II, Article IV, 2, A).

695 an ordeal or ask a magician's judgment or a magical practice to 787 reveal the culprit. The culprit who is discovered is not subject to any social sanction; he is punished by the ordeal itself or the spell cast against him.

[684] If the mother's adultery is proven through her having been caught in the act, her seducer is considered guilty. He must pay the death indemnity (20 to 30 copper rings). The woman is not at all involved as far as society is concerned; it is a matter between her and her husband.

In order to prevent any harmful effect on the child, the 757 Nkundó resort to a potion called bondandeza, which will be ex-
854 plained in [478] the next article, 3. "Medication" by scarification might also be mentioned. This therapy is applied to the parents as well as to the child. If the father is wealthy, he invites the wife's family to come and perform the operation themselves. As in all comparable situations, the invitation is accompanied by the handing over of a pledge, and farewell presents (belingelo) are given at the end of the visit. In addition the wife very often goes to live with her parents for some time after her seclusion in order to increase the efficacy of the treatment.

The sanction incurred for a violation of the secondary 843 stipulations is less serious. For instance, the pregnant woman suffers [684] from violent migraines, which often cause fainting and sometimes make delivery very difficult; thus they can even cause death. The husband is seldom bothered by these headaches. But he takes great pains to faithfully observe the law in order to spare his wife such painful consequences and to avoid the death of the child being born.

Apart from sexual abstention and the rules connected with it, the couple are also subject to various prohibitions which are clearly based on superstitious ideas. Thus:

1) They must neither go down into a well nor dig in the earth. The woman would die, for it is as if they were digging her grave.

2) They must not carry anything together with another person, for that is how corpses are carried, and such carrying would be the cause of death, through imitation of the woman's funeral procession.

847 3) They must not climb up on the roof (they are not forbidden to climb a palm tree in order to cut off nuts).

4) They must not eat animals killed by a carnivore (leopard, 847 crocodile, etc.), or the child would die a sudden and unnatural
262 death like the victims of such wild beasts. [400]
825 5) They must abstain from animals such as porcupines, anteaters, certain birds, crocodiles, and gavials, (1) who are in the habit of living in the hollows of trees or in dens. The delivery would be very painful if they ate them, for the child would roll up and crouch in the mother's womb. Fish that find shelter in passageways do not produce such consequences and are therefore eaten.

6) They must not eat turtles (2). A very difficult birth is feared, for the turtle withdraws into its shell and encloses its end extremities as in a vise, and the child would do the same.

7) They must not eat the head of a monkey. The child would be born with deep-set eyes resembling the monkey's.

8) They must not eat the large antelope known as mbuli, because it has a long neck and flabby flesh, and the child would acquire the same defects.

[141] 9) They must not eat the linfifi fish, which would cause migraines, since it swims fiercely without direction.

The results of bokeka and the obligations resulting from it 591 are connected with natural paternity. Thus, if a woman becomes 847 pregnant as a result of relations with a regular, recognized lover, the latter must assume all responsibility. He is required to "fatten the fetus" and to observe all the regulations pertaining to the

1. In this region women never eat snakes or bats (bolóma, bongidé, Bokyé).

2. In some tribes (Bongili, Bonkoso) women always abstain from eating such reptiles.

843 __bokeka.__ The same is true if the pregnancy is the result of adultery;
837 the natural father must bear all the consequences of his act. The husband is absolved from them and has no relations with his wife until the end of this particular pregnancy. The culprit must give him a pledge by which he publically recognizes his responsibility, and he is expected to fulfill all the duties of a husband. Therefore he may have relations with the woman during her entire pregnancy without paying additional indemnities. If any accident befalls the mother or the child, he is made to pay a large indemnity.

Note finally that, as we have pointed out in Chapter II, [583] Article III, no bride-price payment can be made from the time the pregnancy becomes visible until after the end of the period of seclusion.

843 To facilitate childbirth the previously mentioned concoc-844 tion of various leaves mixed with kaolin (__mpe__) is continuously ap-757 plied to the abdomen. Medical scarifications on the abdomen are also performed.

Finally, as the time of delivery approaches, special douches [278] made from a concoction of the bark of the __bofinko__ tree (1) are administered. All these treatments are called __bote byâ bobotoji__, that is, medicines (for the purpose) of an easy delivery.

---

1. Certain douches, especially the one made of __bofinko__, are also used as abortive agents.

Article III. Birth

844 1. Delivery

A woman remains with her husband for childbirth; she does not go home to her family. Only exceptionally does she give birth elsewhere -- for instance, if she has been sent home for one reason or another, or during a trip, while working in the fields, near a stream, or a spring, etc. Such sudden unexpected deliveries

844 are not too rare. (3)

2. Ease in delivery is called [illegible]; difficulty is called [illegible].

A husband asks his mother-in-law to come and help her daughter. Other kinswomen of the husband or the wife do not refuse [452] their services either. Among them there is always one who is more expert in these matters and who acts as a midwife ([illegible]).

The delivery takes place in the banana grove behind the hut; there is light and air there. In the house it would be more difficult.

The husband cannot be present at this event. His presence would make it difficult and painful. The farther away he is, the better. The prohibition is not rigid, however; if there is no one to help his wife (as in the case of an unexpected delivery in the forest, etc.), he will have no hesitation whatsoever in helping her with all the power and skill at his command.

To facilitate the arrival of the child, the midwife gives [778] the wife a potion to drink "in order to make slippery" ([illegible]), and administers a douche containing [illegible] bark.

If the pains continue for several days and all medication is 754 without results, it is assumed that some evil spell ([illegible]) is at work. To neutralize it the woman in labor is "blessed" (-[illegible]). For that purpose her family and that of her husband each bring a stalk of the [illegible] plant ([illegible]). Two kinswomen, each with the stalk of her respective clan, squeeze out the sap with which they smear the woman's abdomen. After that the delivery takes place in a normal fashion.

847 756 M The nkanga (doctor-magician) only intervenes when a woman has already had several miscarriages or when all her children die. If he is consulted he invariably attributes such misfortunes to the action of spirits of the deceased, who may be appeased by offerings and the promise that a manifestation of their will be heeded with respect to the naming of the child. Usually he adds that a few alimentary prohibitions must be observed until the child is weaned.

(00) alimentary prohibitions must be observed until the child is weaned.

[5] As soon as the child is born, the women present announce the happy event with shouts, and someone runs to inform [483] the father. The latter (or a kinsman) communicates the news by means of a lokolé. For a boy the message is: Batsiki falafala, bokúta bóñáñáñá likongé la ngowa, ayíme lokendo ndá likundú, etc., (1) "The mats are spread; he who holds spear and shield has come from the journey in the womb." For a girl, bokúta ... ngowa is omitted and the words iankaanka y'ëlíato, "sweet friendship of woman" are substituted. (2)

The news is greeted with cries of joy in the whole village, and everyone runs to admire the child and congratulate the mother. They do not enter the house. No feast heightens the general rejoicing.

Then, if the child is a boy, the father or a man in his family places himself in front of the child, who is presented to him at the entrance to the hut or on the porch if there is one. He holds a spear and threatens as if he were about to attack the child, shouting: "Ha! ha! ha!," and gesticulating like a warrior. Then he takes the little hand and makes the child hold the spear, saying to him: "Be a strong man, make war bravely." (3) The

---

1. Elsewhere the term is ikokíscia. Or: bongólá la mpifo bíkókisela bele foléfolé, "bowels and livers have come down, are outside."

2. Other terms exist in certain tribes (See Anthropos, Vol. 30, 1935, p. 635 ff.)

3. If later in life a boy lets himself be frightened, he is asked, "Was that ceremony not performed when you were barely born?"

851 birth of a child involves a few prohibitions which affect the whole village and apply to the Batswá as well as the Baotó. They do not affect inhabitants of a portion of the village which is separated by a swamp from the group where the happy event has occurred. Those bound by the prohibitions may no longer go to "work" -- that is, to work in the fields, fetch food or firewood, build a hunting enclosure or a fishing weir, or work at the building or repair of a house. An infraction of this rule would result in the destruction of the fruit of all their labor: the fields would no longer produce, and no beast or fish would be caught. This deadly influence would [494] extend to all crops, etc., no matter whom they belong to. Nevertheless, there is nothing wrong in fetching firewood from the forest, harvesting manioc from a ripe field, or cutting the fruit of the palm.

Strictly speaking, these prohibitions touch only persons who have seen the newborn child. But since no one fails to go and admire it, all are subject to them. The prohibitions remain in effect until the umbilical cord is detached. [844] Some tribes, however, have the more convenient custom of limiting its duration to the day of the child's birth.

2. The hygiene of mother and child

[844] 846 The umbilical cord ([illegible]) is cut near the middle. An incision is made near the infant's navel. Each day a concoction of herbs is poured on the part of the cord that is still attached and white sand is put on it to make it dry more rapidly. When the end falls off, a powder made of scorched banana is applied to the wound.

In order to prevent the weakening of a woman's abdomen, it is bound with a belt made of bands of the dried bark of the banana tree (ekoti).

The assistants wash the mother and child. On the mother they place dried leaves or bark of the banana tree which have been carefully crumpled. They are put on like panties to catch the blood and are replaced by new ones whenever necessary. Nowadays pieces of cloth are often used; they are put on like a man's garment.

515 In order to facilitate the flowing out of all the blood, the mother is given hot baths. However, they are not begun before noon, for the Nkundó say that in the morning and evening it is too cool and the blood is not sufficiently fluid. Those who have been [171] in greater contact with the Whites give the mother beer or wine to drink. The hot baths are administered behind the hut in an en- [341] closure set up for the occasion. They are of two kinds: baths by sprinkling (bompšlo wă mbĭlomba) and steam baths (bompšlo w'Ělángó). For the first method [485] very hot water is used, and by using a bunch of palms, the woman's abdomen, loins, and ribs are sprinkled. In the second method a pit is dug and large leaves (or a basin) containing boiling water are placed in it. Three or four strong, wide sticks are placed on top, and the woman is seated on them. She is wrapped in several mats to which, today, one or two blankets are added. She is left thus exposed to the action of the steam for several minutes. According to the natives, it is the ideal system because it makes all the blood come out, or almost all. Some people first give a sprinkle bath, and then follow it with a steam bath; others are satisfied with one or the other, depending on the circumstances. In any case more than one bath is never given in one day. This care may be given for one or two weeks, or it may stop after two or three days. The effect of "civilizing" is more inclined to the latter. But no Nkundó would want to omit the baths, for the woman's life is at stake.

After the bath the woman is carefully rubbed and dried, [302] and then anointed with oil mixed with red paint.

From time to time, usually every second day, she is given a douche.

846 As long as the mother remains weak, a large fire is maintained in her hut to keep her warm, and the doors are closed by means of palms. The husband and his relatives fetch the firewood. But the first log must be cut and brought by the husband who, to use the Nkundó expression, must "remove the violence" (lonola lofasl). In the beginning the woman lies down on a bokoge right near the fire. She turns the front of her body toward it. The fire plays a great role in her quick recovery. She is very well cared 846 for and fed so that she may regain her strength rapidly. [486]

3. Seclusion

After childbirth the mother remains secluded (-ilama) in her hut for several weeks -- two, three, or more, depending on circumstances and especially on her husband's social position. Her seclusion is called jalé. The hut bears the same name, or else it is called jenga, "palm leaf." Sometimes the term ekolé is also applied to it, denoting the period of seclusion with all the special regulations it involves. These are as follows:

[846] 1) Meals. In some tribes the woman may already eat on the day of the delivery. But among others she is only permitted to drink. The reason for this fast is given in the form of a legend. One day long ago a Batswa asked his master for a little medicine, but the master refused to give it to him. The master's wife had just given birth. Annoyed by the refusal, the Batswa cursed his master, saying: "From now on your women will have to fast the day they give birth." (1) Another explanation is that at sometime in the past someone refused food to a slave who was about to be sacrificed at a feast of the lifting of mourning. Tribes and villages that do not give any reason of this sort permit a woman to eat in the evening, if the delivery takes place in the morning.

A mother's first meal is prepared by a woman who has performed the carnal act the preceding night. She goes to draw water, and on her return she fastens or attaches over the door of the seclusion hut a piece of palm (jenga) or, among the Bombwanja, a piece of dried banana leaf; in this way she informs everyone that it is a house of ekolé. Then she prepares the food, which consists of [264] bananas with fish or a hen in palm-oil sauce. It is eaten by the mother and her husband as well as the cook. Their very young children may also delight in it, but [487] the older ones, approaching puberty, may not. The newborn child is given a tiny bit of the sauce to taste.

1. Batswa women never fast under such circumstances.

846
[850] For a young unmarried mother, the meal is prepared by a girl who has not reached puberty or a woman who is quite old, that is, by someone who does not engage in sexual intercourse.

2) Various regulations. From the time of the preparation of the first meal until the end of the bokeka, that is, until the day the umbilical cord becomes detached, the hearth of the seclusion hut is sacred, so to speak. Apart from the couple and the assistants, no one may enjoy it or profit from it, either to light anything from it or eat anything that has been prepared there. However, some men have a means of lifting the prohibition pertaining to the fire. Upon the hearth and all the hearths of the village or a group of houses, depending on the situation, they let fall a few drops of a special concoction.

It is also forbidden to sweep or pick up the ashes from the fire. Everything must stay put until the umbilical cord of the new-born child becomes detached.

During the entire period of seclusion, the mother is assisted by a kinswoman (or one of her husband's kinswomen; among the Bombwanja there are always two), who is the wojisa, "the one who makes the seclusion" (from the verb oja). The seclusion should not be thought of as that of a hermit; the mother may go out as soon as her condition permits, and the helper goes about her occupations, but she does not do so more than necessary. Rather the hut is a house of prohibitions.

During this period the mother and her helper do not do farm
[834] work. In addition they must abstain from carnal relations and from all contacts with the opposite sex, in conformity with the customs explained in Article II, 3, above. The ekila extends to the husband and to any other person who enters the hut. Any infraction results in the death of the mother or the child in the same manner as in the case of the bokeka (see loc. cit.) . [437]

3) The end of the bokeka. When, at the end of four or five days, the umbilical cord becomes detached, the news is announced to the whole village, so that everyone may go back to their work that has been suspended. The following night the father [831] and mother perform the conjugal act to "destroy the bokeka and 846 to be able to nurse the child together." This does not mean that 837 from then on they may have regular sexual relations, for these are not permitted until after the end of seclusion. But if they were to omit the act at this time, they would have to abstain from it until the child is weaned. The Nkundó say that the act is performed "only a little." For many it becomes masturbation; others withdraw before obtaining the effect of the act. In no case may the act reach its natural climax. The reason for this practice is unknown to me. Perhaps it is done in order not to molest the woman while she is in a painful condition.

The next day the ashes in the hearth of the seclusion hut 846 are swept out, and the fire becomes "ordinary"; anyone may use it and eat food prepared on it.

6) The umbilical cord is dried on the boifió (a tray or shelf) and then buried at the foot of a young banana tree planted for that purpose, preferably under a bonkoné tree if possible. The ashes and sweepings from the seclusion hut are thrown there. The banana tree is called nkindá. (1) Its fruit may be eaten only by the child's [illegible] 1. This is a generic term used for any banana tree planted for a special purpose (a magical practice, a game, etc.).

[illegible] grandfather and grandmother. If another person eats it, he will be punished with a headache of a nervous type.

The umbilical cord is always buried in the father's native 846 soil. People who are far from home (laborers for the Whites, etc.) [illegible] preserve the umbilical cords of their children with great care in order to take them back [480] when they return to their village, or send them back when a favorable opportunity arises. The Nkundó hold to this usage tenaciously, because a person whose umbilical cord is not buried in the lands of his paternal clan has no authority in the group. The person involved would meet with the following objection: ntákokúndela lokolé, ntákokundela lokolé, ôyakitanya ngômo? ele nk'oyôyo. "The lokolé was not beaten for you, your [illegible] umbilical cord was not buried; how dare you boast? You are but a [illegible] stranger." Therefore this custom constitutes a sort of matriculation into the family. If anyone wants to be entirely certain of a Nkundó's clan, he has only to look for the place where his umbilical cord was buried.

5) The end of seclusion is marked by a few ceremonies.

[illegible] A. A meal. Early in the morning of the day set, the hus[illegible] band goes and cuts a bunch of fruit of the palm tree, and the helper goes and picks manioc leaves (nowadays leaves and fruit collected the day before are sometimes used). The helper crushes all of this to make a dish of food. While she cooks it over the fire, she shaves a little hair off the mother, plucks out one eyebrow, and cuts one of her nails. Then she does the same to the child. The helper moves away, and the father comes in. His wife subjects him to the same treatment, and he reciprocates, doing the same to the child. The rubbish is simply thrown away without any ceremony. This practice has no special name; the Nkundó say: bäyenisa belongo, bäyalongo, "They shave each other's heads."

When the vegetables are ready, all the women of the vil[illegible] lage are gathered together. A little pit is dug in front of the hut. A large leaf is placed in it to serve as a dish, and the vegetables are poured into it. The mother, the helper, and all those assembled eat. Except for a few small boys no representatives of the stronger sex are present. When the meal is completed, [438] the leaf that served as a plate and those that served as spoons are buried in the pit. Today the more advanced of the population use a European plate and spoons. The meal and the vegetables eaten are called losanganya, "reunion," because the entire village is united in partaking of them, or lofanjola, "dispersion," because it is the prelude to the end of the boleko.

B. Then follows the ceremony of separation (-sîsa bofoló, or, among the Ingôlô, bokfelifela). (1) The bofoló is the mid-rib

1. The expression and the ceremony designated by it are used whenever an important matter, such as a trial, etc., is to be terminated.

846 of a dried banana leaf. Three knots are tied in it. The helper holds it in one hand and with the other cuts off the first knot, which she carries away with her. The mother keeps her end in her hand and presents the other to her husband. She receives the knife from the hands of the helper and cuts between the two knots so that each spouse carries away his end. Each time the parties involved say, "We have cut the bofoló; we are separating; go away." Having thus bid each other farewell, each fastens his end to the roof of the seclusion hut.

846 This ceremony ends the period of seclusion and puts an end to the ekeló prohibitions. From then on the couple may have sexual 857 relations together, the helper can resume her usual life, and adultery on the part of the father can no longer harm the child or the mother. Note, however, that the child's immunity to the father's misconduct implies one condition: the father must not take it on his knees the day he commits adultery. By the following day the effects of his act have been nullified. A woman can discover her husband's infidelity through his refusal to take the child. Often she makes use of this means to obtain a confirmation of her suspicions. Some men abstain from all misconduct solely to guard against any such possibility. Adultery may have a harmful influence on the child even after it is weaned if it has a weak constitution. [490] All this seems to indicate that the reaction is considered to be physical and direct rather than a sanction based on religion or superstition.

846 Nkundó therapeutics include an antidote, however; it is 759 called bondandota (from ndota "an illness caused by the infraction of prohibitions of a sexual nature"). It consists of a potion made [276] from the sap of an aroid bearing the same name, which is mixed with the sap of the libôlôlolo plant. If for some reason or other the couple have been away from each other for a fairly long time, they sit or stand face to face and take the child on their knees, which touch each other, and each one makes the child drink the potion twice, once from each hand, making sure to turn its face toward him [or her]. Usually the couple also drink some of the brew, though it is intended primarily for the child. Without these precautions the relations between the pair and the father's

854 taking the child would cause the child's death. The same precau-767 tion is also in order if the husband goes on a trip before the child's birth and does not return till after the delivery.

846 We have just seen that the harmful effects of the father's misconduct on his child's life is effectuated through the father's 853 act of taking the child on his knees. Thus the Nkundó speak of bafongó b'ǎsé, "a father's bad knees," to indicate his reprehensible
[754] conduct, and they say that the bondandota potion is administered to the child so that it will not die because of the father's bad knees. (1)

1. The expression bafongó b'ǎsé is also used when an undertaking which requires continence is unsuccessful. (See Article II, 3).

When a child has painful and persistent diarrhea, it is often 753 interpreted as the effect of the father's infidelity. As soon as they 854 become aware of it, the couple separate for some time, and the father no longer touches the child. [491]

Contrary to what one reads on this subject about other peo-
837 ples of the Congo, Nkundó couples do not have to remain continent 846 beyond the period of seclusion. The separation ceremony gives the 767 husband back the freedom of action he had before his wife's pregnancy. For the wife the bokeka remains strict with respect to illicit relations until the child is weaned. However she, too, may regain her freedom by having recourse to an antidote, the ingredients of which she purchases from a person who holds the secret. The ingredients are placed in a small antelope horn which is then stopped [776] up by means of bolakó (resin from the Symphonia globulifera). The interested party wears it about her loins on a string or a bead belt or, preferably, on a special creeper. This amulet protects the child's life from the harmful influence of the mother's acts of adultery, but it does so only on condition that she does not separate herself from the child, as we will explain further on. This procedure

837 is not morally condoned, and a woman who resorts to it does not 834 escape criticism. She is compared to a goat, who does not have 167 a regular and steady husband: ilónya bóna lontaa, "she nurses her child as a goat does." (1)

1. The opposite of lónya lontaa, -- if it is used to show the contrast -- is lónya bonkonki.

846 When the separation ceremony is ended, the mother is adorned with all her ornaments and goes out to walk in a procession through the village. The child is carried by an older sister, a niece, etc. He is taken around the village, bósangya bóna l'esiko. Small presents are offered him everywhere -- an arrow, a small knife, a hairpin, etc. There is no feast, however; if that honor were accorded him he would die of it (for when someone dies, there is always a feast of farewell in his honor). [460]

Article IV. Nursing

853 During the first few days after birth an infant does not suck the milk of its mother, since it is "too hot." He is fed by a third person, preferably a relative.

On the third day the following occurs:

853 757 1) The mother's breasts are massaged (-kolola bafie). For this purpose the Nkundó use leaves of the lókó creeper and the bilongyá plant (Adenostemma viscosum Forst.), a green leaf from a banana tree called bolongo, several pieces of peeled sugar cane, the tips of the dried leaves of any banana tree, and sometimes other plants are added as well. All the ingredients are crushed, then boiled, and white sand and a bit of red paint are mixed in with them. The mixture is called nkengé. It is prepared by the women who are in charge of massaging the breasts. The lókó leaves, however, must be picked by the father. He goes to the forest early in the morning and first shakes the creeper so that all leaves that are not firmly attached will fall off. Then he climbs it and picks the desired [illegible] quantity of leaves, which he puts in his little basket called [illegible].

[illegible] If a leaf falls in the course of this operation, he must stop and throw away all that he has picked up to that point. The massage cannot take place on that day for it would cause the child to die falling and withering like a leaf. The father must start all over again the next day.

There are always two masseuses: one of the husband's kinswoman and one of the wife's. (1) They crush the leaves in

1. The [illegible] sometimes permit a man to perform the massage.

[illegible] the same single mortar ([illegible]). The mother meanwhile must make her public confession, of which we will speak again in a moment. When the substances intended for rubbing have been prepared, the two masseuses begin their operation, which must be quite painful. The husband's relative takes care of the right breast, the wife's concentrates on [494] the left. (1)

1. This is a natural arrangement for our people; the term used to indicate "husband" (bóme) is undoubtedly etymologically related to the one denoting "the right" ([illegible]), and there is some likelihood that the same is true for wālï (wife) and [illegible] (left).

They energetically massage the breasts from the top to the bottom with the mixture. After a few minutes they test the milk by letting a few drops run out onto a burning fragment of pottery. If the reaction is normal the mother begins to nurse. If on the other hand, the milk curdles and solidifies ([illegible] [illegible]) like rubber, it is a sign that it is of bad quality because of the presence of an internal boil in the breast, called [illegible]. In that case the knowledge and skill of a woman expert is called upon. The latter rubs the leaves of a creeper between her hands in order to extract

853 the sap, which she then mixes with water. The resulting liquid is 757 oily and foams like soap. She places a few drops on a piece of banana leaf and makes a sachet of it. She holds this against the breast for a certain time until the boil, similar to a blood clot or a piece of liver, leaves the breast and enters the sachet. She then shows it to those present. From then on the mother can nurse her child without fear; her milk has become healthy and normal.

2) The mother's public confession must include the names 857 of all the men with whom she has had carnal relations since the 853 child's conception. Other groups, such as the Injâfi, extend this 684 obligation even to instances preceding that moment but which 783 have not been declared at a previous occasion. The confession is public. The mwasaso related to the husband begins to crush the leaves to be used in rubbing the breast; as she moves the pestle and says to the mother, "Name a man." The mother replies by giving a name. The mwasaso says nyongo, "indemnity." Then all those present say yangâ, yangâ, yangâ, "absolved." Then it is the other mwasaso's turn, and she interrogates the mother in the same way. The process continues till all the names have been cited. If [486] the mother cites the name of a man who is a close relative of her husband and who therefore does not need to pay an indemnity, the mwasaso does not reply nyongo. Instead a member of the husband's clan makes the gesture signifying [20] exemption: he holds the kernel of a palm nut (bolikâ) in his left hand and throws it by means of a small board which he holds in his right. Among the Injâfi the man takes two kernels and strikes them against each other and then throws them away. Were the woman to suppress a name the child would die. If she has no admission to make, she replies, "No one besides my husband."

The indemnity that must be paid by those who are obligated to do so consists of a hen and a bunch of bananas (or their cash value) which are to be given to the mwasaso, who will then divide them. Were the accused to refuse, the husband would demand a regular indemnity from him after the end of the seclusion.

The Bombwanja have this confession at the time of the [784] weaning of the fetus. A few old women married into the clan carry out the interrogation. The kernel of the fruit of the palm is thrown by means of a knife.

857 Note, finally, that the confession is restricted to married
763 women. It is never expected of a young unmarried mother. There-853 fore it would seem to be a practice connected with marriage (a social institution) and not with childbirth (a physiological phenomenon).

This confession is called esato or lotato, from the verb [412] -tata, "to confess," (for which the generic term, sanga, "to say," is sometimes substituted).

I was unable to find any reason for this practice other than that of avoiding the death of the child. It is evident, however, that this explanation does not exhaust the question, although it is entirely possible that the original and deeper meaning has been lost without leaving any trace in the minds of the present generation. (488)

3) During the entire duration of nursing, the mother must 853 not be separated from her child. For the usual circumstances of 853 daily life, this rule is broadly interpreted; but during sexual relations it is strict, and no exceptions or excuses are permitted. Negligence under these circumstances would inevitably bring about the death of the child by ndeta as soon as the mother took it back. This rule holds for legitimate relations as much as for illicit ones. Therefore the mother must always keep her child at her breast.

4) If at some point during nursing, the milk no longer flows 853 in sufficient quantity, the mother is given a potion consisting of [751] the extract of the bark of the bolingo tree (which has a fruit con-[276] taining a very sweet milky sap). Then she eats vegetables called lonkfa. (1)

1. The leaves of this plant are also ordinarily eaten as vegetables, but they are consumed especially by those who possess the modern magical practice known as boyeli.

5) An accident to which the Nkundó attach great importance
[262] is the rejection or vomiting of milk into the mouth of an adult, even if the person affected is the infant's mother. Such a person

853 262 may not eat meat if the child is male, or fish if it is female, until the child in question is grown and kills either an animal (or bird) or a fish, according to the case, and has given it to the victim of the accident. If the child dies young, the person is accused of having violated the prohibition and is obliged to pay a large indemnity. This extremity is not usually reached, however, for the one to whom the accident has befallen scrupulously keeps away from everything that might cause this sort of murder. Then, if death occurs and he has nothing with which to reproach himself, he can resort to an ordeal or to the verdict of a test based on superstition. [563] In addition in villages that have Batwa, a woman of that race must nurse the child for an instant after the accident before its mother gives it her breast again. [497]

854 6) The child is carried on the shoulder, and as soon as it is capable of holding on, on the hip. It does not take many weeks for it to become accustomed to that position. When the mother has to hold it for a long period of time (during a march, on a trip, etc.), she puts it in a scarf-shoulder strap ([illegible]), made from creepers that are scraped and woven as for a mat, or from a cloth of raffia fibers, or even from a pelt (nowadays it is often made from a piece of European cloth). The scarf must be sturdy, for were it to tear and the infant fall, far-reaching consequences would result; all of that woman's subsequent children would be condemned to die in the mother's womb or during the period of nursing.

As the child grows it is sometimes carried astride the mother's back, either because she does not like to be separated from it, or because the tyranny of the little one forces her to keep it with her even during her work, errands, and even dances. She remedies this awkward situation if possible by resorting to the assistance of an older girl, a young niece or cousin, or a little boy from among the immediate kin.

When the child rests during the day, it is laid on an ordinary bed or on a movable bed ([illegible]), without any special arrangements. It has no difficulty sleeping soundly on such hard couches.

862 7) Weaning. Although a child is gradually accustomed to solid food, it does not stop nursing. As it grows older, the nursing times are spaced farther and farther apart. But the child [illegible] does not really stop nursing till it is about two years old, and sometimes two and a half if it has a weak constitution.

Weaning is not accompanied by any ceremony or feast. In order to break the child's habit, the mother smears her nipples with the sap of the [illegible] fruit (a kind of small sweet pimento or [illegible] eggplant) or with a pimento-pepper extract ([illegible]). Sometimes she leaves the child with some relative (daughter, sister, etc.) for a time [430] while she lives elsewhere.

As we have seen above, after weaning, the [illegible] period comes to an end for the mother, and her infidelities no longer have repercussions on the life of her child.

[illegible] 8) If the mother dies while the infant is still being nursed, [illegible] the task of nursing is turned over to some woman who is disposed to undertake it even a [illegible], and there always is one. After the child is weaned the woman is suitably recompensed. The use of [illegible] goat's milk is unknown.

[illegible] 9) Young children frequently suffer convulsions. This illness is thought to be caused by birds, and for that reason it is called [illegible] [illegible] (bird). The Nkundo try to prevent it by hanging an amulet around children's necks; it is usually the clavicular triangle of a hen's carcass. In addition they know a remedy whose purpose is to strengthen the nerves: the child is laid on a mat stretched out anywhere on the road of the hut. An eyewash ([illegible]) is prepared from the sap of leaves from the [illegible] bush and extract of [illegible] (fruit of the [illegible]). Using a leaf shaped into a horn, a few drops are put into the child's eyes. Then the father or some other relative pulls out the mat from under the child and lifts it several times, shouting: [illegible].

[illegible] 10) No special importance is attached to teething. But a child whose upper teeth come in before the lower ones (a defect called [illegible]) is considered abnormal. Therefore he is forbidden to eat the first fruits of hunting or fishing in an enclosure ([illegible]), lest the latter lose their productivity.

Article V. Name Giving

553 Naming does not occur on any predetermined date. It is not delayed without a special reason. No feast or ceremony accompanies the event. The father simply puts colored powder on the child's forehead as a sign of joy.

It is the father's right to choose a name for his child. Sometimes he asks for the family's opinion. Preferably he gives names of his relatives, deceased or living, or sometimes his own. But it is proper to respect the mother's feelings also. Failure to take them into account could provoke the woman to cause an abortion in order to punish him for being so willful as to neglect her family.

[844] A painful childbirth, like the repeated death of preceding [847] children, is often attributed to the rancor of a dead person who is discontented. In such a situation the Nkundó await the verdict [787] of a dream, or they have recourse to the judgment of a nkanga (doctor-magician) in order to be able to satisfy the irascible dead.

If the situation recurs too often, the calamity is attributed 553 to a rivalry between dead persons who are fighting over which of 551 their respective names should be given to the newborn; the envious loser kills the child. In order to avoid such mean vengeance and make everyone content while satisfying none, the father gives the child a neutral name or a Batswa name, such as Botswá, Sáka, Ékilima (nameless), Botsilɔ́ (lack of success, bad luck), Litɔ́li (dead without known cause), etc. If the child has already received a name, but for one reason or another the inauspicious fury of a ghost is feared, it is always possible to change from that name to another.

Children are usually given the names of relatives of the same sex. Exceptions are sometimes made, however, if one of the sexes is not sufficiently represented among the progeny, in which case the bearer of the name can always change it later, and he almost always does. Nevertheless, there are [500] no specifically male or female names, except for those that consist of the relative form of a verb, such as Ósámba, "the coquette," Óyémengo, "she who comes with plenty," Ótánji, "she who excels." Finally, certain names are sometimes used for either sex.

551 The etymology of most names is impossible to trace, and they have no meaning. Some are borrowed from the nomenclature of the realms of nature or of things, but no attention is paid to their original meaning, and allusions to it -- sometimes attempted by certain Europeans -- are either not understood or badly received. Other names are dictated by the child's constitution, for example Ókunjoló, "who will be buried even today," or Báwâólóí, "one dies only later." (1) Names sometimes also commemorate a special event, such as a great mourning (Báwâ, "they die"; Bálela, "people weep"), a rivalry (Báunela, "they fight for," meaning that two men are rivals for the possession of the mother of the child to whom the name is given). Finally, some names carry the meaning of a saying, such as Báwake, "all men must die," etc.

1. Both names are intended to prevent allusions to the child's debility and to express the equivalent of the saying: it is but a life of languor.

In closing let us repeat that persons who bear the same [572] name are often bound by a special friendship, give each other presents, and help each other. However, such a relationship does not entitle persons of different sexes to have intimate relations with each other, and if they do so such relations are treated as concubinage or simply adultery.

Article VI. Twins

845 ✓ Although for the Nkundó the birth of twins (baása, sing. jása), does not have the importance that other peoples attach to it [501], it does have some special features, the chief of which is the absence of the prohibitions and regulations that go with ordinary births. Twins are free from all common prohibitions; they are fulíngú. (1) Let is examine the details.

1. This is true even with respect to abstentions during mourning.

845 [202] The event is announced by the usual signal, but the signal is doubled or, if the children are of different sexes, the signal for each sex is given once. It is followed by the dance beat: two [535] or three long and two short.

The next day the father's relatives go outside the village, 845 778 preferably to a crossroads. On each side they plant a stalk of lokófolólókó. All around the stalk they spread a little heap of small branches and various leaves called ilkó. It is a sign and a place of benediction and good fortune. Each passer-by stops, picks two leaves, places one on each pile, spits on it, and says twè.(2) Then they clap hands and twice sing out, yelí yeye. Such behavior brings the benediction of the twins upon a person's journey, his undertakings, his marriage. The umbilical cord as well as the placenta and membrane are buried under the heap.

2. Onomatopoeia for "spit."

845 382 [384] Every morning the mother and father draw two stripes with kaolin on the middle of their foreheads and on their arms, above and below the elbow. They do the same to the twins. (3) They continue doing so until the child is weaned. If after that time one of the children falls ill, they begin again treating him in this manner until he is cured, taking care not to omit his brother, lest he too fall ill. For while these designs are signs of joy, they are [751] above all a prophylactic measure against children's fever (ikótswáki), [502] called wásanyi when it occurs in twins or in a child following them, and manifests itself chiefly by tumors of the head and face.

3. Sometimes a double stripe is added at the temples The kaolin may be used pure or mixed with the red paint called ngóla.

845 551 Twins are invariably called Mbóyó and Bokétu, names given to the first born and the second respectively, whatever their sex. The Bombwanja (like the Ekonda) use the names Mbóó and Mpia, respectively. The mother takes the name of Ǎmbá.

845 However, these names are not used exclusively by such persons;
551 they may be given to others as well. The father, on the other hand, does not receive a new name; but he bears the title is'éy'âfé, which literally means "father of two." (1) Twins are also said to be Åmbâmba (pl. byÅmbâmba) from the verb -âmba, "to accept, to receive," because they are permitted to accept and to take everything, since none of the usual prohibitions apply to them.

The mother of twins is not required to go into seclusion
845 (nyang'éy'afsa ilóko wakelé). The shed belonging to the head 593 of the clan, that is, the one in whose home important animals (leopards, etc.) are dismembered, is set up for her. (2) The shed is closed by means of palms. Neither the parents, nor the helper, nor the persons who enter this place are required to observe continence or the other prohibitions involved in ekelé.

All the members of the kin group come to greet the twins 845 and give each one a present (hens, knives, arrows, food), which is received by the father or the mother. Whenever anything is given to one of the twins, even if it is the smallest object, the same must be given to the other; otherwise the latter would die. If the mother takes one in her arms, the other one must also be picked up, either by her or by the father. If she strikes one, she must also strike his brother. This [503] duality therefore applies to everything, and with even greater reason to nursing.

If a twin child cries or is ill, the parents must sing and [534] dance to the accompaniment of a lokolé and a ngbeno drum, a ceremony called -bénga bafsa. If someone invites a twin or his

1. Among the Ekonda he is called Buka.

2. Therefore, at the bonaonga place or the place of dismembering important animals (nyama ya bikofo, literally "superb animals").

845 parents to the dance, they must go. When the mother passes a [178] crossroads or the dwelling place of a spirit or an [illegible] (a place where the Nkundó gather for magical practices, oracles, etc.), she also sings and dances in honor of the spirit, so that he will favor her 845 children. Various songs are popular, such as: Elima ë'Àmɔlá 573 tongɔlɔla yelí yeye, "Spirit of Àmɔlá, do not weep; (1) [illegible] la

1. Tongɔlɔla is an archaic form still in use among the Ekonda, etc [illegible] ë'Àmɔlá [illegible] [illegible], [illegible] bilingɔ yelí yeye, "Àmɔlá's [illegible] and [illegible], do not bruise yourself, do not stir, do not eat bilingɔ mushrooms"; [illegible] 'a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] yelí yeye, "[illegible] and [illegible], I surround my mother with abundance"; [illegible]'a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] yelí yeye, "I shall fall ill, and yet I will walk (be well)"; [illegible]'a [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] yelí yeye, "difficult childbirth," etc.

845 Foods forbidden to twins are the mushrooms called bilingɔ
262 (or bilingɔndo or [illegible]), the [illegible] antelope, and the [illegible] yam, which is also forbidden to parents whose child is not yet weaned. (2)

2. This prohibition extends to all food cooked in pots in which such forbidden foods have been prepared. The extension is characteristic of all alimentary prohibitions.

845 When traveling, the parents of twins gird themselves with the 487 creeping plant called boyayenge, or wear it like a strap over the shoulder The mother also attaches a bell to it. Their hair is often [301] adorned with two feathers from the tail of a gray parrot ([illegible]) and two feathers from a white hen. [504]

845 The greeting to parents of twins and their reply must always 576 be double: w'ɔ́ná w'ɔ́ná, the reply om'ɔ́ná om'ɔ́ná; ɔ́lyé, ɔ́lyé, the reply bɔ́ka bɔ́ka. Note that the last greeting is not replied to differently

576
845 from the others. They thus rank with the great notables of the past. [sic]

845 When the children grow up and become self-sufficient, all the special regulations lose their force and they become like 591 everybody else. Nothing distinguishes them from the rest in marriage, death, etc. No preference is shown for or against them. But their descendants will again produce twins.

845 Thus the Nkundó consider twins as extraordinary children, but they do not carry this view to extremes. They are pleased to receive two children at a time, although they believe that under such circumstances the pregnancy and delivery are more dangerous for the mother. That is why she is called [illegible] since, despite the seriousness of the situation, she did not die. This epithet is also applied to the father and to the twins, probably for the same reason as well as because of their immunity with respect to prohibitions. If the twins are of different sexes, however, the mother is not as likely to be called [illegible], since she is [illegible], "harmful." (1)

1. See above, Article II, 3.

845 It is apparent from the above description that twins are 787 considered to be somewhat tainted with magic. The existence of 757 this belief is confirmed by the prohibition against throwing anything (stone, palm kernel, etc.) onto their hut, the same prohibition applying to anyone who possesses a charm or practices sorcery or protective magic. In addition they possess a certain innate ability to cast a spell over the activities (hunting, fishing) of others. That is why persons who are afraid of being harmed by them smear themselves with kaolin in the same way as do such children and their parents. [301]

845 The Nkundó have had cases of triplets, but they are extremely rare. The youngest of the three is called [illegible], or [illegible], or [illegible]. The only special practice with reference to the youngest one is that he can never be ordered to do any work, be sent to carry a message, run any errand, etc., [illegible].

845 In other respects he is not differentiated from the other two. Greetings are not tripled in the case of triplets.

A child born directly after twins is called Wotsji (from otsja, "to repeat"). He is in no way different from other children.

Article VII. Circumcision

Circumcision is generally practiced. It does not have to 307 be performed at any particular age. It is usually done during childhood before the tenth year. The more timorous put it off until puberty or even later. Special customs of individual clans sometimes set a time. Thus, a man of the village of Bosombó is not allowed to be circumcised until he has killed an animal at the hunt. On the other hand, the season during which circumcisions are performed is specified: they must take place during the period when the water level is low.

The operation may be performed by any man who is expert at it. It is carried out behind the huts. No one but the boys being operated on and their fathers are present. The boys stand in a group somewhat apart from the proceedings but place themselves so that with their eyes they can follow the treatment to which their companion is being subjected. The patient squats. One of the elderly assistants places his hands over the boy's eyes so that he cannot see what is happening. The person performing the operation has already dug a small pit to catch the blood. He pulls the foreskin, ties it with a string, and then uses ashes to trace the line which must be followed by the empóng knife that is used on such occasions. When the blood has stopped flowing, he chews some bondóngó [824] pepper (Aframomum . . .) or, preferably, [506] a caudal fin of [825] the ngolo fish and then spits it onto the wound. The resulting sensation is very painful. But the patient shows that he is brave; for if he cries he is mocked by his companions.

As long as the wound is not healed, the boy must not use [262] manioc leaves (bangfoju) or manioc bread in the preparation of bosombó or lofto. Nor may he eat the skin, head, or tail of fish.

While the wound is healing, the boy who has been circumcised is cared for, washed, etc., by his mother or, if he has reached 845 puberty, by his father. The performance of this rule entails continence (bekeka) for the person who undertakes it, even with respect to the spouse. A violation of this rule prevents healing of the wound or at least makes the process very long and difficult. (1) [855] 1. A similar bekeka applies to anyone nursing a large gangrenous ulcer (wálí).

The foreskin that has been cut off is dried on the boliló (tray or shelf). Then no one bothers with it any longer, and it usually remains there, dusty and dirty, for an indefinite period of time if the rats leave it alone.

In the custom the young people are beginning to neglect [177] the native skilled in circumcising and resort instead to European surgeons.

Circumcision is not an occasion for feasts or ceremonies. [illegible] Sometimes a man who is rich and vain will give a feast, but this is not at all a common practice.

The term "to circumcise" is translated in Lonkundo as téna bongwé, "to cut off the foreskin." The less vulgar term and one used much more frequently is téna nsongé, "to cut off the tip." A much too decent circumlocution is téna batói, "to cut off the ears."

The reason for this custom has already been given in Chapter I, Part II, Article II, 2.

Article VIII. Education

From an early age a Nkundó child must perform various 861 small services for his parents, especially in the household; he is 857 asked to draw water, fetch firewood, take care of a little brother or sister, etc. The demands for such services are addressed chiefly to girls, but boys are not at all exempt. By the very nature of things, however, the latter are less frequently asked to help.

Quite early a boy may accompany his father on trips, at meetings, legal debates, etc. The father makes a bow and arrows for him and teaches him the art of using them. The great pastime 857 868 for young boys is hunting and fishing by all sorts of methods suitable for their age. Little by little an adolescent learns the usual tasks and everything that he needs to know in order to survive and obtain food and shelter. His instruction is completed by his companions and above all by the exigencies of life.

A girl learns housework and farming. Very early her mother braids a small basket for her in order to accustom her to carrying loads. She also participates in the women's fishing.

In general one has the impression that the girls are far more active than the boys. But I think that this difference is due to the fact that the boys are almost always in the forest, while the girls remain in the village and are therefore noticed more. As a matter of fact in our missions it cannot be said that the boys work less well than the girls, quite the contrary.

The girls practice the culinary art, not only with their mothers but also -- as in Belgium -- in a game ([illegible]).

The children do not study the history, laws, and traditions 867 869 of their clan or tribe. They learn them in the [308] course of events, either by hearing them described or by asking questions. Often their parents explain such matters on their own initiative, not according to a definite program but rather when opportunities arise. A young man can learn many things especially by accompanying his father on visits, on trips, at meetings and deliberations, or by listening attentively to the performances of troubadours who play the longombe (mandolin). The astonishing knowledge of usages and customs, ancestral laws, history, the wisdom of the ancients, proverbs, fables, etc., possessed by some youngsters, to the point of excelling their elders, can be explained by their faithfulness in following papa instead of continuously enjoying the freedom of the forest. I have encountered more than one instance of this sort which was explained primarily on the basis of the boy's attachment to his father.

The Nkundó child begins to hum popular tunes and imitate [illegible] the rhythmic movements of the dancers when he is barely able to walk. Little girls, especially, practice special dances of their own. Then, little by little, the children mix with the group of adult dancers and are able to join the chorus, though they must remain in the rear.

868 Parents teach their children the trades that they themselves know: forging, wood sculpture, the weaving of mats and baskets, pottery making, etc.

867 With respect to ethics, the children learn a great deal from experience, but parents do not fail to teach them rules of politeness, decorum, good breeding, and the great principles of social relations. As in Europe, however, there are degrees of concern or indifference in this realm. The moral code taught is the one the parents themselves practice. It is centered above all on family and society: respect toward members of the family, mutual assistance, respect for the welfare of others, fear of the opposite sex, etc. But all of it has a naturalistic basis: the reason given for adherence to such precepts is limited to the unpleasant consequences [101] that would otherwise result. Reprimands and even corporal punishments for infractions are not unknown. But they are chiefly due to exasperation and therefore mixed with anger and without any continuity or consistent idea. Once the anger has passed the threats remain sterile. For punishment the parents [861] resort chiefly to blows, but other penalties are also common. For instance, one of our catechists when he was young (between 1880 and 1890) had removed a little bird trapped in a snare belonging to one of his cousins. As soon as his father heard what he had done, he gave the youngster a good scolding and made him go to bed without supper.

As a girl approaches puberty, her mother teaches her the rights and duties of a married woman. She teaches her how to behave and conduct herself in order to be a good wife and mother. She does this so that her daughter may find a good husband, and so that the union may be stable and not produce too many palavers or trouble.

Formerly, children were not allowed to see the dances of adults. They were chased away and had to amuse each other. This was an excellent means for preserving morality among the youth and retaining their respect for their elders. Therefore it is most regrettable that it has been abandoned.

881 When the children reach puberty, they no longer like to sleep in their parent's home. The parents do not send them away, but on the other hand, they do not oppose this desire on the part of young people which, they say, springs from a feeling of modesty. The boys go one way, the girls another; for example, they may appropriate an unoccupied hut belonging to their father or go to close relatives, or they may try and find a place in quarters occupied by a group of boys or girls. If no house is available, the boys band together to build a hut which they share. Nowadays they begin very early [330] to build individual huts or one for two, in order to thus enjoy a greater freedom.

861 On the trees in the forest one finds a kind of hard mushroom called [illegible]. When a child begins to speak, the mushroom is placed between his teeth, so that he will bite into it and thus learn not to express himself thoughtlessly but to hold back his words ([illegible]) and think before speaking.

One can often observe parents and other persons actively helping children to express themselves correctly, especially in correcting mistakes, pronunciation, and errors with regard to proper nouns, by giving them the proper words and even explaining grammatical forms and subtle distinctions between certain terms. "This is how it must be said; that means something else. This plant is called thus and so, etc."

861 Therefore, although a Nkundó child is very free to spend his days as he pleases and, perforce, learns many things through personal experience, it would be wrong to say that his parents are not interested in his education and do not contribute to it. They participate actively by their advice, their explanations, and their demonstrations. Needless to say, their role is neither as important nor as continuous as in many civilized societies. Besides it is very difficult, and often unfair, to compare our people's situation with that of Europeans; the difference in circumstances is too great. But we must point out in all fairness that the Nkundó do make efforts in this realm, although the results are hardly apparent with respect to moral education (1), because there are many flaws, gaps,

1. We will say no more about material and economic education, which can not be criticized.

6. errors, and obstacles, the most important of which should be considered. [511]

1) First of all education begins too late. To be crowned with success such efforts should be begun as early as possible. And among the Nkundó, a child is not considered old enough to be given lessons or punished until he is fairly well developed (usually at about six years of age).

2) In their pedagogy the Nkundó do not take into account the relationship between cause and effect with respect to the acquisition of bad habits. They react against censurable actions, but they do not attack their roots by opposing the beginning of them. Thus, they do not understand that if the desires and whims of a small child, for example with respect to nursing, demands for food, the desire to be fondled and carried, etc., are continually satisfied, he will necessarily become an unruly little tyrant who wants to be satisfied in every way.

3) The Nkundó have no systematic idea or consistency in correcting faults and punishing misbehavior; as we have seen, punishment by Nkundó parents most frequently takes the form of sudden explosions of anger and indignation. The purpose of the punishment is not apparent to the child, and the only result obtained is a fear of being chastised. There may be fortunate exceptions, but these are surely extremely rare. Generally, parents follow the impulse of the moment, and the youngsters take advantage of these impulses. The gravity of such a situation stands out clearly in the following case history: Isia (now a man between thirty and forty) was amusing himself by shooting arrows. One of his father's wives, named Bokeli, appeared, accompanied by Bakutu, a young sister of Isia. The youngster reproved Bokeli: "What are you doing here with my sister? If she is hit by an arrow, the palaver will be yours." The woman insulted him. The boy threatened to shoot at her. Thereupon his father, Bolékálá, intervened, saying, "If you dare touch my wife, I [512] will kill one of your mothers." (1) Isia's retort was to shoot at Bokeli saying,

1. That is, either his mother (Botafnanya) or her sister and ebfsa, Basfmi.

[illegible] "Well, then, let them both die." (2) His father wanted to catch

2. That is, if my mother is to die, you, Bokelli, will die also (a common retort in such cases).

him, but the agile youngster fled to the forest. As he did not return home that evening, everyone became frightened. Finally, he answered the call of his aunt Bongilia and came back. The moral of the story: everyone was happy to see him again, and there was no more question of punishment. (3)

3. According to the Nkundó jurisprudence, the wrong was actually on Bokelli's side because she started the insults. But the reaction was excessive, nevertheless.

An even stronger example is that of Esald (now between forty and fifty), who was insulted by his mother Bosala for some misdeed. He shot at her and wounded her on the forehead. To flee his father's anger he withdrew to the forest. He was called and came back. That ended the palaver. (4)

4. As a matter of fact, a Nkundó fable teaches that a person should not be left under the sway of rage, especially if he has withdrawn to the forest, because he may become a misanthrope as a result, producing even more deplorable consequences (vagrancy, murders, etc.).

595
86 4) There is a lack of cooperation between the spouses. Each one acts on his own initiative and out of his own indignation. More than that they contradict each other; one will punish the child, and the other tries to protect it, either directly or indirectly, by reprimanding the spouse.

593
861 Women in particular are very intolerant of having anyone touch their children, even the child's own father. This fact can be attributed in part to a lack of any unity of feeling between the spouses and partly to maternal love, which is purely natural, psycho-physiological, so to speak.

Measures taken against a child who has misbehaved often

861 result in serious domestic quarrels, sometimes followed by the wife's flight to her family. Such was the case of Bekoto b'Ofengi (born around 1880). His father, Bolekaji, had forbidden him to peel a piece of sugar cane [512] in a clumsy and wasteful manner. The boy did not want to listen to reason. Next thing you know he had cut a deep wound in his finger. "What did I tell you!" shouted the father. "Now you are punished for your disobedience." Thereupon the mother, Mbilå, flew into a rage. "Oh! You are killing my child!" and so on. She rolled up her mats, took her baskets on her back, and took the path leading to her village.

Nkundó casuistry includes the case -- which seems hypothetical or at least belonging to the past, for I have never known or heard of a real instance -- of a man taking revenge on his wife for having insulted his child. His revenge took the form of ordering the child to go and kill a goat belonging to her mother's clan, thus obliging the child to pay an indemnity to the owner, so that the mother finds herself thus being punished by her family. The father's right to do this is recognized in Nkundó jurisprudence. But from the standpoint of education the solution is far from ideal.

8) The influence of the kin group also plays a great role.

602
861 The Nkundó are very much attached to their families. Their children are at home everywhere in the group. A wife has very close ties to her own family. The father's brothers and sisters are a child's "fathers"; his maternal aunts and uncles are his "mothers." A child's real father does not do much to defend his son against scolding or punishment from his own close kin but does not readily accept the intervention of his wife's family, and vice versa. And again the child can take advantage of such dissension. The situation occurs quite frequently although there are many exceptions.

6) The parent's opposition to reprimands by strangers is 861 even greater as a general rule. They try to cover up and justify 869 the faults of their progeny, whom they will fiercely defend. The children naturally know all this and take advantage of it.

7) The polygamous household, with all its rivalries among 595-6 co-wives, cannot but accentuate all such [314] adverse effects 596 on the children's education. The conflicts, spiteful comments, 861 palavers, etc., are easily extended to the children. And each wife defends her own.

8) Everything is public; there are no secrets; everything
591 is known, seen, and heard. People do not restrain themselves 861 and the presence of children does not stop the flow of insults and obscenities which anger provokes. The young people see many things it would be better for them not to know. They are present at domestic quarrels and are witnesses to dissensions. All this is increased by life outdoors, in the street, and by the thinness of partitions.

9) Another factor is added nowadays: the facility of com-177 munications and the presence of European stations. Boys can al-
591 ways run away and find shelter with the Whites or their native em-861 ployees. The girls seek out kinswomen who live at such stations, even though they must help a little with the housework, in the hope of later enjoying a greater freedom and living in luxury.
Parental influence and authority are naturally weakened as a result.

10) Finally, Nkundó education lacks any solid basis, any 861 religion or religious morality. Everything is based on natural, physical fear: the fear of punishments (physical or based on superstition), harmful consequences of bad actions (palavers, difficulties, fines, indemnities, sometimes the shame of being caught -- as in theft). It is especially this lack of religious motivation that makes their moral education bear so little fruit. As the Nkundó are accustomed to this imperfect state, they do not feel the need for 000 such a foundation. That is why it is so difficult to instill any moral conscience into them. The patient and perservering action of the great Christian truths with their institutions for moral formation (uninterrupted preaching, confession, prayer) are needed to endow

(592) this people with a sense of duty, that individual conscience of which they are so imperatively in need. [515]

Article IX. Rights Over the Children

593* 591 Without repeating everything on this subject that is to be found at various points in this work, it is nevertheless appropriate to summarize here the various considerations and conclusions concerning the rights over children.

The great principle dominating the entire question is the Roman adage: Pater is est quem nuptiae demonstrant. The legitimate husband is the legal father of his wife's child. Without marriage the natural father has no rights.

584 591 593* Consequently, children conceived in adultery belong exclusively to the husband (Chapter VI, Article VIII). Since relations with a widow who is not yet legitimately remarried is adultery, a child born as a result of such relations is legally the heir's child. (Chapter III, Article II). The same rule, mutatis mutandis, applies to a divorcée before a regular remarriage (Chapter VIII, Article III, 1).

The child of an independent woman has no legal father. Consequently, it belongs to the mother's family and remains illegitimate (otomolá; otomolá ĕkáká is the name by which his grandfather calls him). (Chapter I, Part II, Article IV, 3.) But if the natural father marries the mother, he can obtain the child by paying an extra "slave" for it. In any case he must pay the complete bride price. If he does not marry the mother, he has no rights whatsoever over the child; however, this rule is in the process of changing in the northwest corner of the region under discussion (Chapter I, Part II, Article IV, 3).

This legitimation is not required if the pregnancy began after bride-price payments were begun. It can take place even after the mother's death by means of the above-mentioned payment. Such cases of posthumous legitimization sometimes occur in relation to children born of extra-customary [extracoutumiere] unions contracted during the early period of colonization. [516]

861
595 A father's rights over his child are not unassailable. He can lose them, especially if he neglects to fulfill certain duties because such conduct is equivalent to disowning. Among the duties whose neglect results in the loss of rights over the children are the following:

1) The completion of the bride price.

2) The fulfillment of funerary duties (burial, payments).

3) The relinquishment of a portion of the bride price to be restituted in case of divorce.

4) The performance of duties toward the child. Only instances of gross negligence, constituting real abandonment, enter into consideration here -- especially an illegitimate refusal to obtain the means for a son to get married. The case cited in Chapter II, Article XI, 3 and similar instances also fall into this category.

Conclusions

58 At the end of this work we shall sum up the conclusions it suggests to us:

1) Among the Nkundó marriage consists of a union between a man and a woman, constituted through the payment of certain valuables. This payment is made by the husband, through the intermediation of one or more official witnesses, to the wife's parents; it is counterbalanced by a payment of valuables on the part of the woman's family to the husband and his family.

2) There are various sorts of conjugal unions which differ somewhat from this standard form: the inheritance of a widow by a distant relative of the husband; the substitution -- during life or after death -- of a kinswoman who continues the union begun by a woman now deceased or divorced; [517] the offer of a wife in exchange for the performance of an important service; a certain kind of exchange and, in some tribes, purchase; and union with a slave.

3) Apart from the question of the Batswa, obstacles to marriage are due to kinship and affinity.

4) Married life is regulated by rules which are well defined and wise, but infractions are committed. Adultery is condemned and repressed, but the Nkundó concept of it is not the same as ours, and they accept certain exceptions.

5) Polygamy is highly regarded; the practice is governed by definite rules, and the first wife occupies a rank of precedence in the family and in society.

6) Divorce is permitted under fairly strict conditions, and the dissolution of marriage is regulated by suitable laws.

7) Legal stipulations which must be adhered to at the time of death demonstrate the precedence of marriage over blood ties and prove that a wife really belongs to her husband, although she remains a member of her own clan. Furthermore, the husband's death does not break the marriage for the widow.

8) Children belong to the legal father.

On the whole, we can conclude that although the Nkundó's marriage institutions are not without defect from our point of view, they nevertheless appear well organized and in no way "savage." They give an impression of clarity and wisdom, adaptability and flexibility, unity and logic -- wonderful qualities which many European legal systems can envy and which demonstrate the remarkable organization the interesting Nkundó people have been able to attain. LE
MARIAGE DES NKUNDÓ

INTRODUCTION.

La présente étude traite des lois et coutumes matrimoniales d'un groupe important du peuple Nkundó. Il est donc utile de commencer en donnant quelques généralités sur cette peuplade hautement intéressante au point de vue ethnologique, pour ensuite limiter l'objet direct de nos investigations.

Les Nkundó ou Mǫ́ngǫ occupent presque toute l'étendue de la cuvette centrale du Congo belge, de la Lulonga-Lopori, au Nord, jusqu'au lac Léopold II, et au delà de la Lukenie jusqu'au Kasai. A l'Ouest ils n'atteignent le fleuve Congo qu'au Sud du « Ruki » (1); la partie occidentale de l'ancien district de la Lulonga étant occupée par les Ngǫmbę, qui, en amont de Basankusu (indigène Basǎnkoso), ont poussé une pointe jusqu'à la Maringa (indigène Lǔwo) (2). A l'Est ils atteignent et même dépassent le Lomami. Au Sud-Est ils pénètrent dans le Nord-Ouest du district du Sankuru. Actuellement il est encore impossible de déterminer exactement les limites à l'Est et au Sud-Est : Bambǫ́lę́, Bahamba, Mïtuku, Bangęlęngẹlẹ, Balengola, Basongola, voire les Batẹtẹla et les « Bakusu », sont ou des Mọ́ngọ ou leurs tout proches parents (1).

---

(1) Ruki est probablement une déformation de Bolóki, tribu riveraine de pêcheurs habitant l'aval de cette rivière, que les indigènes appellent plutôt Loflaka.

(2) D'après BITTREMIEUX et LESTAEGHE, l'île Nsumba près de Nouvelle-Anvers garde encore quelques Nkundó (Congo, 1922, I, p. 194).

Il m'est impossible de donner le chiffre total exact de cette peuplade telle que nous venons de la délimiter. En tout cas, on peut l'estimer à plus d'un million.

Les institutions et la langue de ce peuple ne présentent, dans tout l'immense territoire qu'il occupe, que des différences insignifiantes. Des divergences plus fortes existent dans les manifestations matérielles de la culture.

A mon avis, il est probable que certains groupes, s'ils appartiennent au peuple Nkundó-Mọ́ngọ par leur culture et leur idiome, s'en distinguent cependant généalogiquement et historiquement. Tels sont les véritables Elíngá ou Riverains (Bolóki, E̲lẹku, Elíngá de la Haute-Lŏmela et de la Haute-Tshuapa) (2), les tribus Ngọmbẹ de la Lŏmela, les Mbólé, les Bakutu de la Lŏmela-Tshuapa (auxquels il faut vraisemblablement assimiler les Ntómbá et les Nkọ́lẹ) (3); peut-être aussi le Mpámá et les Losakanyi (4). Cela n'exclut pourtant pas la possibilité d'une parenté éloignée, mais, dans l'état actuel de nos connaissances, il est impossible de trancher la question : des ressemblances assez étroites pouvant s'expliquer aussi bien par l'unité d'origine que par la cohabitation temporaire, comme des divergences par la diversité d'origine ou par la séparation momentanée à une certaine époque de leur histoire.

---

(1) Cfr. DONCKERWOLCKE, dans Kongo-Overzee, I, p. 235; et mon article dans Congo, 1931, I, p. 13. Le fait que M. Donckerwolcke range parmi les Wakutshu ou Batẹtẹla les Bakẹla (=Boyéla), qui sont indiscutablement de purs Mọ́ngọ, est très significatif.

(2) Près de Coquilhatville habitent quelques clans Libinja et Basọkọ́, que nous excluons, puisqu'ils sont nettement d'origine étrangère.

La Tshuapa est appelée par les indigènes : Jwafa ou Jafa. Plus haut : Lwafa. Chez les Bongandó et les Bahamba : Laha.

(3) Cfr. mon article dans Congo, 1931, I, pp. 21 et suiv.

(4) Ces derniers sont nommés, erronément, Losakanja par le P. SCHEBESTA, dans Vollblutneger und Halbzwerge, p. 199. Ils paraissent avoir habité autrefois sur la Basse-Momboyo (Loflaka); le terrain sur lequel est installée la Mission de Flandria porte encore leur nom.

Disséminés parmi les Nkundó, se trouvent un assez grand nombre de Pygmoïdes ou Pygmiformes (1) (Batswá, Jǫ́fę, Balúmbę, Bilángi, Boné), qui avec leurs « maîtres » forment une communauté d'intérêts économiques et sociaux. Le Bǫtswá appartient à son maître, dépend de lui, mais n'est pas, à proprement parler, son esclave. Le maître n'a pas que des droits sur lui; il a aussi des devoirs à remplir. La plupart de ces Pygmoïdes se trouvent dans la partie Ouest du territoire nkundó; dans l'Est ils sont très rares.

Les Nkundó-Mǫ́ngǫ sont venus du Nord ou Nord-Est, tandis que les Mbólé prétendent être venus du Nord-Ouest et les Bakutu de l'Ouest (2).

Il nous faut dire un mot du nom de cette peuplade. Nous l'appelons d'ordinaire Nkundó-Mǫ́ngǫ. Le premier nom est employé à l'Ouest et au Sud, le second surtout au Nord et à l'Est. Déjà les Elángá de la région de Losanganya sont appelés par les groupes situés plus à l'Ouest : Mǫ́ngǫ éá Lolo = Mǫ́ngǫ d'en amont. Les étrangers désignent ce peuple, inclusivement des Nkundó, Mbólé, Bakutu, etc., sous le nom de Mǫ́ngǫ. Dans les écrits on rencontre parfois le nom de Lolo, Balolo (3). Or, comme nous venons de voir, lolo n'est pas un nom propre, mais signifie tout simplement : amont (que d'autres dialectes traduisent par nkoto).

Le peuple s'appelle Nkundó ou Mǫ́ngǫ, jamais Bankundó ou Bamǫ́ngǫ. Le préfixe ba s'entend bien, comme il peut s'employer devant tous les noms propres, à peu près de la façon du français : les Molière, les Rubens, etc. Le préfixe singulier bo s'emploie aussi, mais rarement.

(1) Nom proposé par le P. SCHEBESTA, o. c., p. 170.

(2) Cfr. mon étude citée, passim.

(3) Cfr., par exemple, le titre de la Mission protestante de la Lulonga : « Congo Balolo Mission ».

Je ne l'ai entendu que dans l'expression : ale ô bonkundó mongo = c'est un véritable Nkundó, et cela uniquement en parlant d'un étranger, qui s'est bien assimilé la langue et la culture nkundó. Toutefois, il se pourrait qu'il eût un sens plus large.

A ces noms peut-on trouver une étymologie ? Mọ́ngọ est un nom commun signifiant quelque chose d'excellent, particulièrement une personne. Mọ́ng'ěy'ọ̌na, dit-on, = un enfant tout à fait bien; mọ́ng'ěỵ'ǒmoto = une femme superbe. (Comparez aussi imọ́ngọ = état d'être tout à fait bien, prospère, riche, etc.) Au pluriel il ne change pas. Pour Nkundó, l'explication est plus ardue, si même elle est possible (¹). S'il est en rapport avec un autre mot, ce ne peut être qu'avec le verbe kundola = déterrer ce qui avait été enfoui. Mais déterrer quoi ? Les cadavres des ennemis, pour les manger, comme preuve de leur hardiesse ? Ou des anneaux de cuivre, ce qui signifierait leur richesse ? C'est possible, mais nous n'en avons aucune preuve directe. Selon les PP. Bittremieux et Lestaeghe, dans l'article mentionné, p. 195, d'aucuns prétendent que Nkundó signifie « nkóló » = maître. Sur quoi cette explication est-elle basée (²) ?

L'explication que je juge la plus vraisemblable est que Nkundó signifie « gens de l'intérieur ». D'ailleurs le nom est presque toujours employé par opposition à Elíngá = Riverains, parfois à d'autres groupes. Mais le sens originel du mot a probablement été élargi par le contact avec d'autres peuples nègres et avec les Européens; il peut ainsi être devenu plus ou moins le nom spécifique de la peuplade. Toutefois il faut remarquer que si l'on demande à un Ngọmbẹ si sa tribu est Elíngá = riverain-pêcheur, il peut vous répondre : « Il y a chez nous des Elíngá et des Nkundó ». Ce qui confirme notre supposition. Et ainsi ce mot est synonyme de Nkondaka, qu'on trouve dans plusieurs dialectes de l'Équateur (1).

(²) Par opposition aux Batswá, les Nkundó (et autres peuplades) sont Baotó (sing. Bootó) = non-Batswá.

Par opposition aux Bombwanja, on entend souvent le nom Bokóté. En beaucoup de cas c'est un synonyme de Nkundó, dans le sens actuel du mot. Dans son étude sur les Wăngatá (Revue congolaise, I, 1910), ENGELS, qui a bien connu ces populations, ayant été, entre autres, administrateur du territoire de Bokátola, a déjà opposé Bombwanja à Bokóté. Ce nom me semble être le véritable nom propre de la peuplade en question, du moins pour une grande partie. Il n'a pas d'autre signification dans la langue courante. Pourtant, étymologiquement, il pourrait être en connexion avec le verbe kóta = devenir vieux; ou avec un autre kóta = kóta likambo = (ailleurs bútola) = terminer les discussions en rendant un jugement définitif; kóta lisoló = avoir le dernier mot dans une causette; kóta esé = assurer la paix et l'ordre dans le village; et avec le verbe dérivé : kótela = être capable, habile.

Laissant hors considération les Mbólé, etc., ainsi que les tribus de la Lukenie, nous distinguons dans le peuple Nkundó-Mǫ́ngǫ s.s. divers groupes : Nsǫngǫ́ (Mbonje), Elángá, Bosaka, Bongandó, Boyéla, Ekonda, etc., comprenant chacun une quantité de subdivisions ou tribus.

Notre étude exclut la majorité de ces groupes et se restreint au territoire délimité comme suit : au Nord, la Ruki-Tshuapa; à l'Est, la Salonga jusqu'à la limite des Mbólé; au Sud, une ligne allant du confluent de la Loilaka et de la Lwílę et rejoignant la limite Nord des Bombwanja de la Lokoló, ensuite la frontière des Ekonda; à l'Ouest, la Boloko, affluent du Ruki. Nous n'envisageons donc qu'une minime partie du territoire et des tribus nkundó. Mais c'est la seule partie que nous ayons pu étudier à fond. Nous tenons compte des Bombwanja et des Elíngá, qui sont établis dans la région ainsi circonscrite.

(1) Cfr. mon article cité, p. 19. J'ai encore entendu ce terme chez les Lifumba. Rapprochez de Nkondaka le nom Ekonda, et bokonda=forêt sur terre ferme, et le verbe konda=s'ensabler, s'alluvionner, devenir terre ferme.

Les Elíngá habitent seulement le long des grandes rivières. Ils comprennent, dans notre région, outre les Elíngá proprement dits (dont nous n'avons qu'une dizaine de clans appartenant au groupe des Bolóki et qui sont installés de Ikéngé à Bokéle et Mpakú, plus les quatre ou cinq villages Ẹlẹku sur la Salonga), les villages Nkǫ́lę et Ekonda (1) qui ont adopté le genre de vie et les coutumes des Elíngá (2).

Quant aux Bombwanja, on en trouve des clans éparpillés un peu partout et plus ou moins dépendants d'autres clans avec lesquels ils cohabitent; ils forment des sortes de hameaux dans un grand nombre de villages. Un bloc compact se rencontre aux alentours de Bokátola. Il est constitué en chefferie indépendante, bien que, d'après la « coutume », il « appartienne » à titre de julé (pl. baulé) = sujet, clan assujetti, subjugué (verbe uja), à certains villages ou groupes Bokóté (3). Il est bien possible que ces Bombwanja soient originairement des Mbólé : certains mots et locutions de leur dialecte rappellent le lombólé.

Énumérons rapidement les autres tribus — Nkundó « purs » — qui font l'objet de cette étude :

1° Les Injǫ́lǫ́, « fils de la sœur » (bǫ́nankáná) des Ntómbá et Boléngé d'au delà de la Boloko. Ils se divisent en trois groupes, formant, administrativement, chacun une sous-chefferie : Engónjó, Wesé, et Ngọmbẹ (1). Une petite fraction se trouve hors du territoire envisagé, entre la Boloko et Coq (2).

---

(1) Respectivement apparentés aux Nkǫ́lę de la Lokoló et aux Ekonda du lac Léopold II.

(2) Cfr. les données sur l'histoire et la vie des Elingá publiées par le R. P. Boelaert, M. S. C., dans Congo, 1935, II, p. 705.

(3) Il en est de même du groupe Bombwanja de la Lokóló. D'autres clans se trouvent éparpillés parmi les Elángá d'outre Tshuapa. Ils sortent tous du cadre de cette étude. Les Bombwanja se divisent en Basuné et Bonkoso, plus leur bǫ́nankáná (fils de la sœur) les Boéndé.

2° Les Boángí (et leur sous-groupe les Bẹsọmbọ́), apparentés aux Bokála de la région de Losanganya (3).

3° Les Ionda, apparentés aux Bonyanga d'au Nord de la Tshuapa.

4° Les Wăngatá-Ntómbá, dont un groupe habite près d'Ingende, au confluent de la Tshuapa et de la Momboyo, et un autre sur la Jwalé. D'autres parties de cette tribu se trouvent près de Coquilhatville (chefferie des « Tumba »), près de Bokote (chefferie Ikẹngọ), et sur la moyenne Loilaka, entre Waka et Bonkoto (chefferie Nkundệngọlọ́, ou Wafanya et « Tumba »).

5° Les Bakáala, qui semblent être plus ou moins apparentés aux Wăngatá.

6° Les Bonkoso.

7° Les trois tribus sœurs des Bongíli, Bombomba et Lifumba (les Beloko forment une sous-tribu de ces derniers).

---

(1) A l'Ouest de leur territoire se trouvent les vestiges d'une population antérieure que les habitants actuels nomment Tompòko (ou Baséká Bofáka l'Eléké), mais qui m'est totalement inconnue.

(2) Les Injọ́lọ́ du Sud sont souvent appelés Imoma.

(3) Sur la Carte ethnographique du Congo belge, dressée et éditée par le Dr J. MAES, le territoire des Boangi est occupé par le nom Bokuala. Il n'existe là aucune tribu ou village de ce nom. A moins qu'il ne s'agisse d'un sobriquet injurieux et humiliant (bokwála = esclave), le nom peut être une application erronée du nom de Bokwála, chef actuel des Boangi.

(4) Il est pour le moment impossible de déterminer exactement la relation entre Ntómbá et Wăngatá. Généralement, ces derniers, avec les Inganda et les Ikẹngọ, passent pour une subdivision des Ntómbá. En outre, nous ne savons pas encore si ces Ntómbá sont apparentés à d'autres tribus du même nom qu'on rencontre fréquemment (sur la Lopori, aux environs du lac Tumba, du lac Léopold II, chez les Bakutu, etc.), ou s'il s'agit simplement de groupes homonymes. Remarquons que sur la carte précitée les Wăngatá sont placés beaucoup trop au Nord; de fait ils se trouvent entièrement au Sud du Ruki.

8° Le village de Bomángola, enclavé dans les Lifumba, qui ne réunit qu'une trentaine de contribuables, mais qui, puisqu'il fait partie des Nsọngọ́, groupe aîné de tous les Nkundó-Mọ́ngọ, est constitué en chefferie indépendante (1).

9° Les Bongale. Les trois gros villages qui se trouvent dans le territoire étudié sont, selon l'ordre de l'importance numérique : Bongale wǎ Botóló (chez les Lifumba, entre les rivières Bonsómbé, Lolíma et Saási), Bongale wǎ Ilinga (chez les Bakáala, près d'Ikéngé) et Bongale wǎ Bọsọngú (chez les Bonkoso, près de Bempumbá). La divergence dans la loi de l'exogamie qui existe entre eux et les autres tribus justifie l'opinion que les Bongale ne sont pas des Nkundó purs (2).

Les tribus qui habitent entre la Jwalé et la Boloko, auxquelles on ajoute parfois les Boléngé et les Ntómbá d'entre Congo et Boloko, sont réunis par les Boángí, Injọ́lọ́ et Elángá sous le nom global d'Ilángá (3).

Les Nkundó-Mọ́ngọ sont venus du Nord ou du Nord-Est (4). Les groupes dont nous traitons ici ont habité pendant un certain temps sur la Lǔwo (Maringa) et sur la

---

(1) Cette primauté a de tout temps été reconnue et respectée par les Lifumba.

(2) Voir chap. V, art. III. Il existe encore d'autres petits groupes Bongale, dont je ne sais pas s'ils sont apparentés à ceux-ci; par exemple près de Bonyẹka (Busira), chez les Boángí (Bokála, Boénjola). Il se peut qu'ils descendent d'ancêtres différents, mais portant tous le nom de Ngale. Un nom identique peut indiquer l'identité d'origine. Mais il peut aussi provenir de personnes différentes, mais homonymes. Cette remarque a une valeur générale.

(3) La tribu Bokele citée sur la carte déjà mentionnée n'existe pas. L'erreur ne proviendrait-elle pas d'une extension indue du nom d'un village Boloki près de Bokúma et appelé Bokélé ? Ou du nom d'un chef ou notable quelconque de la région, appelé Bokelé ?

(4) Note peut-être intéressante : les Nkundó ont souvenance, dans leurs fables et chants, d'un animal de la famille du léopard et qu'ils nomment bokonga. Leur description correspond à celle du lion. Des soldats et autres expatriés, ainsi que les jeunes gens, à la vue des représentations de cette bête, l'ont immédiatement identifiée avec leur bokonga.

Haute-Ikelemba (¹), puis, sous la poussée des autres tribus Mọ́ngọ, ont traversé la Tshuapa-Ruki. Après avoir chassé les Ekonda, ils se sont installés à leur emplacement actuel. Cet exode doit avoir eu lieu il y a assez longtemps; les calculs à ce sujet sont impossibles et les estimations malaisées. En tout état de cause, il doit y avoir vraisemblablement de cent cinquante à deux cents ans.

Ces populations sont surtout agricoles; elles cultivent principalement : bananes, manioc, ignames, calocasia, patates, canne à sucre, légumes divers et condiments. Les plantations alimentaires, jointes aux palmiers Elaeis et aux produits de cueillette, leur assurent une nourriture continuelle et abondante aussi longtemps que les éléphants ne s'en mêlent pas. L'élevage comprend les poules, des chèvres et des chiens (²). La chasse est plutôt un changement agréable d'occupations qu'une nécessité absolue et inéluctable pour les tribus qui possèdent des Batswá, puisque ceux-ci leur fournissent une certaine quantité — bien qu'insuffisante — de la viande nécessaire. On s'y adonne en commun comme en privé. Cette dernière forme se pratique surtout au moyen de pièges. La pêche aussi se fait beaucoup avec des nasses, mais divers autres procédés sont également connus. La cueillette reste toujours en honneur (fruits, chenilles, champignons, légumes, etc.).

Comme métiers nous trouvons avant tout la forge. La fonte du fer est actuellement délaissée. Le cuivre leur vient d'autres populations par des tribus intermédiaires. La sculpture du bois disparaît rapidement. La vannerie est toujours en honneur. Le tissage n'existe plus à présent; on ne trouve même plus aucun métier dans la région.

(¹) Il paraît qu'entre l'Ikelemba et son affluent la Losálifa se trouve encore un arbre bọnkọm surnommé w'ámẹnga (des têtes chauves), sous lequel, d'après la tradition, les ancêtres ont tenu leurs assemblées, et, tout près, un bosdú dont les fruits n'arrivent jamais à maturité.

(²) Les canards sont d'introduction relativement récente, mais étaient connus longtemps avant la colonisation. Ils sont venus du Sud. L'introduction des moutons ne date que des dernières décades, et on ne les trouve que dans quelques villages riverains du Bas.

La famille est patriarcale et l'organisation politique y correspond : rien que des chefs de famille. C'est chez les Nkundó que la famille est parfaitement la cellule et la base de la société. Il s'ensuit un régime démocratique-oligarchique, mais dans un sens tout autre que celui que nous donnons à ce terme en Europe. Certains hommes s'imposaient par leur intelligence, leur éloquence, leur courage, leurs richesses, exerçaient une influence prépondérante et prenaient ainsi souvent l'aspect de chefs dont l'autorité s'étendait au delà de leur clan, mais ils n'ont jamais donné origine à un empire. La tribu la plus vaillante et la plus crainte était celle des Bongíli, qui, d'ailleurs, étaient favorisés par leur situation géographique, ayant de chaque côté une tribu sœur dans les Lifumba et les Bombomba.

Les goûts artistiques des Nkundó sont tournés surtout vers la musique et la danse. Leur littérature orale aussi est très riche et comprend entre autres l'épopée de Nsongó et Lianja (¹) et celle de la tortue.

Au point de vue religion, les Nkundó reconnaissent l'existence d'un Être Suprême : Njakomba ou Mbombiándá, créateur et ordonateur de tout ce qui existe. Pourtant, ils ne lui rendent aucun culte; celui-ci s'adresse exclusivement aux génies et aux mânes (²).

La langue de ce peuple est belle et harmonieuse, souple et riche; elle a toutes les qualités pour devenir une langue littéraire et est admirablement appropriée aux besoins de l'enseignement. De plus, dans ses divers dialectes, elle s'étend sur un territoire considérable, qui est une des aires

---

(¹) Les plus importantes parties ont été traduites et publiées par le R. P. Boelaert, M. S. C., dans Congo, 1934, I, pp. 49 et 197.

linguistiques les plus vastes du Congo. Outre les livres de religion et de piété des Missions catholiques, elle possède déjà une importante collection de manuels classiques divers, grâce surtout au zèle des Missionnaires protestants, qui ont édité aussi une traduction complète de la Bible. Plusieurs vocabulaires et petites grammaires ont été composés, auxquels sont venus s'ajouter ces dernières années un grand dictionnaire et une grammaire plus développée, tous deux de la main d'A. et L. RUSKIN, de la Mission de Bongandanga. Depuis plusieurs années, la Mission protestante de Bǫlę́ngę́ édite une revue indigène, tandis que la Mission catholique pousse activement les préparatifs pour publier la sienne.

Le livre du R. P. SHEBESTA : Vollblutneger und Halbzwerge, contient un chapitre sur les Nkundó, dans lequel l'auteur donne sur ce peuple un bon aperçu général. Certains détails, toutefois, appellent quelques réserves.

Ces données générales sur les Nkundó peuvent suffire à faire leur connaissance superficielle.

Le dessein du présent ouvrage est d'exposer plus à fond leurs institutions matrimoniales.

Comme nous l'avons déjà dit, nous n'envisageons qu'une partie de ce peuple. Toutes nos affirmations s'étendent uniquement à la fraction que nous avons délimitée. Nous ne tenons aucun compte des institutions familiales d'autres groupes nkundó, parce qu'ils nous sont moins bien connus et que nous n'avons rien voulu affirmer sans l'avoir approfondi. Tout ce que nous nous sommes permis en dehors des limites géographiques tracées se borne à quelques remarques accidentelles. Bien que le peuple Nkundó-Mǫ́ngǫ montre une étonnante unité culturelle, celle-ci n'est évidemment pas absolue. Et si nous avons adopté le titre général de Mariage des Nkundó, c'est qu'il est difficile d'en trouver un meilleur satisfaisant au caractère ethniquement et géographiquement limité de cette étude. Il est bien vraisemblable que dans la majorité des cas la valeur de nos données dépasse les limites assignées, mais il serait contraire à toute méthode scientifique de les généraliser avant une étude approfondie de chaque groupe. Le lecteur est donc instamment prié de tenir compte de cette remarque et de ne pas donner à nos conclusions une portée trop étendue.

En elles-mêmes, et dans leur entier, les institutions familiales restent en dehors du sujet de ce livre. Mais comme elles se fondent sur le mariage, elles entrent pour une bonne part dans notre cadre. Nécessairement nous devons donc y toucher, mais nous bornons nos incursions dans leur domaine aux exigences de la compréhension de l'exposé général. D'un autre côté, l'étude du mariage jette une vive lumière sur les institutions familiales.

Les mots : famille, clan, groupe, etc. reviennent fréquemment. La famille forme une entité plus petite que le clan, et ce dernier est subordonné au groupe. Pourtant, comme il est fort ardu d'en donner une définition exacte, nous ne nous sommes mis en peine d'en faire la distinction nette que là où la chose était nécessaire (1). Ailleurs nous les employons plutôt comme termes génériques, voire comme synonymes. Afin de rendre mieux compréhensibles les relations de parenté et les expressions par lesquelles les Nkundó les désignent, nous annexons, à titre d'exemple, un tableau généalogique.

Voici les études antérieures sur le même sujet qui me sont connues :

Engels, Les Wangata, dans Revue congolaise, 1910, qui traite aussi du mariage;

dont le cadre est plus large que le nôtre, puisqu'il parle même des Mbole;

H. BREPOELS, Het Familiehoofd bij de Nkundó-Negers, dans Congo, 1930, II, p. 332.

Nous nous sommes attaché à réunir une documentation aussi complète que possible. Non seulement sont indiqués les grandes lignes et les principes fondamentaux, mais aussi les détails, même ceux qui paraissent les plus insignifiants. Ils ont toujours leur intérêt, qui souvent est plus grand qu'on ne l'avait d'abord soupçonné. Tout a été discuté et rediscuté, en privé et en public, avec des personnes très diverses et dans des lieux et des temps tout différents, et les points les plus difficiles sont revenus sur le tapis à je ne sais combien de reprises.

De façon générale, nous avons préféré employer la méthode descriptive et analytique. Des données nous avons tiré les principes et les conclusions. Bien que des exemples historiques dussent inévitablement allonger le texte de cet ouvrage, nous n'avons pas craint d'en intercaler à divers endroits : ils sont supérieurs à tout pour faire bien ressortir certaines règles ou coutumes et pour montrer sur le vif la psychologie de nos gens.

A ce propos il est utile de faire une remarque qui, par son importance, mérite bien que nous nous y arrêtions un instant. L'examen des cas juridiques dont nous sommes les témoins directs ou indirects ne suffit pas à engendrer la certitude scientifique sur les lois, — ou « les coutumes », pour employer ce terme si répandu (1). Car tout ce qui se fait n'est pas conforme à la justice. La constatation que l'indigène agit de telle ou telle manière et que souvent l'une ou l'autre palabre est tranchée de telle ou telle façon ne suffit nullement pour conclure qu'ainsi est la loi.

(1) La vogue dont jouit ce terme est regrettable, car il manque de précision. Il peut signifier, en effet, simplement « pratique, usage », ou être employé dans son acception juridique : « usage ayant force de loi ». Une confusion s'établit souvent entre les deux sens; elle porte à considérer toute coutume comme juridiquement obligatoire, alors qu'il y a des usages étrangers au droit coutumier et d'autres qui lui sont opposés. Pour l'exactitude des ouvrages ethnographiques et ethnologiques, il serait souhaitable d'employer le moins possible ce terme amphibologique et de bien distinguer entre droit, loi et coutume ou usage.

Les infractions aux règles de la justice sociale sont plus fréquentes qu'on ne le soupçonnerait. Les principes sont bons, mais les passions en empêchent maintes fois l'application, et souvent nulle sanction ne vient soutenir la faiblesse des volontés ni aucune récompense stimuler l'observation loyale.

Aussi ne doit-on pas invoquer la variabilité et la transformation continuelle du droit indigène (comme le fait, par exemple, le Dʳ Th. Seitz, dans Africa, III, n° 1, p. 89), tant qu'on n'a pas préalablement établi si les jugements rendus sont conformes au droit. La remarque que l'éminent auteur fait plus loin : « Welche Rolle dabei das Machtmoment », etc..., infirme sa première affirmation et prouve précisément qu'on ne peut pas se baser uniquement sur les sentences des tribunaux pour apprendre à connaître exactement les prescriptions juridiques, et que la partialité joue souvent un grand rôle. L'observation de l'ancien gouverneur du Cameroun peut s'appliquer au Congo belge, et parfois aussi dans les pays « civilisés ». Nulle part on n'ignore la partialité et l'abus de pouvoir.

Il faut tenir compte aussi de l'ignorance possible des juges et de la difficulté que nous avons à comprendre leurs sentences, où des points de fait et de droit importants sont parfois passés sous silence, sous-entendus.

Qu'il y ait des cas compliqués où il est très difficile aux indigènes, même intelligents et impartiaux, de trancher le différend et de donner une solution équitable et justifiée, cela n'est pas étonnant. La loi ne saurait prévoir tous les cas dans leur infinie variété de circonstances personnelles, locales et modales.

Seules l'analyse et la comparaison de diverses affaires, de leurs solutions, sanctions et conséquences, jointes à la discussion avec des indigènes prudents et impartiaux autant qu'avisés et experts, ayant appris à nous connaître et à saisir ce que nous désirons savoir d'eux et en même temps sincèrement disposés à nous aider, peuvent engendrer une certitude raisonnée et raisonnable, conforme à la réalité. Ces conditions sont nombreuses et très difficiles à rencontrer réunies dans la même personne. Mais pareilles personnes existent, si de la part de l'investigateur elles rencontrent la sympathie, la largeur d'idées, d'absence de tout racisme européen, la compréhension, la connaissance de leur langue, le dévouement bienveillant à leurs intérêts individuels et sociaux.

Même si, chose infiniment précieuse, mais extrêmement rare, on a la chance de trouver un indigène qui, après une longue pratique, arrive à vous dire spontanément : « Ceci se fait souvent, mais c'est contraire à la loi; la loi est telle et telle; telle solution du tribunal est un acte de partialité pour telle ou telle raison », on n'en est pas pour autant dispensé de la nécessité de contrôler ses affirmations. Mais plus on avance et plus on se rend compte de la réalité et de la qualité de sa valeur dans ce domaine et du cas qu'on peut faire de ses dires.

Ces considérations valent surtout pour la distinction entre obligations et convenances sociales ou politesse, entre obligations de justice et obligations de parenté et d'entr'aide mutuelle. Dans la pratique courante les Nkundó n'en font pas la démarcation nette, parce qu'ils n'ont jamais codifié leur droit ni cherché à faire une classification claire et précise, dont ils ne sentent aucun besoin, pas plus, par exemple, que ni eux ni même nous, « civilisés », ne nous préoccupons de faire une grammaire de notre langue maternelle que nous parlons correctement et sans aucune difficulté, uniquement par habitude.

L'investigation dans le domaine juridique est rendue très ardue par le caractère patriarcal et féodal de ces populations, joint à l'absence de l'écriture. Non seulement il existe une adaptation aux circonstances — flexibilité heureuse des lois indigènes — dans laquelle la jurisprudence joue un grand rôle, mais aussi les Nkundó, tout en sachant pertinemment ce qui est licite et ce qui ne l'est pas, ne discernent d'ordinaire pas bien la nature d'une obligation, ni surtout sa source.

L'obtention de bons résultats est grandement favorisée par la position de cas hypothétiques à des personnes qu'on connaît plus intimement et qu'on sait être entièrement hors de cause; moyen qu'il y a toujours intérêt à utiliser pour compléter, sinon rectifier, les conclusions basées sur l'examen de cas juridiques réels, examen qui est pratiquement impossible aux personnes non munies d'un mandat officiel. La position de cas imaginaires requiert toutefois une connaissance approfondie de la langue de la tribu en question.

Dans l'exposé des lois et pratiques diverses, nous tenons à reproduire les explications qu'en donnent les Nkundó, et à y ajouter, là où cela nous semblait opportun, nos considérations personnelles. Le lecteur avisé n'aura pas de peine à distinguer ces deux sources si différentes.

Je sais bien que beaucoup d'ethnologues n'aiment pas que les « chercheurs de brousse » se mêlent de ces questions et qu'ils préfèrent ne recevoir d'eux que des faits bruts sur lesquels ils pourraient bâtir leurs théories. Tous les ethnographes broussards ou silvestres reconnaissent sans peine leur infériorité théorique. Mais ce désavantage réel par manque de préparation est contrebalancé par un avantage appréciable. Ils connaissent bien plus intimement les indigènes, non seulement pour ce qui concerne le sujet direct de leur étude, mais aussi quant aux autres manifestations de leur vie avec lesquelles ils peuvent être en contact direct et quotidien pendant de longues années (surtout la psychologie et la mentalité générales), ce qui les rend plus aptes à porter un jugement conforme à la réalité. Les ethnologues « en chambre » semblent parfois supposer que les broussards ne sont capables que d'être leurs pourvoyeurs de matériaux. Or, la majorité, si pas tous, ont fait des études moyennes, voire les humanités, et beaucoup ont parcouru les écoles supérieures (universités ou autres). Parmi eux se trouvent des juristes de carrière, etc. Ces observateurs possèdent donc des qualités de jugement sérieuses et nombre d'entre eux, par leurs études philosophiques, possèdent les règles de la logique et ont un sens critique aigu.

Il est vrai qu'il ne nous appartient pas de construire des théories : nos domaines d'investigation sont toujours limités. La connaissance des théories est très intéressante et fort utile, mais nullement nécessaire, parfois même dangereuse, parce qu'influençant facilement notre jugement d'une façon indue et partant nuisible à la science. Aussi n'avons-nous cure de la conformité ou de l'opposition de nos données avec l'une ou l'autre doctrine ethnologique. Nous présentons les faits dans leur entier, la partie matérielle comme le fond intellectuel, psychologique et moral. C'est sur eux que la théorie doit se baser; ce n'est pas aux faits à se plier aux théories.

Dans le cours de cet ouvrage on trouvera des répétitions, des références, des renvois. Nous aurions préféré les omettre, parce qu'ils sont toujours fastidieux. Mais ils étaient inévitables dans pareille matière et nous y étions astreint par le caractère strictement scientifique que nous avons voulu à tout prix conserver à notre travail. Nous espérons même que tous ceux qui voudront l'étudier à fond trouveront dans ces redites, au lieu d'un obstacle, une aide précieuse qui leur facilitera une vue intégrale et exacte de la matière.

Malgré tous mes soins et toutes les précautions prises pour ne présenter au lecteur que des faits et des informations conformes à la réalité, et pour réunir une documentation aussi complète que possible, il est inévitable que ce travail contienne des lacunes, des imperfections, voire l'une ou l'autre erreur (¹).

La matière étudiée ne saurait en être entièrement exempte, et affirmer le contraire serait de la pure présomption. Mais la science n'avancerait pas et le but pratique de nos connaissances ne serait jamais atteint si, avant de livrer au public les résultats de nos recherches, nous attendions la perfection qui ne peut être engendrée que par des études successives, faites par diverses personnes. Aussi serais-je récompensé si d'autres voulaient contrôler mes données, les critiquer, les compléter et les corriger là où c'est nécessaire. J'espère en outre qu'ils trouveront dans le présent ouvrage un stimulant qui les excitera à étudier de même les autres fractions des Nkundó-Mǫngǫ, pour que, enfin, nous obtenions une vue d'ensemble sur les institutions matrimoniales de ce peuple si important.

A ce sujet, est-il permis d'émettre un dernier vœu ? De nombreuses études faites par des fonctionnaires et des agents du Gouvernement, contenant une somme considérable de données ethnographiques diverses, dorment dans les fardes des Bureaux congolais en attendant de servir un jour de pâture aux termites jamais rassasiés. Ne serait-il pas possible que ces documents — au moins les meilleurs, — soient livrés au public ? Même s'ils contiennent des lacunes et des erreurs, ils seront accueillis avec gratitude. Ils entraîneront d'autres chercheurs à approfondir ces questions, et de l'émulation, des critiques, des discussions jaillira une connaissance toujours grandissante et toujours plus parfaite des indigènes, de leur histoire, de leur vie, de leurs lois, de leurs mœurs, de leur mentalité, au grand bénéfice de l'œuvre coloniale tout entière.

Certains termes employés dans l'une ou l'autre partie de cette étude peuvent paraître trop crus. J'aurais préféré les éviter. Mais cela aurait nécessité le recours à des expressions voilées et à des périphrases nuisibles à la clarté et donc à la valeur de l'ouvrage qui a un but purement scientifique. Le bienveillant lecteur voudra donc bien les excuser.

A divers endroits des exemples historiques sont relatés tout au long. Je crois que les détails n'en manquent pas d'intérêt, parce qu'ils font saisir sur le vif la mentalité de nos gens. La majorité en a été recueillie aux environs de Flandria, région qui m'est la plus familière. Çà et là je me suis permis de porter des jugements et de préconiser des solutions à certaines difficultés. J'aime à déclarer qu'il s'agit dans ces cas d'opinions strictement personnelles.

La carte annexée à cet ouvrage permet de retrouver les tribus et villages dont il est question et indique leur position géographique dans l'ensemble des groupements qui composent le peuple Mǫ́ngǫ-Nkundó.

Je tiens à exprimer ma sincère gratitude à tous ceux qui ont contribué de quelque façon à ce travail : S. Exc. M^gr^ Ed. Van Goethem, notre vénéré Vicaire Apostolique, qui m'en a permis la composition et m'a toujours stimulé dans mes recherches, dont il comprend tout l'intérêt pratique pour une saine adaptation qui doit nous permettre d'établir l'Eglise sur des bases solides; — mes confrères les RR. PP. Trigalet et Wauters, ainsi que le R. Fr. Brants, qui, en prenant sur eux une grande partie de la besogne commune, m'ont laissé plus de loisirs pour ce travail; — tous les indigènes qui m'ont donné leur confiance et m'ont aidé de leurs précieuses informations et explications, comme Bakutu Bonifasi, Ali Ntefeji, Mpẹtsi, Esal'ey'olaka, Ikanya, Bolongo Lokolo, B. Ekamba, Bǫsęmbu, Piosi Isia, et tant d'autres que je ne puis citer tous, car la liste s'allongerait démesurément.

Je dois une grande reconnaissance à M. le Procureur Général honoraire A. Sohier. Cet éminent juriste a eu l'extrême obligeance de revoir tout le manuscrit me signalant les passages amphibologiques ou obscurs et indiquant les endroits où un supplément d'explication ou une revision du texte serait souhaitable. Il a ainsi puissamment contribué à donner à ce travail sa forme ultime, et par conséquent une bonne part du mérite de cet ouvrage lui revient.

CHAPITRE I.

PRÉLIMINAIRES ET GÉNÉRALITÉS.

Le mariage comporte un côté sexuel, un élément d'affection ou de tendresse et un élément utilitaire. Il est exceptionnel qu'un de ces éléments soit la composante exclusive de l'union. Non seulement cela est vrai de l'union matrimoniale, mais aussi des relations irrégulières non momentanées.

Cette loi, qu'on peut admettre comme générale et universelle, vaut aussi pour les Nkundó. Il est donc utile, avant d'aborder l'étude détaillée du mariage chez cette peuplade, d'examiner comment ces éléments s'y présentent.

Commençons par le côté utilitaire, sur lequel nous pouvons être bref. De ce point de vue, l'épouse est pour le Nkundó la personne qui s'occupera à satisfaire ses besoins quotidiens d'alimentation (cuisine, plantations), qui fera régner dans sa case l'ordre et la propreté, qui élèvera ses enfants. C'est donc pour lui la ménagère et la mère.

Des cas de mariage pour motif politique ou économique se présentent; mais ils sont exceptionnels, de sorte que nous pouvons omettre d'en tenir compte.

La considération des qualités morales intervient souvent dans le choix d'une épouse. Mais à proprement parler il ne s'agit pas alors de mariage de raison; c'est plutôt l'affection qui en est cause.

Quant à l'élément affectionnel et au côté sexuel de la question, il est indispensable que nous nous y arrêtions plus longuement.

Ce chapitre est donc divisé en deux parties :

I. La vie affective;
II. La vie sexuelle des Nkundó.

PREMIÈRE PARTIE.

La vie affective des Nkundó.

Les Nkundó sont capables d'une réelle affection. Celle-ci prend des formes diverses et atteint des degrés différents selon la qualité des personnes qui en sont l'objet. Nous traiterons dans des articles successifs :

- I. De l'affection entre parents;
- II. D'une forme spéciale de celle-ci ou de la création d'une Bolúmbú;
- III. De l'amitié;
- IV. De l'amour entre conjoints.

ARTICLE I. — L'AFFECTION ENTRE PARENTS.

Le Nkundó porte aux membres de sa parenté un amour profond. Je suis d'avis qu'en général il les affectionne aussi vivement — si pas plus — que la plupart des Européens, mais sans être capable d'autant de dévouement. Pour expliquer cet état d'âme, il suffit de considérer que l'affection est quelque chose d'instinctif : botéma nd' îkǫma, disent nos gens, le cœur est comme un paquet, c'est-à-dire il ne choisit pas l'objet de son amour; c'est celui-ci qui s'offre spontanément à lui (¹); tandis que le dévouement inclut presque toujours un raisonnement et se fonde sur une haute moralité à base religieuse. Ensuite, les causes qui, chez nous éloignent si souvent les parents les uns des autres (questions de propriété, d'héritage, etc.) n'existent pas chez les Nkundó, qui connaissent la la collectivité du patrimoine. Chez eux, les membres de la famille ont un besoin absolu et constant les uns des autres: ils ne peuvent lutter contre la vie que s'ils se tiennent bien unis. Un homme isolé de sa parenté est un paria, car dans toute affaire de quelque importance il doit compter sur elle pour l'aider, le protéger, le défendre. Il est donc pour ainsi dire forcé de faire cause commune avec le reste de sa famille et d'y garder le rang qui lui convient.

Ceci peut contribuer à faire comprendre qu'il y a chez cette peuplade moins de causes de refroidissement de l'affection familiale et plus de raisons pour maintenir la bonne entente. Mais il serait faux d'attribuer leur amour à une espèce de calcul égoïste. Leur affection est sincère et spontanée; seulement les faits indiqués expliquent pourquoi les désunions et les brouilles, si fréquentes en Europe, sont inconnues chez les Nkundó; elles sont liquidées au plus tôt et n'ont pas le temps de s'envenimer ou de s'enraciner. Une exception rarissime ne détruit pas la règle générale.

§ 1. Parents et Enfants.

Les parents aiment sincèrement leurs enfants. Leur affection n'est pas entamée par l'âge; il n'y a qu'une plus grande tendresse vis-à-vis des tout jeunes, qu'ils portent et choient volontiers. L'indulgence qu'ils témoignent à l'égard des défauts de leur progéniture est limitée par la colère lorsque les écarts les exaspèrent, moins souvent par le souci raisonné d'éducation. Le conjoint qui n'a pas souffert de la faute ne réagit pas contre son enfant, mais, entraîné par son affection, le protège plutôt. Les parents tâchent d'excuser et de défendre avec acharnement leurs enfants qui ont mal agi (¹). Toutefois, le bien commun du clan l'emporte sur l'affection. Aussi, lorsque la famille entière pâtit des manquements des adolescents, ceux-ci ne seront plus épargnés par leur père; mais leur mère se met souvent de leur parti, car n'appartenant pas à la famille de son mari, elle ne laisse parler que son cœur. L'organisation familiale-politique de cette peuplade exige que la tendresse soit limitée; sinon elle conduirait au désordre et à l'anarchie.

On ne peut pas dire des parents Nkundó, comme on le lit souvent au sujet d'autres Congolais, qu'ils ne se soucient plus de leurs enfants qui peuvent se suffire à eux-mêmes et qui seraient ainsi obligés, dès l'âge de six à sept ans, de pourvoir personnellement à leurs besoins. Nos gens ne cessent de nourrir, voire de choyer leurs enfants : même mariés, ceux-ci sont toujours bien accueillis au foyer maternel et copieusement servis. Il est bien vrai que la jeunesse est beaucoup en forêt à la recherche de diverses sortes de vivres, mais cela fait partie de leurs jeux et amusements, rentre dans le programme de leur éducation et est en même temps leur contribution à l'entretien du ménage (contribution qui ne peut être absente d'aucune éducation sérieuse et qu'il est regrettable de voir faire défaut dans tant de familles d'Europe (¹).

Dans l'affaire du mariage, les parents respectent, en règle générale, les sentiments de leurs enfants. Poussé par la cupidité et surtout par le besoin qu'il a d'un certain montant de valeurs, un père laisse parfois prédominer la voix de l'intérêt sur celle du cœur.

Il va sans dire que des aberrations du sentiment paternel peuvent se rencontrer, mais elles sont rarissimes (²).

Si les parents aiment tous leurs enfants sans distinction et sans égard à leurs défauts, vices, etc., ils ne sont pourtant pas exempts d'une certaine partialité; comme chez nous, l'un ou l'autre est l'objet de plus de prévenan-ces, de plus de condescendance, etc. Ces préférences n'engendrent pas chez les frères la jalousie, pourvu qu'elles restent dans les limites de l'équité, ce qu'elles font pratiquement toujours.

Certains hommes riches occupant un rang social prépondérant ont un moyen d'extérioriser leur prédilection pour une de leurs filles, moyen qui est en même temps une ostentation de leur richesse et une affirmation de leur position. Cette pratique sera décrite dans l'article suivant.

De leur côté, les enfants aiment sincèrement leurs parents. Comme chez les Européens, leur amour est fait plus de respect envers leur père et est plus tendre envers leur mère. On trouve chez les Nkundó les mêmes variantes dans le sentiment, selon qu'il s'agit des garçons ou des filles. Les enfants peuvent manquer à leur devoir d'affection et de respect; mais ce sont des exceptions dues à la légèreté, à l'entêtement, à la colère brusque (¹). On ne voit pas ici ces dissensions profondes qui parfois, chez les Européens, divisent parents et enfants, ni ces grossièretés et brutalités qu'on lit assez fréquenmment dans nos journaux : chez les Nkundo, ces drames de famille sont inconnus.

Toutefois ceci n'exclut pas la désobéissance. L'enfant nkundo lui aussi préfère le jeu au travail et la liberté à la discipline. Il tâche de se dérober aux ordres de ses parents qui le lient et empêchent les ébats avec ses compagnons (²).

L'affection est particulièrement profonde envers la mère. Quel que soit l'âge que le Nkundó ait atteint, sa tendresse pour elle ne diminue point : il reste toujours son enfant. Dans toute peine, toute déception, tout chagrin il a sur les lèvres le mot : ngóya : maman. Le sentiment inné qui lie mère et enfants conserve chez cette peuplade toute sa spontanéité native.

(²) Un des tout premiers mots que l'enfant nkundó apprend est « mbói » : je ne veux pas.

Les parents et enfants nkundó ne se donnent pourtant pas de marques extérieures spéciales de leur affection, comme il s'en rencontre chez d'autres peuples.

Au décès on peut constater sur le vif la sincérité de l'affection entre parents et enfants. Leur douleur émouvante est extériorisée bruyamment et souvent pathétiquement. Même des hommes âgés n'ont pas honte de sangloter comme des enfants. Que la légèreté de leur caractère les fait passer facilement d'un sentiment à un autre n'infirme en rien notre affirmation. (On peut d'ailleurs en constater autant en Europe.) (¹).

§ 2. Frères et Sœurs.

De l'amour que les enfants nkundó portent à leurs parents dérive naturellement l'affection qu'ils témoignent à leurs frères et sœurs, et qui est sincère et vive. Les remarques que nous avons faites au sujet de la nature et des qualités de ce sentiment des enfants à l'égard de leurs parents s'appliquent également ici. Les brouilles qui peuvent se produire s'enveniment rarement. D'un côté l'affection entre frères et sœurs est sincère et profonde, et de l'autre l'interdépendance sociale et économique renforce tout naturellement ces liens.

L'entr'aide découle de l'amour; les frères et sœurs se rendent fréquemment service.

Après le décès du père et de ses oncles, le frère est le défenseur et protecteur naturel de ses puînés et de ses sœurs, même lorsqu'ils sont mariés.

Il existe une différence notable de degré dans l'intensité de l'amour entre frères et sœurs utérins et les autres. Les liens entre enfants de même mère sont beaucoup plus intimes et leur affection plus chaude qu'envers les frères et sœurs de mères différentes. Ceci encore est entièrement conforme à la nature humaine universelle, et prouve la supériorité de la monogamie sur la polygamie pour l'union, l'entente, le bonheur dans les familles.

Pour ce qui est des marques de l'affection, du chagrin à l'occasion du décès, etc., les mêmes constatations peuvent se faire — mutatis mutandis — que pour les relations entre parents et enfants.

§ 3. Parents divers.

L'amour du Nkundó s'étend à tous les membres de sa famille, c'est-à-dire à tous ceux auxquels il se sent uni par la communauté de sang et d'origine. Ceux-ci sont beaucoup plus nombreux qu'en Europe, puisque la parenté nkundó comprend bien plus de générations. L'intensité de l'affection diminue progressivement avec l'éloignement des degrés. Mais le Nkundó se sait et se sent toujours appartenir à la grande famille et reste attaché à tous les membres dont elle se compose. Chez tous il trouve un domicile. C'est ce qui rend compte de ce que, dans les centres, les hommes d'un même village se recherchent et sont tous « frères », ce qu'ils sont effectivement, puisque, d'une façon générale, chaque village ne forme qu'une seule et même parenté.

Si, ici comme pour le cas des frères et sœurs, la communauté d'intérêts joue un rôle dans le maintien de l'attachement aux membres de la famille, ce sentiment n'est pourtant pas basé sur des considérations égoïstes: celles-ci ne font que renforcer l'affection qui est, chez le Nkundó, véritablement innée. Parmi les divers parents, l'amour est le plus développé entre aïeux et petits-enfants, entre oncles et tantes et neveux et nièces, entre cousins et cousines, etc.

Comme chez les Européens, l'affection entre aïeux et petits-fils est très vive, plus tendre, dirait-on, qu'entre parents et enfants (comme l'exprime le dicton : bǫ̃na l'onkáná, ndeki nd'ônkáná), mais dégénérant en débonnaireté et faiblesse, d'un côté, et en un laisser-aller d'un air irrespectueux, de l'autre.

Le Nkundó aime et traite ses oncles et tantes paternels comme ses « pères », ses oncles et tantes maternels comme ses « mères ». Évidemment, les sentiments qui l'animent à leur égard ne sont pas aussi affectueux que ceux qu'il porte à ses parents, mais ils en sont la prolongation atténuée.

Dans la même mesure il en est ainsi des liens qui l'unissent à ses cousins et cousines, qu'il nomme ses « frères » et « sœurs ». Mais les enfants de sa tante paternelle sont ses « pères ».

ARTICLE II. — LA BOLÚMBÚ.

Aux temps anciens un homme extrêmement riche créait bolúmbú une de ses filles, pour marquer son affection pour elle et faire ostentation de ses biens. Cette coutume est actuellement en pleine disparition (¹). La division plus grande des richesses; la diminution des loisirs causée par les travaux imposés par le Blanc, soit directement : corvées, routes, travaux économiques, etc., soit indirectement, par la nécessité de se procurer le montant des impôts; la difficulté conséquente de faire de grandes concentrations de peuple pour assister à ces cérémonies et fêtes durant des jours et des semaines; tout cela en a rendu la pratique quasi impossible (²). Pourtant, il nous faut la décrire ici.

Lorsqu'un indigène voulait que sa fille aimée devînt

(²) On pourrait supposer que les nouvelles utilisations de richesses procurées par le développement économique aient contribué à la disparition de cette coutume. Théoriquement ce fait aurait pu avoir eu cette influence; mais pratiquement il n'est pour rien dans le changement constaté.

bolúmbú, après avoir obtenu le consentement et le concours pécuniaire de toute sa parenté, d'immenses préparatifs étaient faits : boisson, vivres divers, danses; tout devait être extraordinaire. Au jour fixé et porté à la connaissance de toute la région par des messagers, une affluence énorme de monde se réunissait chez lui. Des réjouissances publiques avaient lieu durant des jours et des jours. Dans une harangue de circonstance, le père annonce à l'assemblée son intention de constituer sa fille bolúmbú. Deux parents ou deux femmes de son père arrachent à la fille les habits qu'elle porte et la revêtent de fourrures précieuses, principalement d'une partie de peau de l'antilope rayée mpangá. Certains villages lui permettaient le port de la peau de léopard, tant devant que derrière.

Ensuite le père décrète (-békya) que sa fille, étant devenue bolúmbú, ne quittera jamais le port des fourrures, qu'elle ne travaillera plus, qu'elle ne sera pas donnée en mariage au premier venu, mais uniquement à un homme très riche et influent. D'où le synonyme de bǫ̌na óâ boéko = enfant de décret, enfant réservée, interdite.

Cette cérémonie peut avoir lieu quel que soit l'âge de l'enfant, depuis trois ans jusqu'à l'adolescence.

La cérémonie terminée, la jeune fille se retire (-ulama, transit. -uja) dans une case spécialement aménagée à cet effet, nommée ilękę. Cette réclusion ne dure que quelques mois. Si certains besoins l'obligent à quitter la demeure, elle le fait par derrière, dans la bananeraie, se dissimulant autant que possible sous une natte. Elle ne marche pas sur le sol nu; ses pieds ne peuvent pas venir en contact avec la terre. C'est pourquoi des nattes sont étendues partout sous ses pas. Elle ne fait aucun travail; ce sont sa mère, sa sœur, sa tante, etc., ou une esclave qui lui préparent la nourriture. Quant aux soins de toilette, elle ne se lave pas les mains à l'eau, mais à l'huile de palme.

Toutes ces pratiques sont des marques de respect et des signes d'honneur.

Lorsque la réclusion touche à sa fin, le père donne une seconde fête, avec danses, boisson, etc. La bolúmbú sort sur des nattes. Mais il n'y a aucune nouvelle cérémonie. Désormais la jeune fille ne diffère en rien de ses congénères; elle ne garde que son signe distinctif : les fourrures, et elle ne s'occupe pas des travaux du ménage.

Son mariage était toujours fort retardé, car l'homme qui désirait la prendre comme épouse devait réunir une quantité considérable de valeurs avant de pouvoir se risquer à demander sa main. En effet, si sa tentative restait infructueuse, il s'exposait à la risée de toute la région.

Chez les tribus habitant la rive gauche de la Loílaka, tout homme riche et de bonne famille pouvait demander une fille bolúmbú en mariage. Au contraire, chez les Injọ́lọ́, la chose était plus compliquée. Le prétendant devait appartenir à une autre tribu ou à un autre groupement. Par exemple, une fille appartenant aux Engónjó n'était donnée qu'à un homme des Wesé ou des Ngọmbẹ, ou d'une tribu voisine, jamais à un membre des Engónjó. Tous les Engónjó considéraient la bolúmbú comme leur sœur. Aussi, lorsque le futur mari se rendait chez la famille de la bolúmbú pour demander sa main, chaque village lui barrait le chemin au moyen d'une palissade-clôture. On lui prenait toutes les valeurs dotales qu'il portait avec lui, en leur substituant l'équivalent en biens divers : poules, canards, chiens, nattes, etc., c'est-à-dire qu'ils faisaient l'échange de valeurs dotales contre des valeurs de nkọmí (¹). Ce n'est que lorsque le village qui barrait la route n'avait plus de quoi continuer l'échange, que le prétendant pouvait passer. Si celui-ci voyait sa provision de richesses épuisée, il était forcé de rentrer chez lui pour la renouveler. Tout ce qu'il donnait de cette façon était compté comme dot=jèngí (1), et tout ce qu'il recevait faisait partie du nkọmí (2).

On le comprend, dans ces conditions demander en mariage une bolúmbú était un luxe que le vulgaire ne pouvait se permettre. Le prétendant appartenait nécessairement à une famille riche et influente, dont tous les membres l'assistaient.

Lorsqu'il avait enfin réussi à se frayer un passage, avec un trésor suffisant, jusqu'au père de l'élue, celui-ci ne mettait plus d'obstacles à son désir. La jeune fille, de son côté, était honorée au possible et enchantée de ce qu'un homme l'aimait au point de se donner tant de peine et de débourser tant de valeurs par affection pour elle.

Pour le reste, le paiement de la dot se faisait comme pour tout autre mariage. Seulement, pour être présentée à son mari, la future s'avançait sur une rangée de nattes. Et une fête était organisée pour célébrer l'heureux et important événement. Des danses, aspergées d'un déluge de bière, avaient lieu et duraient des semaines, voire un mois entier.

Le père donnait à son gendre une grande quantité d'objets de nkọmí (3), de sorte que la bolúmbú devenait souvent yěngaende, ou au moins lifayǎnjọku (4). Il ne laissait partir sa fille qu'après lui avoir adjoint au moins une ebísa pour la servir (5). Ainsi, Bonjéngó, fille d'Ilónjó y'Okákema, de Bompóma (Injóló, Engónjó) (décédée en 1934), lorsqu'elle fut prise en mariage par Bolángé w'Ioma, de Lokóndola (Injọlọ, Ngọmbẹ), avait reçu de son père quatre bibísa, pour s'occuper de ses travaux, plus un jeune cousin qui devait rester auprès d'elle pour lui chercher le bois de chauffage. De la sorte, le père assurait à sa fille bien-aimée la continuité de sa situation honorable de grande dame.

Voulant faire persister la position prépondérante de son épouse, le mari, de son côté, la créait sa bolúmbú (1) : Bǫn'ôw'olúmbú átswá ô wâlí ów'olúmbú ék'ôme. Il disait à l'assemblée : « Son père l'a proclamée bolúmbú, et moi je la proclame bolúmbú de même (la'ékáé ôékyákí, em mpé njôékya â ng'ǫ́kǫ́) ».

Quelle est la raison d'être de cette coutume? D'après les indigènes, c'était une affirmation publique de la prépondérance sociale du père et, en même temps, — les deux choses sont inséparables, — la plus grande marque d'amour qu'il pouvait donner à sa fille. N'importe quel indigène n'avait pas le droit de constituer sa fille bolúmbú. Il devait, au contraire, occuper un rang social particulièrement en vue, c'est-à-dire être chef de famille riche, influent et puissant. Toutes les cérémonies, pratiques et règles observées dans cette institution indiquent cette direction. Et la comparaison avec la femme bolúmbú (1) ajoute encore à cette explication une plus forte probabilité.

Comme nous l'avons indiqué, cette coutume est en pleine voie de disparition. Dans certaines tribus, comme les Beloko, sous-tribu des Lifumba, on commence actuellement à lancer un « ersatz ». La fille de prédilection est parée et ornée comme autrefois, les fourrures étant remplacées par des tissus européens. Mais le caractère public de l'institution ancienne a disparu. On ne fait plus autour de sa création toutes les cérémonies. Enfin on ne l'appelle plus bolúmbú, un nouveau nom ayant été inventé : bǫndę́lóóngola = le Blanc l'élève (l'éduque).

ARTICLE III. — L'AMITIÉ.

L'amitié n'est pas inconnue du Nkundó. Elle se fonde sur les mêmes bases qu'en Europe. J'ai connu plus d'un exemple d'une réelle affection mutuelle entre personnes nullement apparentées. Personnellement, je compte parmi les Noirs que j'ai fréquentés des amis sincères qui m'ont témoigné une réelle affection, m'ont aidé de tout leur pouvoir et fait preuve d'une entière confiance; il y en a même qui n'ont pas craint de s'attirer pour moi des embarras sérieux et qui, pour me disculper, sont allés jusqu'à s'accuser eux-mêmes et s'exposer à des difficultés et à des sanctions.

Outre les cadeaux et l'assistance mutuelle, les amis se donnent peu ou pas de marques de leur affection. Les embrassements existent, mais ils sont rares entre hommes, tandis qu'on les voit fréquemment entre femmes.

Les Nkundó connaissent le pacte d'amitié (boseka ou, chez les Bombwanja, likandeko) (1). Deux personnes du même sexe se lient d'amitié (kọta boseka ou likandeko) en présence d'un témoin (ndonga), à qui il incombe de transmettre les présents mutuels.

La conclusion du traité d'amitié est proprement une coutume des femmes; ce n'est que subsidiairement, par imitation, que les hommes — généralement leurs maris — se lient d'amitié de la même façon. Ce pacte n'est pas héréditaire d'office, mais les enfants peuvent le maintenir, — avec le même ndonga que leurs pères, — comme aussi il leur est loisible de ne pas le reprendre (2).

Nous pouvons distinguer dans le pacte d'amitié deux éléments : la sympathie ou l'affection et l'entr'aide. L'assistance mutuelle est, en soi, une marque de l'amitié; mais il n'est pas rare, entre hommes, qu'il soit la cause et la raison exclusives du pacte dans lequel ils cherchent un soutien réciproque. Chez les femmes, au contraire, on peut affirmer que les cadeaux sont uniquement considérés comme preuves d'affection et que c'est ce sentiment seul qui est à la base du lien. Souvent les femmes qui s'aiment beaucoup ne se lient pas au moyen d'un pacte d'amitié et se contentent de se prouver en toute simplicité leur affection. Les hommes aussi peuvent être d'excellents amis sans recourir à la conclusion d'un pacte. Mais la conclusion d'un traité rend publique leur relation et par conséquent la protège contre des influences délétères, comme seraient des incompréhensions, des dissensions, des colères, etc. On dirait que c'est l'élément raison qui s'ajoute à l'élément sentiment.

(1) Bofili chez les Ekonda, mbele chez les Batswa.

(2) Voir encore une cause particulière de pactes d'amitié au chap. IV, art. 1.

Contrairement à l'affection entre parents, l'amitié se refroidit, voire périt. Ceci vaut surtout pour les pactes dont l'entr'aide est la seule base. Ainsi, si un des deux amis est par trop avare en comparaison de l'autre, on en arrive vite à la rupture.

Le Nkundó porte encore une affection particulière à ses compagnons d'âge (boningá, pl. baningá), c'est-à-dire à tous ceux qui sont nés le même jour, semaine, mois ou époque que lui. Il se sent uni à eux par des liens spéciaux. Entre eux, les compagnons d'âge se considèrent et se traitent comme des frères, se prêtent aide et assistance, etc.

Cette affection est naturelle; l'égoïsme, qu'on peut trouver entre « amis », n'existe pas entre compagnons d'âge.

Leur relation est si intime qu'ils se prêtent, le cas échéant, leurs épouses (⁹).

Enfin, les homonymes (ndoi, plur. bandoi) se témoignent mutuellement une réelle affection; ils s'entr'aident et se remettent des cadeaux. Ils ne font pourtant pas de pacte, comme pour le boseka.

Il faut noter que ces divers liens n'existent pas entre personnes de sexe différent; ils seraient condamnés comme concubinage.

ARTICLE IV. — L'AMOUR CONJUGAL.

Maintes fois la question a été posée : Qu'en est-il de l'amour chez ces populations? Les conjoints s'aiment-ils réellement? Nous ne parlons pas de la passion sexuelle, qui, d'ordinaire, s'ajoute à l'amour entre homme et femme, mais qui, en soi, en est bien distincte. L'amour est une résultante de divers sentiments : sympathie, affection, appréciation mutuelle, admiration, dévouement, etc., et, selon la présence ou l'absence d'un de ces éléments et le degré qu'ils atteignent, nous qualifions la perfection de l'amour.

La réponse à la question est, de par la nature même des choses, extrêmement délicate. En effet, il est difficile d'observer et d'analyser des faits nets et précis. L'idée que nous nous en faisons doit nécessairement provenir d'une conclusion logique basée sur une quantité de cas particuliers. Ceux-ci pourraient avoir une autre explication que celle que nous donnons. Il peut nous arriver, en effet, d'attribuer à l'amour véritable ou à l'absence d'amour les effets d'autres causes que nous ne remarquons pas. Pourtant, nous ne pouvons nous abstenir de faire suivre quelques données qui nous permettront la formation d'un jugement suffisamment conforme à la réalité.

Il est incontestable que l'amour n'a pas ici la pureté qu'on lui trouve dans certaines catégories d'Européens ou d'autres peuples, surtout chez les braves chrétiens. Il n'est étonnant pour personne que des populations païennes avec leur atavisme de coutumes dégradantes ne soient pas arrivées à la finesse du sentiment en général, ni surtout à la hauteur morale d'une vertu si noble nourrie et développée par des siècles d'influence chrétienne.

Ensuite, l'instabilité du mariage, sa dissolubilité et l'existence de la polygamie, loin d'être aptes à développer la pureté de l'amour, tendent plutôt à l'avilir. Enfin, la vivacité et la sincérité de l'affection familiale, que nous avons exposée à l'article I, conduisent tout naturellement à la diminution de l'amour conjugal, d'autant plus que le Nkundó a, de par la constitution patriarcale de la société indigène, un plus grand besoin de sa parenté que de son conjoint.

Aussi trouve-t-on beaucoup d'égoïsme, un des signes caractéristiques de la décadence morale, et peu de dévouement. Il est rare qu'une femme reste chez son mari atteint d'une maladie incurable, impotent ou devenu trop pauvre à son goût. Les Nkundó trouvent la chose toute naturelle et ne montrent aucune honte de l'avouer, même devant le missionnaire.

Il en est de même du mari envers sa femme. Si elle est devenue incapable de lui faire atteindre au moins un des buts pour lesquels il l'a épousée, pourquoi la garderait-il chez lui? Si elle lui a donné des fils, ceux-ci tiennent à garder leur mère, et sur leurs instances, jointes peut-être à un sentiment de compassion envers celle qu'il a aimée, elle pourra rester. Ses fils s'occuperont de sa subsistance, avec de temps en temps un petit apport de la part du père, et ses filles la soigneront et lui prépareront les aliments. D'autres hommes s'obstinent malgré tout à se débarrasser de cette importune. Mais ils ne réussissent que lorsqu'ils n'ont pas de fils en âge de défendre leur mère. Les différences dépendent du caractère individuel des personnes (¹).

Dans ce domaine, il n'y a que la religion qui puisse apporter un changement radical. Quoiqu'on soit encore très loin du but à atteindre, certains chrétiens sérieux commencent déjà à se plier aux exigences de la morale supérieure et à traiter leur conjoint(e), même malade, conformément à la sainteté du mariage, bien que la chose soit plus ardue pour eux, cette même morale leur défen-dant la polygamie ou tout autre moyen de satisfaire la passion.

Un cas admirable est celui de Bekau Marie, fille d'Esalé d'Iámbo (Ɓonkoso). Son mari, Bọkọmbeembe Pierre de Mbalá, est depuis de longues années atteint de la lèpre. Il est incapable, tant d'accomplir l'acte que de faire n'importe quelle besogne sérieuse. La femme doit donc subsister par ses propres moyens et avec l'aide de son fils. Malgré la liberté, l'éloignement de son village natal et les mauvais sentiments de la famille de son mari envers elle, elle n'a pas voulu le quitter et est décidée de continuer à se dévouer à lui (1).

Dans un différend entre sa famille et son mari, il est difficile de dire d'avance pour qui la femme prendra parti. De même si des difficultés surgissent entre sa famille et son épouse, le mari peut aussi bien se ranger du côté de sa femme que de celui de ses parents. Tout dépend des tempéraments individuels. Il y a des personnes qui spontanément soutiennent leur famille; d'autres, au contraire, font bloc avec leur conjoint. Une femme ou un homme qui, sans raison valable, se déclare d'une façon habituelle pour sa famille contre le conjoint n'est nullement approuvé par ceux qui observent le conflit en simples spectateurs neutres. Aussi juge-t-on qu'alors les époux ne s'aiment pas beaucoup. Souvent la rupture ne tarde pas à se produire. Si pourtant l'union tient malgré tout, il faut généralement l'attribuer à la crainte des conséquences encore plus graves d'une dissolution. Les mêmes variations individuelles se retrouvent dans l'attachement de la femme aux intérêts de la famille de son mari.

Nous ne pouvons pas comparer le ménage indigène aux ménages des simples braves gens de chez nous, où la famille se compose exclusivement des parents et de leurs enfants. Ici, elle est plus étendue : les intérêts du mari sont aussi ceux de ses parents, frères, oncles, etc. Pourtant, comme nous le verrons à propos du mariage par héritage, il n'est pas rare de trouver des femmes qui demeurent attachées à la famille de leur mari défunt. D'autres tendent plus à enrichir leurs propres familles.

(1) Ce cas n'est dû à l'influence chrétienne que partiellement. C'est pourquoi il a sa place ici à l'exclusion de quelques autres que je pourrais relater, mais qui sont dus exclusivement à l'action sur les âmes de la morale du Christ.

Voici un cas historique où la femme s'est montrée très dévouée aux intérêts de son mari, quoiqu'une certaine place semble devoir être laissée à l'amour-propre et à la gloire personnelle (1) : Bolúmbú wá nsánjí, fille de Bǫkǫmbę de Litúli (Bombwanja), est mariée à Bǫnyęmę w'ényuká de Bonganda (Bonkoso). Un jour elle rentre voir son frère (son père étant décédé entre-temps), Bǫmpęlí w'ę̀lǫmbǫ, qui a quitté Litúli pour l'établir dans son village maternel, Etóo des Boéndé. Ils se mettent à disputer. Bǫmpęlí prétend que Bǫnyęmę ne vaut pas lourd, qu'on exagère ses richesses, qu'on le glorifie à tort, etc. Bolúmbú défend son mari. Finalement, ne pouvant se mettre d'accord, Bǫmpęlí enjoint à sa sœur de ne plus retourner chez son mari, afin qu'elle soit mariée à un autre homme. Car il est décidé à prendre la preuve de la valeur de Bǫnyęmę en lui faisant la guerre; et elle ne peut pas admettre que son mari soit fait prisonnier par son propre frère. Malgré tout, Bolúmbú s'obstine et part en hâte. Arrivée chez son mari, elle lui raconte tout. Entre-temps, tout Boéndé et d'autres clans Bombwanja prennent les armes. Enyuká, de son côté, communique la nouvelle à tous les villages Bonkoso, leurs alliés, clients et Batswá. Les divers groupes de combattants se postent près du village de Bonganda, dans la forêt actuelle de

(1) D'après mes évaluations, cet épisode est vieux d'à peu près cent ans. J'ai encore connu deux hommes qui en ont gardé souvenance : l'aîné (Longwokó des Baséká Bongóngó, Bongili), avait alors environ 20 ans. Une arrière-petite-fille de Bǫnyęmę (Mpútú Sofie) est maintenant dans la quarantaine.

Boóngónjǫu, entre la Lomeké et l'emplacement présent de Bęsǫmbǫ́, de Lofelí et d'Engónjó. L'armée Boéndé est attaquée à l'improviste par les Bonkoso et, après un combat acharné, est mise en déroute, laissant sur le champ de bataille plusieurs morts. La paix est proposée par Bǫnyęmę. Il met sa fierté à ne pas se laisser surpasser en générosité. Non content de payer aux clans qui ont perdu des membres, il envoie, par une munificence vraiment princière, toutes les valeurs dont Bǫmpęlí a besoin pour indemniser les groupes Bombwanja éprouvés par la perte d'un des leurs; et par surcroît, il lui porte toute une fortune à titre de complément dotal pour Bolúmbú.

Les Nkundó connaissent bien des cas où une veuve ayant atteint un certain âge prend l'engagement solennel de ne pas se remarier, de ne plus s'approcher d'aucun homme. Dans le sexe fort, les cas sont pratiquement inexistants. Renvoyons aussi aux cas, cités plus loin, de fęmmes qui voulaient supporter la maladie et mourir chez leur mari (chap. VI, art. III, § 4), ainsi que les préférences pour la monogamie (chap. VII, art. VI et VII).

Sous le bénéfice de l'explication donnée au début, je pense pouvoir affirmer que la grande majorité des mariages contractés par les Nkundo sont des mariages d'amour. Le mariage politique ou d'intérêt a certainement existé. Et, à présent surtout, on trouve des parents qui poussent leurs enfants au mariage par intérêt financier ou social.

Cette conclusion n'est peut-être pas admise par nombre de coloniaux. Pourtant il me semble qu'elle s'impose, dans le sens et les limites indiquées ici. On argue surtout de l'instabilité des unions, de la fréquence des divorces, de l'infidélité et de la polygamie, objections que nous allons examiner un peu plus en détail.

Pour juger convenablement, il faut commencer par distinguer entre les sexes, les situations n'étant pas du tout comparables. Ensuite, pour ce qui est des femmes, il faut distinguer encore entre les femmes de polygames et les autres.

Parlons d'abord des hommes. Ils semblent être supérieurs à l'autre sexe par rapport à l'amour conjugal, si nous nous basons sur la plus grande fidélité. Le divorce est presque toujours causé par la femme. Ceci est d'ailleurs tout naturel : l'homme se marie à un âge relativement avancé, s'engage donc en pleine connaissance de cause, tandis que la fille est fiancée le plus souvent avant l'âge de raison et ne peut donc laisser parler son cœur.

Par contre, le polygame doit partager son cœur. Comme nous le verrons suo loco, il porte un amour spécial à une de ses épouses. Envers la première, son affection devient plus profonde, plus raisonnée, plus de volonté, tandis que l'amour qu'il porte à la favorite semble plutôt question de sentiment au sens strict du mot. Quant aux autres, généralement il les a choisies de son propre gré, et peut-être même il en a séduit au point de les amener à quitter leur mari précédent. Il paraît donc injuste de nier l'existence d'une certaine affection envers elles.

Mais peut-on encore lui appliquer le nom d'« amour »? Dans notre psychologie européenne, l'amour conjugal est exclusif. On dirait que chez le Nkundó il n'en est pas ainsi. Bien souvent on entend prétendre que le polygame considère ses femmes, à l'exception d'une ou de deux, comme capital humain, comme machines à produire. Sans nier que le harem constitue un capital humain et soit une source de richesses, il m'est avis que l'affirmation est beaucoup trop radicale et absolue. Dans la généralité des cas il faut attribuer au polygame des sentiments de réelle affection envers ses femmes. Je comprends cette affection comme une espèce d'amour de proportion réduite. Et je compare cette situation — mutatis mutandis — à quelqu'un qui aime simultanément plusieurs amis. On peut parler d'amour envers plusieurs, malgré les différences d'intensité, d'après les diverses personnes qui en sont l'objet, quoique nous puissions considérer cet amour partagé comme très imparfait. Mais quel que soit le nom qu'on lui applique, et si faible que soit le degré d'intensité qu'on lui reconnaisse, il est impossible de nier son existence.

Parmi les femmes, il faut distinguer entre femmes de monogames et femmes de polygames, surtout les « supplémentaires ». Il se comprend sans peine que chez ces dernières l'amour est plus sujet au refroidissement. Le mari étant obligé de partager ses faveurs et les marques de son affection, ne fût-ce que pour conserver la bonne entente, il saurait difficilement en être autrement, sans parler des mariages en bas âge. Outre la cause précitée du refroidissement de l'amour chez les épouses polygames, il est incontestable que la communauté d'âmes, de sentiments et d'intérêts ne s'établit pas entre elles et leur mari aussi complètement que dans l'union monogame. On ne peut pourtant pas poser comme règle générale que la femme de polygame n'aime pas son mari, du moins dans une certaine mesure, qui évidemment varie avec les sujets. Prétendre, à priori, que l'homme ne saurait être simultanément l'objet de l'amour de plusieurs femmes est inadmissible en logique et contraire aux faits. Ici on voit assez fréquemment qu'une femme quitte son mari polygame pour un autre, et cela parce qu'elle a reporté son amour sur ce dernier. Les exceptions devraient être plutôt prouvées. Même si elles existaient nombreuses, elles n'excluraient pas les cas d'une réelle affection.

Le retour d'un polygame au milieu des siens après une longue absence suscite souvent de la part des épouses des démonstrations amoureuses qui étonnent l'Européen. Elles se jettent à ses pieds, enlacent ses jambes, se roulent par terre et se contorsionnent de joie et d'émotion. Il est vrai que la liberté produite par la colonisation a beaucoup fait refroidir ces beaux sentiments.

Est-il hors de propos de citer le dicton des femmes de polygames : bokungú ákafola bitáfé, lolango ákafola botéma = l'arbre bokungú ramifie ses branches, l'amour partage le cœur? Et cette fable qui enseigne l'amour véritable : un polygame qui a trois femmes se trouve accidentellement blessé et mourant de l'autre côté de la rivière. Ses femmes ayant couru à la rive n'y trouvent pas de pirogue. La rivière est infestée de crocodiles. Les principales épouses refusent de risquer leur vie en passant l'eau à la nage, et c'est la moindre qui se lance à travers tous les périls pour aller aider son mari.

C'est surtout lorsqu'une femme a donné son cœur à un amant qu'elle ne porte plus d'affection à son mari. Elle reste auprès de lui parce qu'elle saurait difficilement faire autrement. Son mari continue d'user de son corps et de ses bras, mais elle ne lui donne plus place dans son cœur; comme l'exprime si finement ce proverbe : bŏm'ăkwĕta, ḿbw'ă nkánge; bonsámb'ákwĕta, omeka é ńtęngumę = le mari t'appelle, « je suis malade à en mourir »; l'amant t'appelle, « je vais essayer de m'y rendre ».

L'objection tirée du divorce est difficile à manier, parce que la question est très complexe. Tout d'abord, le fait pour des époux de rester ensemble, de se montrer fidèles, n'est pas une preuve d'amour dans une société où la notion du devoir reste forte. Une femme chrétienne peut en arriver à concevoir une véritable aversion pour un époux infidèle et cependant demeurer avec lui par devoir, par amour pour ses enfants, etc. Réciproquement, dans une société où la notion du devoir se relâche ou n'existe même pas, des conjoints seront aisément infidèles, bien qu'au fond ils s'aiment; si le divorce est facile, ils en useront en coup de tête, pour des motifs futiles, sans s'apercevoir qu'en réalité l'amour subsiste entre eux (¹).

Le premier cas ne se rencontre pas chez les Nkundó,

(¹) M. le Procureur Général honoraire A. Sohier me fait savoir que l'expérience de sa longue carrière judiciaire confirme absolument ces données, qui sont si vraies que depuis quelques années on a dû puisqu'ils n'ont pas la notion du devoir moral dans notre signification. Mais il arrive que des époux qui ne s'aiment plus, restent ensemble parce qu'ils n'ont pas la possibilité de se séparer.

La seconde affirmation s'applique aux Nkundó dans sa première partie, comme il ressortira de la suite de cet exposé; mais nullement pour ce qui est de la deuxième partie, puisque le droit et la pratique nkundó, au lieu d'admettre le divorce pour des motifs futiles, en entourent au contraire la procédure de stipulations et conditions si nombreuses et minutieuses qu'ils le rendent plutôt difficile (voir chapitre VIII).

Constatons d'autres faits. Qu'on examine attentivement les statistiques chez les peuples européens à l'époque actuelle; qu'on y réfléchisse un peu et qu'on en tire les conclusions. Que de divorces, que d'unions rompues, que de drames de l'inconduite! Pourtant, impossible de conclure à l'absence d'amour chez les personnes qui en arrivent plus tard à ces situations malheureuses. Elles peuvent très bien s'être mariées par amour véritable, et avec les meilleures intentions. Mais de par les circonstances, elles ont laissé refroidir leur amour. Le cadre moral de leur vie n'était pas assez solide pour les retenir. Le milieu, au lieu de freiner, accélère souvent le mouvement vers la chute. L'autorité sociale ne réagit pas ou pas suffisamment contre les tendances destructrices. Si en outre il leur manque la force intérieure de résistance, les passions prennent le dessus et, finalement, détruisent l'amour.

Chez les Nkundó, les choses ne se passent pas autrement. Il n'est que juste d'en tenir compte et de faire la comparaison au lieu de porter un jugement in abstracto. On perd trop facilement de vue ces considérations pourtant si simples. Et cela particulièrement lorsqu'il s'agit admettre dans des pays d'Europe que les époux divorcés pouvaient se remarier l'un avec l'autre. On en voit qui se retrouvent ainsi après plusieurs années de séparation.

d'un peuple si différent, que nous sommes enclins, à priori et souvent sans nous en rendre bien compte, à considérer comme inférieur à tous points de vue et dans chaque domaine.

Pour pouvoir nous former un jugement adéquat et l'étayer sur des preuves positives, nous devrions posséder des statistiques complètes et exactes. Or, elles font défaut. La seule chose que nous pouvons donc affirmer c'est que, à côté de beaucoup de femmes qui ne vivent plus avec leur premier mari, il y en a d'autres dont le mariage initial continue jusqu'à la mort.

Ici encore il faut se méfier des conclusions hâtives. Nous devrions ne considérer que les personnes décédées. Ensuite, il faudrait exclure les ruptures de fiançailles et s'en tenir uniquement aux mariages légitimement contractés et les prendre au sens strict, c'est-à-dire n'englober que les femmes pour lesquelles au moins le walo ait été versé. En outre, pour la présente matière, il est nécessaire de prendre en considération uniquement les mariages par ǹkumbó de personnes adultes, donc des unions vraiment et parfaitement libres de part et d'autre. Enfin, on devrait exclure les femmes de polygames qui ont des préférences pour la monogamie et ont profité d'une occasion pour rompre leur union, afin de contracter mariage avec un célibataire. Il me semble que les statistiques qu'on établirait en tenant compte de ces considérations et restrictions raisonnables, ne seraient pas tellement en défaveur de la stabilité des unions qu'on le penserait à première vue. Voilà du moins l'impression que m'ont laissée les nombreux cas qui sont venus à ma connaissance et que, de par l'obligation de mon ministère de prêtre, j'ai dû examiner à fond.

Sur un total de 112 cas matrimoniaux inscrits dans nos deux derniers livres de Flandria, nous trouvons les proportions suivantes (1) : veuves, 18 (2); héritées, 6; remplaçantes, 1; unions d'impubères rompues, 3; femmes de polygames, 29; femmes de monogames divorcées, 18; mariage initial, 37. Si nous excluons les remplaçantes, les unions d'enfants et les anciennes femmes de polygames, puis ajoutons les veuves et femmes héritées, nous obtenons une proportion de 37 + 18 + 6 = 61 personnes qui en sont toujours à leur premier mariage, contre 18 cas de divorce nettement caractérisés.

(1) Je retranche les 14 cas des Batswá.

(2) Par opposition aux veuves héritées.

Il est pourtant à noter que ces statistiques ne sont basées que sur une infime minorité de la population et sur la partie qui peut être considérée comme la meilleure à notre point de vue, puisqu'elle veut se soumettre au joug de la morale chrétienne. En outre, ce sont des personnes dans la force de l'âge; il est donc impossible de dire si plus tard elles persévéreront dans ces bonnes dispositions. Mais, en tout cas, elles prouvent que la fidélité à l'engagement peut exister et existe de fait chez les Nkundó.

Une des plus belles qualités de l'amour en général et de l'amour matrimonial en particulier est sans contredit la fidélité conjugale. Comme nous le verrons en détail au chapitre VI, art. VII, § 7, n° 2, le Nkundó n'a pas du tout la même appréciation que nous de la fidélité conjugale. L'infidélité de la femme est punie — et sévèrement — par les lois. Mais l'adultère, même découvert et connu par tous, n'engendre ni la honte ni le remords. Il existe une divergence notable entre notre façon de penser et les conceptions des Nkundó. Ceux-ci soutiennent que l'infidélité passagère, non suivie, même si elle est répétée, ne dénote pas l'absence d'amour pour le conjoint. Malgré l'invraisemblance de cette affirmation, j'ai dû me rendre : mes contradicteurs étaient si nombreux, de positions si différentes, d'un sérieux réel; il y a parmi eux plusieurs chrétiens dont nous sommes très satisfaits et qui, tant eux-mêmes que leurs épouses, se conduisent admirablement bien. Ils traitent ces fautes de défaillances momentanées et passionnelles, qui laissent subsister l'amour. Très souvent même ces hommes et ces femmes sont des modèles dans l'exécution de leurs autres devoirs. Ces fautes sont jugées très graves, sans aucun doute, — leurs fureurs montrent bien qu'ils ne les considèrent pas comme des futilités, — mais elles n'excluent pas l'amour dont, pour le reste, les conjoints ne cessent de se donner des preuves.

N'oublions pas que tant d'éléments peuvent amener une chute et que les consciences peuvent être très dévoyées. D'autre part, le fait qu'un mari se montre tolérant, exploite même sa femme, n'est pas exclusif d'un certain amour; un époux peut être extrêmement indulgent et en même temps jaloux jusqu'au crime. Tout cela se retrouve d'ailleurs chez les Blancs. L'amour sans le sentiment du devoir n'est pas un soutien suffisant d'une union.

En outre, aucun dogme, aucune prescription morale à base religieuse ne met un frein à l'instinct. Ajoutons que dans ce peuple primitif, la propension naturelle de la femme à plaire, à se soumettre aux désirs de l'homme est fortement développée. En Europe, ces sentiments sont canalisés par la religion chrétienne et son influence sur la société. Ici, ils ne rencontrent aucun obstacle direct, hormis les sanctions. Avant le mariage, la passion sexuelle avec toutes les sensations annexes et connexes peut — du moins à l'époque actuelle — s'exercer sans entrave physique, morale ni sociale. Le milieu dans lequel grandit la jeune fille, les exemples et conversations de ses compagnes la poussent encore davantage dans cette voie.

Enfin, n'oublions pas l'esprit de lucre, la convoitise. A part quelques exceptions, la femme exige une rémunération de l'homme à qui elle a livré son corps. Beaucoup d'infidélités peuvent être ainsi expliquées, du moins à l'époque actuelle. Il faut pourtant remarquer que, d'autre part, le fait que la femme exige un « salaire » de l'amant peut s'expliquer par une préoccupation amoureuse; en offrant à la femme un cadeau ou une somme il lui montre qu'il tient à elle; c'est une preuve d'affection à son égard, et la femme se fait payer pour être sûre de l'amour de son amant. Cela ne veut pas dire que ce soit commun ni fréquent; mais ce sentiment est naturel et existe en réalité dans plus d'un cas (¹).

Il ne faut donc pas s'étonner que, vivant dans des circonstances toujours défavorables à la chasteté et à la fidélité conjugale, la femme se laisse aisément entraîner à l'adultère et qu'elle tombe bien souvent. C'est là-dessus que se base le proverbe : bǒmoto ndé lofolókó, nkó ngonda ěfá'nd'ọ́sẹngámẹ́ = la femme est une chrysalide, point de forêt où elle ne pende; ce qui stigmatise bien la légèreté des filles d'Ève au pays nkundó. Pourtant, ces critiques de mœurs en proverbes ne peuvent être acceptées qu'au sens général et doivent se comprendre cum grano salis; elles laissent la porte grande ouverte aux exceptions.

Dans son Blancs et Noirs, p. 38, Jadot écrit : « Le Bantou est capable d'amour... tout court, et sa femme, — quoi qu'on en ait dit, — d'une certaine fidélité conjugale. Généralement, ni l'un ni l'autre n'exagèrent. Le Platonisme, le Pétrarquisme et le Romantisme sont étrangers aux amours indigènes... Je connais... des cas de farouches jalousies et de belle fidélité » (²).

Concluons que l'amour existe chez les Nkundó. Ce sentiment a à subir de rudes assauts et est influencé par une quantité de circonstances défavorables, qui peuvent rendre compte de son imperfection et de certaines anomalies dans ses manifestations. Les objections qu'on fait contre son existence ne prouvent pas son absence, mais les mauvaises conditions dans lesquelles il se trouve et qui empêchent son développement ou engendrent ses défaillances ou sa destruction.

DEUXIÈME PARTIE.

La vie sexuelle des Nkundó.

Dans cette division nous examinerons successivement :

1° Le sentiment de la pudeur;
2° La préparation à la vie sexuelle;
3° La prostitution;
4° La sexualité prématrimoniale;
5° L'exercice de la sexualité;
6° Les vices contre nature;
7° L'inceste;
8° Les philtres d'amour.

ARTICLE I. — LA PUDEUR.

La pudeur est, du moins par les psychologistes modernes, définie à peu près comme « un dynamisme (principe d'activité) sensitif d'appréhension quasi instinctive en relation directe avec les processus sexuels » (¹).

Ce n'est pas une vertu, mais plutôt un bon instinct qui donne une certaine facilité à l'exercice de la chasteté. Ainsi comprise, la pudeur incline à cacher l'acte sexuel et tout ce qui, de près ou de loin, a quelque rapport avec lui.

Les excès de la sensualité n'excluent point l'existence de la pudeur, et vice versa, une personne pudique peut se laisser entraîner au dérèglement des mœurs. Toutefois, plus la pudeur est développée et délicate chez une personne donnée, mieux celle-ci est armée — toutes choses égales par ailleurs — contre les excès passionnels, comme, d'autre part, l'habitude de la luxure émousse et affaiblit la pudeur.

Il résulte de ces considérations psychologico-morales, comme des données de l'expérience, qu'on ne peut conclure à l'absence de la pudeur chez une population en se basant sur le seul fait qu'elle est nettement portée à la sensualité et qu'elle fait preuve d'une forte dose de lascivité.

De la part des Nkundó il ne faut pas s'attendre à cette délicatesse du sentiment qu'on rencontre chez certains autres peuples, là surtout où la morale chrétienne a exercé une forte influence. Mais la pudeur ne leur est pas inconnue.

Dans les lignes qui suivent nous ne parlerons plus de cet instinct de pudeur, — que je crois plutôt émoussé chez les Nkundó, — mais de la pudeur du comportement, qui montre l'existence de la pudeur intérieure. Les règles relativement sévères au moyen desquelles la communauté nkundó tâche de protéger la pudeur, prouvent que cette peuplade se rend parfaitement compte de la valeur de cet instinct comme garantie de la faiblesse humaine.

D'une façon générale, ils cachent les manifestations de la passion sexuelle. En outre, certaines pratiques en honneur chez eux nous montrent leur état d'esprit en cette matière; nous allons les examiner plus en détail. Il est à remarquer que, comme nous le verrons plus loin, la pudeur chez les Nkundó s'étend à des cas auxquels elle reste étrangère chez nous, en raison des différences de vues sur certaines questions, et vice versa.

Les ethnologues indiquent généralement comme effets (ou signes) principaux de la pudeur : le port de vêtements (¹) et l'existence de prescriptions sur la décence et la retenue à observer, en paroles ou en actes, entre individus du même sexe, et surtout à l'égard des personnes de sexe différent.

(¹) Quoique le port de vêtements soit une précaution inspirée par la pudeur, il est avéré aussi que l'absence de l'habillement ne prouve pas le défaut de ce sentiment.

§ 1. Vêtement. Nudité.

Jusqu'à l'âge de raison, et même un peu au delà, l'enfant nkundó ne porte autour des reins qu'une ceinture de perles ou une simple ficelle, ornée généralement de quelque amulette. Personne ne s'offusque de cet habillement rudimentaire. Les parents se soucient davantage de la parure de leurs enfants; dès le jeune âge on voit apparaître des colliers et des ceintures de perles de traite, des bracelets, et aux chevilles des anneaux en fer, en cuivre ou en laiton, auxquels s'ajoutent — actuellement — des verroteries au-dessous du genou.

Avec l'âge, le vêtement croît progressivement en ampleur. Dès le début il est diversifié selon le sexe.

Le garçon reçoit une mince bande d'étoffe attachée, par simple repliement des deux bords extrêmes, à la ficelle-ceinture. Elle passe entre les jambes sans être serrée; elle laisse, par conséquent, une grande liberté de mouvements et permet la libre circulation de l'air : excellente précaution contre la transpiration due à la chaleur excessive, mais protection peu efficace contre les regards indiscrets, du moins dans certaines attitudes. Le tissu, en fibres de raphia, peut être plus ou moins orné. Il en existait, jadis, diverses espèces, que nous n'avons pas à décrire ici. La longueur des bords retombants est dictée par la vanité. La ficelle était souvent remplacée par une ceinture en raphia, ou — chez les notables — par une lanière en cuir.

Le vêtement féminin consiste en une large ceinture en raphia dont les deux extrémités se rétrécissent graduellement et se terminent en cordes, qui se nouent sur le ventre. Au centre de cette ceinture (nkásá) (1) est fixée une boule en fibres de raphia (bonkoko). Une pièce d'étoffe (efufa ou lofufa), d'une largeur variant de 3 à 20 cm. et davantage, selon l'âge et l'intensité du sentiment de la pudeur, est attachée aux cordes terminales et retombe plus ou moins bas. Pour l'habit de fête ou de parade, l'efufa est remplacée par une étoffe plus riche et plus longue (intọ́lọ́; ou chez les Elángá de Losanganya : ifika). Le nkásá est inconnu au delà de la Jwalé et de la Loílaka. Dans cette région-là, la femme se ceint d'une corde (ou ceinture de perles) qui retient une deuxième pièce d'étoffe.

Le vêtement masculin est donc une sorte de culotte rudimentaire ouverte sur les côtés, tandis que la femme est vêtue beaucoup plus librement. D'une façon générale, l'efufa constitue une sauvegarde convenable de la pudeur. Pourtant, dans certaines attitudes il est insuffisant (2).

A présent, le nkásá n'est plus porté que par quelques vieilles habitant les villages éloignés des grandes voies de communication. Partout ailleurs l'ancien habillement a fait place aux étoffes d'importation européenne. Les femmes portent au moins un sangatúmbo, sorte de petite jupe descendant des reins à mi-cuisses, ou au delà. A l'intérieur, les hommes d'un certain âge ont simplement changé la nature du tissu, mais non la façon de le porter. Les plus jeunes, au contraire, ont franchement adopté la mode européenne.

La femme mariée ne peut venir dans le village de ses parents par alliance (bakiló), ni se présenter devant eux, sans compléter son costume au moyen d'une ou plusieurs bẹlẹlẹkẹ (feuilles de bananier déchiquetées en franges). Il faut comprendre le terme de bakiló au sens qu'y attachent les Nkundó, c'est-à-dire en excluant ceux avec lesquels l'acte sexuel est parfois permis et qui sont nommés « maris » au sens large (1). Cette coutume aurait-elle quelque rapport avec le sentiment de la pudeur? La même question peut se poser au sujet de cette autre règle sévère de bienséance qui défend à un homme de regarder sa belle-mère en face (2). On peut répondre sans crainte par l'affirmative (3).

(1) Ou bokangá, bokangá wá nkásá. Chez les Bombwanja : likóngá.

(2) Il peut être intéressant de noter que l'habillement des hommes appelé etóo nsamángá, ou etóo tout court, indique aussi la lignée masculine, tandis que la lignée féminine est souvent désignée par le terme nkásá (parfois aussi par jwómoto, de bómoto : femme). Ajoutons encore que lonkundó jwá nkásá signifie : du lonkundo pur, sans fautes, non abâtardé par des influences étrangères. Qu'on rapproche cette expression des locutions suivantes : langue maternelle, moedertaal, mother-tongue, etc.

La règle de bienséance qui interdit à un homme de s'asseoir sur le siège où se trouve une femme, qui n'est pas son épouse, me semble également dictée par la pudeur. Au contraire, l'enjambement dans ces conditions n'a aucun rapport avec ce sentiment. La raison de cette pratique est d'éviter à la personne assise (sans égard au sexe) le contre-effet néfaste d'un charme, d'une pratique d'envoûtement qu'elle possède (4).

L'indigène a-t-il honte de montrer sa nudité? Méfions-nous ici d'une réponse générale. Aussi, afin de donner une idée suffisamment claire autant qu'exacte, il faut tenir compte des différents cas et des circonstances.

1° Tout d'abord, on peut affirmer que le Nkundó, tant homme que femme, dans les circonstances ordinaires de la vie, fait tout son possible pour cacher les parties honteuses. C'est dire qu'en principe il se sent gêné par les regards d'autrui. Ce sentiment s'étend même aux autres endroits du corps que les peuples en général, sans distinction du degré de culture qu'ils ont atteint, s'efforcent de recouvrir.

(3) Cfr. pourtant le chap. X, art. II, § 2.

(4) Contrairement à l'explication de JADOT : Blancs et Noirs au Congo belge, p. 90.

2° Entre personnes du même sexe et du même âge, une certaine liberté est admise. On peut l'observer surtout entre jeunes garçons, lorsqu'ils ont à satisfaire leur « petit besoin ». Dans nos pays d'Europe, la situation n'est guère différente. Cependant, je dois dire que persoqnellement je n'ai constaté cette liberté que dans les écoles et jamais dans les villages de l'intérieur. Cela viendrait-il d'un manque d'observation de ma part, ou faudrait-il attribuer ce relâchement à l'influence de la loi du moindre effort (les endroits plus convenables étant, dans les écoles, situés à une certaine distance) et au peu de loisir que laissent aux élèves les courtes récréations d'un côté et l'amour du jeu de l'autre? Il se pourrait aussi que chez ces garçons la pudeur fût à peine ébauchée (ce sentiment intensément lié à l'instinct sexuel ne s'éveille qu'avec celui-ci). D'autre part, la vie en groupe semble bien atténuer la force de la pudeur.

3° Il est évident que l'excitation sexuelle va à l'encontre de la pudeur, et que parfois — chez la jeunesse surtout — les actes impudiques sont employés pour provoquer une autre personne, et cela plus particulièrement dans des circonstances qui s'y prêtent mieux, comme, par exemple, le bain.

4° Car les baigneurs, qu'il s'agisse de soins de propreté ou de la natation, sont fort insouciants, du moins quand ces exercices ont lieu en groupe de compagnons ou de compagnes. Sans doute, autrefois, ils n'avaient pas le luxe d'un costume de bain, même rudimentaire. Mais actuellement il ne leur est nullement difficile de se procurer la menue pièce d'étoffe nécessaire. Pourtant le nudisme au bain dans les rivières et ruisseaux est fort pratiqué. Le fait est de loin plus commun chez les femmes que chez les hommes. Les indigènes avec lesquels j'ai discuté sur ce sujet l'attribuent à l'insouciance et la légèreté; on n'y voit d'ailleurs pas grand mal. La question de groupe semble jouer aussi son rôle ici. Surprenez dans ces circonstances une ou deux personnes, elles se cacheront en hâte. Trouvez-en une douzaine, elles ne se détourneront pas; au contraire, elles arrêteront leur toilette pour vous regarder passer. Il peut y avoir là simple insouciance; mais on peut admettre aussi que le fait d'être en groupe les rassure, puisque personne ne se sent individuellement objet du regard. Les soins de propreté, en dehors des cours d'eau, sont toujours accompagnés d'une plus grande décence. A cet effet, un petit enclos (ikomba) est construit derrière la case ou dans la bananeraie; ou bien on y a laissé croître un petit bosquet. De cette manière l'indigène est à l'abri des regards indiscrets lorsqu'il désire prendre un bain ou se mettre un lavement. D'ailleurs ces opérations ont lieu de préférence quand il fait sombre ou obscur.

5° La colère et le chagrin violents éclipsent la pudeur, comme ils enlèvent momentanément l'usage de la raison et suppriment tout sentiment contraire, ou même simplement différent. Ici encore l'homme se montre supérieur à la femme. Il est moins impulsif, plus rassis, moins exposé à perdre le contrôle sur ses actes, pour se laisser emporter par la colère. Aussi ne se dénude-t-il pour ainsi dire jamais. La femme, au contraire, a tôt fait de s'arracher tout habit. La chose est tellement ordinaire qu'un fort chagrin ou une sérieuse colère entraîne toujours la femme à se dévêtir complètement. Heureusement pour la décence, il y a presque toujours une parente ou amie qui se hâte de couvrir au moins l'essentiel. Car la femme, en rejetant ainsi ses habits, s'expose à la risée et aux quolibets des spectateurs (7).

6° Les Nkundó ne pratiquent l'acte sexuel que de nuit, ce qui me semble être inspiré par un sentiment de décence, auquel est venue s'ajouter une explication superstitieuse, comme nous l'expliquerons en détail à l'article V.

(7) Une femme en colère peut encore se dévêtir pour faire affront à son mari; c'est une façon de l'insulter, de le ridiculiser.

7° C'est à l'égard des parents, frères et sœurs, etc., que le sentiment de la pudeur atteint son apogée. Aussi est-il inouï qu'un fils voie la nudité de sa mère : bǫna álęnáká ésunyí nyangó. Si la maladie d'une fille adulte exige des soins intimes (lavement, par exemple) et qu'aucune parente ne soit à proximité, le père sera bien forcé de s'en occuper lui-même. Mais ils ont un tel sens de la pudeur que tous deux en verseront des larmes. Le cas, d'ailleurs, se présente rarement. D'autre part, si la fille se voit dans la nécessité de donner les mêmes soins à son père, elle ne se soumet à cette obligation qu'en se lamentant : « njóy'ǫ́ęna ékí'm wímáká : je viens voir d'où j'ai tiré mon origine ». Et toute femme qui a été dans ce cas n'aura pas plus tard de serment plus sacré que celui-ci : « la botaká wá fafá bökí 'm wę́náká la mpaka : par la nudité de mon père que j'ai vue à un âge avancé ».

Nous pouvons donc conclure que la nudité offense le Nkundó et qu'en général il ne la supporte point. Les exceptions, au lieu d'infirmer cette règle en démontrent plutôt l'existence.

§ 3. Paroles. Obscénité et décence.

En principe le Nkundó ne voit aucun mal à proférer des paroles obscènes. Il ne leur applique l'épithète de « mauvaises » que lorsqu'elles deviennent indécentes.

Si une conversation porte sur des questions sexuelles, il pourra se demander si un tel sujet est nécessaire, intéressant ou amusant; il ne se demandera pas s'il est moral. Car, ainsi qu'il apparaîtra dans tout le cours de cette étude, il ne possède pas la notion de moralité au sens strict du mot.

De ces mots obscènes, le Nkundó — et en ceci il n'est pas le seul de son espèce — possède toute une liste bien fournie et variée. Nous ne faisons pas un dictionnaire, et, partant, nous ne les citons pas. Ce qui nous intéresse, ce sont les circonstances qui rendent ces mots indécents, et font qu'on ne peut les employer convenablement. Ce sont précisément ces circonstances qui nous fournissent le critère du degré d'obscénité d'un mot ou d'une expression. Disons immédiatement qu'on fait rentrer dans cette catégorie non seulement les termes s'appliquant aux organes et phénomènes sexuels proprement dits, mais aussi les mots se rapportant à certaines parties anatomiques ou fonctions physiologiques, tels l'excrétion, les poils et les tatouages intimes, l'habit féminin efufa. Notons encore que certaines tribus considèrent comme obscènes des expressions dont d'autres ne s'offusquent nullement (1).

La règle générale de la décence nkundó est que ces termes sont seulement permis entre égaux. Envers des inférieurs, l'usage en est toléré, mais peu recommandable. Il est même nettement désapprouvé à l'égard d'étrangers quelconques. Entre personnes de sexe différent la défense est particulièrement sévère.

Toutefois, ces expressions sont jugées moins graves lorsqu'elles sont proférées dans un mouvement de colère, ou comme réprimande, même en présence des personnes du sexe.

Les exclamations de colère, de dépit, de chagrin ne sont souvent que des obscénités (2). On ne s'en scandalise pas. Pourtant, des personnes âgées, ou plus décentes, s'en abstiennent; ou si l'habitude de telle ou telle expression est invétérée, elles en déforment plus ou moins la prononciation (tout comme cela se pratique pour certains « jurons » de chez nous).

Pour contourner la difficulté, certains mots qui doivent être employés fréquemment sont remplacés par des euphémismes. Ainsi on dit : « ńtewá bokako w'ĩkusa = je vais derrière la maison », pour signifier qu'on va uriner; « Njôtsw'ẽsɛndú = je vais chercher du menu bois de chauffage », ou : « njôtsw'ótéma lokásá = je vais cueillir une feuille », pour indiquer qu'on se rend au W.C. En route on dit : « ńjɛta felé = je quitte le sentier, ou je me rends en forêt. » Il est pourtant admis que le mari emploie la terminologie propre en s'adressant à sa femme. Mais l'inverse est très inconvenant.

(1) Remarques qu'on peut appliquer aux populations d'autres parties du monde.

(2) Cfr. Les Coutumes funéraires, § 1, sous presse dans Anthropos.

On se tient à distance de quelqu'un qui satisfait un besoin naturel; on ne lui adresse même pas la parole. Cette personne, d'ailleurs, ne répondrait pas, pas même à un appel qu'on lui lancerait. Une femme s'abstient même de répliquer à son mari; mais celui-ci peut signaler sa présence en toussant sèchement.

Toute infraction à ces règles est considérée comme une injure grave. Celui qui se trouve ainsi offensé peut se venger par la violence, soit personnellement, soit par l'intermédiaire de son fils, frère, etc.; la justice indigène lui donne toujours raison, même si la rixe est devenue sanglante. Le seul fait de proférer des obscénités en passant devant la maison où se trouve quelqu'un qui a droit au respect peut entraîner des représailles de sa part (1).

Ces crudités de langage sont particulièrement répréhensibles et blessantes quand elles contiennent une allusion d'inceste ou autre par rapport à un parent de la personne qu'on veut offenser. Et il faut avouer qu'elles peuvent dépasser les bornes (comme : coi cum patre, matre, fratre, sorore, etc.). A ce sujet, notons que, dans ce cas, l'allusion se rapporte toujours à un parent de sexe opposé à celui de la personne à laquelle on s'adresse directement ou indirectement. En outre, les propos licencieux ou les inconvenances de langage sont considérés comme plus graves lorsqu'ils sont tenus devant des femmes et des anciens.

[1] Cfr. Jadot, Blancs et Noirs au Congo belge, p. 96.

et de la part d'un esclave devant son maître, d'un Bọtswa devant un Bootó (9).

Lorsqu'un homme surprend quelqu'un proférant des obscénités devant sa femme, spécialement si elles lui sont adressées personnellement, il peut intenter un procès d'adultère. Si la femme refuse d'écouter le séducteur, elle ne lui répond pas, et, parfois irritée de l'injure, elle riposte en insultant la mère de l'offenseur. Elle pourrait porter plainte, mais généralement elle ne le fait pas. Est-ce par honte, ou bien de peur que le tentateur ne publie sur son compte l'un ou l'autre excès de conduite qu'il a surpris? En tout cas, la femme est plus sensible que l'homme à la honte d'une obscénité : óleki nsónyi éá bitóli ńk'ómoto. — Bómoto ndé ndota (itáfá) : la femme est un serpent ndota. Comme ce reptile se faufile dans les herbes et s'y enroule dès qu'il s'aperçoit de l'approche d'un homme, de même la femme ne supporte que mal toute obscénité.

Le moyen idéal de s'assurer si une expression est réellement considérée comme indécente est de vérifier si elle peut se dire en présence d'une proche parente. Car devant une telle personne, le Nkundó ne se permet jamais une obscénité.

Tout comme en Europe, certaines exclamations scabreuses sont tellement enracinées qu'elles semblent avoir perdu leur sens primitif, c'est-à-dire que la généralité de la population ne pense plus du tout à la signification originale. Quelques personnes plus décentes et sérieuses s'en rendent pourtant encore compte, comme le prouvent les changements qu'elles font subir à la prononciation des termes.

Les expressions licencieuses ne sont jamais considérées comme indécentes et personne ne s'en offusque lorsqu'elles sont proférées en groupe, ou lors d'occupations en groupe. Telles sont : la chasse ou la pêche en commun, les beuveries, les danses, les funérailles et — actuellement — le travail en commun à une route, à un gîte d'étape, etc.

(9) Cfr. Introduction, note 2, p. 6.

Dans cette matière nous constatons donc, à côté d'une retenue remarquable, aussi une certaine tolérance, qui peut aller loin. Les propos licencieux ne sont pas condamnés en eux-mêmes, mais uniquement à cause de certaines circonstances accidentelles, ce qui montre que le Nkundó ne les considère pas, comme nous, du point de vue moral, mais social. Seulement, le fait que ce sont précisément ces mots qui peuvent devenir indécents et socialement mauvais prouve que notre indigène voit dans leur contenu quelque chose de choquant, de honteux, une qualité apte à offenser. La liberté, dans certains cas, n'infirme pas la conclusion générale, mais indique seulement l'inclinaison de la nature passionnée.

§ 2. Danses.

Les danses des Nkundó se renouvellent périodiquement, à l'instar de la mode d'Europe. D'anciennes danses sont, après un certain temps, délaissées et remplacées par d'autres, nouvellement inventées ou récemment introduites. Les danses actuellement à la mode sont venues de chez les Bɔsɔngɔ́, la tribu inventive par excellence. Dans toutes on peut distinguer deux parties : la danse proprement dite et le bouquet ou ikóeyo. Celui-ci consiste en prouesses acrobatiques ou en une représentation théâtrale. Il varie avec chaque exécution et dépasse parfois les bornes de la décence, spécialement dans certaines scènes de danses féminines. Tout dépend ici de la mentalité des acteurs et des spectateurs.

Le texte du chant est d'ordinaire convenable. Ce n'est qu'exceptionnellement que quelques passages le sont moins. Moins innocentes encore sont les exclamations lancées par certains danseurs ou danseuses, mais surtout par le public aux moments où l'ardeur de l'exécution atteint son point culminant. Aussi, ce point culminant constitue-t-il le point faible, moralement parlant. Ceci se constate surtout dans les danses de femmes. Entraînées par leur passion et stimulées par les applaudissements et les acclamations des spectateurs, elles font des mouvements provocants (bitékó, bembónjo). L'Européen ne remarque pas le mal; mais l'indigène connaît ces gestes et leur signification. Les spectateurs acclament avec un redoublement d'enthousiasme, soit par émotion sexuelle, soit par jouissance esthétique, car pour eux, ces mouvements sont beaux. Toutes les danses artistiques pour femmes actuellement en vogue contiennent une phase pareille d'excitation exagérée. Aussi comprend-on la sévérité avec laquelle les vieux défendaient, jadis, aux enfants et adolescents d'assister à ces danses.

Après ce qui vient d'être dit, on n'étonnera personne en affirmant que ces grandes danses sont souvent la cause d'adultères et de divorces. Et, dans une mesure restreinte, cela vaut également pour les danses d'hommes, car la beauté masculine y est exhibée d'une façon attrayante.

Les mouvements rythmiques qui accompagnent parfois les chants pendant les beuveries en commun ne méritent pas le nom de danses; ils n'impliquent rien de choquant et le texte est rarement scabreux. Dans les circonstances ordinaires de la vie les chansons impudiques sont rares, mais elles ne font jamais défaut dans les cérémonies funéraires.

Jusqu'ici nous n'avons parlé que des danses artistiques, toujours en grande faveur. Elles étaient — et sont — réservées à certaines occasions particulières. Pour les circonstances ordinaires les Nkundó connaissent quelques petites danses d'amusement qui n'ont rien de commun avec la danse proprement dite. Ce sont plutôt des jeux. Le texte du chant peut être licencieux, mais l'est plutôt rarement. A présent, pourtant, — surtout depuis l'introduction de danses « à l'européenne », et particulièrement dans les grands et petits centres et chez ceux qui en ont été influencés, — il est très souvent réellement obscène. Cette espèce de danse d'amusement est surtout pratiquée par la jeunesse.

A l'actif de la moralité on doit noter le fait que les danses mixtes sont inconnues du pur indigène. On les voit dans les centres (qu'on pense au bofenya mixte, ou au balingá : grotesque contrefaçon de la danse à l'européenne), mais elles se propagent — et rapidement — dans les villages de l'intérieur. La dernière espèce surtout fait fureur. Elle exerce sur la moralité une influence néfaste. Nombre d'adultères, de divorces, de palabres, de rixes ont été causés par elle; et certains chefs et capitas l'interdisent, et ils aimeraient pouvoir punir sévèrement ceux qui s'y livrent.

Conclusion.

Tout ce qui précède nous oblige à conclure à l'existence de la pudeur chez les Nkundó. Le port des habits, les diverses prescriptions, la mentalité des membres les plus âgés et les plus sages de la communauté prouvent qu'ils connaissent ce sentiment. Celui-ci est essentiellement le même qu'ailleurs. Dans certains domaines il est même poussé à l'extrême. Les exceptions sont à mettre au compte des aberrations individuelles et — par la réaction qu'elles suscitent — ont même une valeur probante. On ne peut pas trouver matière à une objection sérieuse contre l'existence de la pudeur dans la tolérance générale que l'on constate à certaines occasions particulières. La raison de cette attitude, qui nous semble en contradiction avec les autres faits, est sans conteste très difficile à déterminer. Serait-ce une condescendance à la faiblesse humaine, ou faut-il y voir un affaiblissement de la moralité publique? Ou n'est-ce pas plutôt parce que les circonstances visées enlèvent aux actes toute possibilité d'interprétation défavorable? Une allusion faite en public, dans un groupe, n'a pas la même portée, n'indique pas l'intimité suspecte que la même allusion entre deux personnes.

Le sentiment de la pudeur chez cette population et ses diverses manifestations sont, cela va sans dire, en voie de transformation sous l'influence de deux courants différents : d'un côté, la licence des mœurs augmentée par le contact avec toutes sortes d'autres races, par la liberté plus grande, par l'émancipation partielle de la femme et l'attraction des grands centres et leur luxe; d'un autre côté, par la prédication de la morale chrétienne, dont les effets sont pourtant encore bien faibles et certainement ne contrebalancent pas l'influence mentionnée en premier lieu.

ARTICLE II. — PRÉPARATION A LA VIE SEXUELLE.

§ 1. Préparation de la femme.

Lorsqu'une jeune fille désire s'adonner aux plaisirs de la chair, elle prépare préalablement ses organes. La préparation proprement dite est d'« ouvrir la voie » (lifola mbóka). Cette opération, répétée à plusieurs reprises, se fait en cachette, de préférence en forêt, avec ou sans compagnes qui partagent son intention. Chacune opère sur elle-même. Afin d'obtenir l'élargissement progressif de l'organe, la jeune fille emploie les bourgeons toujours plus gros de la plante bosáánga=bokaakó (Costus afer) (dont elle a soin d'enlever la pointe), qui sont finalement remplacés par un fruit lọmbọ́lẹ́ de la plante bọsọ́ọmbọ́ (Aframomum), ou, plus rarement, par une jeune carotte de manioc.

Cette pratique est générale : il doit se trouver peu ou pas d'exceptions. Les jeunes filles s'y adonnent pour que l'acte, auquel elles aspirent, se fasse sans accroc (« bálota báfóy'ōkeela »).

En plus de cette préparation fondamentale, les jeunes filles se font des toilettes intimes. C'est une mesure de propreté, qu'elles continuent, à moins d'un cas exceptionnel, durant toute la vie. D'après mes informateurs, la femme indigène — en règle très générale — tient à cette propreté, tant pour elle-même que pour ne pas rebuter son mari ou amant. Quand une jeune fille se met à pratiquer ces soins hygiéniques, c'est un signe qu'elle veut commencer la vie sexuelle.

Pendant la toute première jeunesse, dès la période consacrée à l'allaitement, la mère prévoyante travaille à donner aux organes de sa fillette le plus de perfection possible. Par des pressions réitérées et longtemps continuées, elle en modèle — pour ainsi dire — la face externe, afin d'en obtenir le rétrécissement, qualité fort prisée par nos gens.

C'est encore la mère qui éduque sa fille dans la préparation à la vie conjugale. Elle lui enseigne en même temps la façon de se comporter vis-à-vis de son mari futur et lui inculque ses devoirs de bonne ménagère. (Cfr. chap. X, art. VIII).

Il nous faut mentionner encore certaines façons d'agir des Nkundó, quoiqu'elles n'aient qu'un rapport purement extérieur et superficiel avec le présent sujet. Fréquemment un homme adulte prend dans ses bras une fillette non encore sevrée, ou déjà plus développeé, n'importe. Cette enfant est considérée par lui comme son épouse. Non qu'il ait payé la dot pour elle. Mais étant la sœur, cousine, etc., d'une de ses femmes, elle est, à son point de vue, une « épouse », c'est-à-dire que non seulement il pourra l'épouser plus tard, mais encore que, sans être son mari, il jouit d'une certaine liberté à son égard (¹). Or, un homme pareil, prenant sa jeune « épouse » dans ses bras, se délecte dans la prévision de l'avenir et lui adresse la parole dans ce sens, souvent en accompagnant de caresses intimes son allocution.

La même pratique se rencontre, mutatis mutandis, de la part d'une femme à l'égard d'un garçonnet qu'elle peut considérer comme son « mari ».

§ 2. Circoncision.

La pratique de la circoncision est générale. D'ordinaire elle a lieu en bas âge. Sans entrer ici dans plus de détails (¹), ni vouloir me prononcer sur le but de cette coutume, il est un fait que la femme nkundó refuse de s'unir à un incirconcis. Par conséquent, tout indigène tient à se soumettre à cette opération. C'est la réponse que les indigènes donnent à nos questions sur le motif de la circoncision. En poussant l'interrogatoire plus à fond, ils ajoutent que la femme abhorre la présence des dépôts qui se forment sous le prépuce. Je donne cette explication pour le prix qu'elle m'a coûté. Il se peut pourtant que ce soit là le véritable motif qui les inspire.

En tout cas, la circoncision ne semble avoir aucun but religieux ni d'initiation.

§ 3. Tatouages.

Il existe chez les Nkundó deux sortes de tatouages : le tatouage purement ornemental et le tatouage sexuel (²). Ce dernier se rencontre seulement chez la femme. Les dessins sont situés sur les parties du corps environnant les organes sexuels et jusque sur l'extérieur de ces derniers.

(²) Je ne parle pas de tatouage tribal, parce qu'il me semble ne pas exister chez les Nkundó. Les motifs du tatouage varient de peuplade à peuplade et de groupe à groupe. De ce fait ils constituent un signe distinctif. Mais cela ne veut point dire qu'ils sont intentionnés comme tel. La distinction posée par le tatouage entre diverses tribus n'est pas un but, mais une conséquence, comme, par exemple, aussi les costumes nationaux en Europe. D'ailleurs, les rapports, pacifiques ou guerriers, de nos gens s'étendaient exclusivement — ou à peu près — aux tribus ou clans voisins, donc affectant les mêmes motifs ornementaux qu'eux. Et dans ces rencontres, le dialecte sert bien mieux à se reconnaître.

Qu'est-ce qui incite les Nkundó à pratiquer cette dernière forme? Tout d'abord, nous devons tenir compte des considérations suivantes : comme la femme est, de sa nature, plus désireuse de paraître belle, il est tout indiqué que son tatouage soit plus abondant, plus développé que celui de l'homme. Et comme la coquetterie est une forme du désir de plaire à l'autre sexe, qui, de son côté, y est sensible, le tatouage attire celui-ci. Il s'ensuit aussi que le tatouage de la femme atteint son développement maximum sur les parties du corps qui sont les plus proches des organes sexuels.

La raison d'être de ces tatouages peut être une certaine jouissance supplémentaire dans l'acte (¹). Cette explication n'est pas dépourvue de vraisemblance. Quoique je ne sois jamais parvenu à en obtenir la confirmation nette et directe, il est un fait qu'un homme fait parfois des allusions malveillantes à l'adresse de sa femme insuffisamment tatouée à son goût (« Toi, ton corps est lisse comme celui d'un homme »). Cette constatation donne à l'explication citée une grande valeur. La persistance de ces tatouages, malgré l'habillement moderne, possède également quelque force probante, bien qu'elle ne soit pas absolue, attendu qu'elle garde son poids dans l'explication psychologique qui suit.

De par leur disposition, les figures convergent vers l'organe sexuel. D'autre part, les hommes ont vu, à l'une ou l'autre occasion, le tatouage, soit en entier, soit en partie. Même si les habits le couvrent plus ou moins, pourtant, un jour ou l'autre, pour une raison quelconque, la femme les met à découvert, ne fût-ce que partiellement.

(¹) Explication donnée, par exemple, par le Dr J. MAES, dans : Notes sur les Populations des Bassins du Kasai, de la Lukenie et du lac Léopold II, pp. 199 et suiv.

L'imagination, travaillant sur ces données de la vue, excite tout naturellement le désir sexuel. L'exactitude de cette explication psychologique peut se vérifier même en Europe; on est surtout tenté par ce qu'on ne fait qu'entrevoir, et les modes « modernes », tout comme certaines modes anciennes, en tiennent compte. Au paragraphe suivant nous constaterons d'ailleurs un autre fait analogue.

Les deux explications données peuvent se défendre, car chacune a sa valeur. Il me semble pourtant préférable de ne pas les opposer l'une à l'autre, mais plutôt de les unir, comme — probablement — elles le sont dans l'idée de l'indigène.

Il reste encore à noter qu'un homme n'effectue jamais sur une femme l'opération du tatouage sexuel, tandis qu'une femme opère bien sur un homme. Enfin, les termes spécifiques désignant ces tatouages sont considérés comme obscénités.

La pratique du tatouage est actuellement en décroissance. Beaucoup de garçons n'en possèdent déjà plus. Mais rares sont les filles qui s'en abstiennent, La manie n'a pas disparu chez elles. Certaines se font même tatouer à l'insu de leurs parents et malgré leur opposition. La mode est, chez les Noires comme partout au monde, une chose fortement enracinée, parce que naturelle. Seulement, ici les figures diminuent en ampleur. Ceci me semble dû, non à une réaction contre le tatouage comme tel, mais à une modification de la mode. Car le tatouage est une véritable mode et, comme toute mode, est sujet au changement, à l'évolution. Il existe actuellement une tendance à imiter les dessins d'autres peuplades congolaises. Ailleurs, comme chez les Injǫlǫ, on constate une évolution interne, quoique sous des influences étrangères. L'évolution se produit surtout dans les motifs de la face, tandis que ceux du tronc commencent à être omis. Mais les tatouages sexuels ne semblent pas disparaître.

§ 4. Ceintures de perles.

Dès le jeune âge l'enfant nkundó se voit orner d'une ceinture de perles de traite. Avant la pénétration européenne, cette garniture ne faisait son apparition que vers la puberté et était restreinte aux filles. A présent, plusieurs hommes aussi se parent de cette façon. Et les perles étant maintenant plus faciles à obtenir, les femmes ne se contentent plus d'un seul rang, mais s'en mettent plusieurs de couleurs variées. Elles en adjoignent de plus petits au-dessous du genou.

D'après les informations qui m'ont été fournies, ce genre d'ornement peut aussi avoir une signification sexuelle. Régulièrement, il est entièrement couvert par les habits — nous parlons de l'hypothèse actuelle, la seule où vaut le cas — ce n'est qu'à quelques occasions qu'il devient visible. Si le nombre de cordons est grand (on va jusqu'à 6-8-10) ou le volume des perles considérable, la surélévation des habits à l'endroit correspondant peut y attirer l'attention. L'ouïe constate leur présence pendant une course ou une danse. Or, d'après mes informateurs, cela suffit à éveiller la passion. Le fait d'y faire allusion et, à fortiori, d'y toucher délibérément est considéré comme une invitation. De son côté, la femme les meut parfois des mains pour leur faire produire leur bruit spécifique et ainsi y attirer l'attention d'un homme, afin de le provoquer.

Ce qui précède ne signifie pas que nécessairement et toujours le simple port de ces perles soit voulu dans un but mauvais. Non seulement il faut exclure cette intention chez les personnes sérieuses, surtout si elles sont âgées, qui se contentent d'un seul cordon, rarement d'un second, servant de soutien au premier; mais encore il peut arriver qu'une jeune beauté noire se ceigne d'une dizaine dans un but de pure vanité, afin que tout le monde puisse constater qu'elle en possède une grande quantité.

Mais, en outre, il est avéré que les soins de beauté ne s'adressent pas nécessairement à une tierce personne. Si cela est la règle générale, il n'est pas moins vrai que bien des personnes aiment à s'habiller pour le plaisir d'être bien habillées, et des jeunes filles qui ne rêvent d'aucune aventure peuvent aimer de jolis dessous. Cette recherche de la parure pour la parure peut, sans doute, rendre compte des ceintures — voire d'autres soins de beauté — chez plus d'une femme nkundó.

Ajoutons que ceux qui adhèrent à la théorie de l'influence sexuelle immédiate du tatouage pourraient l'appliquer également ici.

§ 5. Épilation.

Tout Nkundó, sans égard au sexe, pratique l'épilation sur les parties et même sous les aiselles. Les poils qui croissent en cet endroit sont considérés par les indigènes comme ayant un rapport avec la sexualité. Ils leur appliquent d'ailleurs le même nom qu'à la pilosité plus intime.

Cette épilation est faite par la personne même, ou bien par un compagnon ou une compagne, respectivement. Autrefois, les poils étaient simplement arrachés. A présent, beaucoup les rasent avec un lọtẹ́ú. En outre, la pratique tend à se restreindre aux seules pilosités sexuelles, tandis que jadis tout y passait : sourcils, cils, moustache, barbe.

Pour les Nkundó, les épilations sont des soins de beauté. Leur explication paraît devoir être admise, en donnant toutefois au terme « soins de beauté » un sens large pour y faire rentrer l'épilation des parties du corps qui restent toujours cachées. Cette dernière sorte pourrait toutefois être en rapport avec le tatouage : facilité de l'établir et en obtenir les effets.

ARTICLE III. — LA PROSTITUTION.

Le dictionnaire définit comme suit la prostitution : « métier qui consiste à livrer son corps aux plaisirs du public, pour de l'argent ». Outre cette signification stricte, dont l'élément le plus important est : « pour de l'argent », le mot est encore employé dans plusieurs autres sens plus larges.

La prostitution se rencontre dans le monde sous diverses formes : 1° la femme entretenue; 2° la maison de tolérance; 3° la racoleuse professionnelle; 4° la racoleuse occasionnelle; 5° la femme mariée qui a un amant régulier et payant; 6° l'irrégulière qui vit en concubinage successivement avec l'un, puis avec l'autre, toujours en se faisant payer. Nous allons examiner les formes sous lesquelles cette inconduite se présentait et se présente chez les Nkundó.

La première question à nous poser est celle de savoir si avant l'occupation européenne la femme nkundó se donnait par esprit de lucre. La femme exigeait souvent une rémunération. Mais, nous l'avons déjà dit, il est très difficile de décider si elle agissait ainsi par esprit de lucre ou simplement pour s'assurer de l'affection de son amant. Vu la mentalité de la femme nkundó à l'époque actuelle, nous pouvons admettre que sa cupidité l'a quelquefois poussée à l'amour vénal : certains objets de parure ou de toilette (épingles à cheveux, par exemple) ont sans doute séduit l'une ou l'autre à se livrer afin de les posséder, et il est probable que de la sorte des cas individuels se soient présentés. Mais la généralisation est tout à fait invraisemblable, parce qu'elle ne s'accorde pas avec l'organisation économique de la peuplade, où les biens sont plus ou moins collectifs, et surtout où, comme nous l'exposerons au chapitre VI, article II, la femme n'a aucune propriété.

Nous pouvons donc admettre qu'il a existé un nombre restreint de racoleuses occasionnelles.

Au contraire, il n'y a jamais eu de racoleuses professionnelles, c'est-à-dire la femme nkundó n'a jamais fait de la prostitution un métier. On peut en dire autant des autres formes énumérées ci-dessus.

Il nous faut remarquer que la fort grande majorité des femmes ont toujours été mariées dans leur jeunesse (chapitre IV, art. I) et que l'adultère était sévèrement puni (ch. VI, art. VII), circonstances qui ont nécessairement limité le nombre des prostituées.

Nous trouvons cependant un semblant superficiel de cette méconduite, c'est-à-dire qu'il existe une catégorie peu nombreuse de jeunes filles et de femmes auxquelles on serait tenté à première vue d'appliquer l'épithète de prostituées; il est donc utile d'examiner un peu plus attentivement les faits, qui, s'ils sont en eux-mêmes entièrement différents de la prostitution, peuvent toutefois y donner lieu facilement dans le sens décrit.

En effet, outre la bolúmbú (qui n'a rien de commun avec la dégénérescence de la sexualité féminine, mais qui est une institution de caractère social et politique), on rencontre des filles qui sont retenues chez leurs parents jusqu'à un âge plus avancé que de coutume, avant d'être données en mariage. Une jeune fille pareille est nommée éfótswâála = celle qui ne se marie pas. Elle n'est pas bolúmbú. Extérieurement, ou — pour employer la terminologie philosophique — matériellement, les deux coutumes se ressemblent. Mais formellement elles diffèrent du tout au tout. La bolúmbú est une question d'autorité, d'influence, est donc du domaine public. L'éfótswâála, au contraire, est une affaire privée entre le père et la fille. Alors que la création d'une bolúmbú est accompagnée de fêtes publiques, d'un décret officiellement proclamé (boéko) par le père et agréé par l'assemblée des chefs de famille, la constitution d'une éfótswáála, au contraire n'est l'objet d'aucun acte ni cérémonie officiels.

Le nom d'éfótswáála ne veut pas dire qu'elle restera célibataire toute sa vie. Son mariage n'est pas définitivement exclu, mais seulement ajourné.

Pour sa conduite, l'éfótswáála se comporte comme toute jeune fille nkundó. Rien ne la distingue de ses compagnes. Lorsqu'un bon parti se présente elle se marie comme tout le monde.

Cette coutume — si on peut employer ce terme — n'a donc aucune connexion réelle avec la prostitution. Tout ce qu'on peut dire est que la fille restant célibataire plus longtemps et en plein âge adulte est exposée à un plus grand libertinage et à une vie de débauches.

Il arrive aussi que des parents, courroucés par la rupture du mariage de leur fille avec un homme qu'ils considèrent comme un bon gendre, l'empêchent de se remarier, afin de la forcer à retourner chez son mari légitime. Tant les parents que leur enfant restant chacun sur son propre point de vue, et ne cédant pas, cette situation peut persister durant de longs mois, de sorte que la femme, pratiquement, ne se trouve plus en puissance de mari. Et comme l'opposition de ses parents l'empêche d'être prise en mariage par un autre homme, elle est facilement amenée à se donner à tous. Il faut ajouter qu'à présent ce cas est plutôt théorique. Les parents ne possèdent plus l'autorité ancienne pour contrecarrer de la sorte la volonté de leur fille âgée : si elle tient tête, ils sont bien forcés de céder, de peur de la voir s'enfuir au loin. Et ce serait tomber de Charybde en Scy[illegible] Mais, jadis, des situations pareilles n'étaient pas si rares.

Le terrain propice par excellence pour l'éclosion et le développement de la prostitution doit être cherché dans les centres. On peut donner comme causes principales :

1° La vanité féminine, surexcitée par l'exposition de toutes les éclatantes richesses importées par le Blanc, et qui tentent si fort les négresses. Il faut des revenus importants pour satisfaire ce désir de se rehausser la beauté native. Les travailleurs et artisans ordinaires ne gagnent pas assez d'argent pour satisfaire sur ce point leurs épouses ou filles. Les maîtresses d'Européens ou de Noirs étrangers, les femmes de « clercs » et d'autres représentants de la haute société nègre étalent un luxe qui crève les yeux à leurs congénères.

2° L'excédent considérable de célibataires sur le nombre de femmes disponibles.

3° La licence de l'adultère : aucune sanction n'était prévue.

4° La difficulté pour beaucoup de jeunes filles, nées dans les centres, de trouver un mari convenable. Les mariages entre gens de peuplades différentes (surtout certaines d'entre elles) ne tiennent qu'exceptionnellement. Et comme les habitants des centres n'y ont pas de résidence fixe et stable, ils ont l'intention de retourner tôt ou tard dans leur tribu d'origine. Ces mariages « mixtes » sont donc déconseillés et contrecarrés par les parents sérieux (1).

Dans la région qui nous occupe il ne se trouve que quelques petits centres peu peuplés : plantations, postes du Gouvernement ou de Compagnies, petits centres commerciaux. Les célibataires se satisfont de temps à autre avec les épouses de leurs cotravailleurs, et surtout avec les femmes qui viennent de l'intérieur vendre leurs produits au marché. Un des effets de la prostitution : la propagation des maladies vénériennes, n'en est pour cela pas évité.

Nous pouvons conclure qu'autrefois la prostitution n'a existé que dans son acception très large et dans des proportions réduites. Dans son article cité (p. 32), Engels écrit que chez les Wangata, « la prostitution n'existe plus ». Si l'éminent auteur emploie le terme dans la signification donnée par le dictionnaire, on peut demander sur quoi il se base pour affirmer de cette façon implicite que l'institution a existé autrefois; s'il le comprend au sens large, les faits contredisent sa remarque; car, en réalité, la prostitution n'a cessé de se développer chez les tribus dont il traite et qui se trouvent à toute proximité du centre de Coquilhatville et de ses divers faubourgs.

(1) A lire la belle page de JADOT, Blancs et Noirs au Congo belge, p. 132 : « La prostitution devait inévitablement... ».

De par le fait de la colonisation, la situation a beaucoup changé. La liberté des communications à des distances considérables, l'introduction de richesses nouvelles et variées, de l'argent surtout, ont eu une grande influence sur le développement de la prostitution. Le régime économique de la peuplade est resté le même; mais éloignées de leur famille ou de leur mari, les femmes disposent librement de leur avoir, et l'augmentation des objets de parure fait qu'elles trouvent un profit personnel à se livrer à l'inconduite.

Le vice n'y a donc pas pris les formes européennes; les changements modernes ont simplement accru, — mais dans des proportions énormes — le nombre des racoleuses occasionnelles. Le développement de cet état est favorisé par le proxénétisme de certains polygames, et même monogames, habitant près des centres européens, lequel engendre chez leurs femmes cette attitude. En effet, si c'est le mari qui en profite pécuniairement en tout premier lieu, la femme n'est pas frustrée de son petit bénéfice, et sa cupidité native la pousse aisément à se livrer sans scrupule au commerce de son corps.

Les femmes dont il est question sont, pour la plupart, mariées. Souvent elles ont parmi les travailleurs des camps un amant attitré, qui généralement rémunère cette fidélité. Nous en arrivons ainsi à la femme mariée qui a un amant régulier et payant.

Cette forme s'est développée même en dehors des camps de travailleurs. On la trouve chez les riverains — plus en contact avec les Blancs et leurs gens — et dans les villages voisins, spécialement chez les Beloko, plus près de Coquilhatville, où elle a gagné même des monogames. Il est à noter que cette perversion s'implante d'autant plus facilement qu'elle a une certaine analogie avec la coutume ancestrale du concubinage reconnu (voir chapitre VI, article VIII, § 2) et que, comme celui-ci, elle ne prend pas, dans beaucoup de cas, la forme de la prostitution, c'est-à-dire que les relations coupables ne sont pas voulues dans un but de cupidité. En outre, il y a souvent un arrangement avec le mari.

Quant aux autres formes énumérées, elles sont encore inconnues dans les villages indigènes et dans les petits centres situés dans le territoire étudié, où, pourtant, certaines d'entre elles peuvent, dans un avenir plus ou moins rapproché, se développer.

Dans un centre comme Coquilhatville il existe des femmes irrégulières qui vivent en concubinage successivement avec l'un, puis avec l'autre, quelques jours ou semaines avec celui-ci, puis autant avec celui-là, en se faisant payer et en refusant d'aliéner définitivement leur liberté. Cette localité se trouve, il est vrai, en dehors des limites géographiques de notre étude; mais à cause de la proximité et de sa situation en territoire nkundó, on peut m'excuser d'en toucher un mot. Il n'y a pas de maisons de tolérance, et l'on n'y rencontre pas de racoleuses professionnelles, à l'exception de certaines femmes qui se livrent aux équipages des bateaux. La plupart des prostituées de Coquilhatville sont des jeunes filles ou des divorcées (de droit ou de fait). Cette forme larvée n'y est pas réglementée comme à Léopoldville (*). Cependant, le Gouvernement reconnaît, du moins en pratique, une classe de « femmes libres », dont le nombre est considérable et dont le genre de vie est contagieux jusqu'à entraîner — à des degrés fort variés — une partie notable des jeunes filles qui vivent chez leurs parents, mais qui aspirent au luxe (1).

ARTICLE IV. — SEXUALITÉ PRÉ-MATRIMONIALE.

Sous cette en-tête nous examinerons :

1° Ce que les Nkundó pensent de la virginité;

2° Les rapports entre célibataires;

3° L'opinion des Nkundó sur les naissances extramatrimoniales.

§ 1. Virginité.

Le mot virginité a un double sens. Il peut signifier : présence de l'hymen, intégrité physique ou correspondre à la définition du dictionnaire : « vierge : fille qui n'a jamais eu de commerce avec un homme ».

La pratique décrite ci-dessus à l'article II, § 1, fait que les jeunes filles nkundó qui sont restées physiquement vierges jusqu'à l'âge adulte sont nécessairement rarissimes. Même dans le cas — actuellement d'une grande rareté, mais autrefois commun (2) — d'une fille qui ne numéro, le nom et l'adresse de la contribuable). Cette taxe n'est pas l'équivalent d'une permission de licence et de libertinage. Elle n'est pas nommée : de prostitution, ou autre terme analogue, mais certains Européens l'appellent ainsi parce qu'elle en a l'air.

En outre, il existe une véritable réglementation de la prostitution : c'est l'ordonnance du Gouverneur Général du 3 novembre 1931, qui institue des cartes de prostituées, avec visites sanitaires périodiques, et qui semble être appliquée à Matadi, Léopoldville et Elisabethville.

(1) D'après les dernières données statistiques que je possède, le Gouvernement autorise à Coquilhatville, sur une population extra-coutumière totale de 6.266 personnes, 797 femmes libres.

(2) Cfr. le présent article, sous le § 2.

commence la vie sexuelle que lorsque son corps a atteint le développement normal, elle ne s'adonnait au plaisir charnel qu'après s'être déchiré l'hymen.

Quelle est l'opinion des Nkundó sur la virginité? Il faut distinguer cette question :

1° Le futur attache-t-il de l'importance à l'intégrité physique de sa fiancée ? D'après ce que nous avons vu, non, évidemment.

2° En attache-t-il à sa virginité morale, c'est-à-dire lui est-il indifférent de n'être pas le premier à avoir avec elle un commerce charnel?

Que cela lui soit absolument indifférent serait peut-être une affirmation trop radicale. Mais il n'y attache en tout cas pas grande importance, puisque le but principal est pour lui de se donner une progéniture et de suivre d'une façon honnête l'instinct naturel; ce qui ne signifie nullement qu'il aime épouser une femme de mœurs légères, au contraire.

Quelles sont les données de la linguistique par rapport à la virginité? E. Torday, dans l'intéressante étude intitulée : The Principles of Bantu Mariage (dans Africa, II, n° 3, p. 255, 1929), dit : « Some of the most competent philologists assure us that in most Bantu languages there is no word for « virgin »; ... The Wachagga, who may be an exception, use the word « unimpaired », and it is perhaps in the use of similar expressions, not exclusively applied to physical virginity, that we shall find the explanation of the absence of a specific term. »

Le lonkundó possède ainsi un substantif : ekáté. Il est dérivé du radical kát (verbe -kátema) = être fortement attaché, être tenace (cfr. lokáitá = ténacité). Ekáté désigne quelque chose de difficile à ouvrir, à séparer, à désunir, et spécialement des fruits à écorce dure, coriace et épaisse, comme le likáfé, le liaénjá, le lindongó, lorsque, bien que mûrs, on ne parvient pas à en briser la coque qui contient la partie comestible. Or ce terme est appliqué, au figuré, à une femme qui résiste à la séduction, qui « ne se laisse pas ouvrir ». Cette dénomination n'est donc nullement spécifique et n'est d'ailleurs pas l'équivalent de notre mot virginité, mais signifie plutôt chasteté.

D'autres tribus nkundó semblent connaître un mot spécifique : bǫkǫtǫ́. Je l'ai appris par des indigènes d'entre-Ikelemba-Tshuapa, tant à l'Est qu'à l'Ouest de la Julé, ainsi que par des Baséká Bóngwalanga, de l'ancien district de la Lulonga. Les missionnaires de la Préfecture Apostolique de Basankusu l'emploient dans leurs publications pour « virginité, vierge ». Je n'ai pu me former une idée exacte de sa signification précise. Mais pour autant que j'aie pu m'en rendre compte, il se rapproche beaucoup plus de « chasteté virginale » que ekáté. En tout cas, il ne contient aucune allusion à la virginité physique (1).

Ce que nous venons de voir n'implique pas que toute jeune fille nkundó soit libre de s'adonner aux rapports charnels et que l'opinion publique approuve le libertinage des célibataires. Nous examinerons cette question dans les paragraphes suivants.

§ 2. Rapports sexuels entre célibataires.

Dans cette question nous devons distinguer les relations entre adultes des rapports entre non-adultes. Nous examinerons donc les deux cas séparément, pour, à la fin, tenter une explication des changements survenus dans l'attitude des indigènes dans ce domaine.

---

(1) Il ne saurait nullement nous étonner que des tribus « primitives » ne possèdent pas dans leur langue de terme spécifique pour exprimer notre idée de virginité, ni en déduire qu'ils ne connaissent pas la chose. Les Grecs et les Romains la connaissaient bien, et pourtant ils n'avaient aucun mot propre pour la désigner. Parthenos et Virgo signifient simplement : jeune fille, non mariée. Et les mots germaniques, comme Maagd, Jungfrau, qui maintenant ont le sens de vierge, avaient originairement le même sens que les termes grec et latin.

A. — Avant la maturité physique. — Relatons d'abord ce que les indigènes racontent sur la coutume du vieux temps, pour décrire ensuite la pratique actuelle.

Anciennement les relations entre jeunes gens non encore nubiles étaient sévèrement défendues par les parents. Ceux-ci enseignaient que les coupables sont frappés d'une très grave maladie, amenant inévitablement la mort. Cette maladie était nommée ndole = terme générique, et plus spécifiquement ezímbéji (1). Le corps devient flasque et sans vigueur; la langueur se termine par une paralysie mortelle (byongé nnyányuka ou nkalááná). Les filles redoutaient, en outre, que leurs organes, encore imparfaitement formés, ne se déchirent. Aussi étaient-elles imprégnées d'une peur très accentuée : bofola w'ánde = crainte des mâles; bofola w'ámato = crainte des femmes. Bólotáki iwó : ils craignaient la mort. Les parents ajoutaient que ces actes n'étaient exempts de danger qu'entre personnes ayant atteint l'âge requis.

Cela ne veut pas dire que les enfants ne commettaient pas d'actes impudiques. Le jeu de iolo, où les fillettes s'essaient à la cuisine (et qui est toujours, comme probablement partout au monde, un de leurs amusements préférés (2), y donnaient souvent lieu. Des garçonnets s'y joignaient pour goûter les repas. Et, tout naturellement, on en venait à jouer plus ou moins « à mari et femme ». Souvent tout se limitait à des imitations innocentes. Mais, d'autres fois, ces scènes occasionnaient des attouchements et des exhibitions, soit entre compagnes, soit entre enfants de sexe différent. Actuellement, ce jeu est beaucoup plus dangereux, à cause du changement d'attitude de la jeunesse à l'égard des choses sexuelles.

(1) Ndole est le nom de la maladie qui est la punition d'une infraction de l'interdit sexuel, dans n'importe quelle circonstance. J'ai également entendu ces mêmes termes dans la bouche d'indigènes des environs de Coquilhatville.

(2) Certains garçons imitent ce jeu, pour s'habituer à préparer eux-mêmes leurs repas. Plus tard, ils pourront en tirer profit à plus d'une occasion.

De même le yembankongo, jeu dans lequel les garçons imitent les singes en se poursuivant dans les arbres et sur les lianes, pouvait donner — et donne — lieu à des scènes répréhensibles.

Autrefois, la plupart des jeunes filles étaient mariées avant la nubilité physique. Mais elles n'étaient pas molestées par leurs maris avant qu'elles aient atteint le développement normal.

Chez certaines personnes, cette crainte des relations était enracinée au point de persister même après l'âge limite et n'était vaincue que par des assauts réitérés de la passion. Ainsi est-il universellement connu des indigènes, que de jeunes femmes se réfugiaient chez leur mère lorsque leur mari voulait commencer à user de son droit d'époux. La mère tâchait de persuader à sa fille de se soumettre à la loi de la vie. Mais parfois, voyant son enfant par trop rébarbative, elle l'excusait auprès du mari et le priait d'avoir des égards pour sa jeunesse. Généralement, l'homme tenant aux bonnes relations avec sa belle-mère, n'insistait pas et se résignait à attendre l'action de la nature sur l'esprit et le cœur de son épouse.

La jeunesse ayant été éduquée dans cette crainte profonde des relations dangereuses, il ne saurait nous étonner que ce sentiment, devenu une véritable habitude, ne s'évanouisse pas spontanément au moment précis où une certaine liberté était octroyée. Ne peut-on pas, d'ailleurs, faire des constatations analogues en Europe ?

C'est ainsi que s'explique naturellement le degré assez louable de moralité que possédaient les adolescents à l'époque ancienne.

A présent, tout ceci a radicalement changé. La jeunesse suit l'inclination de ses passions. Plus le moindre frein n'en retient la fougue. Les parents ne se soucient plus que très médiocrement de la conduite de leurs enfants. Aussi ne faut-il pas se demander ce que vaut la moralité de la jeunesse moderne. Les maris ne savent plus respecter le corps de leurs épouses adolescentes, qui, d'ailleurs, depuis longtemps habituées à la vie sexuelle, y aspirent vivement et ne connaissent plus le sentiment de « la peur des hommes ». Comment, dès lors, s'étonner de cette effroyable baisse de la natalité (1) et de l'extension toujours croissante des maladies vénériennes, qui semblent n'avoir pas été connues autrefois ?

Les raisons de ce changement seront recherchées plus loin, sous la lettre C.

B. — Entre adultes. — Ici, les Nkundó sont d'une grande indulgence. Il y a pourtant une différence entre le point de vue juridico-social et le point de vue plutôt moral, qui est cependant influencé par le premier, comme nous allons le voir.

Juridiquement parlant, aussi longtemps qu'un début de paiement dotal n'a pas été fait, la femme est entièrement libre. Aucun homme ne possède sur elle un droit exclusif. D'où le proverbe : Mbímbo île nd'âns'ómbo ífa la nkôlô : les fruits du boimbo qui se trouvent sous l'arbre n'ont pas de propriétaire; ils appartiennent au premier qui les ramasse. Ainsi une jeune fille pour laquelle rien n'a été payé n'appartient à personne. Par ses relations sexuelles, une femme ainsi libre ne lèse le droit d'aucun homme. Ses licences ne sont donc pas sanctionnées.

En outre, aucun sentiment de honte ne s'attache à leur découverte. Tout au plus, certains parents, plus sérieux, gourmandent-ils leurs enfants qui exagèrent : les filles, parce qu'elles s'abîment le corps et diminuent leur valeur en vue d'un mariage futur (2), les garçons, parce qu'ils s'exposent à des difficultés financières (danger d'adultères, indemnité pour accouchement à issue mortelle, etc.).

---

(1) Autrefois, disent les indigènes, une jeune épouse ne tardait pas à devenir enceinte. Et maintenant...

(2) Non pas qu'une moindre dot sera versée pour elles. Mais un homme sérieux préférera ne pas prendre comme épouse une femme qui a beaucoup « couru », qui de ce fait est plus encline à l'adultère, à [illegible], et a moins de chances de devenir la mère d'une nombreuse progéniture.

L'opinion publique est plus indulgente encore que les parents. La chose se comprend aisément: les étrangers n'ont à redouter aucune conséquence fâcheuse. En cette matière, ils considèrent les fautes comme des faiblesses naturelles. A moins, toutefois, qu'elles n'arrivent trop fréquemment. Car l'opinion publique est sévère pour les personnes qui courent de l'un à l'autre et qui sont stigmatisées du nom de ebàbjá = inconstantes, légères, sans intelligence ni raisonnement, ou de ébóngá = même signification, mais plus forte.

Faut-il déduire de tout cela que toute femme libre s'adonne pleinement à la fornication ? D'après les considérations précédentes, nous pourrions conclure franchement par l'affirmative. Les faits qu'on peut observer journellement confirment cette réponse du tout au tout. Chez certains, les écarts sont plutôt accidentels. Mais chez beaucoup ils deviennent vite une habitude. Et de tous on peut dire qu'ils succombent à toute occasion favorable. Une exception rarissime qui peut se rencontrer et qui est due, soit à une anormalité constitutionnelle, soit à une conviction chrétienne extraordinairement ferme, ne saurait évidemment infirmer la règle. Dès lors, comment concilier avec ces constatations l'affirmation, si souvent entendue dans la bouche des indigènes, que, autrefois, avant la venue des Blancs, la situation était tout autre ? Il n'était pas rare de voir les jeunes femmes, non seulement s'abstenir des relations sexuelles, mais même avoir une telle « crainte de l'homme », qu'elles chassaient les séducteurs et qu'elles défendaient leur chasteté à coups de bâton.

Si la femme n'acceptait pas la proposition du jeune homme, elle la considérait comme une injure grave. Le provocateur n'avait aucun droit à une indemnité « pour coups et blessures ». La femme ne lui répondait pas autrement que par des violences en actes ou en paroles. Souvent elle allait insulter la mère du coupable. Celle-ci, s'étant fait exposer le motif de cette façon d'agir, ne pouvait s'en prendre qu'à son mécréant de fils, et d'ordinaire elle le semonçait vertement; et s'il était assez jeune, elle lui administrait une bonne rossée. La jeune fille avait donc plein droit de se défendre.

Si la provocation n'avait donné naissance à aucune complication sociale ou familiale, les parents s'en souciaient bien moins. Seulement, ils tâchaient d'inculquer à leurs enfants la réserve dans cette matière dangereuse, mais plutôt sous la forme de leçon après une faute, ou parfois à l'occasion d'un incident arrivé à autrui. Certains étaient d'une grande sévérité. Cette attitude reposait sur un vague sentiment de moralité, non pas déduit d'un raisonnement philosophique, ni d'idées religieuses ou superstitieuses, mais inné et, pour ainsi dire, instinctif. En outre, la crainte des excès et des conséquences sociales éventuelles y entrait sans doute aussi pour une bonne part. Car ce qu'ils redoutaient surtout, c'était l'exagération, un cas isolé étant plutôt considéré comme faiblesse passagère.

Pour nous former une idée exacte de la situation ancienne, nous ne devons pas perdre de vue que, de par les mariages précoces, le nombre de jeunes femmes célibataires était forcément restreint.

A l'égard des hommes célibataires, l'opinion était plus indulgente. A moins qu'il n'y ait eu de suites quelconques, et à part le danger de l'habitude, qui menait inévitablement à des palabres.

C. — Essai d'une explication des changements modernes. — Tant les faits actuels que la connaissance de la nature humaine, joints à l'attitude indulgente des parents et à l'absence de sanctions (ces deux derniers points seulement pour les relations entre adultes), s'opposent diamétralement à ces affirmations des indigènes. Ne faut-il donc pas les mettre sur le compte de l'exagération, du désir de glorification nationale et de blâme envers la situation engendrée par la colonisation ? Les indigènes, dont je cite les propos si étranges, sont âgés et sérieux; ils montrent toutes les qualités de témoins véridiques. Mais ne sont-ils pas — inconsciemment peut-être — des laudatores temporis acti? Je l'ai longtemps pensé, et me suis toujours refusé à attacher de la valeur à leurs dires. Cette question, je l'ai discutée et rediscutée, non avec l'un ou l'autre indigène, mais avec des dizaines de personnes parmi les plus sérieuses et sincères, et cela dans diverses circonstances et dans des régions fort distantes l'une de l'autre. Or, tous soutiennent la même thèse; et il m'a été impossible de faire prévaloir mon point de vue. Toujours je recevais la même réponse : « Vous autres, Blancs, ne voulez pas nous croire quand nous vous disons ce que nous savons pourtant mieux que vous et ce qui est la pure vérité. Vous êtes tellement enlisés dans votre manière de voir ! » Finalement, devant tant de témoignages formels, uniformes, constants, répétés à satiété dans des circonstances si variées de personnes, de temps et de lieu, on sent, quoique à regret, fléchir l'attachement à sa propre idée.

Mais comment résoudre l'antagonisme entre la liberté plus ou moins étendue et l'observation pratique de la chasteté? Et surtout, comment moins de cinquante ans ont-ils suffi pour transformer l'attitude virginale en dévergondage? La difficulté vaut pour les relations entre adultes, mais elle est particulièrement ardue à résoudre pour les rapports répréhensibles entre non-adultes, à cause de la terrible sanction que nous avons expliquée plus haut.

La première objection peut être résolue en partie, si nous tenons compte de l'habitude prise et conservée de la « crainte de l'homme », causée par la défense sévère des relations avant la maturité physique, et le terrible châtiment dont la transgression de cette prescription était menacée.

La seconde objection, par contre, est beaucoup plus sérieuse. C'est elle surtout qui m'a toujours retenu d'adhérer à la thèse indigène. Voici comment mes contradicteurs la réfutent : « Lorsque les premiers soldats noirs et leurs aides, archers et teneurs de javelots, étaient envoyés par les Blancs pour nous soumettre, ils commettaient toutes sortes de cruautés et se permettaient toutes les licences qui leur passaient par la tête. Entre autres choses, ils abusaient des jeunes filles, même non nubiles. Ils obligeaient à l'acte sexuel des impubères. Ils allaient même jusqu'à forcer des gens à l'inceste, à unir mère et fils, père et fille, le fusil braqué sur leurs poitrines (1).

Ces accusations sont tellement choquantes et répugnantes, qu'on se refuse à en admettre la véracité. Il est pourtant admissible qu'elles soient conformes à la réalité. D'une part, les témoins sont de toute confiance. De l'autre, les critères internes ne font pas défaut. En effet, des scènes pareilles semblent s'être passées dans les débuts de presque toute colonisation. Leurs auteurs étaient des indigènes d'autres régions plutôt que des Blancs (pour notre région, les Européens étaient presque partout absents des premières prises de contact entre les habitants et le nouveau pouvoir). De par la nature des choses, on peut-là s'attendre à tout. Car les occupations se faisaient sous le régime de la loi martiale. Et personne n'ignore que la guerre déchaîne la bête humaine, qui — l'histoire, même contemporaine, le prouve abondamment — est capable des pires et des plus répugnants excès.

On pourrait objecter contre tout ceci que, si les faits affirmés par les indigènes sont vrais, ils n'ont pourtant pas donné origine à la pratique de l'inceste et que, par conséquent, ils auraient tout aussi bien pu ne pas engendrer les changements profonds que nous constatons. Nous devons répondre que les deux cas sont nettement différents. Car la licence entre célibataires est plutôt conforme à l'inclination passionnelle de la nature humaine, qui n'était surtout retenue que par la crainte d'une sanction, terrible il est vrai, mais qui s'est montrée inexistante en fait, tandis que l'inceste est extrêmement répugnant de sa nature, spécialement pour les Nkundó. Ce vice ne provient que de croyances particulières ou d'une dégénérescence foncière de la sexualité.

(1) Il est encore de notoriété publique qu'on se faisait livrer des impubères par crainte des maladies vénériennes.

La rupture du cadre de l'organisation ancestrale peut, dans ce domaine comme dans beaucoup d'autres, fournir une explication partielle. Pour le cas des relations entre célibataires adultes, elle pourrait même être estimée suffisante. On peut en dire autant de la cupidité, de la vanité, du désir d'ostentation et de pompes, sentiments si naturels à la femme et qui ont été fortement excités par les richesses éblouissantes importées d'Europe. Mais à eux seuls ces faits ne suffisent pas à rendre compte de tout. Particulièrement pour ce qui regarde les changements considérables dans les relations entre impubères, ils restent complètement en défaut; et nous sommes ainsi obligé d'accepter l'explication donnée par les indigènes sérieux.

§ 5. Naissances extramatrimoniales.

Les naissances extramatrimoniales sont jugées par les Nkundó — depuis des temps immémoriaux — comme sans gravité et n'ayant donc pas ce caractère criminel que, d'après les ethnographes, elles revêtent chez beaucoup de peuples africains.

Cette attitude découle d'ailleurs logiquement de la liberté laissée aux adolescents, comme nous venons de l'exposer. Ni la femme, ni son amant ne sont importunés ni punis pour cet événement. Au contraire, l'enfant est reçu avec joie par les grands-parents. Il accroît le nombre, la puissance et la richesse du clan. Car un enfant illégitime [entombó (¹)] n'appartient pas au père naturel. Il est incorporé dans la famille de sa mère. On dit de lui qu'il est né sans père. Sa descendance constitue une famille à part dans le clan de ses aïeux maternels; elle est dénommée jwómoto, ou elóo éy'ɔ̧nankáná (c'est-à-dire descendance patrilinéale du fils de la sœur). Les familles ou clans qui ont cette origine ne sont pas excessivement rares dans cette région. On peut trouver même un village entier qui est né de cette façon. Ainsi, Mbelé des Bombwanja-Boéndé est elóo éy'ɔ̧nankáná de Lileko. Plus fort encore : la tribu des Injɔ̧lɔ̧ est la descendance de la sœur de Nsimba et Eanga, ancêtres respectifs des Ntómbá et des Bolɛ́ngé. Comme l'ancêtre masculin est inconnu on suppose que son origine est due à une conception extramatrimoniale de la mère et que le fils de celle-ci, Nkɔ́lɔ́bisé, n'avait pas de père. Il en est de même de la sous-tribu des Wesé bɔ̧nankáná de la sous-tribu aînée Engɔ́njɔ́, ainsi que de la sous-tribu Ngɔmbɛ̧, bɔ̧nankáná des Wesé.

Il serait pourtant contraire à la réalité de faire remonter l'origine de tous les clans « jwómoto » à un enfant naturel. En effet, d'autres causes peuvent avoir agi. Ainsi, il est connu de certains clans que leur ancêtre était né d'une union légitime, mais avant le versement total de la dot; puis un obstacle quelconque s'étant interposé, l'union a été rompue, et l'enfant était incorporé au clan maternel. L'obstacle à l'interruption du versement dotal peut être la désunion entre les fiancés ou leurs familles, tel le cas des Baséká Etáfɛ̧ngɛ̧la des Bakáala; mais surtout une guerre ou les pérégrinations des tribus à certaines époques de leur histoire. Cette dernière cause peut avoir séparé plus d'un mari de la femme pour laquelle, à la naissance de l'enfant, il n'avait effectué que le versement initial.

Le fait donc que maint clan « féminin » existe dans une région ne prouve pas que les relations coupables entre célibataires étaient communes autrefois, — surtout si l'on tient encore compte de ce que, jadis, les grossesses étaient bien plus fréquentes qu'à présent, — mais uniquement que des cas se présentaient.

L'enfant illégitime est considéré et traité par son grand-père maternel comme son propre enfant à lui. Aucune différence n'est faite entre lui et les enfants légitimes. On ne l'en méprise nullement. Il a son mot à dire dans les assemblées et délibérations familiales. Et comme dans la conception nkundó il est avec ses cousins germains dans la relation de père à fils, il a la préséance sur eux et peut devenir chef de famille après son grand-père et ses oncles. Au contraire, dans le clan de son père naturel il n'a rien à dire.

Lorsque quelqu'un verse la dot pour la jeune fille qu'il a rendue mère, il demande à son beau-père de lui laisser son enfant naturel. Presque toujours il est donné suite à son désir. Le beau-père comprend très bien le sentiment d'amour paternel qui anime son gendre et il juge très légitime et convenable que le père possède lui-même le fruit de sa propre chair. La seule condition posée est que le gendre augmente, à cause de cet enfant, la quantité des valeurs dotales, sous la forme d'un esclave supplémentaire ou de son équivalent (7).

Car il ne peut invoquer aucun droit strict. L'enfant ne lui appartient pas du fait de sa paternité physique, mais uniquement par la bienveillance de son beau-père. Si celui-ci veut le lui refuser, il ne manque pas à la justice. Seulement, cette façon d'agir serait considérée comme inhumaine envers le mari de sa fille et envers son petit-fils, et critiquée.

Adopté dans ces conditions par son père naturel, cet enfant n'est méprisé par personne pour sa naissance illégitime. Cette procédure peut donc être considérée comme une véritable légitimation.

(7) Cette opération transactionnelle peut même avoir lieu après la mort de la mère.

Actuellement, chez les Beloko et leurs Elíngá, on commence à « acheter » l'enfant, c'est-à-dire qu'un homme, n'épousant pas la femme qu'il a rendue mère, donne aux parents de celle-ci une certaine somme afin d'obtenir l'enfant. L'introduction de cette coutume ne semble pas rencontrer beaucoup d'opposition. Elle découle, d'ailleurs, d'un sentiment honorable de la paternité et de ses devoirs. Son seul inconvénient est pour l'enfant, qui ne pourra jamais faire valoir aucun droit dans le clan de sa mère (¹).

Si un étranger épouse une fille-mère, jamais on ne lui cède l'enfant, qui reste dans la famille de sa mère. Ceci marque nettement la différence avec les cas mentionnés jusqu'ici.

Ce qui arrive, c'est qu'une femme pareille, en se rendant chez son mari, apporte avec elle son enfant trop jeune pour rester chez ses grands-parents. Plus tard, le garçon, atteignant l'âge adulte, se fixe parfois dans le clan du mari de sa mère et procrée une descendance. Pourtant il est plus ou moins déconsidéré par le clan adoptant (et par les autres). Il n'y jouit d'aucun droit « politique », n'y a pas de « mpifo ». Sa descendance est nommée mbúsolá (de mbúsa = derrière, et bolá = clan d'origine) (²). Elle peut se marier avec le clan adoptant, sauf, évidemment, avec les descendants de la mère commune. Elle a également son propre cimetière. Elle forme donc un clan à part dans le village.

Les cas d'« apporter un enfant dans la bandoulière » semblent disparaître actuellement. Chacun tient trop à rester dans son propre clan. La politique gouvernementale fait perdre pratiquement tout droit aux indigènes qui ne résident pas dans leur propre famille. Puis, on peut trou-ver chez soi les moyens de se constituer un foyer bien plus facilement qu'autrefois. Car ce dernier souci était certainement pour beaucoup dans l'établissement d'un homme dans le clan du mari de sa mère.

(²) On dit aussi : « il a été apporté dans la bandoulière » [illegible] [illegible] ».

Il ressort clairement de ce qui précède que l'amant qui a rendu une jeune fille mère n'encourt aucun blâme, aucune pénalité, aucune amende. Il n'a pas le devoir de prendre soin, ni de la mère, ni de l'enfant. Il n'est pas obligé, soit en justice, soit par convenance, d'épouser la fille-mère. On n'exige de lui aucune indemnité.

Il n'y a qu'une exception : c'est lorsque la mère meurt des suites de la grossesse ou de l'accouchement, ou encore lorsque l'enfant vient au monde mort, débile, difforme, estropié. Dans ces cas, en effet, l'amant doit payer une forte indemnité (mbálaka) (1). C'est pourquoi, dès que la famille de la femme extramatrimonialement enceinte s'aperçoit de son état, elle la presse de confesser le nom de son complice. Celui-ci est rendu officiellement responsable et est obligé de reconnaître cette responsabilité en donnant publiquement un gage de sa volonté d'en assumer toutes les conséquences. Ce gage, comme tout gage, est nommé ndanga. Il consiste en un couteau, un anneau de cuivre ou de laiton, une lance, ou objets similaires (2).

ARTICLE V. — L'ACTE CONJUGAL.

Bien que cette matière soit extrêmement délicate pour l'investigation comme pour la description, il ne me semble pas dépourvu d'utilité de noter ici les quelques détails qui en sont venus à ma connaissance. Nous traiterons successivement de quelques circonstances de l'acte, puis du viol, enfin des actes dénommés incomplets.

---

(1) Pour l'enfant, l'indemnité atteint jusqu'à 50 anneaux; pour la mère 20 anneaux plus un esclave (ou son montant en espèces), ou 75 à 100 anneaux.

(2) La même coutume se pratique dans les cas d'une grossesse adultérine.

§ 1. Circonstances de l'acte.

Les Nkundó posent l'acte conjugal couchés sur le côté. A présent, les indigènes qui ont été en contacts fréquents avec les Blancs commencent à délaisser l'ancienne façon, pour adopter celle des Européens. L'esprit d'imitation joue probablement un rôle dans cette transformation naissante, mais aussi la connaissance qui s'infiltre peu à peu que ce système favorise les chances de conception.

Même pour les relations interdites, nos indigènes ne choisissent que rarement la forêt, une palmeraie ou bananeraie proches. D'ordinaire ils préfèrent une case isolée, ou profitent de l'absence de témoins qui pourraient les importuner. C'est que, de nuit, on a passablement peur de tout ce qui se meut en forêt.

Le Nkundó n'a de rapports que pendant les heures nocturnes. Leur pratique diurne provoquerait une maladie mortelle, nommée bombilé (de mbilé = midi, par extension : jour), et qui présente de fortes ressemblances avec la maladie du sommeil (1). Un des symptômes est l'affaiblissement des membres inférieurs. On cite des cas de personnes qui, n'ayant su résister à leur passion, ont été punis de cette façon. La femme seule, paraît-il, y laisse la vie. Dès que le fait est constaté par sa famille, la coupable dénonce son complice. Celui-ci est rendu responsable : il est obligé de payer une forte indemnité, qui peut monter à plusieurs dizaines d'anneaux de cuivre.

Comme dans beaucoup de matières, les Nkundó ont pourtant trouvé le moyen d'éviter le danger; il existe un antidote (nsengó): c'est l'eau = bási bale nsengó éà bombilé. Ainsi, ceux qui, de jour, ne parviennent pas à maîtriser leur passion surexcitée la satisfont dans un ruisseau peu profond.

La crainte du bombilé a été terriblement ébranlée par la colonisation. S'il faut en croire les indigènes, ici encore les soldats étrangers en portent la responsabilité. Leurs manières d'agir n'ont pourtant pas pu détruire complètement le sentiment ancien. Ceci est probablement dû à la honte naturelle, qui, pour des actes pareils, cherche l'obscurité et le secret.

(1) Ce n'est pas la maladie du sommeil, qui semble avoir été inconnue dans ces parages autrefois.

Après les rapports, la femme indigène fait d'ordinaire sa toilette intime. Elle agit ainsi par soin de propreté. Pourtant, il arrive souvent qu'elle n'attende pas assez longtemps, et de ce fait elle neutralise l'effet de l'acte. Ceci est surtout question d'insouciance. Toutefois, elle peut employer ce moyen pour empêcher la conception dans certaines circonstances (1).

D'après mes informateurs, certaines femmes présentent des anormalités constitutionnelles qui rebutent les hommes. Comme tout devient aisément public, ces défauts sont vite connus après le mariage, moins vite avant. D'ailleurs, l'amour peut passer — et souvent passe — outre. Mais après le refroidissement de la première ardeur, cette situation peut devenir un danger pour la stabilité de l'union. Dans les querelles un peu violentes les femmes se rappellent ces défauts, à la grande honte de la personne qui en souffre. Il en est de même de la faiblesse de certains hommes, qui, comme le défaut par excès, peut susciter des difficultés dans le ménage.

§ 3. Viol.

Le cas de viol, au sens propre du mot, c'est-à-dire l'abus d'une femme par l'emploi de la violence, est tout à fait exceptionnel chez les Nkundó. Si la femme ne consent pas, le séducteur en colère la laisse, tout en l'insultant souvent de son mieux. Je n'ai connaissance que d'un cas, déjà ancien, qui a provoqué une grande consternation dans la région. Il s'agit de Banángá, fille de Ilóko la Efekele, de Lofelí (Bongíli), mais qui, à cette époque, habitait son clan maternel Bọnyẹka (Bonkoso). Elle n'avait pas encore atteint la complète maturité physique (ses seins étaient encore très petits). Un jour, étant allée en forêt, elle ne revint pas le soir. La famille, ayant été alarmée, son père et son oncle Mpénda éà Nkọtọnkale partirent à sa recherche. Voyant des traces de sang encore fraîches, ils les suivent et trouvent le cadavre de Banángá enfoui dans les « nsusulu ». Elle était morte par hémorragie : ses organes, déchirés, portaient la marque indubitable du viol. On a bien eu des soupçons, mais l'identité du criminel n'a jamais pu être prouvée. Si l'on avait eu des preuves, il n'aurait pas échappé à la vengeance mortelle de la part des parents de l'infortunée victime.

(1) Cfr. chap. X, art. 1, § 2.

L'ensemble des données que j'ai pu réunir indiquent que d'autres cas ont sans aucun doute dû se présenter.

§ 3. Actes incomplets.

Nous traitons ici de ce que les moralistes appellent actus impudicitiae, c'est-à-dire des actes qui, de leur nature, conduisent physiquement à la délectation sexuelle.

Les attouchements obscènes entre personnes de sexe différent sont des préparatifs et des excitations; on y range même les attouchements sur les seins, le ventre, voire la prise par le bras.

Les baisers entre personnes de sexe différent sont inconnus. Les embrassements, au contraire, sont pratiqués, mais n'ont pas lieu en public, et l'on doit les considérer comme proche préparation (1). Une passion extraordinairement forte entraîne parfois les amants à des baisers plus intimes, généralement comme prélude aux rapports normaux. Si certains indigènes ne s'offusquent pas de ces pratiques, elles sont considérées comme inconvenantes par les gens plus sérieux.

ARTICLE VI. — VICES « CONTRA NATURAM ».

§ 1. Homosexualité masculine.

L'homosexualité est connue par les Nkundó depuis des temps immémoriaux, et cela tant par les hommes que par les femmes.

Chez les premiers elle prenait autrefois la forme de la sodomie, avec cette particularité, dont j'ignore l'explication, que le plus jeune seul était agent actif. A présent elle commence à prendre, chez la jeunesse, une autre forme, où les garçons qui s'y livrent se couchent dans la position de mari et femme. On rapporte que parfois l'un d'eux dit entre-temps à son complice : « C'est ainsi que je fais avec ta sœur ». Y aurait-il là un indice de ce que cette sorte d'homosexualité est uniquement dans l'acte, non dans le sentiment (in effectu, non in affectu, comme disent les moralistes) ?

L'homosexualité ne paraît pas provenir d'un goût spécial pour ce vice, mais avoir toujours été un pis-aller à la disposition de ceux qui ne trouvaient aucun dérivatif naturel pour leur passion. Quoique ni devant la raison, ni devant la foi nous ne puissions approuver cette dépravation de l'instinct, on doit avouer qu'elle était plus excusable chez ces populations où le régime social était défavorable à de nombreux jeunes gens. Actuellement, la sodomie est déjà beaucoup réduite, en raison de la plus grande facilité de se marier. Quant à la nouvelle forme d'homosexualité, on l'observe surtout dans les lieux où les hommes sont tenus strictement et longtemps à l'écart des relations avec l'autre sexe, comme des internats, prisons, etc.

§ 2. Homosexualité féminine.

Les jeunes filles jouent « mari et femme », et même des femmes adultes, mariées, s'adonnent à ce vice. D'après mes informateurs, les causes en sont : un amour intense et très intime entre les deux femmes, mais surtout la difficulté, pour des épouses de polygame, de satisfaire de la façon naturelle leur passion. Souvent elles s'y adonnent entre coépouses du même homme. La liberté plus grande introduite par la colonisation pourrait faire diminuer sa pratique. Mais jusqu'à présent on ne constate pas de grande amélioration. Qui plus est, dans les établissements où les jeunes filles sont tenues trop sévèrement à l'écart de l'autre sexe, on peut en voir augmenter la fréquence.

Le verbe employé pour désigner ces actes vicieux est yamáma = se tenir l'un contre l'autre. D'où le substantif bomámo. Mais ces mots servent également à désigner l'embrassement tout simple. Un autre terme plus spécifique est yaikya bonsángo; le verbe réciproque yaikya (forme simple : ikya) veut dire « se presser l'un sur l'autre ».

Est-il besoin de dire qu'un peuple naturaliste, comme les Nkundó, ne voit pas le moindre mal dans ce vice? Il serait donc souhaitable que les éducateurs et les missionnaires attirent l'attention de leurs pupilles sur la malice de pareilles pratiques.

§ 3. Masturbation.

Ce vice, que les Nkundó ne semblent jamais avoir pratiqué, est actuellement connu dans les centres importants et dans les camps, et de là pénètre peu à peu à l'intérieur. Pourtant, il ne semble se répandre que difficilement dans la société indigène. On comprend qu'un homme qui, dans un centre quelconque, en a contracté l'habitude, ne s'en défasse pas sans grande peine; mais comme l'indigène n'a pas la volonté corruptrice, il ne s'en fait pas le propagateur (*).

(*) Nonobstant les attouchements fréquents dus aux démangeaisons.

§ 4. Onanisme.

L'onanisme semble également inconnu. Sans doute, beaucoup de femmes ont, par leur concubinage avec des Européens, appris ce vice; mais elles ne l'ont pas répandu. Nous pouvons en dire autant des cas d'onanisme involontaire. C'est que l'indigène ne recherche pas les raffinements sensuels, mais se laisse plutôt aller à sa pente naturelle (*).

ARTICLE VII. — L'INCESTE.

Il nous faut distinguer ici : 1° les relations sexuelles entre membres de la parenté éloignée; 2° entre proches parents.

§ 1. Dans la parenté éloignée.

Dans la parenté éloignée (au sens nkundó du mot) l'inceste est connu depuis des temps immémoriaux. On l'appelle lonkána (chez les Bombwanja : bombakó). Lonkána dérive de nkána = frère, sœur. On dit aussi lóála j'ólálá = union sexuelle dans le village. Sont dénommées lonkána les relations entre membres de familles apparentées seulement de très loin (qui dans notre conception ne sont plus parents du tout), mais entre lesquels le mariage n'est pas permis. Ainsi on entend dire : tel et tel groupement ne se marient pas (bófóyakumbálá), mais ils commettent le lonkána. On pourrait considérer deux groupements pareils comme deux clans étroitement apparentés. Les groupements entre lesquels le lonkána est pratiqué possèdent chacun son propre cimetière, tandis que ceux entre lesquels il est absolument proscrit ont un cimetière commun. Ainsi, pour citer un exemple, le « village » d'Elángá l'Imǫmǫ l'Ǫntǫ́lę (Bongili) est, comme le nom d'ailleurs l'indique, composé de trois groupements. Le bloc des Imǫmǫ se trouve en partie dans le Sud de la chefferie (une autre partie est située en la chefferie alliée des Bombomba). Il en est de même de Bǫntǫ́lę. Avec Elękę (Lokongo), Elángá et Imǫmǫ forment la descendance du fils d'Ambá, sœur d'Iloko, Eángá et Bokongá, ce dernier étant l'ancêtre des Bǫntǫ́lę. Or, les trois groupements ne se marient pas entre eux. Elángá et Imǫmǫ ne permettent non plus des relations de lonkána, tandis qu'ils les pratiquent avec Bǫntǫ́lę. Notons que le terme de lonkána n'est jamais appliqué aux relations entre clans réellement distincts, c'est-à-dire entre entités exogamiques.

(*) La pratique décrite au chap. II, art. III, § 3, n° 3, est peut-être entachée d'onanisme; elle peut certainement y conduire, mais elle n'est pas causée par la perversité.

Pour fixer exactement jusqu'où peut s'étendre cette pratique, il faudrait examiner chaque groupement à part. Or, cela nous mènerait trop loin.

Il est encore à noter que le lonkána peut se limiter à un acte isolé, ou devenir un concubinage intermittent. La pratique ne change pas de nom lorsqu'il s'agit d'une femme mariée qui vient en visite dans sa famille. Pourtant, les sanctions contre l'adultère sont applicables à ces cas, comme à tout autre (1). Bien que les parents de la femme soient plus tolérants que pour les relations adultères avec un autre amant, le mari lésé dans ses droits ne fait, lui, aucune distinction.

Cette coutume du lonkána paraît assez étrange. En effet, si les relations sexuelles entre ces clans ne sont pas répréhensibles, pourquoi le mariage est-il défendu? Il y a là une contradiction apparente qui mérite l'attention. Ne faut-il pas y voir l'indication d'une tendance au relâchement de la loi de l'exogamie? Anciennement, toute relation sexuelle aurait été interdite entre membres des clans envisagés, phénomène bien naturel à l'origine des familles. Plus tard, des jeunes gens auraient succombé à la tentation et même peu à peu les infractions se seraient multipliées : c'est que, en raison de l'extension des clans, les tentations devenaient de plus en plus nombreuses, et la règle, détachée de son rapport naturel, puisqu'il s'agissait désormais d'une parenté extrêmement éloignée, paraissait aux intéressés plus ou moins arbitraire; elle n'était d'ailleurs soutenue par aucune sanction ni par aucune crainte (1); ainsi, le nombre même des fautes commises aurait petit à petit fait entrer la pratique dans les mœurs. Impuissants à réagir, les détenteurs du pouvoir, gardiens de la moralité ancestrale, se seraient contentés de canaliser le mouvement et de le limiter au minimum, en se montrant indulgents pour les relations libres, afin de sauver le principe de l'exogamie. Cette hypothèse explicative peut trouver une petite confirmation dans le fait que, déjà au début de la colonisation, alors que l'influence européenne était encore nulle, des cas, isolés et très rares, se présentaient de mariages contraires à la loi exogamique, entre membres de groupes apparentés seulement à un degré fort éloigné, mais qui pratiquaient déjà le lonkána. L'exception est ensuite devenue règle, et dorénavant les deux groupements en question se marient entre eux régulièrement et sans entraves, tandis que les autres familles sont restées soumises à l'ancienne loi. Ainsi le fait connu du village Boyela (Bakáala), qui comprend les groupes Bokamblé, Bembakó, Besúló et Bekólema (éteint), descendants de Ngọndẹ avec une femme, tandis que d'une autre épouse sont issus Lilęké et Likongo, auxquels est adjoint Bongilá, groupe allié (likilé). Ces deux groupes de familles ne peuvent pas se marier, mais s'adonnent au lonkána. Or, vers l'époque de la première arrivée des Blancs, un membre de la famille Bembakó, un certain Bonjúmbú, poussé par un amour excessif, enfreignit la loi exogamique en prenant comme épouse la femme Bolondó de Lilękę. L'amour ne se refroidissant pas et l'union se prouvant stable, le mariage fut reconnu et admis comme légitime. Depuis lors, les deux groupes en question sont devenus exogamiques.

(1) De fait, aucune sanction n'est prévue contre les mariages à l'intérieur d'une unité exogamique : tout se résume à l'opposition des parents et des vieux et à l'habitude quasi innée.

§ 2. Entre proches parents.

L'inceste entre proches parents ne porte pas de nom propre et spécial. Il n'a d'ailleurs jamais lieu pour des motifs passionnels. Il ne se rencontre qu'en relation avec des pratiques d'envoûtement et de sorcellerie (boté, pl. beté) dont il constitue le nsimbo, c'est-à-dire la condition sans laquelle ces beté resteraient inefficaces. Si le nsimbo n'est pas observé, le boté se retourne contre son possesseur et, par un effet à rebours (bosesengano), lui cause la mort. C'est ce qui fait que les intéressés se soumettent, malgré toutes les répugnances naturelles, à ces exigences dégradantes. D'après les cas, l'inceste est imposé avec la mère, la fille, la sœur. C'est la première éventualité qui répugne le plus à nos indigènes. Quoique tout à fait à contre-cœur, la mère se soumet à cette ignominie pour sauver la vie à son fils imprudent et cupide.

Le nsimbo d'inceste n'existe pas dans n'importe quel boté. Il paraît même avoir été absent des beté anciens et purement nkundó. On le trouve surtout dans les grands beté modernes, introduits d'autres peuplades ou inventés sur place depuis la colonisation (*).

ARTICLE VIII. — PHILTRES D'AMOUR.

Les Nkundó connaissent deux philtres d'amour : l'efóndé et le bontólá. D'autres beté modernes peuvent avoir partiellement ou subsidiairement le même effet. Ici, nous ne traitons que des deux premiers, qui sont des philtres d'amour « purs » et anciens.

---

(*) Cfr. [illegible], dans Congo, [illegible], I, p. [illegible].

Le philtre d'amour (bolé w'élangyé) sert tant pour gagner le cœur d'une jeune fille que pour débaucher à son mari une femme mariée.

§ 1. Efiondé.

L'efiondé (*) est le charme commun. N'importe qui peut se le procurer chez le fabricant, moyennant rétribution convenable, s'entend. Il existe diverses sortes d'efiondé d'après la diversité des ingrédients et du procédé de fabrication et, par suite, du mode d'emploi. Les ingrédients les plus usités sont certaines feuilles mêlées à du fard rouge (ngólá) et à une sorte de lichen qui forme des plaques rouges sur l'écorce de certaines essences forestières; le tout soigneusement empaqueté dans une petite fourrure (spécialement la peau du petit félide iyei).

On cache ce charme sous la traverse du lit où la désirée doit prendre son repos nocturne. De ce fait, son cœur concevra un amour ardent pour le possesseur du charme. Ou bien on le place quelque part dans une case; ensuite on y appelle la femme convoitée; on lui prend le bras, et immédiatement l'efiondé lui fait « tourner le cœur ». Ou encore le charme est, toujours à l'insu de la femme, jeté dans le feu où elle fait sa cuisine. Si, en revenant à son foyer, elle commence à éternuer, c'est le signe que la fumée, chargée des émanations mystérieuses du philtre, a pénétré par les narines jusqu'à son cœur et l'a remplie d'un amour ardent pour l'Adonis.

L'efiondé est considéré comme un ikfiko, c'est-à-dire un assujetissement. Efiondé ákfiko bámato = l'efiondé maîtrise, exerce le pouvoir sur les femmes.

L'interdit propre à l'efiondé est le bokai, sorte de légume

---

(*) Efiondé est souvent employé comme synonyme d'elangyé dans son sens sexuel.

aigre. Le possesseur du philtre doit s'en abstenir. Car les bekai causent des renvois de l'estomac, et de même la femme renverrait son amour et rendrait ainsi le boté inefficace.

§ 3. Bonálá.

Contrairement à l'efóndé, le bonálá n'est pas un philtre d'amour commun à tous, mais un charme réservé aux danseurs d'iyaya. Cela ne veut pas dire que tous les artistes de cette danse le possèdent, mais eux seuls le connaissent. Comme la masse des boté nkundó, la base matérielle du bonálá sont les feuilles de certaines plantes.

Le bonálá atteint son effet infailliblement. Il n'agit donc pas seulement sur la personne aimée, mais sur toute femme qui satisfait, involontairement ou de propos délibéré, à la condition d'efficacité : dès que la tête d'une femme touche le bras du possesseur du bonálá, son cœur tourne en sa faveur, et si elle est mariée, l'amour qu'elle porte à son époux se change en répugnance : elle l'abandonne pour rejoindre son charmeur.

TROISIÈME PARTIE

Recherche d'une épouse.

Quand un jeune homme en âge de se marier croit en avoir les moyens, il va à la recherche d'une épouse. Evidemment, il connaît nombre de jeunes filles et, généralement, il n'a aucune difficulté à en trouver une qui lui convienne. La fréquentation est toute simple : rencontres, visites, causettes, blagues, comme partout; mais aucun romantisme ni sentimentalisme; choses absolument inconnues de nos populations. Comme ils ont hâte d'arriver au terme de leurs relations, la vie conjugale, — ce que favorisent les us et coutumes, — il ne reste que peu de temps pour la poésie.

La fréquentation ne porte pas de terme propre et spécifique. On dit tout simplement sanja bómoto = causer à une femme, ou asa bómoto = chercher une femme. Celle qui en est l'objet est appelée bombóyá (ou, chez les Injóló, bosendá).

Les propositions du jeune homme sont d'abord adressées à la jeune fille : « ńdanga ákokolé (ákokamolélé) la wálí = je désire te prendre comme épouse ». Elle manifeste son accord en lui disant : « ńkolanga wę ng'ókó = je t'aime de même », ou plutôt : « elakó ó wę = comme tu veux »; « jói ó likę = c'est ton affaire », ou termes analogues (¹).

Les amants se font des cadeaux. La jeune fille donne de la nourriture que sa mère lui remet, ou qu'elle est parvenue à se procurer elle-même. De son côté, le jeune homme lui offre certains petits animaux de chasse (surtout le grand rat bolókoba, des limaciens du genre esíndá, etc.) ou des poissons. Ces présents ne portent pas de nom spécifique. De la part de l'homme, ils s'appellent simplement mpaló = cadeau envoyé; de la part de la femme boléma, usité pour tout don fait par une femme à son amant (cfr. aussi ch. VI, art. VII, § 2). Le verbe qui est employé avec ce substantif est lomba = faire briller, qui n'a avec lui aucun rapport étymologique.

Parfois les amoureux se donnent un gage mutuel et secret de leur volonté de se marier. Ce gage, appelé bondongé ou bonangé, consiste spécialement en un collier de perles bajondikonga (ou, plus rarement, bisangá ou bisangajila).

(¹) Notons que ces expressions ont, pour le Nkundo, une portée tout autre que celle du sens direct des mots. Elles expriment un réel accord et consentement explicite et personnel. Pour une femme, il est d'ailleurs malséant d'employer une expression plus directe.

Dans le choix de leurs épouses les hommes se laissent conduire par les divers motifs qui peuvent exercer une influence dans ce domaine : attraits physiques ou moraux; les richesses et le rang social n'entrent pour ainsi dire jamais en ligne de compte. La jeunesse est aisément entraînée par l'attrait physique et l'amour passionnel. Les hommes déjà plus rassis ou les jeunes gens plus sensés font plutôt attention aux qualités morales : conduite générale, soumission, bonté, mansuétude, et surtout activité, application soigneuse, etc. Bref, nous trouvons ici toute la gamme des variations individuelles qu'on rencontre ailleurs, hormis les mariages d'intérêt financier ou politique, et les motifs d'une haute élévation morale que peut susciter la religion chrétienne, comme le dévouement pur.

Après quelques jours de fréquentation, la jeune fille fait savoir à son courtisan que, s'il l'aime réellement, il serait temps d'arranger leur situation et que, par conséquent, il doit obtenir le consentement des parents. Entretemps, ils ont eu déjà plusieurs rapports intimes; il convient donc de ne pas retarder le moment des pourparlers officiels.

La recherche d'une épouse qui est déjà au pouvoir de mari ne diffère pas de ce que nous venons de décrire; seulement on doit user d'une grande circonspection, afin de ne pas éveiller les susceptibilités du mari. C'est surtout dans ce cas que se pratique la remise du gage secret dont nous avons parlé.

Après la consommation du divorce, la femme est assimilée à une jeune fille, puisqu'elle est libre.

La recherche comme future épouse d'une enfant non encore née ou en très bas âge aura sa place dans un chapitre spécial (ch. IV, art. 1).

CHAPITRE II.

ÉLABORATION DU CONTRAT MATRIMONIAL. — DOT.

L'élaboration du contrat matrimonial (*) se fait, dans les lignes principales, au moyen du versement de certaines valeurs par l'intermédiaires de témoins qualifiés (art. II). Elle débute par les fiançailles (art. III). Ensuite, nous exposerons les divers versements ultérieurs au père, walo (art. IV) et bonjngo (art. IX), et à la mère (art. V), ainsi que les cadeaux (art. VI). En outre, le droit nkundó impose même au clan de la femme le paiement de certaines valeurs (art. VII). Enfin, nous examinerons diverses règles et coutumes concernant la dot : son acceptation (art. VIII), [illegible] destination (art. X), pour terminer par quelques remarques générales (art. XI) et quelques considérations sur l'attitude adoptée à l'égard de la dot (art. XII).

ARTICLE I. — DÉBUTS DES POURPARLERS.

Comme nous l'avons vu à la fin du chapitre précédent, la période de la fréquentation n'est pas longue.

Le jeune homme ayant informé de ses projets ses propres parents, ceux-ci s'assurent que ce mariage mérite

---

(*) Cette terminologie doit être prise dans son sens large et non dans sa signification strictement juridique. Contrat matrimonial ne signifie donc pas ici ce qu'en droit européen on appelle le « contrat de mariage ». Ce chapitre traite des diverses phases par lesquelles passe chez les Nkundó la constitution de l'état conjugal et les pratiques qui s'y attachent. J'ai choisi ce titre afin de pouvoir y englober la multiplicité des éléments essentiels ou accessoires qui composent la genèse de l'union conjugale et des diverses circonstances qui l'accompagnent.

considération et qu'il n'existe pas d'empêchements ou de trop grandes difficultés qui pourraient plus tard causer la brouille.

Pour les pourparlers officiels, le prétendant, accompagné de son père (ou du remplaçant de celui-ci), se rend chez les parents de la choisie, qui s'informent du but de la visite, et ayant appris qu'un tel désire la main de leur fille, ils demandent : « Comment la veux-tu? » (1). — « Je la désire comme épouse. » Là-dessus ils lui disent de s'arranger pour faire le premier versement dotal. Les deux parties s'étant mises d'accord, les parents de la future concluent en disant : « Nous ne nous opposons pas, c'est votre affaire. »

Les formalités des pourparlers ne diffèrent pas, qu'il s'agisse d'une jeune fille libre ou d'une femme qui a déjà un mari. Seulement, dans ce dernier cas, aussi longtemps que le divorce n'a pas été consommé, on doit procéder avec une grande circonspection, pour éviter d'éveiller les susceptibilités de l'époux abandonné. En outre, les parents de la femme font savoir au futur et à sa famille le montant de la dot qu'ils devront apporter afin de pouvoir rembourser le premier mari (2).

Quant aux fiançailles avant la naissance ou dans la prime jeunesse, on y observe la même procédure, mais adaptée aux circonstances spéciales du cas que nous expliquerons en détail dans le chapitre IV.

Après ces débuts des pourparlers, le père du prétendant prépare le premier versement dotal, qu'il va, accompagné de son fils et du ndonga, remettre à la famille de la future épouse. Expliquons d'abord ce qu'est le ndonga.

(1) C'est-à-dire comme épouse légitime; ou, as-tu l'intention de cohabiter seulement pendant un certain temps? De cette façon, les parents de la future s'assurent de la volonté sérieuse du prétendant de contracter un mariage en règle.

(2) Cfr. chap. VIII, art. II et III.

ARTICLE II. — LE NDONGA.

Le ndonga est le gardien-conservateur du mariage choisi par les parties et dont l'intervention comme intermédiaire, témoin, conciliateur ou arbitre est obligatoire à chacune des phases de l'union. C'est un personnage officiel en ce sens qu'il tient son autorité de la loi même qui régit le mariage dans la société nkundó.

Tout d'abord, le ndonga est l'intermédiaire absolument indispensable dans le versement de la dot. Sans lui, pas de mariage légitime : Nkó ndonga ótóka baómbá ó lonkubó, bóna ale ó bondo = Sans ndonga tu jettes tes valeurs en pure perte, et ta fille n'est qu'une esclave, c'est-à-dire elle n'est pas épouse. En droit lui seul a qualité pour témoigner.

L'importance que les indigènes attachent à l'intervention du ndonga ressort dans la vie courante à tout instant. Ainsi, qu'une femme ait été battue par son mari, on peut entendre sa famille dire : « Notre fille (sœur) n'est pas une esclave; elle a été payée par l'intermédiaire d'un ndonga : bón'ókisó éfa bokwála, bótóngáki é la ndonga. » Ou elle-même ripostera de cette façon, mutatis mutandis, à son mari, ou à la famille de celui-ci, quand, à son avis, on ne la traite pas convenablement.

Cette nécessité absolue de l'intervention d'un ndonga qualifié n'est relevée que très rarement par les Européens de l'Administration coloniale. On dirait qu'ils ignorent son importance, pourtant capitale.

Pour être capable de servir de ndonga d'un mariage déterminé, il faut être apparenté à la fois aux deux futurs époux, ou, comme on dit en lonkundo, être mbóléranó. Actuellement, comme, à cause des pérégrinations des indigènes, les ndonga possédant ces qualités sont rares dans les centres, et souvent complètement introuvables, force a été d'adapter à ces circonstances la loi ancestrale. De là s'est introduite l'évolution qui consiste à prendre comme ndonga, dans ces circonstances critiques, un homme reconnu généralement comme intègre, ayant toutes les raisons d'être impartial et intéressé à la stabilité du mariage. Ainsi trouve-t-on souvent des catéchistes en chef qui en assument les fonctions et les responsabilités.

Jadis, et à l'intérieur encore maintenant, lorsque deux jeunes gens s'aiment, mais qu'il ne se trouve personne qui réunisse les qualités requises pour l'exercice de la fonction de ndonga, les parents du jeune homme s'opposent au mariage : Bifímɛ́jɛ́ lúála linko, bifa l'ôkofɛ́ndɛ́jɛ́ bakómbé = nous ne voulons pas de ce mariage; il n'y a personne pour transmettre les valeurs ». Dans les circonstances ordinaires, pareille éventualité est pratiquement inexistante.

Il appartient au mari de choisir le ndonga, qui ensuite est agréé par la femme et ses parents. Si ceux-ci font opposition, le mari le remplace par un autre. Quoique autrefois ce cas ne se présentait guère, pourtant, dans les conditions présentes, on peut le rencontrer.

Une femme peut être ndonga aussi bien qu'un homme.

Les fonctions sont héréditaires. Au décès du ndonga, son fils, sa fille, son frère, même sa femme, si elle reste dans le clan de son mari défunt, lui succèdent dans ses devoirs et droits.

De même, en son absence, ou s'il est empêché, il peut être remplacé par eux. Ainsi, par exemple :

Yoka est un ndonga qualifié pour le mariage d'Ekolo et Nsongé. Mais comme il est encore trop jeune pour en exercer les fonctions, son père Bomangá peut en tout droit le remplacer entre-temps.

Pour le même mariage il peut y avoir plusieurs ndonga. Tous doivent remplir les conditions requises et ont les mêmes devoirs et droits. Il n'est pourtant pas nécessaire qu'ils soient tous présents à chaque intervention requise par le droit : un seul, et n'importe lequel suffit. Leurs témoignages se valent en théorie. Pourtant le premier désigné est connu comme ndonga éé nkina, ou ndonga principal. S'il est possible de découvrir deux [illegible], on doit les prendre tous deux comme ndonga; sinon on peut se contenter du seul individu trouvable.

Pour ses services, le ndonga a droit à une rémunération de la part de chacune des parties contractantes.

Au versement du ndonga (cfr. plus loin) la famille de la femme lui donne un bokómba [illegible], une poule ou un poisson bolóóa. C'est un présent qui porte le nom générique de liónja (verbe bonjola). Toutefois, il est obligatoire.

De même, lors du paiement du walo, avant toute autre chose, la famille de la femme lui présente des vivres d'origine animale (bofambo), particulièrement un bokómba, une poule ou un bolóóa, plus des bananes, le tout désigné par le terme général de bokómba l'osanda (*).

Enfin, après le versement du walo, la famille du mari lui remet deux anneaux de cuivre, et la famille de la femme en fait autant. Si le montant de la dot est très élevé, on va même jusqu'à cinq anneaux. Cette dernière rémunération s'appelle bompángá. Le sens propre de ce mot est un animal domestique (chien ou chèvre) donné en paiement. Actuellement on donne sa contre-valeur en anneaux de cuivre (longa, pl. balonga); mais le nom ancien est resté.

(*) Bosanda est une espèce de bananes, mais on donne n'importe quelle sorte. D'où, à présent, on commence à parler aussi de bokómba la [illegible] (ou [illegible]). On ajoute : [illegible] (poule et bananes).

Pour toutes ces rémunérations on emploie le terme générique : lémbela ndonga = préparer pour le ndonga, et le substantif : balémbo (sing. ilémbo), comme s'il s'agissait d'aliments. Cela concorde bien avec le bolémba et les bananes, etc., mais est tout de même usité pour les cuivres. Nous trouvons-nous devant une extension de la signification? Ou faudrait-il conclure qu'au temps jadis la rémunération en question consistait uniquement en vivres?

S'il y a plusieurs ndonga, leur rémunération n'en est point augmentée; elle est unique, et ils n'ont qu'à se la partager.

Dans la pratique assistent encore au paiement de la dot les chefs de clan ou de famille, hommes influents qui ont pouvoir de juger les différends. Ils réclament au ndonga leur part de la rémunération. Selon le dicton, — en langage archaïque, — bolé wä ndonga nd'é dombé = la force (littéralement la médecine) du ndonga réside chez les juges. Ce n'est pas parce que les juges comme tels ont droit ou pouvoir d'intervenir dans les palabres matrimoniales. Mais ils sont autant de témoins supplémentaires. Le jour où surgira un différend à propos de la dot, spécialement à l'occasion du divorce, le ndonga pourra les convoquer pour l'aider à rafraîchir sa mémoire et ainsi lui éviter des embarras. Car il peut très bien se faire qu'après plusieurs années le témoin officiel n'a plus qu'une souvenance approximative et vague des valeurs versées. Si les juges ne reçoivent rien, ils se récuseront au moment critique. Il est donc de politique intelligente d'acquiescer à leur désir, quoique, à strictement parler, ils ne puissent invoquer aucun droit véritable.

Actuellement, le Gouvernement colonial, ayant constitué des chefferies et nommé des chefs, ceux-ci se sont vu attribuer le droit d'intervenir d'office comme ndonga dans les affaires matrimoniales; ou du moins ont-ils profité des pouvoirs leur concédés pour ce faire. Généralement, ils convoquent en même temps les juges de la chefferie et l'affaire est inscrite tant bien que mal dans le registre des jugements. L'assistance du chef comme témoin peut avoir de la valeur, puisqu'il ajoute son témoignage et que le montant dotal est inscrit. Mais, d'autre part, elle a l'inconvénient d'introduire le chef dans des affaires qui, somme toute, ne le regardent point. Sans parler des cas où lui-même ou des parents à lui sont intéressés dans la palabre. S'il se contentait d'être témoin passif et d'inscrire l'acte des transactions, la chose serait parfaite.

Etymologiquement, il est probable que le mot ndonge dérive du radical verbal : long, intrans. longam = être en règle, être arrangé; trans. longy = arranger, rendre comme il faut. Outre le mot ndonga, employé à l'Ouest de la Loilaka, nous trouvons chez les Boángi et les Boíyá (comme chez les Elángá) : bokólo, et chez les Injɔ́lɔ́ : nkombi. Ce dernier mot pourrait être le même que son homonyme, signifiant espion, du verbe kombe, espionner; le premier est peut-être une extension du sens du mot bokólo = engagement (*).

ARTICLE III. — LES FIANÇAILLES.

§ 1. Versement de l'ikulá.

Les fiançailles débutent par le premier versement d'une valeur dotale, qui anciennement était une flèche, et, de là, s'appelle likulá ou ikulá. Si le prétendant était très riche, il donnait parfois un couteau ingóndá ou même empótę. Un plus pauvre pouvait se contenter d'un simple manche de flèche (bompako). A présent on donne un ou deux anneaux de cuivre. Mais le nom primitif de ce paiement a toujours été conservé.

S'étant rendus chez le père de la future, le prétendant, son père (ou le remplaçant), le (les) ndonga, et souvent d'autres parents encore, s'asseyent d'un côté du loánjá (cour devant l'habitation), après l'échange des marques usuelles de politesse. La jeune fille et les représentants de sa parenté s'asseyent du côté opposé. Comme dans toute affaire qu'un Nkundó a à arranger, l'hôte commence par s'informer du motif de la visite. Le père du jeune homme répond : « Nous venons demander ta fille pour mon fils. » — « Comment la demandez-vous? » — « Nous la demandons en mariage. » De ces pourparlers préliminaires on dit simplement : ésama nsango = se demander réciproquement des nouvelles.

Ensuite le père de la jeune fille questionne : « Qui va transmettre la linkɔ (banane) ou le bonyáku (banane encore imparfaitement mûre), c'est-à-dire les cadeaux? ». Par cette expression figurée, il s'enquiert de la personne proposée comme ndonga. Le père du jeune homme lui répond : un tel et un tel. Ceux-ci ayant été agréés, le père de la fiancée fait apporter des bananes, du poisson fumé, parfois des poules, que le témoin transmet au groupe du futur.

Après l'acceptation des présents, le ndonga fixe la flèche en terre, devant les parents de la femme. D'où la locution, toujours très en vogue, de -sanya ikulá, ou -bakya likulá = planter la flèche; quoique, à présent, le ndonga dépose les anneaux.

§ 6. Consentement.

Invitée par ses parents ou par le ndonga, ou bien de sa propre initiative, — selon les dispositions personnelles, — la jeune fille arrache la flèche, ou ramasse les anneaux, et les remet à son père. C'est la façon d'exprimer son consentement aux fiançailles proposées.

Par sa promptitude ou sa nonchalance, voire la manière récalcitrante dont elle exécute ce geste, elle manifeste les sentiments qui l'animent. En règle générale elle agit vivement. Comme nous l'avons expliqué, l'union a été préparée depuis quelque temps déjà, et la jeune fille nkundó se glorifie d'être l'objet de l'amour d'un homme et d'avoir un mari. Pourtant, il se présente des cas où la fille, surtout si elle est encore jeune, se fait presser avant de se décider. C'est qu'intérieurement elle n'est pas enthousiaste de ce mariage. Mais, finalement, elle s'incline devant le désir paternel, préférant une union contre son gré que s'exposer à des tracasseries plus ou moins graves de la part de sa famille.

Il est évident qu'ici nous rencontrons toute l'échelle des variations d'après les tempéraments individuels et les circonstances. Un refus catégorique doit certainement être très rare. Ce serait le fait d'une femme particulièrement énergique. Mais celle-ci se serait retirée depuis longtemps déjà, sans laisser les choses arriver à cette extrémité.

Plus fréquent est le cas d'une femme qui se soumet à la cérémonie en regimbant et à contre-cœur. Non seulement faut-il insister et la presser, mais sa mine renfrognée exprime son mécontentement. Elle prend les objets d'un geste apathique, tourne le dos à son père et laisse tomber les valeurs par derrière, sans même le regarder. Personne dans l'assistance ne se trompe sur la portée de ces gestes. Aussi les membres de la famille et les notables présents ne manquent-ils pas d'attirer l'attention du père sur la gravité de la situation. Ils tâchent de le faire changer d'avis et de le dissuader d'accepter la dot. A cette fin ils lui mettent sous les yeux les conséquences de son obstination : à la première occasion favorable, la femme prendra la fuite; d'où palabres (et autrefois guerre, souvent), emprisonnement, tracas divers et finalement restitution de la dot pour divorce. Parfois ils réussissent; d'autres fois toute la sagesse et toute l'éloquence restent vaines : la cupidité, la nécessité d'obtenir les moyens pour payer la dot pour une épouse (personnelle ou destinée à un fils, frère, etc.) et le profit qu'il escompte de l'alliance imposent silence à tous les autres sentiments. Ici encore, tout dépend des dispositions individuelles. Actuellement, l'extension de la liberté par la colonisation rend les cas moins fréquents. Pour les raisons indiquées, ils se produisent pourtant encore. Mais le plus souvent, la cérémonie se déroule de façon normale. Aussi longtemps qu'elle n'a pas eu lieu, le versement de la dot ne continue point. C'est assez indiquer l'importance que le droit nkundó y attache, et combien ce droit tient à l'expression publique et officielle, bien que non exprimée par paroles, mais seulement impliquée dans un acte spécial et significatif, du consentement de la femme au mariage proposé. Les faits contraires sont de pures infractions.

Dans les cas normaux, le père accepte la flèche ou les anneaux des mains de sa fille, et ainsi établit son consentement aux fiançailles et, par conséquent, au mariage.

L'expression du consentement diffère entièrement de ce que nous venons de décrire dans les autres formes de mariage que nous étudierons plus loin (chap. III et IV).

§ 4. Fuite.

Même avant l'arrivée des Européens il se présentait des cas où deux amants persistaient, malgré l'opposition des parents de la femme, à vouloir se marier. Les parents refusant d'accepter l'ikulá, les fiancés arrangeaient une occasion favorable pour fuir. La femme tâchait de gagner à sa cause son frère, qui par amour fraternel acceptait d'ordinaire la flèche des mains du solonga. Ou bien celui-ci la fixait en cachette dans le toit de la maison des parents de la femme en fuite. Plus tard, l'union de leur fille tenant bien et le gendre les ayant amadoués par sa bonne conduite à leur égard (cadeaux, manifestations de respect, etc.), ils ne refusaient plus leur consentement. Ensuite les versements continuaient de façon normale.

§ 4. Départ de la fiancée

Par le fait du versement de l'íkulá, la femme est liée, au moins partiellement, à son mari (bómé). C'est l'application de l'axiome déjà cité au chapitre précédent, IIe partie, art. III, § 2, B : « Les fruits du boímbo qui se trouvent encore sous l'arbre n'appartiennent à personne. » Tant qu'une jeune fille est chez ses parents elle n'est liée à aucun homme. Mais dès que quelqu'un a versé l'íkulá, elle est « ramassée » et appartient à un mari.

Aussi quitte-t-elle ses parents pour suivre son mari (¹), soit immédiatement, soit après quelques jours. Le père peut, en effet, congédier son gendre et promettre de lui conduire sa fille, personnellement, ou en déléguant quelqu'un. Entre-temps, il réunit quelques petites provisions. Lorsque la fiancée arrive chez son futur, ce sont des acclamations de joie chez tous les habitants du village, accourus aux premiers cris : « bompáka wá Sóngólé abyá : la fiancée de X... est arrivée ».

Ce n'est qu'à partir de cet instant que ce terme de bompáka est employé (²). N'est-ce pas par le versement de l'íkulá que la femme devient bompáka? Je l'avais toujours compris ainsi. Et ce me semblait logique. Mais dans une discussion sur ce sujet, mes contradicteurs indigènes me mirent en tort sur toute la ligne. Pas moyen de leur faire admettre que si une femme est nommée bompáka à son arrivée dans le clan de son fiancé, c'est qu'elle l'était devenue effectivement de par le versement officiel de l'íkulá et qu'il s'agit uniquement d'une façon de parler. « Non, disent-ils, tant que la femme n'a pas rejoint son mari elle n'est pas bompáka. » — « Mais, enfin, il n'y a

(²) Ce mot signifie aussi [illegible]. Les fiancés disent [illegible] ou [illegible].

qu'une différence tout accidentelle : de toute façon, la chose essentielle est le versement de l'ikulá. » — « Il est vrai que la femme appartient à l'époux dès le paiement de l'ikulá, mais pourtant elle ne porte pas encore le nom de bompáka. Elle ne le reçoit que lorsqu'elle quitte ses parents et se rend chez son mari. » — « Mais pourquoi cela? » — « Parce que, sinon, le fiancé s'exposerait à la risée et à la moquerie. Supposons qu'après l'ikulá il rentre chez lui, seul. Sa future le rejoindra dans quelques jours. Il annonce la grande nouvelle à ses amis. Puis, le jour fixé, la promise ne paraît point. Quelle honte! Au contraire, si la chose est gardée secrète jusqu'au moment où il n'y a plus de changement à craindre, il n'y a que des cris d'allégresse. »

D'autre part, il est utile de rapprocher de ces données ce fait incontestable que le seul paiement de la dot réalise très rarement, dans les lois et coutumes des différentes peuplades congolaises, le mariage; il s'y ajoute presque toujours une autre cérémonie, qui est, dans la majorité des cas, la tradition de la femme. Ces données nous inclinent à considérer l'explication des Nkundó comme une explication de convenance, qui indique l'intérêt pratique de la règle, mais ne la justifie pas. En effet, elle ne rend pas compte de la raison pour laquelle la femme ne devient pas bompáka dès le paiement de fiançailles. D'autre part, il est indéniable qu'elle ne reçoit ce nom qu'à partir du moment où elle arrive chez son époux. Il est possible que les indigènes aient oublié ou perdent de vue la raison profonde de ce phénomène. L'explication qui concorde le mieux avec les faits positifs est que l'élément essentiel des fiançailles ne consiste pas dans le paiement de l'ikulá, mais dans l'acte par lequel la femme quitte sa famille et rejoint son fiancé (*).

(*) Je remercie vivement M. le Procureur Général A. Sohier d'avoir attiré mon attention sur la comparaison avec le droit et la pratique d'autres peuplades congolaises et de m'avoir fait approfondir la base juridique de cette question.

§ 5. Arrivée de la fiancée chez son mari.

Comme je l'ai dit, elle est accueillie dans le clan de son mari par les acclamations universelles de la population enthousiaste.

D'après les cas, le futur la reçoit et l'introduit chez lui ou chez ses parents. Ceux-ci, attendant son arrivée, sont réunis avec leurs filles, sœurs, et diverses parentes et alliées. Le fiancé leur présente sa choisie. On la salue de la façon usuelle : « w'ôm; otikila; osyá; otéfoswa, etc. », selon le degré de leur intimité antérieure.

Ensuite on procède à la tradition de cadeaux à la fiancée. D'abord les beaux-parents lui offrent un présent de bienvenue, dénommé bosambelo, qui, littéralement, se traduit par : « poignée de mains » et qui consiste en un anneau ou un couteau. Puis ils lui donnent la main (1). A leur suite, tous les parents et alliés doivent en faire de même. Généralement les hommes remettent un anneau et les femmes un couteau. Ces objets sont considérés comme parties de la dot et la femme les envoie à sa famille. Les parents plus éloignés satisfont à leur devoir en apportant de la viande ou du poisson et actuellement aussi de l'argent ou quelque menu cadeau, qui n'est pas englobé dans la dot.

De son côté, le mari lui offre en présent un petit couteau, quelques (5) flèches (aux temps de l'État Indépendant un faisceau de nsapo = mitako = fils de cuivre, et à présent, par exemple, 5 ou 10 fr.). Ces présents du mari ne sont pas bosambelo, car il ne donne pas la main à sa fiancée, mais yêkola (salutation), et ne font pas partie de la dot. Ils peuvent être envoyés par la femme à ses parents.

Si le mari n'a pas encore de maison ni de cultures propres, — cas qui était très fréquent autrefois — (1), les fiancés habitent provisoirement dans la case des parents, et la femme va chercher la nourriture aux champs de sa belle-mère et la prépare au foyer de celle-ci, jusqu'à ce que le jeune homme ait construit sa case et établi ses cultures à lui.

(1) Les Nkundó se donnent la main en signe d'amitié. C'est une sorte de salutation. Ils ne se [illegible] pas la main comme les Européens, mais posent doucement l'une sur l'autre, puis la retirent en frottant légèrement.

Actuellement il n'arrive plus qu'un jeune homme qui veut prendre femme n'ait pas encore sa propre maison. Dès l'époque de la puberté le désir de la liberté pousse les jeunes gens à abandonner le toit paternel et à se construire leur case personnelle, où ils peuvent habiter seuls, ou avec l'un ou l'autre compagnon, et jouir de la liberté.

§ 6. Vie des fiancés.

La bompáka habite chez son mari, y va causer et dormir avec lui. Les trois ou quatre premières journées elle ne travaille pas, à moins qu'elle ne soit d'une nature très active. Dans la suite elle s'occupe de tous les travaux du ménage, prépare le repas au foyer et sous la surveillance de sa belle-mère. Ce n'est qu'après quelques semaines, lorsqu'elle s'est habituée à son nouveau genre de vie et qu'elle s'est initiée aux usages de sa nouvelle famille, qu'elle a ses propres installations. Dès cet instant elle habite définitivement chez son fiancé.

De chez ses parents elle est venue les mains vides, sans ustensiles quelconques. Elle trouve tout dans sa nouvelle résidence. Ses belle-mère, belles-sœurs lui donnent ce dont elle a besoin : paniers, pots, calebasses, nattes, mortiers, pilons, poules même.

Il appert de tout ce qui précède qu'il n'y a ni rites, ni cérémonies spéciales, ni accoutrements propres.

La bompáka est déjà considérée comme épouse; elle en à tous les droits et devoirs : cohabitation, soins du ménage, etc. Tout ce qu'elle produit, tout ce qu'elle gagne appartient à son mari. Sa famille à elle n'a plus aucun droit sur les fruits de son activité. Si après le versement de l'ikulá et avant tout paiement ultérieur le mari découvre des relations de sa fiancée avec un autre homme, celui-ci est considéré comme adultère et devient passible des sanctions qui répriment cette infraction. L'indemnité à payer est d'autant plus forte que la femme est plus âgée, et monte de cinq à dix anneaux (cf. chap. VI, art. VIII).

---

(1) Il n'y avait pratiquement que les orphelins qui avaient leurs maisons et cultures propres. Nous excluons évidemment des hommes déjà mariés précédemment.

En concordance logique avec ce qui précède, le fiancé ne porte pas de nom spécifique. Puisque de fait il est mari, on le nomme ainsi (bóme).

Pendant cette période, les fiancés apprennent à se connaître physiquement et moralement (relations sexuelles, travail, tempérament, qualités, défauts). On l'exprime par la locution figurée : bakóngola mpoké — ils essaient le pot, dont voici l'explication : avant d'employer un pot (mpoké) nouveau, on le pose sur l'étagère au-dessus du feu et le laisse là durant quelques jours, afin qu'il durcisse et devienne résistant à la chaleur. S'il se fêle, c'est qu'il ne convient pas à la préparation des aliments; sinon on peut y bouillir sans crainte. C'est ce qu'on nomme : ikóngola mpoké. De là ce terme est transféré à la période d'essai des nouveaux mariés. C'est donc une sorte de noviciat, et le terme français qui peut traduire avec la meilleure approximation possible cette situation est bien « fiançailles, fiancés ».

Cette première période peut durer plusieurs mois. Entretemps le mari cherche les valeurs nécessaires au versement du ndanga.

§ 9. Le ndanga.

Le ndanga pour le mariage était originairement le paiement d'un couteau (d'où l'on entend encore le nommer :

ifakó = couteau), remplacé ensuite par 2 à 5 anneaux de cuivre, et maintenant par 5 à 10 et davantage.

Actuellement, ikulá et ndanga tendent à se fondre, étant devenus tous deux un paiement d'anneaux, et ils sont fréquemment donnés conjointement et en même temps, sans les distinguer.

Dans les grandes lignes, la remise du ndanga suit la même marche que le versement de l'ikulá. Elle se fait seulement avec plus de solennité. Le jeune homme et son père (ou le remplaçant de celui-ci), accompagnés du ndonga et souvent de quelques proches — en premier lieu la mère, — se rendent chez les parents de la fiancée, qui les reçoivent avec les marques usuelles de politesse et d'affection. Ils s'asseyent d'un côté du loánjá, la famille de la femme se plaçant au côté opposé. Tout d'abord, ceux-ci demandent des nouvelles, c'est-à-dire s'informent du but de la visite. Le père du jeune homme répond : « nous sommes venus verser le ndanga = toóy'ókákya ndanga (ou ifakó), ce qui, littéralement, signifie : nous sommes venus accrocher le ndanga (ou le couteau). Ensuite le beau-père donne au ndonga un cadeau de bienvenue (lionja). C'est un bokómba fumé, ou un ou deux poissons bolía, ou une poule; on y ajoute un régime de bananes.

Le fiancé et sa famille reçoivent, par exemple, une chèvre, un chien, quelques poules, qui sont considérés comme faisant partie du nkomí (cfr. plus loin, art. VII), et de la viande, du poisson fumé, quelques régimes de bananes, dont il disposera avec sa femme et sa famille, et qui ne sont pas considérés comme partie du nkomí, mais constituent un simple cadeau.

Ensuite on procède à la remise des valeurs du ndanga, qui se fait obligatoirement par l'intermédiaire du ndonga, qui a dû également transmettre les cadeaux, etc. Il n'est pas requis que la fiancée intervienne ici, ni même qu'elle soit présente.

Il arrive que lors du versement du ndanga on réclame déjà les cadeaux = beéngo, qui, en théorie, ne devraient être demandés qu'à l'occasion du paiement suivant (cfr. plus loin, art. VI). Parfois le mari satisfait à ces exigences. D'autres fois il se contente de donner un gage (wẹ̀kọ). Il pourrait également débouter les parents cupides. Mais comme il tient trop à la femme, il répond sans murmures à leurs désirs.

Quel est le but et la signification du ndanga? Les indigènes répondent : on donne le ndanga, afin que la fille ne se brûle au feu = bọ̀n'ókisó áfóy'ólongola tsá. » C'est un signe que le fiancé assume la responsabilité de tout accident (représenté par le terme général de brûlure) qui pourrait arriver à la fiancée. Dans les mains de la femme et de sa famille, il constitue une preuve publique et officielle contre le mari (1). Conséquemment, c'est aussi une garantie pour eux de ce que le mari prendra soin de leur enfant et la traitera convenablement.

Mais, alors, quelle est la raison d'être de l'ikulá ? Les Nkundó répondent : « L'ikulá constitue une preuve, un signe de ce que la femme appartient à un tel. »

Pratiquement, il n'y a donc guère de différence entre les motifs des deux versements. De fait, leurs conséquences sont identiques, tant pour ce qui est des devoirs et droits des fiancés, que pour ce qui regarde l'indemnité à payer le cas échéant.

Ainsi, si une femme s'enfuit avec son amant sans que celui-ci ait donné l'ikulá, et qu'il lui arrive quelque accident, la famille ne peut rien réclamer, car elle ne sait rien prouver. Autrefois ce cas était hypothétique; actuellement on peut le rencontrer, mais dans les milieux indigènes il reste tout à fait exceptionnel.

Cependant, une nuance se constate dans l'explication que donnent les indigènes de ces deux paiements.

(1) D'où, probablement, l'origine du mot. Radical : langa = aimer, vouloir, donc accepter. Cfr. en lokonda : iolanga.

L'ikulá serait une simple preuve; le ndanga, au contraire, serait la reconnaissance et l'acceptation des responsabilités : le fiancé se frappe la poitrine (éyakóndela ntólé), comme on dit.

Nous avons dit que ikulá et ndanga sont en voie de se fondre. Ceci est probablement dû à la circonstance que tous deux se font actuellement sous forme d'anneaux de cuivre ou de laiton. Mais à lui seul ce fait ne suffit nullement à fournir une explication adéquate, si la différence indiquée est fondamentale. Une petite nuance sans conséquences pratiques me semble insuffisante pour expliquer ces deux paiements, étant donné surtout qu'entre l'un et l'autre un assez grand laps de temps pouvait jadis s'écouler.

Aussi, nous pouvons nous demander si l'on ne pourrait pas trouver l'indice d'une différence plus profonde dans l'hypothèse d'une coutume primitive.

Par exemple, l'ikulá aurait été le paiement d'une demande en mariage, comparable à nos fiançailles d'Europe. Ensuite, des palabres sans issue naissant de cette situation, on aurait imaginé un système qui permettrait désormais, non d'éviter les différends, mais de les résoudre selon des règles juridiques propres et équitables. Ce système serait le paiement d'un ndanga.

Cette explication est possible, mais peu probable. La loi indigène, qui, dans tous les domaines, se montre si raisonnable, si prudente et sage, si adaptée aux circonstances, aurait-elle laissé la voie libre à pareille source de difficultés dans une matière si importante ? La chose est presque inadmissible pour quiconque est un peu accoutumé à la mentalité des Nkundó. Et puis, la confusion moderne de l'ikulá et du ndanga insinue qu'un des deux fait double emploi. Or, la conséquence en aurait été d'unir les deux paiements et de leur assigner un but identique, ou plutôt — conformément à la pratique — de transférer à l'ikulá la signification de gage, qui, théoriquement, est propre au ndanga. L'existence d'un seul paiement de fiançailles s'accorderait bien mieux de la présente hypothèse que ne le fait l'existence de deux versements distincts, indépendants et séparés dans le temps. Ajoutons encore que l'acceptation d'une responsabilité se fait toujours et dans toute circonstance par la tradition d'un ndanga.

Aussi peut-on imaginer une seconde hypothèse qui paraît plus conforme à la réalité. Originairement, l'ikulá aurait été un paiement de fiançailles, comme dans la première hypothèse, mais la jeune fille n'aurait pas accompagné son mari chez lui : elle devait rester chez ses parents, probablement avec permission au fiancé de la visiter et d'avoir des rapports avec elle, à quoi, nous l'avons vu au chapitre précédent, la loi indigène ne s'oppose pas. Le désir mutuel de cohabitation ne pouvant patienter pendant le laps de temps souvent long qui était requis pour l'arrangement du versement de la dot proprement dite, les parents de la fille auraient donné à leur enfant la permission de suivre l'inclination de son cœur, ce qui, répétons-le, ne soulevait que des difficultés d'ordre juridique, « civil ». Or, pour que le fiancé pût prendre chez lui sa future, il devait d'abord tranquilliser les parents et les libérer de leur responsabilité, en l'assumant lui-même d'une façon officielle, c'est-à-dire en donnant une preuve de sa volonté de supporter toutes les conséquences de son acte. Un gage pareil s'appelle en lonkundó : ndanga. Plus tard, on aurait encore avancé la date du début de la cohabitation, en le permettant dès l'ikulá. De ce fait, la raison d'être du ndanga aurait été, en pratique, transférée à l'ikulá, et le ndanga aurait été conservé comme simple paiement imposé par la coutume, jusqu'au jour où le bouleversement des coutumes anciennes a incité les Nkundó à tirer les conséquences logiques des faits, en fondant les deux paiements en un seul. Ceci est encore confirmé par le fait que l'appellation même d'ikulá tend à disparaître pour faire place à l'unique terme de ndonga. Enfin, pour faire concorder cette hypothèse avec les données du § 4 concernant le terme de bompáka, nous devons supposer qu'autrefois le transfert de la fiancée de sa famille chez son mari n'avait lieu qu'après le ndonga et par conséquent qu'elle ne devenait bompáka qu'à ce moment.

§ 6. Rupture des fiançailles.

La rupture des fiançailles ne comporte pas de grandes difficultés de droit. Tant l'homme que la femme sont libres de rompre s'ils trouvent que leurs caractères ne s'accordent pas, ou que leur union ne promet pas d'être heureuse, ou pour tout autre motif. Il existe pourtant quelques stipulations d'ordre plutôt pratique.

Le jeune homme répudiant sa fiancée la remet entre les mains du ndonga, qui la renvoie dans sa famille.

La femme ne voulant plus continuer la vie commune quitte son fiancé, en l'avertissant ou non, et, passant par le ndonga (actuellement même parfois sans voir ce dernier, ce qui doit être considéré comme une transgression de la règle), rentre chez ses parents.

Dans la pratique, elle peut aussi se rendre directement chez un autre homme. Ceci était, jadis, dangereux, parce que pouvant engendrer une guerre, et était considéré comme contraire à la loi. A présent, la liberté plus grande produite par la colonisation a fait cesser les dangers inhérents à cette façon d'agir. Aussi cette absence de procédure est-elle devenue plus fréquente et commence même à être reconnue normale.

En tout cas, même si la femme a omis de passer par le ndonga, celui-ci est envoyé par le fiancé pour examiner la situation et pour réclamer la restitution des versements déjà exécutés.

Car, à proprement parler, la rupture des fiançailles consiste dans la restitution de l'ikulá-ndonga, par l'entremise du ndonga. Mais on en déduit les cadeaux donnés par la famille de la femme, comme nous l'expliquerons plus amplement au chapitre sur le Divorce. Tout doit être intégralement restitué. La famille de la femme ne peut même pas invoquer le travail fait par leur fille au profit du mari.

A présent toutefois, la coutume entre en vogue de partager l'excédent du montant de la dot sur celui du ndómi (7). Les parents de la femme exigent une certaine indemnisation parce qu'ils considèrent le mari comme ayant perdu les droits à ses valeurs; et s'ils ne les lui retiennent pas entièrement, c'est à cause du respect et de la gêne qu'ils ressentent à l'égard du ndonga, apparenté au fiancé comme à eux-mêmes.

Ce changement de la loi ancestrale, les indigènes tâchent de le motiver comme suit :

1° Les fiançailles sont destinées à s'épanouir en mariage régulier et n'ont de valeur que sous cet aspect. Le droit du fiancé sur l'activité de la femme n'est fondé que sur la nature de cet état, préparation directe à la vie matrimoniale. Si donc l'union ne se parachève pas, le fiancé s'est enrichi aux dépens de ses beaux-parents.

2° La rupture fait perdre aux parents l'espérance légitime et régulière d'une dot intégrale; cette perte est considérée par eux comme lucrum cessans.

Pourtant, cette justification indigène ne suffit pas à expliquer l'origine de ce changement. Car :

1° Vraisemblablement les Nkundó ont simplement imité la pratique d'autres populations congolaises qu'ils ont appris à connaître depuis la colonisation, et leur explication n'est qu'une explication de convenance.

2° Les motifs invoqués en faveur du changement ne sont pas neufs; ils valaient aussi autrefois, et tels quels et en eux-mêmes ils sont donc insuffisants.

3° Si nous reprenons le motif du bénéfice retiré par le fiancé de l'activité de la femme, nous trouvons que le raisonnement repose sur un sophisme. Car la loi nkundó reconnaît, d'un côté, la légitimité de ce bénéfice et, de l'autre, le droit pour chacune des parties de rompre les fiançailles. Le seul fait de la rupture ne peut donc donner lieu à indemnisation, puisqu'il est inadmissible qu'on soit puni pour avoir usé d'un droit.

---

(7) Cfr. plus loin, art. VII.

4° Cette objection vaut également pour le second motif invoqué par les Nkundó : la possibilité de la perte de l'espérance est inhérente à l'essence des fiançailles, puisqu'elles réservent la liberté des parties de ne pas réaliser l'union.

Donc, en eux-mêmes, les motifs allégués doivent être rejetés.

Toutefois, il est possible que certaines circonstances modernes ont modifié plus ou moins l'aspect du problème. Ainsi :

1° L'introduction du salariat et du commerce européen a donné aux Noirs une nouvelle notion de richesses. De ce fait, le bénéfice retiré des fiançailles a beaucoup gagné en importance (développement du commerce, richesses plus grandes et plus variées) de sorte que la valeur économique de la femme a augmenté dans des proportions considérables.

En théorie, ces modifications pourraient justifier une certaine indemnisation. En pratique, toutefois, l'évolution économique a fait accroître le montant du paiement de fiançailles, ce qui contrebalance l'augmentation du bénéfice apporté par la femme.

L'indemnisation, pour cause des avantages économiques, aurait en outre l'heureux effet d'empêcher la déviation possible du système vers une exploitation qui consisterait à prendre des fiancées pour le temps où l'on en a besoin pour un travail extraordinaire et à les renvoyer ce travail fini.

A quoi il faut remarquer que si la précaution est bonne en soi, elle n'est pas indiquée dans les circonstances présentes, car les Nkundó ne pensent même pas à pareille déformation des fiançailles.

3° La colonisation a considérablement renforcé — voire peut-être introduit — dans l'esprit des indigènes l'idée que les grâces d'une femme méritent un salaire. Je pense que cette circonstance a contribué beaucoup plus que les changements économiques à l'origine de la pratique nouvelle; ou, plutôt, que pour justifier celle-ci on s'est surtout basé sur cette idée de l'amour vénal. Or, dans ce cas nous nous trouvons devant un pretium stupri de nature à développer la prostitution, donc contraire à la morale et à l'ordre public.

Et autant on doit applaudir aux évolutions normales de la coutume et à son adaptation aux possibilités d'ascension morale et sociale créées par la colonisation, autant devons-nous réagir contre ses déviations, ses égarements, ses déraillements, sa dérive vers l'exploitation des défauts et des vices.

La concordance du droit nkundó suggère une autre objection contre l'innovation. Comme le divorce ne donne lieu à aucune indemnisation, comment approuver celle-ci dans le cas d'une rupture de fiançailles, qui sont un engagement bien moins fort que le mariage lui-même ? Il est bien vrai que les fiançailles nkundó sont presque un mariage, puisqu'elles comportent la cohabitation, etc.; néanmoins, elles ne constituent pas un lien aussi étroit que l'union définitive, dont elles sont nettement distinctes. La coutume nouvelle mène logiquement à la conclusion qu'il est préférable de parfaire l'union, de la rendre définitive par le versement de la dot intégrale, pour la rompre ensuite au moyen d'un divorce authentique qui n'entraîne pas ce dommage financier.

Enfin, si l'indemnité pour cause d'augmentation du bénéfice que le fiancé a retiré des fiançailles ne peut pas être condamnée comme injuste en soi, elle l'est bien si elle est considérée comme une pénalité infligée pour la rupture. Car elle est restreinte au fiancé, qu'il y ait de sa part tort ou non. En outre, admettre l'indemnité même quand la rupture est due au fait de la femme est de nature à favoriser les fraudes, une véritable escroquerie de la part de la femme et de ses parents, une espèce de trafic de femmes.

Il est encore évident que les riches (polygames) pâtissent beaucoup moins de l'innovation que les monogames, surtout ceux qui adoptent la monogamie comme principe, plus particulièrement les chrétiens, qui n'admettent pas le divorce. Aussi suis-je d'avis que le désir de défendre la polygamie contre la doctrine des missionnaires n'est pas entièrement étrangère à la transformation de la coutume.

Il appert de toutes ces considérations que la question est fort complexe et qu'il serait préférable de voir la loi ancienne rétablie en honneur.

Si la rupture est due à des torts, la coutume nouvelle, bien que non exempte de dangers sérieux, pourrait pourtant être tolérée, mais l'indemnité devrait frapper exclusivement la partie qui est en faute. En outre, il faudrait des torts graves et que, d'autre part, il ne s'agisse pas d'une indemnité forfaitaire, mais de dommages-intérêts en rapport avec l'importance du dommage et la gravité de la faute. Et ici il faut surtout songer aux cas où la rupture serait accompagnée de procédés qui lui donnent un caractère injurieux ou vexatoire. Et bien que l'appréciation en soit très délicate, on ne peut d'aucune façon omettre de tenir compte de ces éléments.

La conservation de la loi ancienne s'impose toujours, il me semble, lorsque la rupture provient d'un simple changement des sentiments sans faute de part ni d'autre, si le cas se présente. Car il vaut mieux n'innover rien que d'innover trop vite.

ARTICLE IV. — WALO — BOMBULAKU.

Le walo ou bombulaku est la masse de la « dot » à payer pour un mariage. Entre le versement du ndonga et celui du walo, des mois, voire des années, peuvent s'écouler. Autrefois, on n'était pas du tout pressé. La seule cause qui faisait raccourcir le délai était le besoin que le père de la femme avait de la dot, afin de se procurer une femme à soi-même, ou à un fils, cousin, etc. Actuellement, pourtant, la surexcitation du désir de richesses, d'un côté, et de l'autre, la possibilité pour les jeunes de quitter leur tribu et leur région pour aller dans les centres chercher les moyens de gagner plus d'argent, de s'habiller plus luxueusement, de satisfaire leur vanité et leur désir de liberté, pour ne pas dire licence ou pire encore, poussent les ayants droit à la dot à réduire le délai du versement du walo, sans que l'unique raison qui existait auparavant soit disparue, au contraire. Et comme conséquence de tout cela, dès que le délai devient un peu long au gré du père de la fille, celui-ci va facilement en saisir les chefs établis par l'Administration, qui sont toujours disposés à s'occuper des cas matrimoniaux, tant à cause du bénéfice pécuniaire qu'ils en escomptent, que pour accroître leur prestige en s'ingérant dans un domaine si important, où la loi ancestrale ne leur reconnaît pas le moindre droit d'intervention, pour la simple raison qu'elle ignore capitas et chefs au sens européen.

§ 1. Terminologie.

Le terme walo est employé par les Bonkoso, Bongili, Bombwanja, Ionda; bombulaku, au contraire, par les Wángatá, Bakáala, Lifumba, Injɔ́lɔ́ et Boángi (et les Elángá de Losanganya). Les Bombomba l'appellent, à l'imitation de leurs voisins, les Ekonda, elámbela.

Ce dernier mot pourrait être en rapport avec -lámba = préparer les aliments. Qu'on compare ce que nous avons dit, à l'article II, sur la rémunération des ndongo. L'étymologie de bombalaka ne m'apparaît nullement. Toutefois la fortune pour walo.

D'après les règles de l'étymologie nkundó, ce mot peut être en connexion avec un radical -al, ou avec un dérivé à sens augmentatif-intensitif -alol. Je ne connais aucun exemple actuellement existant du radical simple. Mais nous trouvons des formes dérivées : alej, et alol, ou, après expulsion du premier l, -aol.

-Alej signifie = disposer en couches; par exemple, des œufs dans un panier, des briques dans un four. Le substantif qui en dérive est jwalo = couche, et par analogie : rayon d'étagère, et, par extension, ce qu'on met entre les couches pour les protéger, et encore : la doublure d'un vêtement. Il est difficile de rapprocher ici le mot walo en cause.

-Aol existe tant avec un sens augmentatif-intensitif qu'avec un sens réversif. Ce dernier donnerait un substantif avec o final haut. Comme dans jwaló, de aola longánjo = déverser des légumes. Il doit donc être exclu.

Avec les autres sens, ce verbe entre en combinaison avec plusieurs substantifs. D'abord avec walo, dans le sens de faire la chasse au rabat du menu gibier [1]. Ensuite, on l'emploie dans le sens de : rassembler et ramasser les herbes, l'ivraie, les balayures, les cendres. L'action se nomme jwalo.

La conclusion la plus naturelle est certainement de mettre le substantif sous discussion en rapport avec -aol dans son dernier sens. Ce serait une allusion à la quantité relativement grande de valeurs déposées. D'ailleurs, l'action de ramasser les ivraies, etc. et celle de ramasser les anneaux, etc. sont pratiquement et physiquement identiques. Pourtant une difficulté s'oppose à cette explication : c'est qu'on ne dit pas -sola walo, mais sola walo, sola bakimbá, tant pour ce versement particulier que [illegible] confondu pour les paiements et présents divers qui sont liés au mariage, tels que les paiements funéraires et les cadeaux à l'occasion du décès (*).

---

[1] On dit aussi tomba walo.

En tout état de cause, le terme walo n'a pas la moindre connexion étymologique avec le mot wáli = épouse, ni avec le radical -bal = épouser.

§ 5. Nature des valeurs de walo.

Le walo consiste surtout en anneaux de cuivre ou de laiton. On y ajoute des objets forgés (bifeko), comme des lances, des couteaux, des haches. Une partie peut être, actuellement, en simples barres de laiton ou de fer (acier). En outre, on peut donner des chèvres, une femelle équivalant à 5-6 (maintenant 10) anneaux, un bouc à 2-4 (à présent 6-7) bakonga. Une ou plusieurs cloches elónjá sont fort prisées.

Le paiement de chaînes en fer ou en cuivre (bengónyola), de colliers de diverses sortes de perles, de dents de léopard n'existe pratiquement plus. Autrefois certaines perles avaient une grande valeur, telles les grandes rondes blanc bleuâtre (lonyóngu, pl. nnyóngu), valant 1 konga pièce; les grandes oblongues, cylindriques ou rectangulaires, noirâtres, de 2-3 cm. de diamètre sur 5-10 cm. de longueur (nkóngé), valant un esclave ou, actuellement, 20-25 bakonga pièce.

C'est le cuivre qui a la plus grande importance, cuivre rouge (konga) ou jaune (kóngó). De là, payer la « dot » s'entend souvent exprimer par ónga la kóngó la konga.

L'affirmation du R. P. Kaptein, dans Congo, 1922, I, pp. 332-343, que les valeurs primitives étaient des benkata, des bingelele et des mitako repose sur une erreur.

(*) Le verbe -sola indique plutôt la quantité d'objets qu'on ramasse et est employé dans beaucoup d'autres combinaisons. Un substantif ejolé signifie une grande quantité d'objets (spécialement de poissons).

Les deux premiers genres de valeurs, appelés aussi bendjongo dans certaines tribus, étaient employés uniquement par les Ntómbá du lac Tumba et les Ekonda limitrophes (Bosanga, Balingá, Lonyanyanga, etc.). Les mitako, en lonkundo : nsoŋgɔ, s. lɔsoŋgɔ, ne sont pas indigènes ; ils étaient l'unité monétaire introduite par l'État Indépendant.

Le paiement, au moins partiel, en monnaie ou en objets d'origine européenne (étoffes, couvertures, machines à coudre, malles, ustensiles de ménage, etc.) s'introduit lentement et, avant la crise, était déjà fort en honneur entre « gens de Blancs ».

§ 4. Provenance des valeurs.

Le jeune homme obtient les valeurs pour le paiement de la dot de diverses façons. La plus commune et en même temps la plus conforme au statut familial et social des Nkundó est l'emploi des valeurs dotales reçues pour une sœur, tante, nièce, cousine, etc.

S'il n'a pas de parentes (ekánanyí, bonsána) ou qu'il n'en reste plus à la dot desquelles il a droit, il peut recevoir de son père une partie ou la totalité du capital dont il a besoin. Les divers membres de sa famille lui procurent qui 2, qui 5, qui 10-20 anneaux qu'ils ont pu épargner sur des dots reçues, ou qu'ils ont touchés comme belonga (Cf. chap. VI, art. V, § 1), comme rémunération d'une prestation quelconque (travail, jugement de palabres, intervention comme ndonga, etc.), comme prix de vente d'animaux, de ruisseaux, d'étangs, comme dédommagement ou en acquit d'une dette quelconque.

C'est bien le plus grand contretemps pour un amoureux que de ne pas trouver toute prête la dot, mais de devoir aller à la quête des valeurs un peu partout. Ces déplacements lui prennent un temps considérable. Car tout cela ne va pas en grande vitesse avec une nervosité à l'européenne. Il ne suffit point d'envoyer une missive à l'oncle X ou au mari de la tante Y, ni même de se présenter chez eux et exposer le but de la visite, pour pouvoir immédiatement repartir avec un cadeau. On le retient pendant des jours et des semaines : « Attends, je vais t'en chercher; reste encore un peu, nous verrons ensuite; il y a si longtemps qu'on ne t'a plus vu, tu ne peux t'en aller si vite, etc. » Très souvent même, le jeune homme a tout intérêt à ne pas quitter ses hôtes; il doit parfois gagner leur bienveillance en rendant quantité de menus services, et même par des prestations plus importantes, comme l'aide au défrichement, à la construction d'une case, à la chasse, etc. Pour des Européens il faudrait une patience d'ange. Mais même aux jeunes indigènes, qui parfois sont relativement excités et nerveux, surtout par le désir de terminer l'affaire dotale, et qui, en tout cas, ne possèdent pas encore le calme des personnes plus âgées chez lesquelles ils se sont rendus, il faut souvent une grande dose de résignation et de persévérance. D'où les proverbes : bokámo nkáfundólákó bakonga ndé lifaya = l'hôte ne déterre pas d'anneaux à l'étranger (on enterre souvent les bakonga pour les mieux garder, précaution utile surtout jadis aux temps des bagarres entre villages et des razzias); et bonsua w'ôkámé nkásingólákó bakonga ndé lokendo = la bouche d'un enfant ne déroule pas les anneaux en voyage (déroule, c'est-à-dire des pieds de la femme du parent visité).

Il n'existe donc pas de trésor familial spécial dans lequel les divers membres puissent puiser pour se procurer des épouses. Mais comme les dots versées proviennent, en principe, des dots reçues et que, d'autre part, pour toutes les richesses provenant de la famille comme telle (c'est-à-dire non produites par l'activité strictement privée et personnelle d'un membre) les Nkundó admettent une certaine communauté de propriété, on peut dire, dans un sens, que tous les membres de la famille ont un droit solidaire aux richesses communes, mais uniquement dans la mesure de la parenté et conformément à la réglementation imposée par le conseil familial.

Même les membres de la famille qui n'y sont pas obligés en stricte justice, ne se montrent pas réfractaires à donner à leur parent la part qu'ils peuvent lui réserver. Pourtant je connais des cas isolés où l'on refuse l'assistance, soit par avarice, soit par opposition au mariage projeté. Pourtant, il y a là un manquement aux devoirs de parenté, plus ou moins grave d'après les relations entre les personnes en cause (1). Ce refus n'existe pratiquement pas de la part de la famille maternelle. Car celle-ci s'est enrichie par la dot reçue pour la mère du jeune homme, qui, de ce fait, a toujours droit à la dot payée pour une des filles de la nkita de sa mère (nkita = femme acquise au moyen de la dot versée).

Il se rend donc chez son oncle maternel (nyangompáme (2), ou chez les Wángatá, Bakáala, Lifumba : nyangóbóka). Celui-ci l'aide toujours, s'il en a tant soit peu les moyens. Le neveu peut même, sous certaines conditions, faire valoir des droits sur le harem de son oncle. Mais il faut bien distinguer les cas. (N'oublions pas que nous parlons d'un jeune homme qui n'a pas déjà reçu d'épouse dans son propre clan.)

1° Le droit de l'oncle prime, s'il n'a qu'une seule femme, même si celle-ci est la nkita de la mère du neveu. Toutefois, si cette femme ne sait vivre en paix avec son mari, et qu'elle tâche toujours de rompre le mariage et de se rendre chez un autre, la famille même du mari peut intervenir pour assigner l'épouse au neveu, si les deux s'aiment. On veut, par là, éviter qu'elle se rende ailleurs : il est préférable qu'elle demeure dans la parenté. En effet, la rupture implique la famille dans un long procès de restitution, source de difficultés nombreuses et cessation de rapport — si l'on peut s'exprimer ainsi — des valeurs dotales.

(1) Rappelons la remarque, déjà faite, qu'il faut toujours bien distinguer entre devoir de justice et devoir de parenté, d'amitié, de bienséance, de politesse, de convenance sociale.

(2) Littéralement : mère masculine.

2° Si l'oncle a deux femmes, le neveu ne peut faire valoir de droit que sur celle qui a été acquise au moyen de la dot touchée pour sa propre mère. L'exception citée sous 1° vaut à fortiori ici.

Dans les deux cas cités jusqu'ici, la famille, toutefois, tâche de calmer l'ardeur du neveu, en lui assignant la dot future d'une cousine, et ne cède à ses instances que si aucune autre issue ne se présente.

3° Si l'oncle possède plusieurs femmes (quatre, cinq ou davantage), toutes acquises avec des valeurs étrangères à la dot de sa sœur, mère du neveu, ce dernier a toujours le droit de prendre une de ces femmes.

En toute hypothèse, le neveu est obligé de quitter son clan paternel (wisé) et d'entrer dans la famille de sa mère (bonyangó). Il n'y est d'ailleurs pas opposé. Car dans la parenté de son père il n'a — par supposition — ni richesse, ni avenir, tandis que chez son oncle il trouve tout ce qu'il lui faut. Il y est considéré comme propre enfant, voire comme chef de ses cousins et cousines. Il est leur père (isé) et, de ce fait, a la préséance sur eux, et il peut succéder à son oncle comme patriarche de famille. En outre, à la mort de son oncle, il hérite toujours d'une de ses veuves et devient le premier — souvent l'unique — successeur après les frères du défunt (*).

Ces droits valent même si le neveu a des richesses chez lui. Dans ce cas, — rarissime, puisque d'ordinaire il préfère demeurer dans son propre clan, — il ne les exerce pourtant pas si l'oncle n'a que deux ou trois femmes (dont pourtant il peut hériter), ou si d'autres proches parents sont dans le besoin. Car il manquerait gravement à l'amour familial (lólá) et il en serait sévèrement réprimandé.

(*) Ce droit à l'héritage vaut même s'il continue à résider dans son propre clan; auquel cas, pourtant, il lui est impossible de devenir héritier principal ou unique.

C'est en considération de tout cela que le neveu (bɔ́nankíná = fils de la sœur) exagère parfois ses droits. Là-dessus se basent les proverbes : nkɔi ákumb'omingɔ́ lokombo = le léopard prend le propriétaire de la clôture de chasse (c'est-à-dire le chasseur); bɔ́nankíná éfɔmola nyangoempámá wálí nd'éóko = le neveu ravit à l'oncle son épouse même sur son propre domaine; bɔ́nankíná ale ingonja y'ilóko = le neveu est un bâton au-dessus (de la tête), édition nkundó de l'épée de Damoclès.

Bref, le neveu a droit à l'aide de son oncle maternel, s'il se fixe chez lui, et est adopté par lui. A la mort des oncles il devient chef de famille et héritier. Mais son droit ne vient qu'après celui des frères de l'oncle en question, qui sont ses « mères » aussi. S'il demeure dans son propre clan, il est aidé, peut même obtenir la dot d'une de ses cousines, nées de la nkíta de sa mère, et reçoit une part de l'héritage s'il est abondant. Ces droits sont basés sur le fait que l'oncle s'est enrichi grâce aux valeurs lui cédées pour le mariage de sa sœur, par le clan du neveu.

Enfin, si le jeune homme n'a même pas de proches parents, tous étant morts, et que pour une raison quelconque (dissipation, dettes, exploitation du faible par le fort) il n'ait pas de patrimoine, force lui est de se procurer la dot par son travail personnel : sculpture, chasse, pêche, placement de pièges d'éléphants, de trappes, de clôtures de chasse, défrichement, ou, actuellement, travail au service des Blancs. Autrefois il avait encore la ressource de la guerre ou des razzias, qui lui permettaient de se rendre maître de valeurs ou de prisonniers à revendre comme esclaves. La richesse que quelqu'un a ainsi acquise par sa propre industrie s'appelle baúmbá (bakonga, etc.) bá mpambɔ́ɔ́kɔ (littéralement : de force des bras).

§ 4. Montant du walo.

Autrefois le montant moyen d'un walo était de 20 à 30 bikonga, ou leur équivalent, n'importe quel objet entrant dans la composition de la dot pouvant être ramené à une valeur en cuivre, le nkonga étant pour ainsi dire l'unité monétaire nkundó.

Actuellement, dans les chefferies avoisinant Flandria, le minimum est de 35-40 anneaux. Chez les Boangi et Injolo, les anneaux étant notablement plus grands et contenant un poids plus élevé de cuivre ou de laiton, le minimum peut être de 20. Ailleurs il atteint un chiffre bien plus élevé.

Généralement, le prix du walo dépasse ce minimum plutôt rare. La moyenne approche de 60 à 80 anneaux. Il est extrêmement rare qu'on atteigne 200 et surtout que ce chiffre soit dépassé (Cfr. des cas ci-dessous.)

Les différences dans le montant du walo proviennent surtout de la richesse relative des parties contractantes, du prix que le mari attache à sa femme, de la cupidité des parents de celle-ci, du montant de la dot réclamée pour la femme qu'ils veulent se procurer avec la dot de leur fille (sœur), sans oublier les cas où, la femme ayant quitté un mari précédent, la nouvelle dot doit servir au remboursement de celui-ci.

Le montant du walo peut encore être augmenté pour satisfaire la vanité de la femme qui veut paraître supérieure à ses compagnes, ou du mari qui désire être reconnu comme très riche (1). Dans une dispute, il n'est pas rare d'entendre une femme se glorifier : « Je ne suis pas une esclave, mon mari a versé pour moi autant et autant; — toi, ton mari ne t'aime pas, ou il est pauvre, il n'a versé qu'autant ».

(1) A l'homme qui paie beaucoup pour sa femme on applique l'épithète honorifique de [illegible] « puits et champignon. Au puits, tous peuvent trouver de l'eau à satiété; de leur côté, les champignons pullulent. Ainsi beaucoup peuvent profiter des richesses apportées par le gendre.

De la part du mari, il existe une seconde raison : se mieux attacher la femme et les beaux-parents. Plus le walo est élevé, moins il est facile de rompre l'union, car plus il y aura de difficultés pour rembourser. Aussi verse-t-on une plus grande somme pour une femme à laquelle on tient davantage. Les beaux-parents, de leur côté, diront : il faut rester en bonnes relations avec notre gendre, car il est généreux et riche ». Et lorsque survient une palabre dans le ménage et que leur fille veut quitter ou quitte effectivement son mari, ils seront d'autant plus disposés à faire tout ce qui est en leur pouvoir pour aplanir le différend et lui faire réintégrer le domicile conjugal. « Nous avons touché tant de valeurs, diront-ils, où trouverons-nous de quoi rembourser ? »

En cas de remariage de leur fille, les parents peuvent exiger, outre le montant requis pour rembourser le premier mari, un supplément pour eux-mêmes. Pourtant, il n'est pas de mise d'exagérer : on se contente d'une dizaine ou quinzaine d'anneaux. Il s'ensuit que plus un femme a eu de maris successifs, plus sa dot est élevée.

La cause principale qui fait diminuer le prix du walo a été toujours et est encore de payer le bosongo (cfr. art. IX) simultanément avec le walo, ou immédiatement après. Ceci explique le walo minime des cas 21, 25, 27, 28 b de la liste qui suit. Actuellement, une nouvelle raison peut se trouver entre chrétiens, lorsque, par exemple, une frère veut aider sa sœur veuve à ne pas devoir attendre trop longtemps le remariage (cas 28); ou pour des orphelines nées quelque part dans un centre éloigné, et ainsi plus ou moins délaissées par leur famille (cas 17). Pour donner une idée du montant du walo, je transcris quelques cas de nos cahiers de dots de la Mission de Flandria. Derrière les noms des femmes j'indique la tribu d'origine, puis la valeur versée (en bakonga), enfin l'année du mariage. Les numéros du début marquent les numéros d'ordre dans les cahiers (¹).
